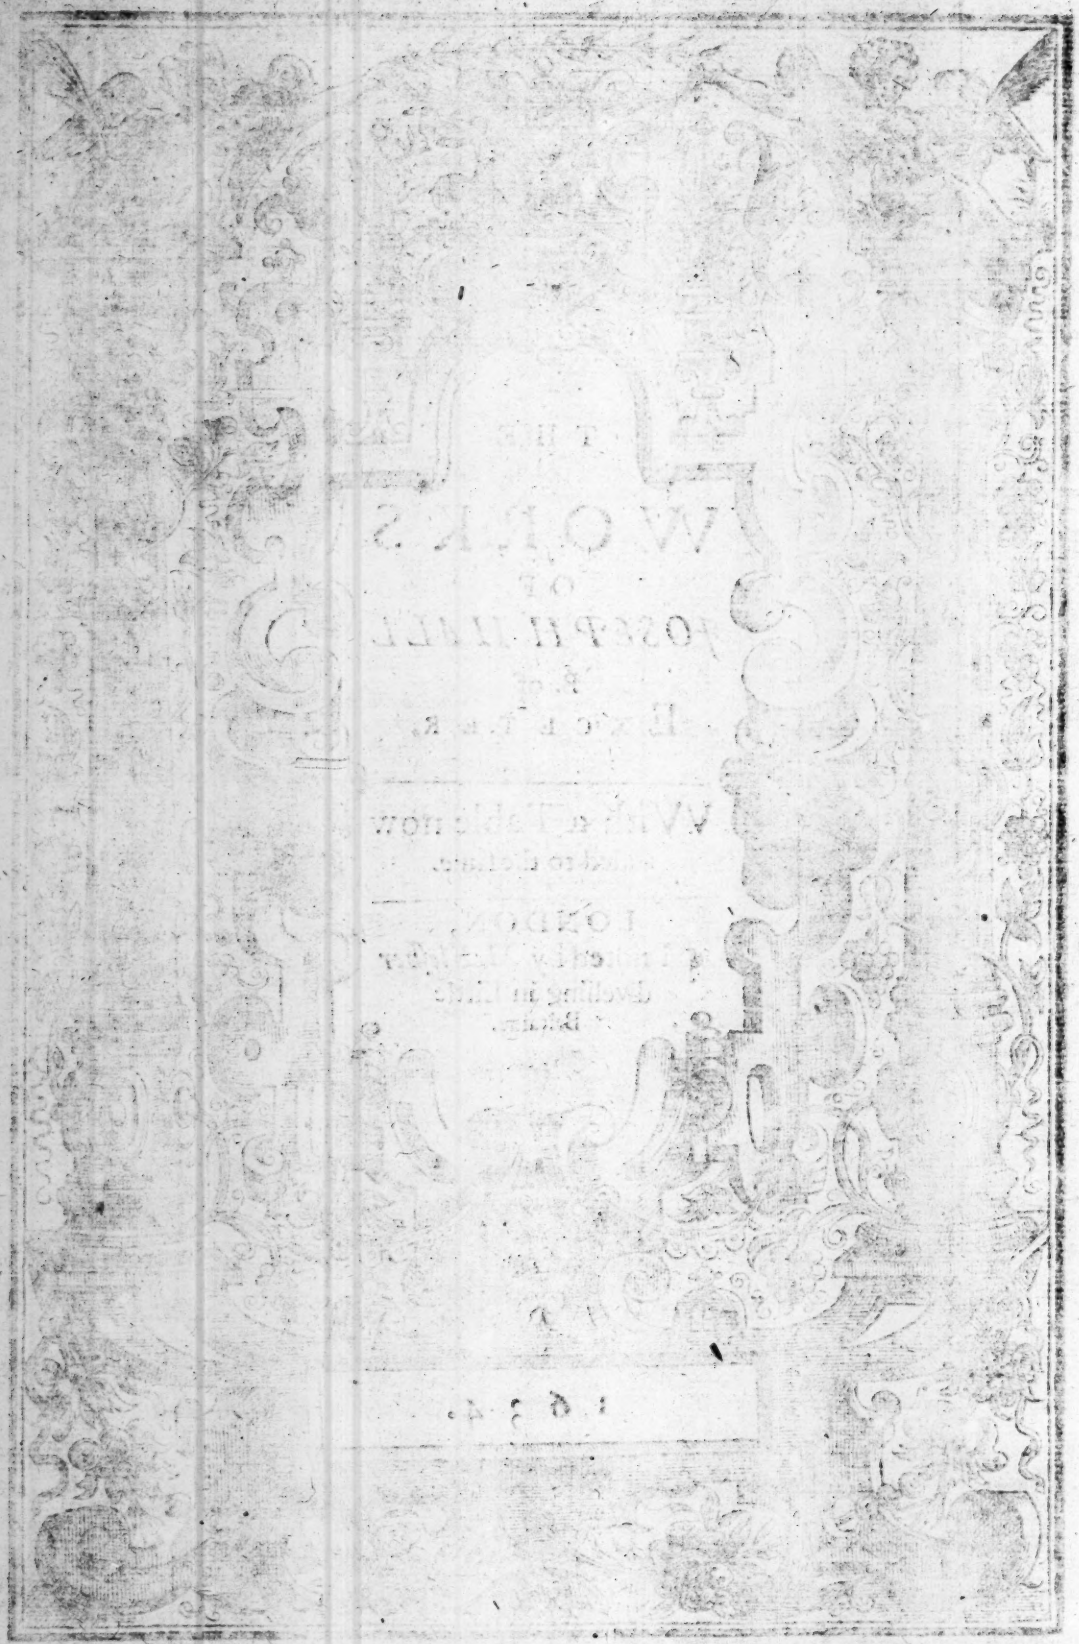
Prot. 20



TO THE HIGH AND MIGHTY MONARCH OVR DEARE AND DREAD SOVERAIGNE LORD, IAMES, BY THE GOOD providence of God, King of Great BRITAINE, FRANCE, and IRELAND; the most worthy and most able Defender of the Faith, and most gracious Patron of the Church;

All Peace and Happinesse.

Most gracious Soveraigne:

I Cannot so over-love this issue of my owne braine, as to hold it worthy of your Majesties judicious eyes; much lesse of the highest Patronage under Heaven: Yet now, my very dutie hath bidden me looke so high; and tels me it would be no lesse than injurious, if I should not lay downe my worke, where I owe my service; and that I should offend if I presumed not, Besides; whither should the rivers runne, but into the Sea? It is to your Majestie (under the Highest) that we owe both these sweet opportunities of good, and all the good fruites of these happy opportunities: If we should not therefore freely offer to your Majestie some præmetiall handfulls of that croppe, whereof you may challenge the whole harvest, how could wee bee but shamelesly unthankefull? I cannot praise my Present otherwise than by the truth of that heart from which it proceedeth: Onely this I may say; that seldome any man hath offered to your Royall hands a greater bundle of his owne thoughts (Some whereof, as it must needs fall out amongst so many, have beene confessed profitable) nor perhaps more varietie of discourse: for here shall your Majestie finde Moralitie, like a good handmaid, waiting on Divinitie; and Divinitie, like some great Lady, every day in severall dresses; Speculation interchanged with experience; Positive Theologie with Polemicall; Textuall with discursorie; Popular with Scholasticall.

I cannot dissemble my joy to have done this little good: And if it bee the comfort, and honour of your unworthy servant, that the God of heaven hath vouchsafed to use his hand in the least service of his Church; How can it be but your Crowne and rejoycing, that the same God hath set apart your Majesty, as a glorious instrument of such an universall good to the whole Christian World? It was a mad conceit of that old Heresiarch, which might justly take his name from madnes; That an huge Giant beares up the earth with his shoulder; which he changes every thirtieth yeere, for ease; and with the removall causes an Earthquake. If by the device he had meant onely an Emblem of Kings (as our ancient Mythologists under their Saint George, and Christopher, have described the Christian Souldier, and good Pastor) he had not done amisse; for surely, the burthen of the whole world lies on the shoulders of Soveraigne authoritie; and it is no marvell if the Earth quake in the change. As Kings are to the World, so are good Kings to the Church: None can be so blinde, or envious, as not to grant, that the whole Church of God upon earth, rests her selfe principally (next to her stay above) upon your Majesties Royall supportation; You may truly say with David, Ego sustineo columnas ejus. What wonder is it then, if our tongues and pens blesse you; if wee be ambitious of all occasions, that may testifie our cheerefull gratulations of this happines to your Highnesse, & ours in you? Which, our humble prayers unto him, by whom Kings reigne, shall labour to continue, till both the Earth and Heavens be truly changed.

The unworthiest of your Majesties servants,

Ios. Hall.

MEDITATIONS

AND

DIVINE AND MORALL,

Serving for direction in Christian and Civill Practice

Imprinted at London, 1638.

TO THE RIGHT WORSHIPFVLL, SIR Robert Drury, Knight,

ALL INCREASE OF TRVE Honour and Vertue.

SIR, that I have made these my homely Aphorismes publike, needs no other reason, but that though the world is furnished with other writings, even to satietie and surfet, yet of those which reduce Christianity to practice, there is (at least) scarce enough: wherein (yet) I must needs confesse, I had some eye to my selfe: for, having after a sort vowed this austere course of judgment and practice to my selfe, I thought it best to acquaint the world with it, that it may either witnesse my answerable proceeding, or checke mee in my straying there-from. By which meanes, so many men as I live amongst, so many monitors I shall have, which shall point mee to my owne rules, and upbraid me with my aberrations. Why I have dedicated them to your name, cannot be strange to any that knowes you my patron, and mee your Pastor. The regard of which bond, easily drew mee on to consider that whereas my body, which was ever weake, began of late to languish more, it would not be inexpedient (at the worst) to leave behinde mee this little monument of that great respect which I deservedly beare beare you. And if it ſhall pleaſe God to reprieve me untill a longer day; yet it ſhall not repent me, to have ſent this unworthy ſcrowle, to wait upon you in your neceſſary abſence; neither ſhall it be, I hope, bootleſſe for you, to adjoyne theſe my meane ſpeculations unto thoſe grounds of vertue you have ſo happily laid: to which if they ſhall adde but one ſcruple, it ſhall be to me ſufficient joy, contentment, recompence. From your Hal-ſted. Decemb. 4.

Your Worſhips humbly devoted,

Ios. Hall.

THE FIRST CENTVRIE OF MEDITATIONS AND VOWES, Divine and Morall.

1

IN Meditation, thoſe, which begin heavenly thoughts, and proſecute them not, are like thoſe which kindle a fire under greene wood, and leave it, ſo ſoone as it but begins to flame; leeſing the hope of a good beginning, for want of ſeconding it with a ſutable proceeding: when I ſet my ſelfe to meditate, I will not give over, till I come to an iſſue. It hath beene ſaid by ſome, that the beginning is as much as the middeſt; yea, more than all: but I ſay, the ending is more than the beginning.

There is nothing (but Man) that reſpecteth greatneſſe: Not God; not death; not judgement. Not God: he is no accepter of perſons. Not nature: we ſee the ſonnes of Princes borne as naked as the pooreſt: and the poore child as faire, well-favoured, ſtrong, wittie, as the heire of Nobles. Not diſeaſe, death, judgement: they ſicken alike, die alike, fare alike after death. There is nothing (beſides naturall men) of whom goodneſſe is not reſpected. I will honour greatneſſe in others: but for my ſelfe, I will eſteeme a dram of goodneſſe, worth a whole world of greatneſſe.

As there is a fooliſh wiſdome, ſo there is a wiſe ignorance; in not prying into Gods Arke; not enquiring into things not revealed. I would faine know all that I need, and all that I may: I leave Gods ſecrets to himſelfe. It is happie for me, that God makes me of his Court, though not of his Councell.

As there is no vacuitie in nature, no more is there ſpiritually. Every veſſell is full; if not of liquor, yet of ayre: ſo is the heart of man; though (by nature) it is emptie of grace, yet it is full of hypocriſie, and iniquity. Now, as it is filled with grace, ſo it is empty of his evill qualities; as in a veſſell, ſo much water as goes in, ſo much aire goes out: but mans heart is a narrow-mouthed veſſell, and receives grace but by drops; and therefore takes a long time to emptie and fill. Now, as there be differences in degrees, and one heart is neerer to fulneſſe than another: ſo the beſt veſſell is not quite full, while it is in the body; becauſe there are ſtill remainders of corruption. I will neither be content with that meaſure of grace I have, nor impatient of Gods delay; but every day I will endevour to have one drop added to the reſt: ſo my laſt day ſhall fill up my veſſell to the brim.

God will haue all whole or none.

Satan would ſeeme to be mannerly and reaſonable: making, as if he would be content with one halfe of the heart, whereas God challengeth all or none: as (indeed) he hath moſt reaſon to claime all, that made all. But this is nothing but a craftie fetch of Satan; for he knowes, that if he have any part, God will have none: ſo, the whole falleth to his ſhare alone. My heart (when it is both whole, and at the beſt) is but a ſtrait and unworthy lodging for God: if it were bigger and better, I would reſerve it all for him. Satan may looke in at my doores by a tentation: but he ſhall not have ſo much as one chamber-roome ſet apart for him to ſojourne in.

I ſee that in naturall motions, the neerer any thing comes to his end, the ſwifter it moveth. I have ſeene great rivers, which at their firſt riſing out of ſome hills ſide, might be covered with a buſhell; which, after many miles, fill a very broad channell; and drawing neere to the Sea, do even make a little Sea in their owne bankes: So the wind at the firſt riſing, as a little vapour from the crannies of the earth, and paſſing forward about the earth, the further it goes, the more bluſtering and violent it waxeth. A Chriſtians motion (after he is regenerate) is made naturall to God-ward: and therefore, the neerer he comes to heaven, the more zealous he is. A good man muſt not be like Ezekias Sunne, that went backward; nor like Ioſhuahs Sunne, that ſtood ſtill; but Davids Sunne, that (like a Bridegroome) comes out of his chamber, and as a Champion rejoyceth to runne his race: only herein is the difference, that when he comes to his high noone, he declineth not. How ever therefore, the minde (in her naturall faculties) followes the temperature of the body, yet in theſe ſupernaturall things ſhee quite croſſes it. For with the coldeſt complexion of age, is joyned in thoſe that are truly religious, the ferventeſt zeale and affection to good things: which is therefore the more reverenced, and better acknowledged, becauſe it cannot be aſcribed to the hot ſpirits of youth. The Devill himſelfe deviſed that old ſlander of early holineſſe; A Young Saint, an old Devill. Somtimes young Devils have proved old Saints; never the contrary: but true Saints in youth, do alwayes prove Angels in their age. I will ſtrive to be ever good; but if I ſhould not finde my ſelfe beſt at laſt, I ſhould feare I was never good at all.

Conſent harteneth ſinne; which a little diſlike would have daunted at firſt. As we ſay, There would be no theeves, if no receivers: ſo would there not be ſo many open mouths to detract and ſlander, if there were not ſo many open eares to entertaine them. If I cannot ſtop another mans mouth from ſpeaking ill, I will either open my mouth to reprove it, or elſe I will ſtop mine eares from hearing it; and let him ſee in my face, that he hath no roome in my heart.

Such men are as yr companions are.

I have oft wondered how fiſhes can retaine their freſh taſte, and yet live in ſalt waters; ſince I ſee that every other thing participates of the nature of the place wherein it abides. So, the waters paſſing thorow the channels of the earth, vary their favour with the veines of ſoile, thorow which they ſlide. So, brute creatures, tranſported from one region to another, alter their former qualitie, and degenerate by little and little. The like danger I have ſeene in the manners of men, converſing with evill companions in corrupt places: For, beſides that, it blemiſheth our reputation, and makes us thought ill, though wee be good; it breeds in us an inſenſible declination to ill; and workes in us, if not an approbation, yet a leſſe diſlike of thoſe ſinnes, to which, our eares and eyes are ſo continually inured. I may have a bad acquaintance: I will never have a wicked companion.

Expectation, in a weake minde, makes an evill, greater; and a good, leſſe: but in a reſolved mind, it digeſts an evill, before it come: and makes a future good, long before preſent. I will expect the worſt, becauſe it may come: the beſt, becauſe I know it will come.

10

Some promiſe what they cannot doe, as Satan to Chriſt; ſome, what they could, but meane not to doe, as the ſons of Iacob to the Sechemites; ſome, what they meant for the time.

A time, and after, retrait, as Laban to Iacob; some, what they doe also give, but unwillingly, as Herod; some, what they willingly give, and after repent them, as Iosua to the Gibeonites: So great diffrust is there in men, whether from his impotence, or faithlesnesse. As in other things, so in this, I see God is not like man: but in what ever he promises, he approves himselfe most faithfull, both in his ability and performances. I will therefore ever trust God on his bare word; even with hope, besides hope, above hope, against hope; and onwards I will relie on him for small matters of this life: for how shall I hope to trust him in impossibilities, if I may not in likelihoods? How shall I depend on him for raising my body from dust, and saving my soule; if I mistrust him for a crust of bread, towards my preservation?

B If the world would make me his Minion, he could give me but what he hath. And what hath he to give? but a smoke of honour, a shadow of riches, a sound of pleasures, a blast of fame; which when I have had in the best measure, I may be worse, I cannot bee better: I can live no whit longer, no whit merrier, no whit happier. If he professe to hate me, what can he doe, but disgrace me in my name, impoverish mee in my estate, afflict me in my body? in all which, it is easie, not to be ever the more miserable. I have beene too long beguiled with the vaine semblances of it; Now henceforth, accounting my selfe borne to a better world, I will in an holy loftinesse beare my selfe as one too good to bee enamoured of the best pleasures, to bee danted with the greatest miseries of this life.

13

C I see there is no man so happy as to have all things; and no man so miserable, as not to have some. Why should I looke for a better condition than all others? If I have somewhat, and that of the best things; I will in thankefulnesse enjoy them, and want the rest with contentment.

14

Constraint makes an easie thing toilsome; whereas againe, love makes the greatest toile pleasant. How many miles doe wee ride and run, to see one silly beast follow another, with pleasure! which if we were commanded to measure, upon the charge of a Superiour, we should complaine of wearinesse. I see the folly of the most men, that make their lives miserable, and their actions tedious, for want of love to that they must doe: I will first labour to settle in my heart a good affection to heavenly things: so Lord, thy yoke shall be easie, and thy burthen light.

15

D I am a stranger even at home: therefore if the dogs of the world barke at me, I neither care nor wonder.

16

It is the greatest madnesse in the world, to bee an hypocrite in religious profession. Men hate thee, because thou art a Christian, so much in appearance. God hates thee double, because thou art but in appearance: so, while thou hast the hatred of both, thou hast no comfort of thy selfe. Yet if thou wilt not be good as thou seemest; I hold it better to seeme ill as thou art. An open wicked man doth much hurt with notorious sinnes; but an hypocrite doth at last more shame goodnesse, by seeming good. I had rather be an open wicked man, than an hypocrite: but I had rather bee no man, than either of them.

E When I cast downe mine eyes upon my wants, upon my sinnes, upon my miseries; me thinkes no man should be worse, no man so ill as I; my meanes so many, so forcible, and almost violent; my progresse so small, and insensible; my corruptions so strong, my infirmities so frequent and remedilesse; my body so unanswerable to my minde. But when I looke up to the blessings that God hath enriched me withall, me thinkes I should soone be induced to thinke none more happy than my selfe: God is my friend, and my father: the world not my master, but my slave: I have friends not many, but so tried that I dare trust them: an estate not superfluous, not needy; yet neerer to defect, than abundance: A calling, if despised of men, yet honourable with God: a body not so so strong, as to admit security, (but often checking me in occasion of pleasure) nor yet so weake, as to afflict me continually: A mind not so furnished with knowledge, that I may boast of it; nor yet so naked, that I should despaire of obtaining it. My miseries afford me joy, mine enemies advantage; my secure is layd up for another world. And if thou thinke I have said too much good of my selfe, either I am thus, or I would be.

The worldlings life is (of all other) most miserable. For, that which is his God doth not alwayes favour him; that which should be, never.

There are three messengers of death; Casualtie, Sickenesse, Age. The two first are doubtfull; since many have recovered them both: the last is certaine. The two first are sudden: the last leasurely and deliberate. As for all men, upon so many summons, so especially for an old man, it is a shame to be unprepared for death; for where others see they may die, hee sees he must die. I was long agone old enough to die: but if I live till age, I will thinke my selfe too old to live longer.

19

I will not care what I have; whether much, or little. If little, my account shall be lesse; if more, I shall doe the more good, and receive the more glory.

20

I care not for any companion, but such as may teach me somewhat; or learne somewhat of me. Both these shall much pleasure me; (one as an Agent, the other as a Subject to worke upon) neither know I, whether more. For though it be an excellent thing to learne; yet I learne, but to teach others.

21

If earth (that is provided for mortality, and is possessed by the Makers enemies) have so much pleasure in it, that Worldlings thinke it worth the account of their heaven: such a Sunne to enlighten it, such an heaven to wall it about, such sweet fruits and flowres to adorne it, such varietie of creatures, for the commodious use of it: What must heaven needs bee, that is provided for God himselfe, and his friends? How can it bee lesse in worth, than God is above his creatures, & Gods friends better than his enemies? I will not onely be content, but desirous to be dissolved.

22

It is commonly seene, that boldnesse puts men forth before their time, before their abilitie. Wherein we have seene many, that (like Lapwings, and Partridges) have run away with some part of their shell on their heads: whence it followes, that as they began boldly, so they proceed unprofitably, and conclude not without shame. I would rather be haled by force of others to great duties, than rush upon them unbidden. It were better a man should want worke, than that great workes should want a man answerable to their weight.

23

I will use my friend as Moses did his rod: While it was a rod, he held it familiarly in his hand: when once a Serpent, he ran away from it.

24

I have seldome seene much ostentation, and much learning met together. The Sun, rising, and declining makes long shadowes; at mid-day when hee is at highest, none at all. Besides that, skill when it is too much showne, loseth the grace: as fresh coloured wares, if they be often opened, lose their brightnesse, and are soiled with much handling. I had rather applaud my selfe for having much, that I shew not; than that others should applaud me for shewing more than I have.

25

An ambitious man is the greatest enemie to himselfe, of any in the world besides: for he still torments himselfe with hopes, and desires, and cares: which he might avoid, if he would remit of the height of his thoughts, and live quietly. My only ambition shall be, to rest in Gods favour on earth, and to be a Saint in heaven.

26 There

There was never good thing easily come by. The Heathen man could say, God sels knowledge for sweat; and so he doth honour for jeopardy. Never any man hath got either wealth or learning with ease. Therefore the greatest good must needs bee most difficult. How shall I hope to get Christ, if I take no paines for him? And if in all other things the difficultie of obtaining, whets the minde so much the more to seeke; why should it in this alone daunt mee? I will not care what I doe, what I suffer, so I may winne Christ. If men can endure such cutting, such lancing, and searing of their bodies, to protract a miserable life yet a while longer; what paine should I refuse for eternitie?

27

B If I die, the world shall misse me but a little; I shall misse it lesse. Not it me, because it hath such store of better men: Not I it, because it hath so much ill, and I shall have so much happinesse.

28

Two things make a man set by; Dignitie, and Desert. Amongst fooles, the first without the second is sufficient: amongst wise men, the second without the first. Let me deserve well, though I bee not advanced. The conscience of my worth shall cheere me more in others contempt, than the approbation of others can comfort me, against the secret checke of my owne unworthinesse.

29

C The best qualities doe so cleave to their subjects, that they cannot be communicated to others. For whereas patrimony and vulgar account of honour follow the bloud, in many generations; Vertue is not traduced by propagation, nor learning bequeathed by our Will to our heires; lest the givers should wax proud, and the receivers negligent. I will account nothing my owne, but what I have gotten; nor that mine owne, because it is more of gift than desert.

30

Then onely is the Church most happy, when Truth and Peace kisse each other; and then miserable, when either of them balke the way, or when they meet and kisse not. For truth, without peace, is turbulent: and peace, without truth, is secure injustice. Though I love peace well, yet I love maine truths better. And though I love all truths well, yet I had rather conceale a small truth, than disturbe a common peace.

31

D An indiscreet good action, is little better than a discreet mischiefe. For in this the doer wrongs onely the Patient: but in that other, the wrong is done to the good action: for both it makes a good thing odious (as many good tales are marr'd in telling) and besides, it prejudices a future opportunitie. I will rather let passe a good gale of wind, and stay on the shore; than lanch forth, when I know the wind will be the contrary.

32

The World teacheth me, that it is madnesse to leave behinde me those goods that I may carry with me: Christianitie teacheth me, that what I charitably give alive, I carrie with me dead: and experience teacheth me, that what I leave behind, I lose. I will carrie that treasure with me by giving it, which the worldling loseth by keeping it: so, while his corps shall carrie nothing but a winding cloth to his grave, I shall be richer under the earth, than I was above it.

33

E Every worldling is an hypocrite: for while his face naturally lookes upward to heaven, his heart grovels beneath on the earth: yet if I would admit of any discord in the inward and outward parts; I would have an heart that should looke up to heaven in an holy contemplation of the things above, and a countenance cast downe to the earth, in humiliation. This onely dissimilitude is pleasing to God.

The heart of man is a short word, a small substance; scarce enough to give a Kite one meale, yet great in capacitie; yea, so infinite in desire, that the round Globe of the world cannot fill the three corners of it. When it desires more, and cries, Give, give, I will set it over to that infinite good, where the more it hath, it may desire more, and see more to be desired: when it desires but what it needeth, my hands shall soone satisfie it. For, if either of them may containe it, when it is without the body; much more may both of them fill it, while it is within. A

With men it is a good rule; To trie first, and then to trust: with God it is contrary; I will first trust him (as most wise, omnipotent, mercifull) and trie him afterwards. I know it is as impossible for him to deceive me, as not to be.

36

As Christ was both a Lambe, and a Lion: so is every Christian; A Lambe, for patience in suffering, and innocencie of life: A Lion, For boldnesse in his innocencie. I would so order my courage and mildnesse, that I may bee neither Lion-like in my conversation, nor sheepish in the defence of a good cause. B

37

The godly sow in teares, & reape in joy. The seed-time is commonly wateriſh, and lowring. I will be content with a wet spring, so I may be sure of a cleere and joyfull Harvest.

38

Every man hath an Heaven and an Hell. Earth is the wicked mans Heaven; his Hell is to come: on the contrary, the godly have their Hell upon earth; where they are vexed with tentations, and afflictions, by Satan and his complices: their Heaven is above in endlesse happinesse. If it be ill with me on earth, it is well my torment is so short, and so easie: I will not be so covetous to hope for two Heavens.

39

Man, on his death-bed hath a double prospect: which in his life-time the interposition of pleasure and miseries debarred from him. The good man lookes upward, & sees heaven open, with Steven, and the glorious Angels ready to carrie up his soule: The wicked man lookes downeward, and sees three terrible spectacles; Death, judgment, Hell, one beyond another, and all to be passed thorow by his soule. I marvell not that the godly have beene so cheerefull in death, that those torments, whose very sight hath overcome the beholders, have seemed easie to them. I marvell not that a wicked man is so loth to heare of death; so deject, when he feeleth sickneſse, and so desperate when he feeleth the pangs of death; nor that every Balaam would faine die the death of the righteous. Henceforth I will envie none, but a good man: I will pitty nothing so much as the prosperitie of the wicked. C

40

Not to be afflicted, is a signe of weakneſse. For, therefore God imposeth no more on mee, because he sees I can beare no more. God will not make choyce of a weake Champion. When I am stronger, I will looke for more: and when I sustaine more, it shall more comfort me, that God findes me strong, than it shall grieve me to be prest with an heavie affliction. D

41

That the wicked have peace in themselves, is no wonder: they are as sure as Tentation can make them. No Prince makes warre with his owne subjects. The godly are still enimies; therefore they must looke to be assaulted both by stratagems and violence. Nothing shall more joy me, than my inward quietneſse. A just warre is a thousand times more happy, than an ill-conditioned peace.

42

Goodneſse is so powerfull, that it can make things simply evill (namely, our sins) good to us: not good in nature, but good in the event; good, when they are done, not good to be done. Sinne is so powerfull, that it can turne the holiest ordinances of God into it selfe: but herein our sinne goes beyond our goodneſse; That sinne defiles a man or action otherwise good; but all the goodneſse of the world cannot justifie one sinne; as the holy flesh in the skirt, makes not the bread holy that toucheth it; but the uncleane touching an holy thing, defileth it. I will loath every evill for it owne sake: I will doe good, but not trust to it. E

A Fooles measure good actions by the event after they are done; wise men before-hande, by judgement upon the rules of reason and faith. Let mee doe well; let God take charge of the successe. If it be well accepted, it is well; if not my thanke is with God.

44

He was never good man that amends not. For, if he were good, he must needs desire to be better. Grace is so sweet, that who-ever tasts of it, must needs long after more: and if he desire it, he will endevour it; and if he doe but endevour, God will crowne it with successe. Gods familie admitteth of no Dwarfes (which are unthriving, and stand at a stay) but men of measures. What ever become of my bodie, or my estate, I will ever labour to finde somewhat added to the stature of my soule.

45

B Pride is the most dangerous of all sinnes. For, both it is most insinuative (having crept into Heaven and Paradise) and most dangerous where it is. For, where all other Tentations are about evill, this alone is conversant only about good things; and one dram of it poisons many measures of grace. I will not bee affraid more of doing good things amisse, than of being proud when I have well performed them.

46

Not only commission makes a sinne. A man is guiltie of all those sinnes he hateth not. If I cannot avoid all, yet I will hate all.

47

Prejudice is so great an enemie to truth, that it makes the minde uncapable of it. In matters of faith, I will first lay a sure ground and then beleeve, though I cannot argue; holding the conclusion in spight of the premisses: but in other lesse matters, I will not so
C forestall my minde with resolution, as that I will not bee willing to be beter informed. Neither will I say in my selfe, I will hold it, therefore it shall bee truth: but this is truth, therefore I will hold it. I will not strive for victorie, but for truth.

Drunkennesse and Covetousnesse doe much resemble one another. For the more a man drinkes, the more hee thirsteth: and the more he hath, still the more he coveteth. And for their effects, besides other, both of them have the power of transforming a man into a beast; and of all other beasts, into a swine. The former is evident to sence: the other, though more obscure, is no more questionable. The covetous man in two things plainly resembleth a swine; That hee ever roots in the earth, not so much as looking towards heaven: That hee never doth good till his death. In desiring, my rule shall bee necessitie of nature, or estate. In having, I will account that my good, which D doth me good.

I acknowledge no master of Requests in Heaven, but one; Christ my Mediator. I know I cannot be so happie as not to need him; nor so miserable, that he should contemne me. I will alwaies aske, and that of none but where I am sure to speed; but where there is so much store, that when I have had the most, I shall leave no lesse behinde. Though numberlesse drops be in the Sea; yet if one be taken out of it, it hath so much the lesse, though insensible: but God, because he is infinite, can admit of no diminution. Therefore are men niggardly, because the more they give, the lesse they have: but thou, Lord, maiest give what thou wilt, without abatement of thy store. Good praiers never came weeping home: I am sure I shall receive either what I aske, or what I should aske.

50

E I see that a fit bootie many times makes a theefe: and many would be proud, if they had but the common causes of their neighbours. I account this none of the least favours of God, That the world goes no better forward with me: For, I feare, if my estate were better to the world, it might be worse to God. As it is an happy necessity that inforceth to good; so is that next happy that hinders from evill.

51

It is the basest love of all others, that is for a benefit; for herein wee love not another so much as our selves. Though there were no heaven, O Lord, I would love thee:

New

Now there is one, I will esteeme it, I will desire it; yet still I will love thee for thy goodnesse sake. Thy selfe is reward enough, though thou broughtest no more. A

52

I see men point the field, and desperatly jeopard their lives (as prodigall of their bloud) in the revenge of a disgracefull word against themselves; while they can bee content to heare God pulled out of Heaven with blasphemy, and not feele so much as a rising of their bloud. Which argues our cold love to God, and our over-fervent affection to our selves. In mine owne wrongs, I will hold patience laudable, but in Gods injuries, impious.

It is an hard thing to speake well; but it is harder to be well silent, so as it may be free from suspition of affection, or sullennesse, or ignorance: else loquacity, and not silence, would be a note of wisdome. Herein I will not care how little, but how well. B
He said well for this; Not that which is much, is well; but that which is well is much.

There is nothing more odious than fruitlesse old age. Now (for that no tree beares fruit in Autumne, unlesse it blossome in the spring) to the end that my age may be profitable, and laden with ripe fruit; I will endevour that my youth may bee studious, and flowred with the blossomes of learning and observation.

55

Revenge commonly hurts both the offerer, and sufferer: as we see in the foolish Bee (though in all other things commendable, yet herein the patterne of fond spightfulnesse) which in her anger invenometh the flesh, and loseth her sting, and so lives a Drone ever after. I account it the only valour, To remit a wrong; and will applaud it to my selfe as right Noble and Christian, that I might hurt, and will not. C

56

He that lives well, cannot chuse but die well. For, if hee die suddenly, yet he dies not unpreparedly: if by leasure, the conscience of his well-lead life makes his death more comfortable: But it is seldome seene, that he which liveth ill, dieth well. For the conscience of his former evils, his present paine, and the expectation and feare of greater, so take up his heart, that hee cannot seeke God. And now it is just with God, not to be sought, or not to be found, because he sought to him in his life time, and was repulsed. Whereas therefore there are usually two maine cares of good men, to Live well, and Die well: I will have but this one; to Live well.

57

With God there is no free man, but his servant, though in the Gallies: no slave, but the sinner, though in a Palace: none noble but the vertuous, if never so basely descended: none rich, but hee that possesseth God, even in rags: none wise, but hee that is a foole to himselfe and the world: none happy, but he whom the world pities: Let me be free, noble, rich, wise, happy to God, I passe not what I am to the world. D

58

When the mouth prayeth, man heareth; when the heart, God heareth. Every good prayer knocketh at heaven for a blessing: but an importunate prayer pierceth it, (though as hard as brasse) and makes way for it selfe into the eares of the Almightie. And as it ascends lightly up, carried with the wings of faith; so it comes ever laden downe againe upon our heads. In my prayers my thoughts shall not be guided by my words, but my words shall follow my thoughts.

59

If that servant were condemned of evill, that gave God no more than his owne, which hee had received; what shall become of them that rob God of his owne? If God gaine a little glory by me, I shall gaine more by him. I will labour so to husband the stocke that God hath left in my hands, that I may returne my soule better than I received it; and that hee may take it better than I returne it. E

60

Heaven is compared to an hill; and therefore is figured by Olympus, among the Heathen; by mount Sion, in Gods Booke: Hell, contrariwise, to a pit. The ascent to the

A the one is hard therefore, and the descent to the other easie and headlong: and so as if wee once beginne to fall, the recoverie is most difficult: and not one (of many) staies till hee comes to the bottome. I will bee content to pant, and blow, and sweat in climbing up to heaven: as, contrarily, I will bee warie of setting the first step downward towards the pit. For, as there is a Iacobs Ladder into heaven, so there are blinde staires that goe winding downe into death, whereof each makes way for other. From the object is raised an ill suggestion: suggestion drawes on delight, delight consent, consent endevour, endevour practice, practice custome, custome excuse, excuse defence, defence obstinacie, obstinacie boasting of sinne, boasting, a reprobate sense. I will watch over my waies: and doe thou Lord watch over mee, that I may avoid the first degrees of sinne. And if those overtake my frailtie, yet keepe me that presumptuous sinnes prevaile not over mee. Beginnings, are with more ease and safetie declined, B when wee are free; than proceedings when wee have begunne.

It is fitter for youth to learne, than teach; and for age to teach, than learne: and yet fitter for an old man to learne than to be ignorant. I know I shall never know so much, that I cannot learne more; and I hope I shall never live so long, as till I be too old to learne.

62

I never loved those Salamanders, that are never well but when they are in the fire of contention. I will rather suffer a thousand wrongs, than offer one: I will suffer an hundred, rather than returne one: I will suffer many ere I will complaine of one, and endevour to right it by contending. I have ever found, that to strive with my superiour, is furious; with my equall, doubtfull; with my inferiour, sordid and base; with any, full of unquietnesse.

The praise of a good speech standeth in words and matter: Matter, which is as a faire and well-featur'd body; Elegance of words, which is as a neat and well-fashioned garment. Good matter, slubbered up in rude and careless words, is made lothsome to the hearer; as a good body mis-shapen with unhandsome clothes. Elegancie without soundnesse, is no better than a nice vanitie. Although therefore the most hearers are like Bees, that goe all to the flowers, never regarding the good herbs (that are of as wholesome use, as the other of faire shew:) yet let my speech strive to be profitable; plausible, as it happens: better the coat be mis-shapen, than the body.

I see, that as black and white colours to the eyes, so is the vice and vertue of others to the judgement of men. Vice gathers the beames of the sight in one; that the eye may D see it and be intent upon it: Vertue scatters them abroad; and therefore hardly admits of a perfect apprehension. Whence it comes to passe, that (as judgement is according to sense) we do so soone espy, and so earnestly censure a man for one vice; letting passe many laudable qualities undiscerned, or at least unacknowledged. Yea, whereas every man is once a foole, and doth that (perhaps) in one fit of his folly, which he shall at leasure repent of (as Noah, in one houres drunkennesse, uncovered those secrets, which were hid six hundred yeeres before) the world is hereupon ready to call in question all his former integritie, and to exclude him from the hope of any future amendment. Since God hath given me two eyes; the one shall be busied about the present fault that I see, with a detesting commiseration; the other about the commendable qualities of the offender; not without an unpartiall approbation of them. So shall I doe God no wrong, in robbing him of the glory of his gifts, mixed with infirmities: nor yet, in the meane time, E encourage Vice; while I doe distinctly reserve for it a due proportion of hatred.

God is above man; the brute creatures under him; he set in the midst. Lest he should be proud that he hath infinite creatures under him, that One is infinite degrees above him. I doe therefore owe awe unto God; mercy to the inferiour creatures; knowing, that they are my fellowes, in respect of creation; whereas there is no proportion betwixt me, and my Maker.

One ſaid, It is good to inure thy youth to ſpeake well, for good ſpeech is many times drawne into the affection: But, I would feare, that ſpeaking well without feeling, were the next way to procure an habituall hipocriſie. Let my good words follow good affections; not goe before them. I will therefore ſpeake as I thinke: but withall, I will labour to thinke well; and then I know, I cannot but ſpeake well.

67

When I conſider my ſoule, I could be proud, to thinke of how divine a nature & qualitie it is: but when I caſt downe mine eyes to my body (as the Swan to her black legs) and ſee what loathſome matter iſſues from the mouth, noſtrils eares, pores, and other paſſages, and how moſt carrion-like of all other creatures it is after death; I am juſtly aſhamed to thinke, that ſo excellent a gueſt dwels but in a meere cleanly dunghill.

68

Euery worldling is a mad man. For, beſides that he preferreth profit and pleaſure to Vertue, the World to God, Earth to Heaven, Time to Eternity; he pampers the body, and ſtarves the ſoule. He feedes one Fowle an hundred times, that it may feed him but once; and ſeekes all Lands and Seas for dainties, not caring whether any, or what repaſt he prouideth for his ſoule. He cloaths the body with all rich ornaments, that it may be as faire without as it is filthy within; whileſt his ſoule goes bare and naked, having not a rag of knowledge to cover it. Yea, hee cares not to deſtroy his ſoule, to pleaſe the body, when for the ſalvation of the ſoule, he will not ſo much as hold the body ſhort of the leaſt pleaſure. What is, if this be not, a reaſonable kind of madneſſe? Let me enjoy my ſoule no longer, than I preferre it to my body. Let me have a deformed, leane, crooked, unhealthfull, neglected body; ſo that I may find my ſoule ſound, ſtrong, well furniſhed, well diſpoſed both for earth and heaven.

69

Aſa was ſicke but of his feet, farre from the heart: yet becauſe he ſought to the Phyſitians, not to God, he eſcaped not. Ezechiah was ſicke to die: yet becauſe he truſted to God not to Phyſitians, he was reſtored. Meanes, without God, cannot helpe: God, without meanes, can, and often doth. I will uſe good meanes, not reſt in them.

70

A mans beſt monument is his vertuous actions. Fooliſh is the hope of immortality, and future praiſe, by the coſt of ſenſeleſſe ſtone; when the Paſſenger ſhall only ſay, Here lyes a faire ſtone, and a filthy carkaſſe. That only can report thee rich: but for other praiſes, thy ſelfe muſt build thy monument alive; and write thy owne Epitaph in honeſt and honourable actions. Which are ſo much more noble than the other, as living men are better than dead ſtones: Nay, I know not if the other be not the way to worke a perpetuall ſucceſſion of infamie, whiles the cenſorious Reader, vpon occaſion thereof, ſhall comment upon thy bad life: whereas in this, every mans heart is a Tombe, and every mans tongue writeth an Epitaph upon the well-behaved. Either I will procure me ſuch a monument, to be remembred by; or elſe it is better to be inglorious, than infamous.

71

The baſeſt things are ever moſt plentifull. Hiſtory and experience tell us, that ſome kind of Mouſe breedeth 120. young ones in one neſt: whereas the Lion, or Elephant, beareth but one at once. I have ever found, The leaſt wit, yeeldeth the moſt words. It is both the ſureſt and wiſeſt way, to Speake little and Thinke more.

72

An evill man is clay to God, wax to the Devill. God may ſtampe him into powder, or temper him anew; but none of his meanes can melt him. Contrariwiſe, a good man is Gods wax, and Satans clay: he relents at every looke of God, but is not ſtirred at any tentation. I had rather bow than breake, to God: but, for Satan, or the world I had rather be broken in peeces with their violence, than ſuffer my ſelfe to be bowed unto their obedience.

73

It is an eaſie matter for a man to bee careleſſe of himſelfe; and yet much eaſier to bee enamoured

A 73

It is an easie matter for a man to be careleſſe of himſelfe; and yet much easier to be enamoured of himſelfe. For, if he be a Chriſtian, whiles he contemneth the world perfectly, it is hard for him to reſerve a competent meaſure of love to himſelfe: if a worldling, it is not poſſible but he muſt over-love himſelfe. I will ſtrive for the meane of both; and ſo hate the world, that I may care for my ſelfe: and ſo care for my ſelfe, that I be not in love with the world.

74

I will hate popularity and oſtentation (as ever dangerous; but moſt of all in Gods buſineſſe) which who ſo affect, doe as ill ſpokeſmen; who when they are ſent to wooe for God, ſpeake for themſelves. I know how dangerous it is to have God my Rivall.

75

B Earth affords no ſound contentment. For, what is there under Heaven not troubleſome, beſides that which is called pleaſure? and, that, in the end, I finde moſt irkſome of all other. My ſoule ſhall ever looke upward for joy, and downward for penitence.

76

God is ever with me, ever before me. I know, he cannot but over-ſee me, alwaies; though my eyes be held that I ſee him not: yea, he is ſtill within me, though I feele him not: neither is there any moment, that I can live without God. Why doe I not, therefore, alwaies live with him? Why doe I not account all houres loſt, wherein I enjoy him not?

There is no man ſo happy as the Chriſtian. When he looks up unto Heaven, hee thinkes, That is my home: the God that made it, and owes it, is my father; the Angels, more glorious in nature than my ſelfe, are my attendants: mine enemies are my
C vaſſals. Yea, thoſe things which are the terribleſt of all to the wicked, are moſt pleaſant to him. When he heares God thunder above his head, he thinkes, This is the voice of my father. When he remembreth the Tribunall of the laſt judgement, he thinkes, It is my Saviour that ſits in it: when death, he eſteemes it but as the Angell ſet before Paradiſe; which with one blow admits him to eternall joy. And (which is moſt of all) nothing in earth or hell can make him miſerable. There is nothing in the world worth envying, but a Chriſtian.

As man is a little world: ſo every Chriſtian is a little Church within himſelfe. As the Church, therefore, is ſometimes in the wane, through perſecution; other times in her full glory and brightneſſe: ſo let me expect my ſelfe ſomtimes drooping under Tentations, and ſadly hanging downe the head for the want of the feeling of Gods preſence;
D at other times carried with the full ſaile of a reſolute aſſurance, to Heaven: knowing, that as it is a Church at the weakeſt ſtay, ſo ſhall I, in my greateſt dejection, hold the Child of God.

Tentations on the right hand, are more perillous than thoſe on the left; and deſtroy a thouſand, to the others ten: as the Sunne, more uſually, cauſeth the traveller to caſt off his cloake, than the wind. For, thoſe on the left hand miſcarry men but two waies: to diſtruſt, and deniall of God; more rare ſinnes: but the other to all the reſt, wherewith mens lives are ſo commonly defiled. The ſpirit of Chriſtians is like the Engliſh Iear; whereof we reade, that it is fired with water, quenched with oyle. And theſe two, proſperity and adverſitie, are like heat and cold: the one gathers the powers of the ſoule together, and makes them abler to reſiſt, by uniting them: the other diffuſes them; and,
E by ſuch ſeparation, makes them eaſier to conquer. I hold it therefore as Praiſe-worthy with God, for a man to contemne a proffered honour, or pleaſure, for conſcience ſake; as, on the racke not to deny his profeſſion. When theſe are offered, I will not nibble at the bait; that I be not taken with the hooke.

God is Lord of my body alſo: and therefore challengeth as well reverent geſture, as inward devotion. I will ever, in my prayers, either, ſtand, as a ſervant, before my maſter; or kneele, as a ſubject, to my Prince.

81 I have

81

I have not beene in others breasts: but, for my owne part, I never tasted of ought, that might deserve the name of pleasure. And, if I could, yet a thousand pleasures cannot countervaile one torment: because the one may be exquisite; the other, not without composition. And, if not one torment, much lesse a thousand. And if not for a moment, much lesse for eternitie. And, if not the torment of a part, much lesse of the whole. For if the paine but of a tooth be so intolerable, what shall the racking of the whole body be? And if of the body; what shall that be, which is primarily of the soule? If there be pleasures that I heare not of, I will be wary of buying them so over-deare.

82

As Hypocrisie is a common counterfeit of all vertues: so there is no speciall vertue, which is not (to the very life of it) seemingly resembled, by some speciall vice. So, devotion is counterfeited by superstition; good thrift, by niggardlinesse; charitie, with vaine-glorious pride. For, as charity is bounteous to the poore, so is vaine-glory to the wealthy: as charity sustaines all, for truth; so pride, for a vaine praise: both of them make a man courteous and affable. So the substance of every vertue is in the heart: which, since it hath not a window made into it, by the Creator of it, (but is reserved under locke and key for his owne view) I will judge only by appearance. I had rather wrong my selfe, by credulitie; than others, by unjust censures and suspitions.

83

Every man hath a kingdome within himselfe: Reason, as the Princesse, dwels in the highest and inwardest ro me: the senses are the Guard and attendants on the Court; without whose aid, nothing is admitted into the Presence: The supreme faculties (as will, memory, &c.) are the Peeres: The outward parts, and inward affections, are the commons: Violent Passions are as Rebels, to disturbe the common peace. I would not be a Stoicke, to have no passions: for that were to overthrow this inward government God hath erected in me; but a Christian, to order those I have. And for that I see, that as (in commotions) one mutinous person drawes on more; so in passions, that one makes way for the extremitie of another, (as excesse of love causeth excesse of griefe, upon the losse of what we loved:) I will doe as wise Princes use, to those they misdoubt for faction; so hold them downe, and keepe them bare, that their very impotencie and remisnesse shall afford me securitie.

84

I looke upon the things of this life, as an owner; as a stranger. As an owner, in their right; as a stranger, in their use. I see, that owning is but a conceit, besides using: I can use (as I lawfully may) other mens commodities as my owne; walke in their woods, looke on their faire houses, with as much pleasure as my owne; yet againe, I will use my owne, as if it were anothers; knowing, that though I hold them by right, yet it is only by Tenure at will.

85

There is none like to Luthers three masters; Prayer, Tentation, Meditation. Tentation stirs up holy Meditation: Meditation prepares to prayer: and Prayer makes profit of Tentation; and fetcheth all divine knowledge from Heaven. Of others, I may learne the Theorie of Divinitie; of these onely, the Practice. Other masters teach me by rote, to speake Parrot-like of heavenly things: these alone, with feeling and understanding.

86

Affectation is the greatest enemie both of doing well, and good acceptance of what is done. I hold it the part of a wise man, to endevour rather that fame may follow him, than goe before him.

87

I see a number, which, with Shimei, whiles they seeke their servant, which is riches, lose their soules. No worldly thing shall draw me without the gates, within which God hath confined me.

88

It is an hard thing for a man to finde wearinesse in pleasure, while it lasteth; or contentment in paine, while he is under it. After both (indeed) it is easie: yet both of these must

A must be found in both; or elſe we ſhall be drunken with pleaſures, and overwhelmed with ſorrow. As thoſe, therefore, which ſhould eat ſome diſh over-deliciouſly ſweet doe allay it with tart ſawce, that they may not be cloyed: and thoſe that are to receive bitter pills (that they may not be annoyed with their unpleaſing taſte) rowle them in Sugar: So in all pleaſure it is beſt to labour, not how to make them moſt delightfull, but how to moderate them from exceſſe: and in all ſorrowes, ſo to ſettle our hearts in true grounds of comfort, that we may not care ſo much for being bemoaned of others, as how to be moſt contented in our ſelves.

In wayes, we ſee Travellers chuſe not the faireſt, and greeneſt, if it be either croſſe or contrary; but the neereſt, though miry and uneven: ſo, in opinions, let me follow not the plauſibleſt, but the trueſt, though more perplexed.

B 90

Chriſtian ſociety is like a bundle of ſtickes laid together, whereof one kindles another. Solitary men have feweſt provocations to evill; but againe feweſt incitations to good. So much, as doing good, is better than not doing evill, will I account Chriſtian good fellowſhip better than an Eremitiſh and melancholike ſolitarineſſe.

Of Solitarines.

I had rather confeſſe my ignorance, than falſly profeſſe knowledge. It is no ſhame; not to know all things, but it is a iuſt ſhame to over-reach in any thing.

92

Sudden extremity is a notable triall of faith, or any other diſpoſition of the ſoule. For as in a ſudden feare, the bloud gathers to the heart, for guarding of that part which is principall: ſo the powers of the ſoule combine themſelves in an hard exigent, C that they may be eaſily judged of. The faithfull (more ſuddenly than any caſualtie) can lift up his heart to his ſtay in Heaven: Whereas the worldling ſtands amazed, and diſtraught with the evill; becauſe hee hath no refuge to flie unto. For, not being acquainted with God in his peace, how ſhould he but have him to ſeeke in his extremitie? When therefore ſome ſudden ſtitch girds me in the ſide, like to be the meſſenger of death; or when the ſword of my enemie, in an unexpected aſſault, threatens my bodie; I will ſeriouſly note how I am affected: ſo the ſuddeneſt evill, as it ſhall not come unlooked for, ſhall not goe away unthought of. If I finde my ſelfe couragious, and heavenly-minded, I will rejoyce in the truth of Gods grace in me; knowing that one dram of tried faith is worth a whole pound of ſpeculative; and that, which once ſtood by me, will never faile me: If dejected, and heartleſſe, herein I will acknowledge cauſe of humiliation; and, with all care and earneſtneſſe, ſeeke to ſtore my ſelfe againſt D the dangers following.

The worldling & wicked haue no refuge to flie vnto.

The Rules of civill policie may well be applied to the minde. As therefore for a Prince, that he may have good ſucceſſe againſt either Rebels, or forraine enemies, it is a ſure axiome, Divide and Rule: but when he is once ſeated in the Throne over loyall ſubiects, Vnite and Rule: ſo, in the regiment of the ſoule, there muſt be variance ſet in the judgement, and the conſcience and affections; that, that which is amiſſe may be ſubdued: but, when all parts are brought to order, it is the only courſe to maintaine their peace; that, all ſeeking to eſtabliſh and helpe each other, the whole may proſper. Alwayes to be at warre, is deſperate: alwayes at peace, ſecure, and over-Epicure-like. I doe account a ſecure peace, a juſt occaſion of this civill diſſention in my ſelfe; and a true Chriſtian peace, the end of all my ſecret warres: which when I have atchieved, I E ſhall reigne with comfort; and never will be quiet, till I have atchieved it.

I brought ſinne enough with me into the world to repent of all my life, though I ſhould never actually ſinne: and ſinne enough actually every day, to ſorrow for, though I had brought none with me into the world: but laying both together, my time is rather too ſhort for my repentance. It were madneſſe in me to ſpend my whole life in jollity and pleaſure, whereof I have ſo ſmall occaſion; and neglect the opportunitie of my ſo juſt ſorrow: eſpecially, ſince before I came into the World, I ſinned; after I am gone out of the world, the contagion of my ſinne paſt, ſhall adde to the guilt of it: yet, in both theſe eſtates, I am uncapable of repentance. I will doe that while I may, which, when I have neglected, is unrecoverable. A

Ambition is torment enough for an enemie. For, it affords as much diſcontentment in enjoying, as in want; making men like poyſoned Rats: which when they have taſted of their bane, cannot reſt, till they drinke; and then can much leſſe reſt, till their death. It is better for me to live in the wiſe mens ſtockes, in a contented want; than in a fooles Paradiſe, to vex my ſelfe with wilfull unquietneſſe.

96

It is not poſſible but a conceited man muſt be a foole. For, that over-weening opinion he hath of himſelfe, excludes all opportunity of purchaſing knowledge. Let a veſſell be once full of never ſo baſe liquor, it will not give roome to the coſtlieſt; but ſpils beſide, whatſoever is infuſed. The proud man, though he be empty of good ſubſtance, yet is full of conceit. Many men had proved wiſe, if they had not ſo thought themſelves. I am empty enough to receive knowledge enough; Let me thinke my ſelfe but ſo bare as I am, and more I need not. O Lord, doe thou teach me how little, how nothing I have; and give me no more, than I know I want. B

97

Every man hath his turne of ſorrow: whereby (ſome more, ſome leſſe) all men are in their times miſerable. I never yet could meet with the man that complained not of ſomwhat. Before ſorrow come, I will prepare for it: when it is come, I will welcome it: when it goes, I will take but halfe a farewell of it; as ſtill expecting his returne.

98

There be three things that follow an injury ſo farre as it concerneth our ſelves; (for, as the offence toucheth God, it is above our reach) Revenge, Cenſure, Satisfaction; which muſt be remitted of the mercifull man. Yet not all at all times: but revenge alwaies, leaving it to him that can, and will doe it: Cenſure oft-times; Satisfaction ſometimes. He that deceives me oft, though I muſt forgive him, yet charitie bindes me not, not to cenſure him for untruſty; and he, that hath endammaged me much, cannot plead breach of charitie, in my ſeeking his reſtitution. I will ſo remit wrongs, as I may not encourage others to offer them; and ſo retaine them, as I may not induce God to retaine mine to him. C

99

Garments that have once one rent in them, are ſubject to be torne on every naile, and every bryer; and glaſſes, that are once crackt, are ſoone broken: ſuch is mans good name once tainted with juſt reproach. Next to the approbation of God, and the teſtimony of mine owne conſcience, I will ſeeke for a good reputation amongſt men: not by cloſe cariage, concealing faults, that they may not be knowne to my ſhame: but avoiding all vices, that I may not deſerve it. The efficacie of the agent, is in the Patient well diſpoſed. It is hard for me ever to doe good, unleſſe I be reputed good. D

100

Many vegetable, and many brute creatures exceed man in length of age. Which hath opened the mouthes of Heathen Philoſophers to accuſe Nature, as a ſtep-mother to Man; who hath given him the leaſt time to live, that onely could make uſe of his time, in getting knowledge. But herein Religion doth moſt magnifie God, in his wiſdome and juſtice; teaching us, that other creatures live long, and periſh to nothing, onely Man recompences the ſhortneſſe of his life, with eternitie after it; that the ſooner hee dies well, the ſooner he comes to perfection of knowledge, which he might in vaine ſeeke below: the ſooner hee dies ill, the leſſe hurt he doth with his knowledge. There is great reaſon then, why man ſhould live long; greater, why he ſhould die early. I will never blame God, for making mee too ſoone happy; for changing my ignorance, for knowledge; my corruption, for immortalitie; my infirmities, for perfection. Come Lord Ieſus, come quickly. E

MEDITATIONS AND VOWES,

DIVINE AND MORALL.

THE SECOND CENTVRY.

By Ios. Hall.

¶ Imprinted at LONDON, 1633.

ANCHORA FIDEI

TO THE RIGHT VERTVOVS AND VVORSHIPFVLL LADIE, THE Ladie DRURY, all increaſe of Grace.

MADAME, I know your Chriſtian ingenuitie ſuch, that you will not grudge others the communication of this your private right: which yet I durſt not have preſumed to adventure, if I feared that either the benefit of it would be leſſe, or the acceptation. Now it ſhall bee no leſſe yours: only it ſhall bee more knowne to be yours. Vouchſafe therefore to take part with your worthy Husband, of theſe my ſimple Meditations. And if your long and gratious experience have written you a larger volume of wholeſome lawes, and better informed you by precepts fetcht from your owne feeling, than I can hope for, by my bare ſpeculation: yet where theſe my not unlikely rules ſhall accord with yours, let your redoubled aſſent allow them, and they confirme it. I made them not for the eye, but for the heart: neither doe I commend them to your reading, but your practice: wherein alſo it ſhall not be enough that you are a meere and ordinary agent, but that you be a patterne propounded unto others imitation. So ſhall your vertuous and holy progreſſe, beſides your owne peace and happineſſe, be my Crowne and rejoycing, in the day of our common appearance. Halſted. Decemb. 4.

Your L. humbly devoted,
IOS. HALL.

MEDITATIONS AND VOWES.

THE SECOND CENTURIE.

A Man under Gods affliction, is like a bird in a net; the more he ſtriveth, the more he is intangled. Gods Decree cannot be eluded with impatience. What I cannot avoid, I will learne to beare.

I finde, that all worldly things require a long time in getting, and afford a ſhort pleaſure in enjoying them. I will not care much, for what I have; nothing, for what I have not.

I ſee naturall bodies forſake their owne place and condition, for the preſervation of the whole; but of all other creatures, Man; and of all other Men, Chriſtians have the leaſt intereſt in themſelves. I will live, as given to others, lent only to my ſelfe.

That which is ſaid of the Elephant, that being guiltie of his deformitie, he cannot abide to looke on his owne face in the water (but ſeekes for troubled and muddy channels) we ſee well morallized, in men of evill conſcience, who know their ſoules are ſo filthy, that they dare not ſo much as view them; but ſhift off all checks of their former iniquitie, with vaine excuſes of good-fellowſhip. Whence it is, that every ſmall reprehenſion ſo galls them; becauſe it calls the eye of the ſoule home to it ſelfe, and makes them ſee a glimpſe of what they would not. So have I ſeene a fooliſh and timorous Patient, which knowing his wound very deepe, would not endure the Chirurgion to ſearch it: whereon what can enſue, but a feſtering of the part, and a danger of the whole body? So I have ſeene many prodigall waſters runne ſo farre in bookes, that they cannot abide to heare of reckoning. It hath beene an old and true Proverbe, Oft and even reckonings make long friends: I will oft ſumme my eſtate with God, that I may know what I have to expect, and anſwer for. Neither ſhall my ſcore runne on ſo long with God, that I ſhall not know my debts, or feare an Audit, or deſpaire of pardon.

I account this body, nothing, but a cloſe priſon to my ſoule; and the earth a larger priſon to my body. I may not breake priſon, till I be looſed by death: but I will leave it, not unwillingly, when I am looſed.

The common feares of the World are cauſeleſſe, and ill placed. No man feares to doe ill, every man to ſuffer ill: wherein, if we conſider it well, we ſhall finde that we feare our beſt friends. For my part, I have learned more of God and of my ſelfe, in one weekes extremitie, than all my whole lifes proſperitie had taught me afore. And, in reaſon and common experience, proſperitie uſually makes us forget our death: adverſitie on the other ſide, makes us neglect our life. Now (if we meaſure both of theſe, by their effects) forgetfulneſſe of death makes us ſecure: neglect of this life makes us carefull of a better. So much therefore as neglect of life is better than forgetfulneſſe of death; and watchfulneſſe better than ſecuritie: ſo much more beneficiall will I eſteeme adverſitie, than proſperitie.

Even griefe it ſelfe is pleaſant to the remembrance, when it is once paſt: as joy is, whiles it is preſent. I will not therefore in my conceit, make any ſo great difference betwixt joy and griefe: ſith griefe paſt, is joyfull; and long expectation of joy, is grievous.

8

Every ſickneſſe is a litle death. I will be content to die oft, that I may die once well.

Oft-times thoſe things which have beene ſweet in opinion, have proved bitter in experience. I will therefore ever ſuſpend my reſolute judgement, untill the triall and event: in the meane while I will feare the worſt, and hope the beſt.

10

In all divine and morall good things, I would faine keepe that I have, and get that I want. I doe not more loath all other covetouſneſſe, than I affect this. In all theſe things alone, I profeſſe never to have enough. If I may increaſe them, therefore, either by labouring, or begging, or uſurie, I ſhall leave no meanes unattempted.

11

Some children are of that nature, that they are never well, but while the rod is over them: ſuch am I to God; Let him beat me, ſo he amend me: let him take all away from me, ſo he give me himſelfe.

12

There muſt not be one uniforme proceeding with all men, in reprehenſion: but that muſt vary according to the diſpoſition of the reproved. I have ſeene ſome men as thornes, which eaſily touched, hurt not, but if hard and unwarily, fetch bloud of the hand: others, as nettles, which if they be nicely handled, ſting and pricke; but if hard and roughly preſſed, are pulled up without harme. Before I take any man in hand, I will know whether he be a thorne or a nettle.

13

I will account no ſinne little; ſince there is not the leaſt, but workes out the death of the ſoule. It is all one, whether I be drowned in the ebber ſhore, or in the midſt of the deepe Sea.

14

It is a baſe thing to get goods, to keepe them. I ſee that God (which only is infinitely rich) holdeth nothing in his owne hands, but gives all to his creatures. But, if we will needs lay up, where ſhould we rather repoſe it, than in Chriſts treaſury? The poore mans hand is the treaſury of Chriſt. All my ſuperfluity ſhall be there hoorded up, where I know it ſhall be ſafely kept, and ſurely returned me.

15

The Schoole of God, and Nature, require two contrary manners of proceeding. In the Schoole of Nature, we muſt conceive, and then beleeve: in the Schoole of God, we muſt firſt beleeve, and then we ſhall conceive. He that beleeves no more than he conceives, can never be a Chriſtian; nor he a Philoſopher, that aſſents without reaſon. In Natures Schoole, we are taught to bolt out the truth, by Logicall diſcourſe: God cannot endure a Logician. In his Schoole he is the beſt Scholler, that reaſons leaſt, and aſſents moſt. In divine things, what I may I will conceive: the reſt I will beleeve and admire. Not a curious head, but a credulous and plaine heart, is accepted with God.

No worldly pleaſure hath any abſolute delight in it: but as a Bee, having honey in the mouth, hath a ſting in the taile. Why am I ſo fooliſh, to reſt my heart upon any of them? and not rather labour to aſpire to that one abſolute Good, in whom is nothing ſavouring of griefe, nothing wanting to perfect happineſſe?

17

A ſharp reproofe I account better than a ſmooth deceit. Therefore when my friend checks me, I will reſpect it with thankfulneſſe: when others flatter me, I will ſuſpect it, and reſt in mine owne cenſure of my ſelfe; who ſhould be more privy (and leſſe partiall) to my owne deſervings.

18

Extremity diſtinguiſheth friends: Worldly pleaſures, like Phyſicians, give us over when once wee lie a dying; and yet the death-bed had moſt need of comforts: Chriſt Ieſus ſtandeth by his, in the pangs of death; and after death at the barre of judgement; not leaving them either in their bed, or grave. I will uſe them therefore to my beſt advantage; not truſt them. But for thee, O my Lord, which in mercy and truth canſt not faile me, (whom I have found ever faithfull and preſent in all extremities) Kill me, yet will I truſt in thee.

Wee have heard of ſo many thouſand generations paſſed, and we have ſeene ſo many hundreds die within our knowledge; that I wonder any man can make account to live one day. I will die daily. It is not done before the time, which may be done at all times.

20

Deſire oft-times makes us unthankfull. For, who ſo hopes for that he hath not, uſually forgets that which he hath. I will not ſuffer my heart to rove after high or impoſſible hopes; leſt I ſhould, in the meane time, contemne preſent benefits.

21

In hoping well, in being ill, and fearing worſe, the life of man is wholly conſumed. When I am ill, I will live in hope of better: when well, in feare of worſe: neither will I, at any time, hope without feare; leſt I ſhould deceive my ſelfe with too much confidence (wherein evill ſhall be ſo much more unwelcome and intolerable, becauſe I looked for good) nor, againe, feare without hope; leſt I ſhould be over-much dejected: nor doe either of them, without true contentation.

22

What is man to the whole earth? What is earth to the heaven? What is heaven to his Maker? I will admire nothing in it ſelfe; but all things in God, and God in all things.

23

There be three uſuall cauſes of ingratitude, upon a benefit received: Envie, Pride, Covetouſneſſe: Envie, looking more at others benefits, than our owne; Pride, looking more at our ſelves, than the benefit; Covetouſneſſe, looking more at what we would have, than what we have. In good turnes, I will neither reſpect the giver, nor my ſelfe, nor the gift, nor others; but only the intent and good will from whence it proceeded. So ſhall I requite others great pleaſures, with equall good will, and accept of ſmall favours, with great thankfulneſſe.

24

Whereas the cuſtome of the world is, to hate things preſent, to deſire future, and magnifie what is paſt; I will contrarily eſteeme that which is preſent, beſt. For, both what is paſt, was once preſent, and what is future, will be preſent: future things next, becauſe they are preſent in hope; what is paſt, leaſt of all, becauſe it cannot be preſent: yet ſomewhat becauſe it was.

We pittie the folly of the Larke, which (while it playeth with the fether, and ſtoopeth to the glaſſe) is caught in the fowlers net: and yet cannot ſee our ſelves alike made fooles by Satan; who, deluding us by the vaine fethers and glaſſes of the world, ſuddenly enwrappeth us in his ſnares. We ſee not the nets indeed; it is too much that we ſhall shall feele them, and that they are not so easily escaped after, as before avoided. O Lord, keepe thou mine eyes from beholding vanitie. And though mine eyes see it, let not my heart stoope to it, but loath it afrre off. And, if I stoope at any time, and be taken, set thou my soule at libertie: that I may say, My soule is escaped, even as a bird out of the snare of the Fowler; the snare is broken, and I am delivered. A

In suffering evill, to looke to secondary causes, without respect to the highest, maketh impatience. For so we bite at the stone, and neglect him that threw it. If we take a blow at our equall, we returne it with usurie: if of a Prince, we repine not. What matter is it, if God kill me, whether he doe it by an Ague, or by the hand of a Tyrant? Againe, in expectation of good, to looke to the first cause, without care of the second, argues idlenesse, and causeth want. As we cannot help our selves, without God: so God will not ordinarily help us, without our selves. In both, I will looke up to God, without repining at the meanes in one, or trusting them in the other. B

27

If my money were another mans, I could but keepe it: only the expending shewes it my owne. It is greater glory, comfort, and gaine, to lay it out well, than to keepe it safely. God hath made me, not his Treasurer, but his Steward.

28

Augustines friend, Nebridius, not unjustly hated a short answer, to a weighty and difficult question; because the disquisition of great truths requires time, and the determining is perillous: I will as much hate a tedious and farre-fetched answer to a short and easie question. For, as that other wrongs the truth, so this the hearer.

29

Performance is a binder. I will request no more favour of any man than I must needs. I will rather chuse to make an honest shift, than over-much enthrall my selfe, by being beholding. C

30

The World is a stage; every man an actor, and plaies his part, here, either in a Comedie, or Tragedie. The good man is a Comedian; which (how-ever he begins) ends merrily: but the wicked man acts a Tragedie; and therefore ever ends in horrour. Thou seest a wicked man vaunt himselfe on this stage: stay till the last act, and looke to his end (as David did) and see whether that be peace. Thou wouldest make strange Tragedies, if thou wouldest have but one Act. Who sees an Oxe, grazing in a fat and ranke pasture, and thinkes not that he is neere to the slaughter? whereas the leane beast, that toiles under the yoke, is farre enough from the shambles. The best wicked man cannot be so envied in his first shewes, as he is pitiable in the conclusion. D

31

Of all objects of Beneficence, I will chuse either an old man, or a childe; because these are most out of hope to requite. The one forgets a good turne: the other lives not to repay it.

32

That, which Pythagoras said of Philosophers, is more true of Christians: (for, Christianitie is nothing but a divine and better Philosophy.) Three sorts of men come to the Market: buyers, sellers, lookers on. The two first are both busie, and carefully distracted about their Market: onely the third live happily; using the world as if they used it not.

33

There be three things, which of all other I will never strive for: the wall, the way, the best seat. If I deserve well, a low place cannot disparage me so much as I shall grace it: if not, the height of my place shall adde to my shame; whiles every man shall condemne me of pride matched with unworthinesse. E

I see there is not somuch difference betwixt a man and a beast, as betwixt a Christian, and a naturall man. For, whereas man lives but one life of reason, above the beast; a Christian lives foure lifes, above a naturall man: The life of inchoate regeneration, by

A by grace; the perfect life of imputed righteousnesse; the life of glory begun, in the separation of the soule; the life of perfect glory, in the society of the body, with the soule in full happinesse: The worst whereof is better by many degrees, than the best life of a naturall man. For whereas the dignity of the life is measured, by the cause of it, (in which regard the life of the plant is basest, because it is but from the juyce, arising from the root, administred by the earth: the life of the bruit creature better than it, because it is sensitive: of a man better than it, because reasonable) and the cause of this life, is the Spirit of God; so farre as the Spirit of God is above reason, so farre doth a Christian exceed a meere naturalist. I thanke God much that he hath made me a man, but more, that he hath made me a Christian: without which, I know not whether it had beene better for me to have beene a beast, or not to have beene.

B Great mens favours, friends promises, and dead mens shooes, I will esteeme, but not trust to.

36

It is a fearefull thing to sinne; more fearfull to delight in sinne; yet worse than worst, to boast of it. If therefore I cannot avoid sinne, because I am a man; yet I will avoid the delight, defense and boasting of sinne, because I am a Christian.

37

Those things which are most eagerly desired, are most hardly both gotten and kept; God commonly crossing our desires, in what we are over-fervent. I will therefore account all things as too good to have, so nothing too deare to lose.

38

A true friend is not borne every day. It is best to be courteous to all, entire with few.
C So may we (perhaps) have lesse cause of joy: I am sure, lesse occasion of sorrow.

Secrecies, as they are a burthen to the minde, ere they be uttered: so are they no lesse charge to the receiver, when they are uttered. I will not long after more inward secrets, lest I shoud procure doubt to my selfe, and jealous feare to the discloser: But as my mouth shall be shut with fidelity, not to blab them; so mine eare shall not be too open to receive them.

40

As good Physicians, by one receit make way for another: so is it the safest course in practice: I will reveale a great secret to none, but whom I have found faithfull in lesse.

41

D I will enjoy all things in God, and God in all things; nothing in it selfe: So shall my joyes neither change, nor perish. For how ever the things themselves may alter, or fade: yet he, in whom they are mine, is ever like himselfe, constant, and everlasting.

42

If I would provoke my selfe to contentation; I will cast downe mine eyes to my inferiours; and there see better men in worse condition: if to humilitie, I will cast them up to my betters; and so much more deject my selfe to them, by how much more I see them thought worthy to be respected of others, and deserve better in themselves.

43

True vertue rests in the conscience of it selfe, either for reward, or censure. If therefore I know my selfe upright, false rumours shall not daunt me: if not answerable to the good report of my favourers, I will my selfe finde the first fault, that I may prevent the shame of others.

I will account vertue the best riches, knowledge the next, riches the worst; and therefore will labour to be vertuous and learned, without condition: as for riches, if they fall in my way, I refuse them not; but if not, I desire them not.

45

An honest word I account better, than a careless oath. I will say nothing but what I dare sweare, and will performe. It is a shame for a Christian to abide his tongue a false servant, or his minde a loose mistresse.

46 There

Not to disclose or sūpose ought to any.

46

There is a just and easie difference to be put betwixt a friend and an enemy; betwixt a familiar, and a friend; and much good use to be made of all: but, of all, with discretion. I will disclose my selfe nowhit to my enemy, somewhat to my friend, wholly to no man; lest I should be more others, than mine owne. Friendship is brittle stuffe. How know I, whether he that loves me, may not hate me hereafter?

47

No man, but is an easie Iudge of his owne matters; and lookers on oftentimes see the more. I will therefore submit my selfe to others, in what I am reproved: but in what I am praised, only to my selfe.

48

I will not be so merry, as to forget God; nor so sorrowfull, to forget my selfe.

ye ground of friendsp.

As nothing makes so strong and mortall hostility, as discord in religions: so nothing in the world unites mens hearts so firmely, as the bond of faith. For, whereas there are three grounds of friendship, Vertue, Pleasure, Profit; and by all confessions, that is the surest, which is upon vertue: it must needs follow, that what is grounded on the best, and most heavenly Vertue, must be the fastest: which, as it unites man to God so inseparably, that no tentations, no torments, not all the gates of Hell can sever him; so it unites one Christian soule to another so firmely, that no outward occurrences, no imperfections in the party loved, can dissolve them. If I love not the child of God (for his owne sake, for his Fathers sake) more than my friend (for my commodity, or my kinsman for bloud) I never received any sparke of true heavenly love.

not to be unwilling or backward in devocon.

The good duty, that is deferred upon a conceit of present unfitnesse, at last growes irksome; and thereupon altogether neglected. I will not suffer my heart to entertaine the least thought of lothnesse towards the taske of devotion, wherewith I have stinted my selfe: but violently breake thorow any motion of unwillingnesse; not without a deepe checke to my selfe, for my backwardnesse.

yt doed of men to be more true led to yr owne words.

Hearing is a sense of great apprehension; yet farre more subject to deceit, than seeing: not in the manner of apprehending, but in the uncertainty of the object. Words are vocall interpreters of the minde; actions, reall: and therefore how ever both should speake according to the truth of what is in the heart; yet words doe more belie the heart, than actions. I care not what words I heare, when I see deeds. I am sure, what a man doth, he thinketh: not so alwaies, what he speaketh. Though I will not be so severe a censor, that, for some few evill acts, I should condemne a man of false-heartednesse: yet, in common course of life I need not be so mopish, as not to beleeve rather the language of the hand, than of the tongue. He, that sayes well, and doth well, is without exception commendable: but, if one of these must be severed from the other, I like him well, that doth well, and saith nothing.

nor yt fire of dissencon in yr church ought keep from it.

That, which they say of the Pelican, that when the Shepherds, in desire to catch her, lay fire not farre from her nest; which shee finding, and fearing the danger of her young, seekes to blow out with her wings, so long till shee burne her selfe and makes her selfe a prey, in an unwise pittie to her young; I see morally verified in experience, of those which indiscreetly medling with the flame of dissention kindled in the Church, rather increase than quench it; rather fire their owne wings than helpe others. I had rather bewaile the fire afarre off, than stirre in the coles of it. I would not grudge my ashes to it, if those might abate the burning: but, since I see this is daily increased with partaking, I will behold it with sorrow; and meddle no otherwise than by prayers to God, and intreaties to men; seeking my owne safety, and the peace of the Church, in the freedome of my thought, and silence of my tongue.

That which is said of Lucillaes faction, that anger bred it, pride fostered it, and covetousnesse confirm'd it, is true of all Schismes, though with some inversion. For, the most

A most are bred through pride, (whiles men, upon an high conceit of themselves, scorne to goe in the common road, and affect singularity in opinion) are confirmed through anger, (whiles they stomacke and grudge any contradiction) and are nourished through covetousnesse, whiles they seeke ability to beare out their part. In some others againe, covetousnesse obtaines the first place, anger the second, pride the last. Herein therefore I have beene alwayes wont to commend and admire the humility of those great and profound wits, whom depth of knowledge hath not led to by-paths in judgement; but (walking in the beaten path of the Church) have bent all their forces to the establishment of received truths: accounting it greater glory to confirme an ancient verity, than to devise a new opinion (though never so profitable) unknowne to their predecessours. I will not reject a truth, for meere noveltie: (Old truths may come newly to light; neither is God tied to times, for the gift of his illumination) but I will suspect a novell opinion, of untruth; and not entertaine it, unlesse it may be deduced from ancient B grounds.

The eare and the eye are the mindes receivers; but the tongue is only busied in expending the treasure received. If therefore the revenues of the minde be uttered as fast, or faster than they are received; it cannot be, but that the minde must needs be held bare, and can never lay up for purchase. But, if the receivers take in still with no utterance, the minde may soone grow a burthen to it selfe, and unprofitable to others. I will not lay up too much, and utter nothing, lest I be covetous: nor spend much, and store up little, lest I be prodigall and poore.

55

It is a vaine-glorious flattery for a man to praise himselfe: An envious wrong to detract C from others. I will therefore speake no ill of others, no good of my selfe.

56

That which is the misery of Travellers; to finde many Oasts, and few friends, is the estate of Christians in their pilgrimage to a better life. Good friends may not, therefore, be easily forgone: neither must they be used as suits of apparell; which when we have worne threed-bare, we cast off, and call for new. Nothing, but death or villany, shall divorce me from an old friend; but still I will follow him so farre, as is either possible or honest: and then I will leave him, with sorrow.

A good friend ought to be parted with.

True friendship necessarily requires Patience. For there is no man, in whom I shall not mislike somewhat, and who shall not, as justly mislike somewhat in me. My friends faults therefore, if little, I will swallow and digest; if great, I will smother them: how- D ever, I will winke at them to others; but, lovingly notifie them to himselfe.

58

Injuries hurt not more in the receiving, than in the remembrance. A small injury shall goe as it comes: a great injury may dine or sup with me; but none at all shall lodge with me. Why should I vex my selfe, because another hath vexed me?

Injuries must be forgot speedily.

It is good dealing with that, over which we have the most power. If my state will not be framed to my minde, I will labour to frame my minde to my estate.

60

It is a great misery to be either alwaies, or never alone: Society of men hath not so much gaine as distraction. In greatest company I will be alone to my selfe: in greatest privacie, in company with God. E

61

Griefe for things past that cannot be remedied, and care for things to come that cannot be prevented, may easily hurt, can never benefit me. I will therefore commit my selfe to God in both, and enjoy the present.

62

Let my estate be never so meane, I will ever keepe my selfe rather beneath, than either levell or above it. A man may rise when he will, with honour: but cannot fall without shame.

63

Nothing doth ſo befoole a man, as extreme paſſion. This doth both make them fooles, which otherwiſe are not; and ſhew them to be fooles, that are ſo. Violent paſſions, if I cannot tame them, that they may yeeld to my eaſe; I will at leaſt ſmother them by concealement, that they may not appeare to my ſhame.

64

The minde of man, though infinite in deſier, yet is finite in capacitie. Since I cannot hope to know all things, I will labour firſt to know what I needs muſt, for their uſe: next, what I beſt may, for their convenience.

65

Thouh time be precious to me (as all irrevocable good things deſerve to be) and of all other things, I would not be laviſh of it; yet I will account no time loſt, that is either lent to, or beſtowed upon my friend.

66

The practiſes of the beſt men are more ſubject to errour than their ſpeculations. I will honour good examples: but I will live by good precepts.

67

As charitie requires forgetfullneſſe of evill deeds: ſo patience requires forgetfulneſſe of evill accidents. I will remember evills paſt, to humble me; not to vex me

68

It is both a miſery and a ſhame for a man to be a Bankrupt in love: which he may eaſily pay, and bee never the more impoveriſhed. I will be in no mans debt, for good will: but will at leaſt returne every man his owne meaſure, if not with uſury. It is much better to be a Creditor, than a Debtor, in any thing; but eſpecially of this: yet of this I will ſo be content to be a Debtor, that I will alwaies be paying it where I owe it; and yet never will have ſo paid it, that I ſhall not owe it more.

69

The Spaniſh Proverb is too true; Dead men and abſent finde no friends. All mouthes are boldly opened, with a conceite of impunitie. My eare ſhall be no grave to bury my friends good name. But as I will be my preſent friends ſelfe; So will I be my abſent friends deputie; to ſay for him what he would (and cannot) ſpeake for himſelfe.

70

The loſſe of my friend, as it ſhall moderately grieve me; ſo it ſhall another way much benefite me, in recompence of his want: for it ſhall make me thinke more often, and ſeriouſly of earth, and of heaven. Of earth, for his body which is repoſed in it: Of Heaven, for his ſoule which poſſeſſeth it before me: Of earth, to put me in minde of my like frailty and mortality: Of Heaven, to make me deſire, and (after a ſort) emulate his happineſſe and glory.

71

Varietie of objects is wont to cauſe diſtraction: when againe a little one, laid cloſe to the eye (if but of a peny breadth) wholly takes up the ſight; which could elſe ſee the whole halfe Heaven at once. I will have the eyes of my minde ever fore-ſtalled, and filled with theſe two obiects; the ſhortneſſe of my life, eternity after death.

72

I ſee that he is more happy, that hath nothing to loſe, than he that loſeth that which he hath. I will therefore neither hope for riches, nor feare povertie.

73

I care not ſo much in any thing for multitude, as for choice. Bookes and friends I will not have many: I had rather ſeriouſly converſe with a few, than wander amongſt many.

74

The wicked man is a very coward, and is afraid of every thing. Of God; becauſe he is his enemie: of Satan, becauſe he is his tormentor: of Gods creatures, becauſe they (joyning with their Maker) fight againſt him: of him ſelfe, becauſe he beares about him his owne accuſer and executioner The godly man contrarily, is afraid of nothing. Not

of

A of God, becauſe he knowes him his beſt friend, and therefore will not hurt him: not of Satan, becauſe he cannot hurt him: not of afflictions, becauſe he knowes they proceed from a loving God, and end to his owne good: not of the creatures, ſince the very ſtones of the field are in league with him: not of himſelfe, ſince his conſcience is at peace. A wicked man may be ſecure, becauſe he knowes not what he hath to feare; or deſperate, through extremitie of feare: but, truly couragious he cannot be. Faithleſneſſe cannot chuſe but be falſe-hearted. I will ever, by my courage, take triall of my faith. By how much more I feare, by ſo much leſſe I beleeve.

The godly man lives hardly, and (like the Ant) toiles here, during the Summer of his peace, holding himſelfe ſhort of his pleaſures, as looking to provide for an hard Winter. Which, when it comes, he is able to weare it out comfortably: whereas the wicked B man doth prodigally laſh out all his joyes, in the time of his proſperitie; and (like the Graſhopper) ſinging merrily all Summer, is ſtarved in winter. I will ſo enjoy the preſent, that I will lay up more for hereafter.

76

I have wondred oft, and bluſhed for ſhame, to reade in meere Philoſophers (which had no other Miſtreſſe, but Nature) ſuch ſtrange reſolution in the contempt of both fortunes (as they call them:) ſuch notable precepts for a conſtant ſetledneſſe and tranquillitie of minde; and to compare it with my owne diſpoſition, and practice: whom I have found too much drouping and dejected under ſmall croſſes; and eaſily againe carried away with little proſperitie: To ſee ſuch courage and ſtrength to contemne death, in thoſe which thought they wholly periſhed in death; and to finde ſuch faint-heartedneſſe in my ſelfe, at the firſt conceit of death, who yet am thorowly perſwaded of the future C happineſſe of my ſoule. I have the benefit of nature as well as they; beſides infinite other helpes that they wanted. Oh the dulneſſe and blindneſſe of us unworthy Chriſtians! that ſuffer Heathens, by the dim candle-light of Nature, to goe further than we by the cleere Sun of the Goſpell: that an indifferent man could not tell by our practice, whether were the Pagan. Let mee never for ſhame account my ſelfe a Chriſtian, unleſſe my Art of Chriſtianity have imitated and gone beyond nature, ſo farre, that I can finde the beſt Heathen as farre below mee in true reſolution, as the vulgar ſort were below them. Elſe, I may ſhame Religion; it can neither honeſt nor helpe me.

77

If I would be irreligious and unconſcionable, I would make no doubt to be rich. For if a man will defraud, diſſemble, forſweare, bribe, oppreſſe, ſerve the time, make uſe of D all men for his owne turne, make no ſcruple of any wicked action for his advantage; I cannot ſee how he can eſcape wealth and preferment. But for an upright man to riſe, is difficult: while his conſcience ſtraightly curbes him in, from every unjuſt action; and will not allow him to advance himſelfe by indirect meanes. So riches come ſeldome eaſily, to a good man; ſeldome hardly, to the conſcienceleſſe. Happy is that man that can be rich with truth, or poore with contentment. I will not envy the gravell, in the unjuſt mans throat. Of riches let me never have more, than an honeſt man can beare away.

God is the God of order, not of confuſion. As therefore, in naturall things, he uſeth to proceed from one extreme to another by degrees, through the meane: ſo doth hee in ſpirituall. The Sun riſeth not at once to his higheſt, from the darkneſſe of midnight; E but firſt ſends forth ſome feeble glimmering of light in the dawning; then lookes out with weake and wateriſh beames; and ſo by degrees aſcends to the midſt of Heaven. So in the ſeaſons of the yeere, we are not one day ſcorched with a Summer heat; and on the next, frozen with a ſudden extremity of cold. But Winter comes on ſoftly; firſt, by cold dewes, then hoare froſts; untill at laſt it deſcend to the hardeſt weather of all; ſuch are Gods ſpirituall proceedings: He never brings any man from the eſtate of ſinne, to the eſtate of glory, but through the eſtate of grace. And as for grace, hee ſeldome brings a man from groſſe wickedneſſe to any eminence of perfection. I will be charita-bly jealous of thoſe men, which from notorious lewdneſſe leape at once into a ſudden forwardneſſe of profeſſion. Holineſſe doth not, like Ionas gourd, grow up in a night. I like it better, to goe on, ſoft and ſure, than for an haſtie fit to runne my ſelfe out of winde; and after ſtand ſtill and breathe me.

It hath beene ſaid of old; To doe well and heare ill, is princely. Which as it is moſt true, by reaſon of the envy which followes upon juſtice: ſo is the contrary no leſſe juſtified, by many experiments. To doe ill, and to heare well, is the faſhion of many great men. To doe ill, becauſe they are borne out with the aſſurance of impunity: To heare well, becauſe of abundance of Paraſites; which as Ravens to a carkaſſe, gather about great men. Neither is there any ſo great miſery in greatneſſe as this, that it conceales men from themſelves: and when they will needs have a ſight of their owne actions, it ſhewes them a falſe glaſſe to looke in. Meanneſſe of ſtate (that I can find) hath none ſo great inconvenience. I am no whit ſorry, that I am rather ſubject to contempt, than flattery.

80

There is no earthly bleſſing ſo precious, as health of body: without which, all other worldly good things are but troubleſome. Neither is there any thing more difficult, than to have a good ſoule, in a ſtrong and vigorous body (for, it is commonly ſeene, that the worſe part drawes away the better:) But to have an healthfull and ſound ſoule in a weake ſickly body, is no novelty; whiles the weakeneſſe of the body is an help to the ſoule; playing the part of a perpetuall monitor, to incite it to good, and check it for evill. I will not be over-glad of health, nor over-fearefull of ſickneſſe. I will more feare the ſpirituall hurt, that may follow upon health, than the bodily paine that accompanies ſickneſſe.

81

There is nothing more troubleſome to a good minde, than to doe nothing. For, beſides the furtherance of our eſtate, the minde doth both delight, and better it ſelfe with exerciſe. There is but this difference then betwixt labour and idleneſſe; that labour is a profitable and pleaſant trouble: idleneſſe, a trouble both unprofitable and comfortleſſe. I will be ever doing ſomething; that either God when he commeth, or Satan when he tempteth, may find me buſied. And yet, ſince (as the old proverb is) better it is to be idle than effect nothing; I will not more hate doing nothing, than doing ſomething to no purpoſe. I ſhall doe good, but a while; let me ſtrive to doe it, while I may.

82

A faithfull man hath three eyes: The firſt of ſenſe, common to him with bruit creatures: the ſecond of reaſon, common to all men: the third of faith, proper to his profeſſion: whereof each looketh beyond other; and none of them medleth with others objects. For, neither doth the eye of ſenſe reach to intelligible things and matters of diſcourſe: nor the eye of reaſon to thoſe things which are ſupernaturall and ſpirituall: neither doth faith looke downe, to things that may be ſenſibly ſeene. If thou diſcourſe to a bruit beaſt of the depths of Philoſophy, never ſo plainly, he vnderſtands not, becauſe they are beyond the view of his eye, which is only of ſenſe. If to a meere carnall man, of divine things; he perceiveth not the things of God: neither indeed can doe, becauſe they are ſpiritually diſcerned. And therefore no wonder if thoſe things ſeeme unlikely, incredible, impoſſible to him, which the faithfull man (having a proportionable meanes of apprehenſion) doth as plainly ſee, as his eye doth any ſenſible thing. Tell a plaine Country-man, that the Sunne, or ſome higher or leſſer ſtarre is much bigger than his Cart-wheele; or, at leaſt, ſo many ſcores bigger than the whole earth; hee laughes thee to ſcorne, as affecting admiration with a learned untruth. Yet the Scholler, by the eye of reaſon, doth as plainly ſee and acknowledge this truth as that his hand is bigger than his pen. What a thick miſt, yea what a palpable, and more than Ægyptian darkeneſſe, doth the naturall man live in! what a world is there that he doth not ſee at all! and how little doth he ſee in this, which is his proper element! There is no bodily thing, but the bruit creatures ſee as well as hee; and ſome of them better.

As

A As for his eye of reason, how dim is it in those things which are best fitted to it! what one thing is there in nature, which he doth perfectly know? what herbe, or flower, or worme that he treads on, is there, whose true essence he knoweth? No, not so much, as what is in his owne bosome; what it is where it is, or whence it is that gives Being to himselfe. But, for those things which concerne the best world, he doth not so much as confusedly see them; neither knoweth whether they be. Hee sees no whit into the great and awfull Maiestie of God. He discernes him not in all his creatures, filling the world with his infinite and glorious presence. He sees not his wise providence, overruling all things, disposing all casuall events, ordering all sinfull actions of men to his owne glory. He comprehends nothing of the beautie, maiestie, power, and mercie of the Saviour of the world, sitting in his humanitie at his Fathers right hand. He sees not the unspeakable happinesse of the glorified soules of the Saints. He sees not the whole
B heavenly Common-wealth of Angels (ascending and descending to the behoofe of Gods children) waiting upon him at all times invisibly (not excluded with closenesse of prisons, nor desolatenesse of wildernesses) and the multitude of evill spirits passing and standing by him, to tempt him unto evill: but, like unto the foolish bird when he hath hid his head that he sees no body, he thinkes himselfe altogether unseene; and then counts himselfe solitary, when his eye can meet with no companion. It was not without cause, that we call a meere foole a naturall. For how-ever worldings have still thought Christians Gods fooles, we know them the fooles of the world. The deepest philosopher that ever was (saving the reverence of the Schooles) is but an ignorant sot, to the simplest Christian. For the weakest Christian may, by plaine information, see somewhat into the greatest mysteries of Nature, because he hath the eye of Reason common with the best: but the best Philosopher, by all the demonstration in the world,
C can conceive nothing of the mysteries of godlinesse, because he utterly wants the eye of faith. Though my insight into matters of the world be so shallow, that my simplicitie moveth pitie, or maketh sport unto others; it shall be my contentment and happinesse, that I see further into better matters. That which I see not, is worthlesse, and deserveth little better then contempt: that which I see, is unspeakable, inestimable, for comfort, for glory.

It is not possible for an inferiour to live at peace, unlesse he have learned to be contemned. For the pride of his superiours, and the malice of his equals and inferiours, shall offer him continuall and inevitable occasions of unquietnesse. As contentation is the mother of inward peace with our selves: so is humility the mother of peace with others. For if thou be vile in thine owne eyes first, it shall the lesse trouble thee to be D accounted vile of others. So that a man of an high heart, in a low place, cannot want discontentment: whereas a man of lowly stomacke, can swallow and digest contempt, without any distemper. For, wherein can he be the worse for being contemned, who out of his owne knowledge of his deserts, did most of all contemne himselfe? I should be very improvident, if in this calling I did not looke for daily contempt: wherein we are made a spectacle to the world, to Angels, and Men. When it comes, I will either embrace it, or contemne it: Embrace it, when it is within my measure; when above contemne it. So embrace it, that I may more humble my selfe under it: and so contemne it, that I may not give heart to him that offers it; nor disgrace him, for whom I am contemned.

Christ raised three dead men to life: One, newly departed; another, on the Bere; a E third, smelling in the grave: to shew us that no degree of death is so desperate, that it is past helpe. My sinnes are many, and great: yet if they were more, they are farre below the mercy of him that hath remitted them, and the value of his ransome that hath payed for them. A man hurts himselfe most by presumption: but wee cannot doe God a greater wrong, than to despaire of forgivenesse. It is a double injury to God, first, that we offend his justice by sinning; then, that we wrong his mercy, with despairing &c.

For a man to be weary of the world through miseries that he meets with (and for that cauſe to covet death) is neither difficult, nor commendable; but rather argues a baſe weakneſſe of minde. So it may be a cowardly part, to contemne the utmoſt of all terrible things, in a feare of lingering miſery: but for a man either living happily here on earth, or reſolving to live miſerably, yet to deſire his removall to Heaven, doth well become a true Chriſtian courage; and argues a noble mixture of patience and faith. Of patience, for that he can and dare abide to live ſorrowfully: of faith, for that he is aſſured of his better Being other-where; and therefore prefers the abſent joyes he lookes for, to thoſe he feeles in preſent: No ſorrow ſhall make me wiſh my ſelfe dead, that I may not be at all. No contentment ſhall hinder me from wiſhing my ſelfe with Chriſt, that I may be happier.

It was not for nothing that the wiſe Creator of all things hath placed gold & ſilver and all precious minerals under our feet to be trod upon, and hath hid them low in the bowels of the earth, that they cannot without great labour be either found, or gotten: whereas he hath placed the nobleſt part of his creation above our heads: and that ſo open to our view, that we cannot chuſe but every moment behold them. Wherein what did he elſe intend, but to draw away our mindes from theſe worthleſſe, and yet hidden treaſures, (to which hee fore-ſaw we would be too much addicted) and to call them to the contemplation of thoſe better things, which (beſide their beauty) are more obvious to us, that in them we may ſee and admire the glory of their maker, and withall ſeeke our owne? How doe thoſe men wrong themſelves, and miſconſtrue God, who (as if hee had hidden theſe things, becauſe he would have them ſought, and laid the other open for neglect) bend themſelves wholly to the ſeeking of theſe earthly commodities! and doe no more minde Heaven, than if there were none. If we could imagine a beaſt to have reaſon, how could he be more abſurd in his choice? How eaſie is it to obſerve, that ſtill the higher we goe, the more purity and perfection we finde! (So earth is the very droſſe and dregs of all the elements: water ſomewhat more pure than it; yet alſo more feculent than the aire above it: the lower aire leſſe pure than his uppermoſt regions; and yet theſe as farre inferiour to the loweſt heavens: which againe are more exceeded by the glorious and Empyriall ſeat of God, which is the heaven of the juſt:) Yet theſe brutiſh men take up their reſt, and place their felicity in the loweſt and worſt of all Gods workmanſhip; not regarding that which with it owne glory can make them happy. Heaven is the proper place of my ſoule: I will ſend it up thither continually in my thoughts, whiles it ſojournes with me, before it goe to dwell there for ever.

87

A man need not to care for more knowledge, than to know himſelfe: he needs no more pleaſure, than to content himſelfe: no more victory, than to overcome himſelfe: no more riches, than to enjoy himſelfe. What fooles are they that ſeeke to know all other things, and are ſtrangers in themſelves? that ſeeke altogether to ſatisfie other mens humours, with their owne diſpleaſure: that ſeeke to vanquiſh Kingdomes and Countries, when they are not Maſters of themſelves; that have no hold of their owne hearts, yet ſeeke to be poſſeſſed of all outward commodities. Goe home to thy ſelfe, firſt, vaine heart: and when thou haſt made ſure worke there, (in knowing, contenting, overcomming, enjoying thy ſelfe) ſpend all the ſuperfluity of thy time and labour, upon orhers.

It was an excellent rule that fell from the Epicure (whoſe name is odious to us, for the father of looſeneſſe;) That if a man would be rich, honourable, aged, he ſhould not ſtrive ſo much to adde to his wealth, reputation, yeeres, as to detract from his deſires. For certainly, in theſe things which ſtand moſt upon conceit, hee hath the moſt that deſireth leaſt. A poore man that hath little, and deſires no more, is in truth richer than the greateſt Monarch, that thinketh he hath not what he ſhould, or what he might, or that grieves there is no more to have. It is not neceſſitie, but ambition, that ſets mens hearts on the racke. If I have meat, drinke, apparell, I will learne therewith to be content. If I had the world full of wealth beſide, I could enjoy no more than I uſe: the reſt could

A could pleaſe me no otherwiſe but by looking on. And why can I not thus ſolace my ſelfe, while it is others?

An inconſtant and wavering minde, as it makes a man unfit for ſociety (for that there can be no aſſurance of his words, or purpoſes, neither can we build on them, without deceit:) ſo, beſides that, it makes a man ridiculous, it hinders him from ever attaining any perfection in himſelfe, (for a rolling ſtone gathers no moſſe;) and the minde, while it would be every thing, proves nothing. Oft changes cannot be without loſſe:) Yea, it keepes him from enjoying that which he hath attained. For, it keepes him ever in worke; building, pulling downe, ſelling, changing, buying, commanding, forbidding. So, whiles he can be no other mans friend, he is the leaſt his owne. It is the ſafeſt courſe for a mans profit, credit, and eaſe, to deliberate long, to reſolve ſurely; hardly to alter, not to enter upon that, whoſe end he fore-ſees not anſwerable; and when he is once entred, not to ſurceaſe till B he have attained the end he fore-ſaw. So may he, to good purpoſe, begin a new worke, when he hath well finiſhed the old.

The miſeries of Inconſtancy.

The way to Heaven, is like that which Ionathan and his Armour-bearer paſſed, betwixt two rocks; one Bozez, the other Seneh; that is, foule and thornie: whereto we muſt make ſhift to climbe on our hands and knees; but when we are come up, there is victorie and triumph. Gods children have three ſutes of apparell, whereof two are worne daily, on earth; the third laid up for them in the Ward-robe of Heaven: They are ever either in blacke, mourning; in red, perſecuted; or in white, glorious. Any way ſhall be pleaſant to me, that leads unto ſuch an end. It matters not, what rags, or what C colours I weare with men; ſo I may walke with my Saviour in white, and reigne with him in glory.

There is nothing more eaſie, than to ſay Divinitie by rote; and to diſcourſe of ſpirituall matters from the tongue or pen of others: but to heare God ſpeake it to the ſoule, and to feele the power of religion in our ſelves, and to expreſſe it out of the truth of experience within, is both rare, and hard. All that we feele not in the matters of God, is but hypocriſie: and therefore the more we profeſſe, the more we ſin. It will never be well with me, till in theſe greateſt things I be careleſſe of others cenſures, fearefull onely of Gods, and my owne: till ſound experience have really catechiſed my heart, and made me know God, and my Saviour, otherwiſe than by words; I will never be quiet till I can ſee, and feele, and taſte God: my hearing I will account as onely ſerving to effect this, and my D ſpeech onely to expreſſe it.

There is no enemie can hurt us, but by our owne hands. Satan could not hurt us, if our owne corruption betraied us not: afflictions cannot hurt us without our owne impatience: tentations cannot hurt us, without our owne yeeldance: death could not hurt us, without the ſting of our owne ſins: ſin could not hurt us, without our owne impenitence: how might I deſie all things, if I could obtaine not to be my owne enemie? I love my ſelfe too much, and yet not enough. O God, teach mee to wiſh my ſelfe but ſo well as thou wiſheſt me, and I am ſafe.

Most of our ſtarings come from our ſelves.

It grieves me to ſee all other creatures ſo officious to their Maker in their kinde: that both winds, and ſea, and heaven, and earth, obey him with all readineſſe, that each of E theſe heares other, and all of them their Creator, though to the deſtruction of themſelves; and man onely is rebellious, imitating herein the evill ſpirits, who in the receit of a more excellent kinde of reaſon, are yet more perverſe: hence it is, that the Prophets are oft times faine to turne their ſpeech to the earth, void of all ſenſe and life, from this living earth informed with reaſon: that only which ſhould make us more pliable, ſtifneth us. God could force us, (if he pleaſed) but he had rather incline us by gentleneſſe. I muſt ſtoope to his power, why doe I not ſtoope to his will? It is a vaine thing to reſiſt his voice, whoſe hand we cannot reſiſt.

All creatures obey God.

94

As all naturall bodies are mixt; ſo muſt all our morall diſpoſition: no ſimple paſſion doth well. If our joy be not allayed with ſorrow, it is madneſſe: and if our ſorrow be not tempered with ſome mixture of joy, it is helliſh and deſperate: if in theſe earthly things, we hope without all doubt, or feare without all hope, we offend on both ſides; if wee labour without all recreation, we grow dull and heartleſſe: if we ſport our ſelves without all labour, we grow wilde and unprofitable: theſe compoſitions are wholſome, as for the bodie, ſo for the minde; which though it be not of a compounded ſubſtance, as the bodie; yet hath much varietie of qualities and affections, and thoſe contrary to each other. I care not how ſimple my heavenly affections are, which the more free they are from compoſition, are the neerer to God: nor how compounded my earthly, which are eaſily ſubject to extremities: if joy come alone, I will aske him for his fellow; and evermore in ſpight of him, couple him with his contrary: that ſo while each are enemies to other, both may be friends to me.

Ioy and ſorrow are hard to conceale: as from the countenance, ſo from the tongue: there is ſo much correſpondence betwixt the heart and the tongue, that they will move at once: every man therefore ſpeakes of his owne pleaſure and care: the Hunter and Falconer of his games; the Plough-man of his teame; the Souldier of his march, and colours. If the heart were as full of God, the tongue could not refraine to talke of him. The rareneſſe of Chriſtian communication, argues the common povertie of grace. If Chriſt be not in our hearts, we are Godleſſe: if he be there without our joy, we are ſenſeleſſe: if we rejoyce in him, and ſpeake not of him, we are ſhamefully unthankfull: every man taketh, yea raiſeth occaſion to bring in ſpeech of what he liketh. As I will thinke of thee alwayes, O Lord, ſo it ſhall be my joy to ſpeake of thee often: and if I finde not opportunitie, I will make it.

96

When I ſee my Saviour hanging in ſo forlorne a faſhion upon the Croſſe; his head drouping downe, his temples bleeding with thornes, his hands and feet with the nailes, and ſide with the ſpeare; his enemies round about him, mocking at his ſhame, and inſulting over his impotence: how ſhould I thinke any otherwiſe of him, than, as himſelfe complaineth, forſaken of his Father? But when againe I turne mine eyes, and ſee the Sun darkened, the earth quaking, the rocks rent, the graves opened, the theeſe confeſſing, to give witneſſe to his Deitie; and when I ſee ſo ſtrong a guard of providence over him, that all his malicious enemies are not able ſo much as to breake one bone of that body, which ſeemed careleſly neglected, I cannot but wonder at his glory, and ſafetie. God is ever neere, though oft unſeene; and if he winke at our diſtreſſe, hee ſleepeth not: the ſenſe of others muſt not be judges of his preſence, and care; but our faith: what care I, if the world give me up for miſerable, whiles I am under his ſecret protection? O Lord, ſince thou art ſtrong in our weakneſſe, and preſent in our ſenſleſneſſe; give me but as much comfort in my ſorrow, as thou giveſt me ſecuritie, and at my worſt I ſhall be well.

In ſins and afflictions our courſe muſt be contrarie: we muſt begin to deteſt the greateſt ſin firſt, and deſcend to the hatred of the leaſt; we muſt firſt begin to ſuffer ſmall afflictions with patience, that we may aſcend to the endurance of the greateſt. Then alone ſhall I be happy when by this holy method, I have drawne my ſoule to make conſcience of of the leaſt evill of ſinne, and not to ſhrinke at the leaſt evill of affliction.

Preſcription is no plea againſt the King: much leſſe can long cuſtome plead for error againſt that our ſupreame Lord, to whom a thouſand yeares are but as yeſterday: yea, Time, which pleads voluntarily for continuance of things lawfull, will take no fee, not to ſpeake againſt an evill uſe. Hath an ill cuſtome laſted long? it is more than time it were abrogated: age is an agravation to ſinne. Hereſie or abuſe, if it be gray-headed, deſerves ſharper oppoſition: to ſay, I will doe ill becauſe I have done ſo, is perillous and impious preſumption: continuance can no more make any wickedneſſe ſafe, than the

A the author of ſin, no Devill: If I have once ſinned, it is too much; if oft, woe be to me, if the iteration of my offence cauſe boldneſſe, and not rather more ſorrow, more deteſtation: woe be to me and my ſin, if I be not the better becauſe I have ſinned.

It is ſtrange to ſee the varieties and proportion of ſpirituall and bodily diets: there be ſome creatures that are fatted and delighted with poyſons: others live by nothing but aire; and ſome (they ſay) by fire: others will taſte no water but muddie: others feed on their fellowes, or (perhaps) on part of themſelves: others, on the excretions of nobler creatures: ſome ſearch into the earth for ſuſtenance, or dive into the waters: others content themſelves with what the upper earth yeelds them without violence. All theſe and more, are anſwered in the Palate of the ſoule: there be ſome (yea the moſt) to whom ſinne (which is of a moſt venomous nature) is both food and dainties; others, that thinke it B the onely life, to feed on the popular aire of applauſe; others, that are never well out of the fire of contentions; and that wilfully trouble all waters with their private humours and opinions; others, whoſe cruelty delights in oppreſſion, and bloud; yea, whoſe envie gnawes upon their owne hearts; others, that take pleaſure to revive the wicked and foule hereſies of the greater wits of the former times; others, whoſe worldly mindes root altogether in earthly cares; or who not content with the ordinary proviſion of doctrine, affect obſcure ſubtilties, unknowne to wiſer men; others, whoſe too indifferent mindes feed on what-ever opinion comes next to hand, without any careſull diſquiſition of truth; ſo ſome feed foule: others (but few) cleane, and wholeſome. As there is no beaſt upon Earth, which hath not his like in the Sea, and which (perhaps) is not in ſome ſort paralelled in the Plants of the earth: ſo there is no beaſtiall diſpoſition, which is not anſwerably found in ſome men. Mankind therefore hath within it ſelfe his Goats, Chameleons, Salamanders, Camels, Wolves, Dogs, Swine, Moles, and what ever ſorts C of beaſts: there are but a few men amongſt men: to a wiſe man the ſhape is not ſo much as the qualities: If I be not a man within, in my choices, affections, inclinations; it had beene better for mee to have beene a beaſt without: A beaſt is but like it ſelfe; but an evill man is halfe a beaſt, and halfe a Devill.

Forced favours are thankleſſe: and commonly with noble mindes find no acceptation: for a man to give his ſoule to God, when he ſees he can no longer hold it; or to beſtow his goods, when he is forced to depart with them; or to forſake his ſinne, when he cannot follow it, are but unkinde and cold obediences: God ſees our neceſſity, and ſcornes our compelled offers; what man of any generous ſpirit will abide himſelfe made the laſt D refuge of a craved, denied, and conſtrained curteſie? While God gives me leave to keepe my ſoule, yet then to bequeath it to him, and whiles ſtrength and opportunitie ſerve me to ſinne, then to forſake it, is both accepted and crowned: God loves neither, grudged, nor neceſſary gifts: I will offer betimes, that he may vouchſafe to take: I will give him the beſt, that he may take all.

O God, give me this grace, that I may give thee my ſelfe, freely and ſeaſonably: and then I know thou canſt not but accept me, becauſe this gift is thine owne.

MEDITATIONS
AND VOWES, DIVINE
AND MORALL.

TO THE RIGHT WORSHIPFVLL, SIR Edmund Bacon, Knight,

INCREASE OF HONOVR, ſtrength of body, perfection of Vertue.

SIR, There is no wiſe man would give his thoughts for all the world: which as they are the moſt pleaſing and noble buſineſſe of man, being the naturall and immediate iſſue of that reaſon, whereby he is ſevered from brute creatures: ſo they are in their uſe moſt beneficiall to our ſelves, and others. For, by the meanes hereof, we enjoy both God and our ſelves; and hereby we make others partners of thoſe rich excellencies, which God hath hid in the minde. And though it be moſt eaſie and ſafe, for a man, with the Pſalmiſt to commune with his owne heart in ſilence; yet is it more behovefull to the common good, for which (both as men and Chriſtians) we are ordained, that thoſe thoughts which our experience hath found comfortable and fruitfull to our ſelves, ſhould (with neglect of all cenſures) be communicated to others. The concealement whereof (mee thinkes) can proceed from no other ground, but either timorouſneſſe, or envie. Which conſideration hath induced me to cloath theſe naked thoughts in plaine and ſimple words, and to adventure them into the light, after their fellowes: Conſecrating them the rather to your name, for that (beſides all other reſpects of dutie) they are part of thoſe meditations, which in my late peregrination with you, tooke mee up under the solitarie hills of Ardenna, wanting as then the opportunitie of their employment. I offer them to you not for that your selfe is not stored with choyce of better; but as poore men use to bring presents to the rich: If they may carry acceptation from you and bring profit unto any soule, it shall abundantly satisfie me, who should thinke it honour enough, if I might be vouchsafed to bring but one pinne towards the decking of the Spouse of Christ; whiles others, out of their abundance, adorne her with costly robes, and rich medals. I commend their successe to God, their patronage to you, their use to the world. That God multiplie his rare favours upon you, and your worthy Ladie; and goe you on to favour.

Your Worships humbly devoted,

Ios. Hall.

MEDITATIONS AND VOWES.

THE THIRD CENTURIE.

1

GOod men are placed by God, as ſo many ſtarres in the lower firmament of the world. As they muſt imitate thoſe heavenly bodies, in their light and influence; ſo alſo in their motion: and therefore as the Planets have a courſe proper to themſelves, againſt the ſway of the Heaven that carries them about; ſo muſt each good man have a motion out of his owne judgement, contrary to the cuſtomes and opinions of the vulgar; finiſhing his owne courſe with the leaſt ſhew of reſiſtance. I will never affect ſingularity, except it be among thoſe that are vicious. It is better to do, or think well alone, than to follow a multitude in evill.

What ſtrange variety of actions doth the eye of God ſee at once round about the D compaſſe of the earth, and within it! Some building houſes; ſome delving for metals; ſome marching in troups, or encamping one againſt another; ſome bargaining in the market; ſome travelling on their way; ſome praying in their cloſets; others quaffing at the Taverne, ſome rowing in the Gallies; others dallying in their chambers; and in ſhort, as many different actions as perſons: yet all have one common intention of good to themſelves; true in ſome, but in the moſt, imaginary. The glorified ſpirits have but one uniforme worke, wherein they all joyne; The praiſe of their Creator. This is one difference betwixt the Saints above, and below: They above are free both from buſineſſe, and diſtraction: theſe below are free (though not abſolutely) from diſtraction, not at all from buſineſſe. Paul could thinke of the cloke that he left at Troas; and of the ſhaping of his skins for his tents: yet, thorow theſe hee look't ſtill at heaven. This world is made for buſineſſe: my actions muſt vary according to occaſions: my end
E ſhall be but one, and the ſame now on earth, that it muſt be one day in heaven.

To ſee how the Martyrs of God died, and the life of their perſecutors, would make a man out of love with life, and out of all feare of death. They were fleſh and bloud, as well as wee; life was as ſweet to them, as to us; their bodies were as ſenſible of paine as ours; wee goe to the ſame heaven with them. How comes it then, that they were ſo courageous in abiding ſuch torments in their death, as the very mention ſtrikes horror into any Reader, and we are ſo cowardly in encountering a faire and naturall death?

If this valour had been of themſelves, I would never have looked after them in hope of imitation. Now, I know it was he for whom they ſuffered, and that ſuffered in them, which ſuſtained them. They were of themſelves as weake as I, and God can be as ſtrong in me, as he was in them. O Lord, thou art not more unable to give me this grace; but I am more unworthy to receive it: and yet thou regardeſt not worthineſſe, but mercy. Give me their ſtrength, and what end thou wilt. A

Our firſt age is all in hope. When wee are in the wombe, who knowes whether wee ſhall have our right ſhape and proportion of body, being neither monſtrous nor deformed? When we are borne, who knowes whether with the due features of a man, we ſhall have the faculties of reaſon and underſtanding? When yet our progreſſe in yeeres diſcovereth wit or folly; who knowes, whether with the power of reaſon we ſhall have the gace of faith to be Chriſtians? and when we begin to profeſſe well, whether it be a temporary, and ſeeming, or a true and ſaving faith? Our middle age is halfe in hope for the future, and halfe in proofe for that is paſt: Our old age is out of hope, and altogether in proofe. In our laſt times therefore wee know, both what wee have beene, and what to expect. It is good for youth to looke forward, and ſtill to propound the beſt things unto it ſelfe; for an old man to looke backward, and to repent him of that wherein he hath failed, and to recollect himſelfe for the preſent: but in my middle age, I will looke both backward and forward; comparing my hopes with my proofe; redeeming the time, ere it be all ſpent, that my recoverie may prevent my repentance. It is both a folly and miſery to ſay, This I might have done. B

It is the wonderfull mercy of God, both to forgive us our debts to him in our ſins, and to make himſelfe a debtor to us in his promiſes. So that now both wayes the ſoule may be ſure; ſince he neither calleth for thoſe debts which he hath once forgiven; nor withdraweth thoſe favours, and that heaven which he hath promiſed: but as hee is a mercifull creditor to forgive, ſo hee is a true debtor to pay whatſoever hee hath undertaken: whence it is come to paſſe, that the penitent ſinner owes nothing to God but love and obedience, and God owes ſtill much and all to him: for hee owes as much as hee hath promiſed; and what he owes by vertue of his bleſſed promiſe, wee may challenge. O infinite mercy! He that lent us all that wee have, and in whoſe debt-bookes we runne hourely forward till the ſumme be endleſſe; yet owes us more, and bids us looke for payment. I cannot deſerve the leaſt favour hee can give; yet will I as confidently challenge the greateſt, as if I deſerved it. Promiſe indebteth no leſſe thā loane or deſert. C

It is no ſmall commendation to manage a little well. He is a good Waggoner, that can turne in a narrow roome. To live well in abundance, is the praiſe of the eſtate, not of the perſon. I will ſtudie more how to give a good account of my little, than how to make it more? D

Many Chriſtians doe greatly wrong themſelves with a dull and heavie kinde of ſullennes; who not ſuffering themſelves to delight in any worldly thing, are thereupon oft-times ſo heartleſſe, that they delight in nothing. Theſe men, like to careleſſe gueſts, when they are invited to an excellent banquet, loſe their dainties for want of a ſtomake; and loſe their ſtomake for want of exerciſe. A good conſcience keeps alwaies good cheere: hee cannot chuſe but fare well that hath it, unleſſe hee loſe his appetite with neglect and ſlothfulnes. It is a ſhame for us Chriſtians, not to finde as much joy in God, as worldlings doe in their forced merriments; and lewd wretches in the practice of their ſinnes. E

A wiſe Chriſtian hath no enemies. Many hate and wrong him: but hee loves all men, and all pleaſure him. Thoſe that profeſſe love to him, pleaſure him with the comfort of their ſocietie, and the mutuall reflection of freindſhip: thoſe that profeſſe hatred, make him more warie of his waies; ſhew him faults in himſelfe, which his freinds would either not have eſpied, or not cenſured: ſend him the more willingly to ſeeke favour above

A above; and as the worſt doe beſtead him, though againſt their wills; ſo he againe doth voluntarily good to them. To doe evill for evill, as Ioab to Abner, is a ſinfull weakneſſe: To doe good for good, as Ahaſuerus to Mordecai, is but naturall juſtice: To doe evill for good, as Iudas to Chriſt, is unthankfulneſſe & villanie: Onely to doe good for evill, agrees with Chriſtian profeſſion. And what greater work of freindſhip, than to doe good? If men will not be my freinds in love, I will perforce make them my friends in a good uſe of their hatred. I will be their freind, that are mine, and would not be.

All temporall things are troubleſome. For if we have good things, it is a trouble to forgoe them; and when we ſee they muſt be parted from, either we wiſh they had not beene ſo good, or that we never had enjoyed them. Yea, it is more trouble to loſe them, than it was before joy to poſſeſſe them. If contrarily, we have evill things, their very
B preſence is troubleſome; and ſtill wee wiſh that they were good, or that wee were diſburdened of them. So good things are troubleſome in event, evill things in their uſe. They in the future, theſe in the preſent: they, becauſe they ſhall come to an end, theſe becauſe they doe continue. Tell mee, thy wife, or thy childe lies dying, and now makes up a loving and dutifull life, with a kinde and loving parture; whether hadſt thou rather for thy owne part, ſhee had bin ſo good, or worſe? would it have coſt thee ſo many hearty ſighes and teares, if ſhee had beene perverſe and diſobedient? Yet if in her life time I put thee to this choice, thou thinkeſt it no choice at all, in ſuch inequalitie. It is more torment (ſayeſt thou) to live one unquiet moneth, then it is pleaſure to live an age in love. Or if thy life be yet dearer: Thou haſt lived to gray haires, not haſtned with care, but bred with late ſucceſſion of yeeres. Thy table was ever cóvered with va-
C riety of diſhes. Thy backe ſoftly and richly clad: Thou never gaveſt denyall to either skin or ſtomake: Thou ever favouredſt thy ſelfe; and health, thee. Now death is at thy threſhold, and unpartially knockes at thy dore, doſt thou not wiſh thou hadſt lived with cruſts, and beene clothed with rags? Wouldſt not thou have given a better welcome to death, if he had found thee, lying upon a pallet of ſtraw, and ſupping of waters gruell; after many painfull nights, and many ſides changed in vaine? Yet this beggerly eſtate thou deteſteſt in health, and pitieſt in others, as truly miſerable. The ſumme is; A begger wiſheth he might be a Monarch while hee lives; and the great Potentate wiſheth he had lived a begger when he comes to die: and, if beggerie be to have nothing, he ſhall be ſo in death, though he wiſhed it not. Nothing therfore but eternitie can make a man truly happy; as nothing can make perfect miſery but eternitie: for as temporall good things afflict us in their ending, ſo temporall ſorrowes afford us joy in the hope of their end. What folly is this in us to ſeeke for our trouble, to neglect our happineſſe? I can D be but well; and this that I was well, ſhall one day be grievous. Nothing ſhall pleaſe me, but that once I ſhall be happie for ever.

The eldeſt of our fore-fathers lived not ſo much as a day to God, to whom a thouſand yeeres is as no more; we live but as an houre to the day of our fore-fathers, for if nine hundred and ſixty were but their day, our foureſcore is but as the twelfth part of it: and yet of this our houre wee live ſcarce a minute to God. For, take away all that time that is conſumed in ſleeping, dreſſing, feeding, talking, ſporting; of that little time there can remaine not much more than nothing: yet the moſt ſeeke paſtimes to haſten it. Thoſe which ſeeke to mend the pace of Time, ſpurre a running horſe. I had more need to redeeme it with double care and labour, than to ſeeke how to ſell it for nothing.

11

E Each day is a new life, and an abridgement of the whole. I will ſo live, as if I counted every day my firſt, and my laſt: as if I began to live but then, and ſhould live no more afterwards.

It was not in vaine, that the ancient founders of languages uſed the ſame word in many tongues, to ſignifie both Honour and Charge; meaning therein to teach us the inſeparable connexion of theſe two. For there ſcarce ever was any charge without ſome opinion of honour: neither ever was there honour without a charge; which two as they are not without reaſon joyned together in name by humane inſtitution, ſo they are moſt wiſely coupled together by God in the diſpoſition of theſe worldly eſtates. Charge without Honour, to make it amends, would be too toilſome, and muſt needs diſcourage and over-lay a man. Honour without charge would be too pleaſant, and therefore both would be too much ſought after, and muſt needs carrie away the minde in the enjoying it. Now many dare not be ambitious, becauſe of the burden; chuſing rather to live obſcurely and ſecurely: And yet on the other ſide thoſe that are under it, are refreſhed in the Charge with the ſweetneſſe of Honour. Seeing they cannot be ſeparated, it is not the worſt eſtate to want both. They whom thou enviest for honour, perhaps envie thee more for thy quietneſſe. A

He that taketh his owne cares upon himſelfe, loads himſelfe in vaine with an uneaſie burden. The feare of what may come, expectation of what will come, deſire of what will not come, and inabilitie of redreſſing all theſe, muſt needs breed him continuall torment. I will caſt my cares upon God, he hath bidden mee: they cannot hurt him; he can redreſſe them. B

14

Our infancie is full of folly; youth, of diſorder and toile; age, of infirmitie. Each time hath his burden, and that which may juſtly worke our wearineſſe: yet infancie longeth after youth; and youth, after more age: and he that is very old, as he is a childe for ſimplicitie, ſo he would be for yeeres. I account old age the beſt of three; partly, for that it hath paſſed thorow the folly and diſorder of the others; partly, for that the inconveniences of this are but bodily, with a bettered eſtate of the minde; and partly, for that it is neareſt to diſſolution. There is nothing more miſerable, than an old man that would be young againe. It was an anſwer worthy the commendations, of Petrarch, and that which argued a minde truly philoſophicall of him, who when his friend bemoned his age appearing in his white temples, telling him hee was ſorrie to ſee him looke ſo old, replied: Nay, be ſorrie rather that ever I was young, to be a foole. C

15

There is not the leaſt action or event, (what-ever the vaine Epicures have imagined) which is not over-ruled, and diſpoſed by a providence: which is ſo far from detracting ought from the majeſtie of God for that the things are ſmall, as that there can be no greater honour to him, than to extend his providence and decree to them becauſe they are infinite. Neither doth this hold in naturall things only, which are chained one to another by a regular order of ſucceſſion, but even in thoſe things which fall out by caſualtie and imprudence: whence that worthy Father, when as his ſpeech digreſſed his intention to a confutation of the errors of the Manichees, could preſently gheſſe, that in that unpurpoſed turning of it, God intended the converſion of ſome unknowne Auditor; as the event proved his conjecture true ere many daies. When ought falls out contrary to that I purpoſed, it ſhall content me, that God purpoſed it as it is falne out: ſo the thing hath attained his owne end, whiles hee miſſed mine. I know what I would, but God knoweth what I ſhould will. It is enough that his will is done, though mine be croſſed. D

16

It is the moſt thankleſſe office in the world, to be a mans Pandar unto ſinne. In other wrongs, one man is a Wolfe to another: but in this, a Devill. And, though at the firſt this damnable ſervice carry away reward, yet in concluſion, it is requited with hatred and curſes. For, as the ſicke man extremely diſtaſted with a loathſome potion, hateth the very cruze wherin it was brought him; ſo doth the conſcience, once ſoundly deteſting ſinne, loath the meanes that induced him to commit it. Contrarily, who withſtands a man in his proſecution of a ſinne, while he doteth upon it, beares away frownes, and heart-burnings for a time: but when the offending party comes to himſelfe, and right reaſon, he recompenceth his former diſlike with ſo much more love, and ſo many more thankes. The franticke man returned to his wits, thinkes him his beſt friend that bound him, and beat him moſt. I will doe my beſt to croſſe any man in his ſinnes, if I have not thankes of him, yet of my conſcience I ſhall. E

God must be magnified in his very judgements. He lookes for praise, not only for heaven, but for hell also. His justice is himselfe, as well as his mercy. As heaven then is for the praise of his mercy; so hell for the glory of his justice. We must therefore be so affected to judgements as the Author of them is, who delighteth not in bloud, as it makes his creature miserable, but as it makes his justice glorious. Every true Christian then must learne to sing that compound ditty of the Psalmist: Of mercy and judgement. It shall not only joy me to see God gratious and bountifull in his mercies, and deliverances of his owne; but also to see him terrible in vengeance to his enemies. It is no cruelty to rejoyce in justice. The foolish mercy of men is cruelty to God.

Rarenesse causeth wonder, and more than that, incredulity, in those things which in themselves are not more admirable, than the ordinary proceedings of Nature. If a blazing starre be seene in the skie, every man goes forth to gaze, and spends, every evening, some time in wandering at the beames of it. That any fowle should be bred of corrupted wood resolved into wormes: or that the Chameleon should ever change his colours, and live by aire: that the Ostrich should digest yron: that the Phœnix should burne her selfe to ashes, and from thence breed a successor; we wonder, and can scarce credit. Other things more usuall, no lesse miraculous, we know and neglect. That there should be a bird, that knoweth, and noteth the houres of day and night, as certainly as any Astronomer by the course of Heaven, if we knew not, who would beleeve? Or that the load-stone should by his secret vertue so draw yron to it selfe, as that a whole chaine of needles should all hang by insensible points at each other, only by the influence that it sends downe from the first, if it were not ordinary, would seeme incredible. Who would beleeve when hee sees a fowle mounted as high as his sight can descrie it, that there were an engine to be framed, which could fetch it downe into his fist? Yea, to omit infinite examples, that a little despised creature should weave nets out of her owne entrailes, and in her platformes of building should observe as just proportions as the best Geometrician, we should suspect for an untruth, if we saw it not daily practised in our owne windowes. If the sunne should arise but once to the earth, I doubt, every man would be a Persian, and fall downe and worship it: whereas now it riseth and declineth without any regard. Extraordinary events each man can wonder at. The frequence of Gods best workes causeth neglect: not that they are ever the worse for commonnesse; but because wee are soone cloyed with the same conceit, and have contempt bred in us through familiarity. I will learne to note Gods power and wisdome, and to give him praise of both, in his ordinary workes: so those things which are but triviall to the most ignorant, shall be wonders to me; and that not for nine dayes, but for euer.

19

Those that affect to tell novelties and wonders, fall into many absurdities, both in busie enquiry after matters impertinent, and in a light credulitie, to what-ever they heare; and in fictions of their owne, and additions of circumstances to make their reports the more admired. I have noted these men, not so much wondered at for their strange stories, while they are telling, as derided afterwards, when the euent hath wrought their disproofe and shame. I will deale with rumours as grave men doe by strange fashions, take them up when they are growne into common use before: I may beleeve, but I will not relate them but under the name of my authour; who shall either warrant me with defence, if it be true; or if false, beare my shame.

20

It was a witty and true speech of that obscure Heraclitus. That all men awaking are in one common world, but when wee sleepe, each man goes into a severall world by himselfe; which though it be but a world of fancies, yet is the true image of that little world which is in every mans heart. For the imaginations of our sleepe, shew us what our disposition is awaking. And as many in their dreames reveale those their secrets to others, which they would never have done awake: so all may and doe disclose to themselves in their sleepe those secret inclinations, which after much searching, they could not not have found out waking. I doubt not therefore, but as God heretofore hath taught future things in dreames (which kind of revelation is now ceased) so still he teacheth the present estate of the heart this way. Some dreames are from our selves, vaine & idle, like our selves: Others are divine, which teach us good, or move us to good: and others devillish, which sollicite us to evill. Such answer commonly shall I give to any temptation in the day, as I doe by night. I will not lightly passe over my very dreames. They shall teach me somewhat; so neither night nor day shall be spent unprofitably: The night shall teach me what I am, the day what I should be. A

21

Men make difference betwixt servants, friends, and sonnes. Servants, though neere us in place, yet for their inferiority, are not familiar. Friends, though by reason of their equality, and our love, they are familiar; yet still we conceive of them as others from our selves. But children we thinke of, affectionately, as the divided peeces of our owne bodies. But all these are one to God: his servants are his friends, his friends are his sons, his sons his servants. Many claime kindred of God, & professe friendship to him, because these are privileges without difficultie, and not without honour: all the triall is in service. The other are most in affection, & therefore secret, and so may be dissembled, this consisting in action, must needs shew it selfe to the eyes of others. Yee are my friends, if ye doe whatsoever I commaund you: friendship with God is in service, and this service is in action. Many weare Gods cloth that know not their Master, that never did good chare in his service: so that God hath many retainers that weare his livery, for a countenance, never wait on him; whom hee will never owne for servants either by favour, or wages; few servants, and therefore few sons. It is great favour in God, and great honour to me, that he will vouchsafe to make me the lowest drudge in his family; which place if I had not, and were a Monarch of men, I were accursed. I desire no more but to serve; yet, Lord, thou giv'st me more, to be thy sonne. I heare David say, Seemeth it a small matter to you, to be the sonne in law to a King? What is it then, oh what is it to be the true adopted son of the King of glory? Let me not now say as David of Saul, but as Sauls grand-child to David; Oh, what is thy servant, that thou shouldest looke upon such a dead dog as I am? B C

22

I am a stranger here below, my home is above; yet I can thinke too well of these forraine vanities, and cannot thinke enough of my home. Surely, that is not so farre above my head, as my thoughts; neither doth so far passe me in distance, as in comprehension: and yet I would not stand so much upon conceiving, if I could admire it enough: but my straight heart is filled with a little wonder; & hath no roome for the greatest part of Glory that remaineth. O God, what happinesse hast thou prepared for thy chosen? What a purchase was this, worthy of the bloud of such a Saviour? As yet I doe but looke towards it afar off: but it is easie to see by the outside, how goodly it is within: Although as thine house on earth, so that above hath more glory within, than can be bewrayed by the outward appearance. The outer part of thy Tabernacle here below, is but an earthly & base substance; but within, it is furnished with a living, spirituall, and heavenly guest: so the outer heavens, though they be as gold to all other materiall creatures; yet they are but drosse to thee: yet how are even the outmost walls of that house of thine, beautified with glorious lights, whereof every one is a world for bignesse, and as an heaven for goodlinesse! Oh teach me by this to long after, and wonder at the inner part, before thou letst me come in to behold it. D

23

Riches or beautie, or what ever worldly good that hath beene, doth but grieve vs; that which is, doth not satisfie vs; that which shall be, is uncertaine. What folly is it to trust to any of them? E

24

Securitie makes worldlings merry: & therefore are they secure, because they are ignorant. That is only solid joy, which ariseth from a resolution; when the heart hath cast up a full account of all causes of disquietnes, & findeth the causes of his joy more forcible: thereupon setling it selfe in a stayed course of rejoycing. For the other,

so

A so soone as sorrow makes it selfe to be seene, especially in an unexpected forme, is swallowed up in dispaire; whereas this can meet with no occurrence, which it hath not prevented in thought. Securitie and ignorance may scatter some refuse morsels of joy, sauced with much bitternesse; or may be like some boasting house-keeper, which keepeth open doores for one day with much cheere, and lives starvedly all the yeere after. There is no good Ordinary but in a good conscience. I pity that unsound joy in others, and will seeke for this sound joy in my selfe. I had rather weepe upon a just cause, than rejoyce unjustly.

As love keepes the whole law, so love only is the breaker of it; being the ground, as of all obedience, so of all sinne; for whereas sinne hath beene commonly accounted to have two roots, Love and Feare; it is plaine, that feare hath his originall from love:
B for no man feares to lose ought but what he loves. Heare is sinne and righteousnesse brought both into a short summe, depending both upon one poore affection: It shall be my only care therefore to bestow my love well, both for object, and measure. All that is good, I may love, but in severall degrees; what is simply good, absolutely; what is good by circumstance, only with limitation. There be these three things that I may love without exception, God, my neighbour, my soule; yet so as each have their due place: My body, goods, fame, &c. as servants to the former. All other things I will either not care for, or hate.

One would not thinke, that pride and base-mindednesse should so well agree; yea, that they love so together, that they never goe asunder. That envie ever proceeds from a base minde, is granted of all: Now the proud man, as he faine would be envied
C of others, so he envieth all men. His betters he envies, because he is not so good as they: he envies his inferiours, because he feares they should prove as good as he: his equals, because they are as good as he. So under big lookes, he beares a base minde, resembling some Cardinals mule, which to make up the traine, beares a costly Port-mantle stuffed with trash. On the contrary, who is more proud than the basest? (the Cinicke tramples on Platoes pride, but with a worse) especially if hee be but a little exalted; wherein we see base men so much more haughty, as they have had lesse before what they might be proud of. It is just with God, as the proud man is base in himselfe, so to make him basely esteemed in the eyes of others; & at last to make him base without pride. I will contemne a proud man, because he is base, and pittie him because he is proud.

Let me but have time to my thoughts; but leisure to thinke of Heaven, and grace to D my leasure; and I can be happy in spight of the world. Nothing, but God that gives it, can bereave me of grace; and he will not; for his gifts are without repentance. Nothing but death can abridge me of time; and when I begin to want time to thinke of heaven, I shall have eternall leisure to enjoy it. I shall be both wayes happy, not from any vertue of apprehension in me, (which have no peere in worthynesse) but from the glory of that I apprehend; wherein the act and object are from the author of happinesse. He gives me this glory; let me give him the glory of his gift. His glory is my happinesse; let my glory be his.

God bestowes favours upon some in anger, as he strikes othersome in love: (The Israelites had better have wanted their Quailes, than to have eaten them with such sauce.) And somtimes at our instancie removing a lesser punishment, leaves a greater,
E though insensible, in the roome of it. I will not so much strive against affliction, as displeasure. Let me rather be afflicted in love, than prosper without it.

It is strange that we men having so continuall use of God, and being so perpetually beholding to him, should be so strange to him, and so litle acquainted with him: since we account it a perverse nature in any man, that being provoked with many kinde offices, refuses the familiarity of a worthy friend, which doth still seeke it, and hath deserved it. Whence it comes, that we are so loth to thinke of our dissolution and going to God: for naturally where wee are not acquainted, wee liſt not to hazard our welcome; chuſing rather to ſpend our money at a ſimple Inne, than to turne in for a free lodging to an unknowne Oaſt, whom wee have only heard of, never had friendſhip with; whereas to an entire friend, whoſe nature and welcome we know, and whom we have elſe-where familiarly converſed withall, we goe as boldly and willingly as to our home, knowing that no houre can be unſeaſonable to ſuch a one: whiles on the other ſide we ſcrape acquaintance with the world, that never did us good, even after many repulſes. I will not live with God, and in God, without his acquaintance, knowing it my happineſſe to have ſuch a freind. I will not let one day paſſe without ſome act of renewing my familiarity with him: not giving over till I have given him ſome teſtimony of my love to him, and joy in him; and till he hath left behinde him ſome pledge of his continued favour to me.

to

30

Men, for the moſt part, would neither die nor be old. When we ſee an aged man that hath over-lived all the teeth of his gummes, the haire of his head, the ſight of his eyes, the taſte of his palate; we profeſſe, wee would not live till ſuch a comberſome age wherein we prove burdens to our deareſt friends, and our ſelves: yet if it be put to our choyce what yeere we would die, we ever ſhift it off till the next; and want not excuſes for this prorogation, rather than faile, alleaging, we would live to amend; when yet wee doe but adde more to the heape of our ſinnes by continuance. Nature hath nothing to pleade for this folly, but that life is ſweete: wherein wee give occaſion of renewing that ancient check, or one not unlike to it, whereby that primitive viſion taxed the timorouſneſſe of the ſhrinking Confeſſors; Yee would neither live to be old, nor die ere your age: what ſhould I doe with you? The Chriſtian muſt not thinke it enough to endure the thought of death with patience, when it is obtruded upon him by neceſſitie; but muſt voluntarily call it into his minde with joy; not only abiding it ſhould come, but wiſhing that it might come. I will not leave till I can reſolve, if I might die to day, not to live till to morrow.

31

As a true friend is the ſweeteſt contentment in the world: ſo in his qualities he well reſembleth hony, the ſweeteſt of all liquors. Nothing is more ſweet to the taſte nothing more ſharpe and cleanſing, when it meets with an exulcerate ſore. For my ſelfe, I know I muſt have faults; and therefore I care not for that friend, that I ſhall never ſmart by. For my friends, I know they cannot be faultleſſe; and therefore as they ſhall finde me ſweet in their praiſes and encouragements, ſo ſharpe alſo in their cenſure. Either let them abide me no friend to their faults, or no friend to themſelves.

In all other things we are lead by profit; but in the maine matter of all, we ſhew our ſelves utterly unthriftie; and whiles we are wiſe in making good markets in theſe baſe commodities, we ſhew our ſelves fooliſh in the great match of our ſoules. God and the world come both to one ſhop, and make proffers for our ſoules. The world, like a franke Chapman, ſayes, All theſe will I give thee, ſhewing us his bagges, and promotions, and thruſting them into our hands. God offers a crowne of glory, which yet he tels us we muſt give him day to performe, and have nothing in preſent, but our hope and ſome ſmall earneſt of the bargaine. Though we know there is no compariſon betwixt theſe two in value, finding theſe earthly things vaine & unable to give any contentment, & thoſe other of invaluable worth & benefit: yet we had rather take theſe in hand, than truſt God on his word for the future; while yet in the ſame kind we chuſe rather to take ſome rich Lordſhips in reverſion, after the long expectation of three lives expired, than a preſent ſumme much under foot: As contrarily, when God & the world are ſellers, & we come to the Mart, the world offers fine painted wares, but wil not part with them under the price of our torment: God proclaims; Come yee that want, buy for nought. Now wee thrifty men, that trie all ſhops for the cheapeſt peniworth, refuſe God, proffering his precious commodities for nothing; & pay an hard price for that which is worſe than nothing, painfull. Surely, we are wiſe for any thing but our ſoules: not ſo wiſe for the body, as fooliſh for them. O Lord, thy payment

A payment is ſure, and who knowes how preſent? Take the ſoule that thou haſt both made and bought: and let me rather give my life for thy favour, than take the offers of the world for nothing.

There was never age that more bragged of knowledge, and yet neuer any that had leſſe ſoundneſſe. Hee that knowes not God, knoweth nothing; and he that loues not God, knowes him not: for he is ſo ſweet, and infinitely full of delight, that who-euer knowes him cannot chuſe but affect him. The little loue of God then argues the great ignorance euen of thoſe that profeſſe knowledge. I will not ſuffer my affections to run before my knowledge: for then I ſhall loue faſhionably onely, becauſe I heare God is worthy of love; and ſo be ſubject to relapſes: but I will ever lay knowledge as the ground of my loue. So, as I grow in divine knowledge, I ſhall ſtill profit in an heauen-

Thoſe that trauell in long pilgrimages to the holy Land, what a number of weary paſes they meaſure? what a number of hard lodgings and knowne dangers they paſſe? and at laſt when they are come within view of their journeyes end, what a large tribute pay they at the Piſan Caſtle to the Turkes? And when they are come thither, what ſee they but the bare Sepulcher wherein their Saviour lay? and the earth that hee trode upon to the increaſe of a carnall devotion? What labour ſhould I willingly vnder-take in my journey to the true Land of promiſe, the celeſtiall Ieruſalem, where I ſhall ſee and enjoy my Saviour himſelfe? What tribute of paine or death ſhould I refuſe to pay for my entrance, not into his Sepulcher, but his Palace of glory? and that not to looke upon, but to poſſeſſe it?

Thoſe that are all in exhortation, no whit in doctrine, are like to them that ſnuffe the candle, but powre not in oyle. Againe, thoſe that are all in doctrine, nothing in exhortation, drowne the wike in oyle, but light it not; making it fit for vſe, if it had fire put to it; but as it is, rather capable of good, than profitable in preſent. Doctrine, without exhortation, makes men all braine, no heart. Exhortation, without doctrine, makes the heart full, leaues the braine emptie. Both together make a man: One makes a man wiſe; the other good. One ſerues that we may know our duty; the other, that we may performe it. I will labour in both: but I know not in whether more. Men cannot practiſe, unleſſe they know; and they know in vaine, if they practiſe not.

There be two things in euery good worke; honour and profit. The latter God be-D ſtowes upon us, the former he keepes to himſelfe. The profit of our workes redounds not to God. My well-doing extendeth not to thee. The honour of our worke may not be allowed us. My glory I will not give to another. I will not abridge God of his part, that he may not bereaue me of mine.

The proud man hath no God; the envious man hath no neighbour; the angry man hath not himſelfe. What can that man haue that wants himſelfe? What is a man better, if he have himſelfe, and want all others? What is he the neerer, if he have himſelfe, and others, and yet want God? What good is it then to be a man, if he be either, wrath-full, proud or envious?

Man that was once the ſoveraigne Lord of all creatures, whom they ſerviceably at-
E tended at all times, is now ſent to the very baſeſt of all creatures to learne good qualities, Goe to the Piſmire, &c. and ſee, the moſt contemptible creature's prefer'd before him: The Aſſe knoweth his owner; wherein we, like the miſerable heire of ſome great Peere, whoſe houſe is decayed through the treaſon of our progenitors, heare and ſee what Honours and Lord-ſhips we ſhould have had, but now find our ſelves below many of the vulgar: we have not ſo much cauſe of exaltation, that we are men, and not beaſts; as we have of humiliation, in thinking how much we were once better than wee are, and that now in many duties wee are men inferiour to beaſts: ſo as thoſe whom wee contemne, contemne, if they had our reaſon, might more juſtly contemne vs ; and as they are, may teach us by their examples, and doe condemne us by their practice. A

The idle man is the Devils cuſhion, on which he taketh his free eaſe : who as he is uncapable of any good, ſo he is fitly diſpoſed for all evill motions. The ſtanding water ſoone ſtinketh ; whereas the current ever keepes cleere and cleanly : conveying downe all noiſome matter that might infect it, by the force of his ſtreame. If I doe but little good to others by my endevours, yet this is great good to me, that by my labour I keepe my ſelfe from hurt.

40

There can be no neerer conjunction in nature, than is betwixt the body and the ſoule: yet theſe two are of ſo contrary diſpoſition, that as it falls out in an ill-matched man and wife, thoſe ſervants which the one likes beſt, are moſt diſpraiſed of the other ; ſo here, one ſtill takes part againſt the other in their choice : what benefits the one, is the hurt of the other. The glutting of the body pines the ſoule; and the ſoule thrives beſt when the body is pinched. Who can wonder, that there is ſuch faction amongſt others, that ſees ſo much in his very ſelfe ? True wiſdome is to take, not with the ſtronger, as the faſhion of the world is, but with the better: following herein, not uſurped power, but juſtice. It is not hard ro diſcerne, whoſe the right is ; whether the ſervant ſhould rule or the miſtreſſe I will labour to make and keepe the peace, by giving each part his owne indifferently : but if more be affected with an ambitious contention, I will rather beat Hagar out of doores, than ſhee ſhall over-rule her miſtreſſe. B

41

I ſee Iron firſt heated red hot in the fire, and after beaten and hardened with cold water. Thus will I deale with an offending friend : firſt heat him with deſerved praiſe of his vertue, and then beat upon him with reprehenſion: ſo good nurſes, when their children are fallen, firſt take them up and ſpeake them faire, chide them afterwards : Gentle ſpeech is a good preparative for rigor. He ſhall ſee that I love him, by my approbation; and that I love not his faults by my reproofe. If he love himſelfe, he will love thoſe that miſlike his vices ; and if he love not himſelfe, it matters not whether he love me. C

42

The liker we are to God, which is the beſt and only good, the better and happier we muſt needs be. All ſinnes make us unlike him, as being contrary to his perfect holineſſe; but ſome ſhew more direct contrariety : ſuch is envy. For whereas God bringeth good out of evill ; the envious man fetcheth evill out of good ; wherein alſo his ſinne proves a kinde of puniſhment : for whereas to good men even evill things worke together to their good, contrarily, to the envious, good things worke together to their evill. The evill, in any man, though never ſo proſperous, I will not envy, but pitty : The good graces I will not repine at, but holily emulate ; rejoycing that they are ſo good, but grieving that I am no better. D

43

The covetous man is like a ſpider, as in this, that he doth nothing but lay his nets to catch every Flie, gaping only for a booty of gaine ; ſo yet more, in that whiles hee makes nets for theſe flies, he conſumeth his owne bowels : ſo that which is his life is his death. If there be any creature miſerable, it is he ; and yet he is leaſt to be pittied, becauſe hee makes himſelfe miſerable ; ſuch as he is I will account him ; and will therefore ſweepe downe his webs and hate his poyſon.

In heaven there is all life, and no dying : in hell is all death, and no life. In earth there is both living and dying ; which, as it is betwixt both, ſo it prepares for both. So that he which here below dyes to ſinne, doth after live in heaven ; and contrarily, hee that lives in ſinne upon earth, dies in hell afterwards. What if I have no part of joy here below, but ſtill ſucceſſion of afflictions ? The wicked have no part in heaven, and yet they enjoy the earth with pleaſure : I would not change portions with them. I rejoyce, that ſeeing I cannot have both, yet I have the better. O Lord, let mee paſſe both my E deaths

A deaths here upon earth. I care not how I live or die, ſo I may have nothing but life to looke for in another world.

45

The conceit of propriety hardens a man againſt many inconveniences, and addeth much to our pleaſure. The mother abides many unquiet nights, many painfull throes, and unpleaſant ſavours of her childe, upon this thought, It is my owne. The indulgent father magnifies that in his owne ſonne, which he would ſcarce like in a ſtranger. The want of this to God-ward, makes us ſo ſubject to diſcontentment, and cooleth our delight in him, becauſe we think of him aloofe, as one in whom we are not intereſſed. If we could think, It is my God that cheereth me with his preſence, and bleſſings, while I proſper; that afflicteth me in love, when I am dejected; my Saviour is at Gods right hand; my Angels ſtand in his preſence, it could not be but Gods favour would be ſweeter, his cha-
B ſtiſements more eaſie, his benefits more effectuall. I am not mine owne, while God is not mine: and while he is mine, ſince I doe poſſeſſe him, I will enjoy him.

Nature is of her owne inclination froward, importunately longing after that which is denied her; and ſcornfull of what ſhe may have. If it were appointed that we ſhould live alwaies upon earth, how extremely would we exclaime of wearineſſe, and wiſh rather that we were not? Now it is appointed we ſhall live here but a while, and then give roome to our ſucceſſors, each one affects a kind of eternity upon earth. I will labour to tame this peeviſh and ſullen humour of nature, and will like that beſt that muſt be.

All true earthly pleaſure forſooke man, when he forſooke his Creator; what honeſt
C and holy delight he tooke before in the dutifull ſervices of the obſequious creatures; in the contemplation of that admirable variety, and ſtrangeneſſe of their properties; in ſeeing their ſweet accordance with each other, and all with himſelfe? Now moſt of our pleaſure is, to ſet one creature together by the eares with another, ſporting our ſelves onely with that deformity, which was bred through our owne fault: yea, there have beene, that have delighted to ſee one man ſpill anothers bloud upon the ſand, and have ſhouted for joy at the ſight of that ſlaughter, which hath fallen out upon no other quarrell, but the pleaſure of the beholders: I doubt not but as we ſolace our ſelves in the diſcord of the inferiour creatures, ſo the evill ſpirits ſport themſelves in our diſſentions. There are better qualities of the creature, which we paſſe over without pleaſure. In recreations, I will chuſe thoſe which are of beſt example, and beſt uſe; ſeeking thoſe by which I
D may not onely be the merrier, but the better.

There is no want for which a man may not finde a remedy in himſelfe. Doe I want riches? He that deſires but little, cannot want much. Doe I want friends? If I love God enough, and my ſelfe but enough, it matters not. Doe I want health? If I want it but a little, and recover; I ſhall eſteeme it the more, becauſe I wanted. If I be long ſick, and unrecoverably, I ſhall be the fitter and willinger to die; and my paine is ſo much leſſe ſharpe, by how much more it lingreth. Doe I want maintenance? A little, and courſe, will content nature. Let my mind be no more ambitious, than my backe and belly, I can hardly complaine of too little. Doe I want ſleepe? I am going whither there is no uſe of ſleepe; where all reſt, and ſleepe not. Doe I want children? Many that have them, wiſh they wanted: It is better to be childleſſe, than croſſed with their miſcarriage. Doe I want learning? He hath none, that ſaith he hath enough. The next way to get
E more, is to find thou wanteſt. There is remedie for all wants, in our ſelves, ſaving only for want of grace: and that, a man cannot ſo much as ſee and complaine that he wants, but from above.

Every vertuous action (like the Sunne eclipſed) hath a double ſhadow; according to the divers aſpects of the beholders: one of glory, the other of envy. Glory followes upon good deſerts; Envy upon glory. He that is envied, may think himſelfe well: for he that envies him, thinks him more than well: I know no vice in another, whereof a man may make ſo good and comfortable uſe to himſelfe. There would be no ſhadow, if there were no light. A

In medling with the faults of friends, I have obſerved many wrongfull courſes; what for feare, or ſelfe-love, or indiſcretion. Some I have ſeene, like unmercifull and covetous Chirurgians, keepe the wound raw, (which they might have ſeaſonably remedied) for their owne gaine. Others, that have laid healing plaiſters to skin it aloft, when there hath beene more need of Corroſives to eat out the dead fleſh within. Others, that have galled and drawne, when there hath beene nothing but ſolid fleſh, that hath wanted only filling up. Others, that have healed the ſore, but left an unſightly ſcarre of diſcredit behinde them. He that would doe good this way, muſt have Fidelitie, Courage, Diſcretion, Patience. Fidelitie, not to beare with; Courage, to reprove them; Diſcretion, to reprove them well; Patience, to abide the leiſure of amendment; making much of good beginnings, and putting up many repulſes, bearing with many weakneſſes; ſtill hoping, ſtill ſolliciting; as knowing that thoſe who have beene long uſed to fetters, cannot but halt awhile, when they are taken off. B

51

God hath made all the World, and yet what a little part of it is his? Divide the World into foure parts: but one, and the leaſt containeth all that is worthy the name of Chriſtendome: the reſt overwhelmed with Turciſme, and Paganiſme: and of this leaſt part, the greater halfe yet holding aright concerning God & their Saviour in ſome common principles, overthrow the truth in their concluſions; and ſo leave the leſſer part of the leaſt part for God. Yet lower: of thoſe that hold aright concerning Chriſt, how few are there, that doe otherwiſe than faſhionably profeſſe him? And of thoſe that do ſeriouſly profeſſe him, how few are there that in their lives deny him not, living unworthy of ſo glorious a calling? Wherein I doe not pitty God, who will have glory even of thoſe that are not his: I pitty miſerable men, that doe reject their Creator and Redeemer, and themſelves in him. And I envy Satan, that he ruleth ſo large. Since God hath ſo few, I will be more thankfull that he hath vouchſafed me one of his; and be the more zealous of glorifying him, becauſe we have but a few fellowes. C

52

As thoſe that have taſted of ſome delicate diſh, finde other plaine diſhes but unpleaſant; ſo it fareth with thoſe which have once taſted of heavenly things, they cannot but contemne the beſt worldly pleaſures. As therefore ſome dainty gueſt knowing there is ſo pleaſant fare to come; I will reſerve my appetite for it, and not ſuffer my ſelfe cloied with the courſe diet of the world.

53 D

I finde many places where God hath uſed the hand of good Angels for the puniſhment of the wicked; but never could yet find one, wherein he employed an evill Angell in any direct good to his children. Indirect I find many, if not all, through the power of him that brings light out of darkneſſe, and turnes their evill to our good: In this choice God would and muſt be imitated. From an evill ſpirit I dare not receive ought, if never ſo good; I will receive as little as I may from a wicked man. If he were as perfectly evill as the other, I durſt receive nothing; I had rather hunger, than wilfully dip my hand in a wicked mans diſh.

54

We are ready to condemne others, for that which is as eminently faulty in our ſelves. If one blinde man ruſh upon another in the way, either complaines of others blindneſſe, neither of his owne. I have heard thoſe which have had moſt corrupt lungs, complaine of the unſavory breath of others. The reaſon is, becauſe the mind caſteth altogether outward, and reflecteth not into it ſelfe. Yet it is more ſhamefull to be either ignorant of, or favourable to our owne imperfections. I will cenſure others vices fearefully, my owne confidently, becauſe I know them; and thoſe I know not, I will ſuſpect. E

55

He is a very humble man, that thinks not himſelfe better than ſome others; and he is very meane, whom ſome others doe not account better than themſelves: ſo that

Veſſ ll

A Veſſell that ſeemed very ſmall upon the maine, ſeemes a tall ſhip upon the Thames. As there are many better for eſtate than my ſelfe, ſo there are ſome worſe; and if I were yet worſe, yet would there be ſome lower: and if I were ſo low, that I accounted my ſelfe the worſt of all, yet ſome would account themſelves in worſe caſe. A mans opinion is in others, his being is in himſelfe. Let me know my ſelfe, let others gueſſe at me. Let others either envy or pitty me, I care not ſo long as I enjoy my ſelfe.

Hee can never wonder enough at Gods workmanſhip, that knowes not the frame of the world: for he can never elſe conceive of the hugeneſſe, and ſtrange proportion of the creature. And he that knowes this, can never wonder more at any thinge elſe. I will learne to know, that I may admire; and by that little I know, I will more wonder at that I know not.

B 57

There is nothing below but toyling, grieving, wiſhing, hoping, fearing; and wearineſſe in all theſe. What fooles are we to be beſotted with the love of our owne trouble, and to hate our liberty and reſt? The love of miſery, is much worſe than miſery it ſelfe. We muſt firſt pray, that God would make us wiſe, before we can wiſh he would make us happy.

58

If a man referre all things to himſelfe, nothing ſeemes enough: If all things to God, any meaſure will content him of earthly things; but in grace he is inſatiable. Worldlings ſerve themſelves altogether in God, making Religion but to ſerve their turnes, as a colour of their ambition, and covetouſneſſe. The Chriſtian ſeekes God onely in ſeeking himſelfe, uſing all other things but as ſubordinately to him; not caring whether himſelfe C win or loſe, ſo that God may win glory in both. I will not ſuffer mine eyes and minde to bee bounded with theſe viſible things; but ſtill looke through theſe matters, at God which is the utmoſt ſcope of them: accounting them onely as a thorowfare to paſſe by, not as an habitation to reſt in.

59

He is wealthy enough, that wanteth not. He is great enough, that is his owne Maſter. He is happy enough, that lives to die well. Other things I will not care for; nor too much for theſe, ſave onely for the laſt, which alone can admit of no immoderation.

60

A man of extraordinary parts, makes himſelfe by ſtrangeand ſingular behaviour, more admired; which if a man of but common faculty doe imitate, he makes himſelfe ridiculous: for that which is conſtrued as naturall to the one, is deſcried to be affected D in the other. And there is nothing forced by affectation can be comely. I will ever ſtrive to goe in the common road: ſo while I am not notable, I ſhall not be notorious.

61

Gold is the beſt metall, and for the purity not ſubject to ruſt, as all others; and yet the beſt Gold hath ſome droſſe. I eſteeme not that man that hath no faults: I like him well that hath but a few, and thoſe not great.

62

Many a man marres a good eſtate, for want of skill to proportion his carriage anſwerably to his ability. A little ſaile to a large veſſell, rids no way, though the wind bee faire. A large ſaile to a little Barke drownes it. A top-ſaile to a ſhip of meane burthen in a rough weather, is dangerous. A low ſaile in an eaſie gale, yeelds little advantage. This diſproportion cauſeth ſome to live miſerably in a good eſtate: and ſome to make a E good eſtate miſerable. I will firſt know what I may doe for ſafety, and then I will try what I can doe for ſpeed.

The rich man hath many friends; although in truth riches have them, and not the man. As the Aſſe that carried the Ægyptian Goddeſſe, had many bowed knees, yet not to the beaſt, but to the burthen. For, ſeparate the riches from the perſon, and thou ſhalt ſee friendſhip leave the man, and follow that which was ever her object: while he may command, and can either give, or controll, he hath attendance, and proffer of love at all hands; but which of these dares acknowledge him, when he is going to prison for debt? Then these Waspes, that made such musicke about this Gally-pot, shew plainly, that they came only for the honey that was in it. This is the misery of the wealthy, that they cannot know their friends: whereas those that love the poore man, love him for himselfe. He that would chuse a true friend, must search out one that is neither coveteous nor ambitious; for such a one loves but himselfe in thee. And if it be rare to find any not infected with these qualities, the best is to entertaine all, and trust few.

That which the French Proverbe hath of sicknesses, is true of all evills: That they come on horseback, and goe away on foot. Wee have oft seene a sudden fall, or one meales surfet hath stuck by many to their graves; whereas pleasures come like Oxen, slow and heavily, and goe away like Post-horses, upon the spur. Sorrowes, because they are lingring guests, I will entertaine but moderately; knowing, that the more they are made of, the longer they will continue: and for pleasures, because they stay not, and doe but call to drinke at my doore; I will use them as passengers, with slight respect. He is his owne best friend, that makes least of both of them.

65

It is indeed more commendable to give good example, than to take it: yet imitation, how-ever in civill matters it be condemned of servilitie, in Christian practice hath his due praise; and though it be more naturall for beginners at their first imitation, that cannot swim without bladders; yet the best proficient shall see ever some higher steps of those that have gone to heaven before him, worthy of his tracing: wherin much caution must be had, that we follow good men, and in good: Good men, for if we propound imperfect patterns to our selves, we shall be constrained first to unlearne those ill habits we have got by their imitation, before we can be capable of good: so besides the losse of labour, we are further off from our end. In good; for that a man should be so wedded to any mans person, that he can make no separation from his infirmities, is both absurdly servile, and unchristian. He therefore that would follow well, must know to distinguish well, betwixt good men, and evill; betwixt good men and better; betwixt good qualities and infirmities. Why hath God given me education not in a Desart alone, but in the company of good and vertuous men, but that by the sight of their good carriage, I should better mine owne? Why should we have interest in the vices of men, and not in their vertues? And although precepts be surer, yet a good mans action is according to precept; yea, is a precept it selfe. The Psalmist compares the Law of God to a Lanterne; good example beares it. It is safe following him that carries the light: if he walke without the light, he shall walke without me.

66

As there is one common end to all good men, salvation; and one Author of it, Christ: so there is but one way to it, doing well, and suffering evill. Doing well (me thinks) is like the Zodiacke in the Heaven, the high way of the Sunne, thorow which it daily passeth: Suffering evill, is like the Eclipticke line that goes thorow the middest of it. The rule of doing well, the Law of God, is uniforme and eternall; and the copies of suffering evill in all times agree with the originall. No man can either do well, or suffer ill without an example. Are we sawne in peeces? so was Esay. Are we beheaded? so Iohn Baptist. Crucified? so Peter. Throwne to wild beasts? so Daniel. Into the furnace? so the three children. Stoned? so Steven. Banished? so the beloved Disciple. Burnt? so millions of Martyrs. Defamed and slandered? what good man ever was not? It were easie to be endlesse both in torments and sufferers: whereof each hath begun to other, all to us. I may not hope to speed better than the best Christians; I cannot feare to fare worse. It is no matter which way I goe so I come to Heaven.

67

There is nothing beside life of this nature, that it is diminished by addition. Every moment we live longer than other, and each moment that we live longer, is so much taken out of our life. It increaseth and diminisheth only by minutes, and therefore is not perceived: the shorter steps it taketh, the more slily it passeth. Time shall not so steale upon me, that I shall not discerne it, and catch it by the fore-lockes; nor so steale from me, that it shall carry with it no witnesse of his passage in my proficiency.

68

The prodigall man, while he ſpendeth, is magnified: when he is ſpent, is pittied: and that is all his recompence for his laviſht Patrimonie. The covetous man is grudged while he lives, and his death is rejoyced at: for when he ends, his riches beginne to be goods. He that wiſely keeps the meane betweene both, liveth well, and heares well; neither repined at by the needy; nor pittied by greater men. I would ſo manage theſe worldly commodities, as accounting them mine to diſpoſe, others to pertake of.

69

A good name (if any earthly thing) is worth ſeeking, worth ſtriving for; yet to affect a bare name, when we deſerve either ill or nothing, is but a proud hypocriſie: and to be puffed up with the wrongfull eſtimation of others miſtaking our worth, is an idle and ridiculous pride. Thou art well ſpoken of upon no deſert: what then? Thou haſt deceived thy neighbours, they one another, and all of them have deceived thee: for thou madeſt them thinke of thee otherwiſe than thou art; and they have made thee thinke of thy ſelfe as thou art accounted: the decite came from thee, the ſhame will end in thee. I will account no wrong greater, than for a man to eſteeme and reporte me above that I am: not rejoycing in that I am well thought of, but in that I am ſuch as I am eſteemed.

70

It was a ſpeech worthy the commendation, and frequent remembrance of ſo divine a Biſhop as Auguſtine, which is reported of an aged Father in his time; who when his friends comforted him on his ſicke bed, and told him, they hoped he ſhould recover, anſwered: If I ſhall not die at all, well; but if ever, why not now? Surely it is folly, what we muſt doe, to doe unwillingly. I will never thinke my ſoule in a good caſe, ſo long as I am loth to thinke of dying; and will make this my comfort: Not, I ſhall yet live longer, but, I ſhall yet doe more good.

71

Exceſſes are never alone. Commonly thoſe that have excellent parts, have ſome extremely vicious qualities: great wits have greate errours; and great eſtates have great cares: whereas mediocrity of gifts or of eſtate hath uſually but eaſie inconveniences: elſe the excellent would not know themſelves, and the meane would be too much dejected. Now thoſe whom we admire for their faculties, we pitie for their infirmities; and thoſe which find themſelves but of the ordinary pitch, joy that as their vertues, ſo their vices are not eminent. So the higheſt have a blemiſhed glory, and the meane are contentedly ſecure. I will magnifie the higheſt, but affect the meane.

72

The body is the caſe, or ſheath of the minde: yet as naturally it hideth it; ſo it doth alſo many times diſcover it. For although the forehead, eyes, and frame of the countenance doe ſometime belie the diſpoſition of the heart; yet moſt commonly they give true generall verdicts. An angry mans browes are bent together, and his eyes ſparkle with rage, which when he is well pleaſed, looke ſmooth and cheerefully. Envy hath one looke; deſier another; ſorrow yet another; contentment, a fourth, different from all the reſt. To ſhew no paſſion, is too Stoicall; to ſhew all, is impotent; to ſhew orher than we feele, hypocriticall. The face and geſture doe but write, and make commentaries upon the heart. I will firſt endevoure ſo to frame and order that, as not to entertaine any paſſion, bur what I need not care to have laid open to the world: and therefore will firſt ſee that the Text be good; then that the gloſſe be true; and laſtly, that it be ſparing. To what end hath God ſo walled-in the heart, if I ſhould let every mans eyes into it by my countenance?

73

There is no publike action which the world is not readie to ſcan; there is no action ſo private, which the evill ſpirits are not witneſſes of; I will endevour ſo to live, as knowing that I am ever in the eyes of mine enemies.

74

When we our ſelves, and all other vices are old, then covetouſneſſe alone is young, and at his beſt age. This vice loves to dwell in an old ruinous cottage: yet that age can have no ſuch honeſt colour for niggardlineſſe and inſatiable deſire. A young man might might pleade the uncertainty of his estate and doubt of his future need: but an old man sees his set period before him. Since this humour is so necessarily annexed to this age, I will turne it the right way, and nourish it in my selfe. The older I grow, the more covetoues I will be; but of the riches, not of the world I am leaving, but of all the world I am entring into. It is good coveting what I may have, and cannot leave behind me. A

There is a mutuall hatred betwixt a Christian, and the world: for on the one side, the love of the world is enmity with God; and Gods children cannot but take their Fathers part. On the other; The world hates you, because it hated me first. But the hatred of the good man to the wicked is not so extreme, as that wherewith he is hated. For the Cristian hates ever with commiseration and love of that good he sees in the worst; knowing that the essence of the very Devils is good, and that the lewdest man hath some excellent parts of nature, or common graces of the Spirit of God, which he warily singleth out in his affection. But the wicked man hates him for goodnesse, and therefore findes nothing in himselfe to moderate his detestation. There can be no better musick in mine eare than the discord of the wicked. If he like me, I am afraid he spies some quality in me, like to his owne. If he saw nothing but goodnesse, he could not love me, and be bad himselfe. It was a iust doubt of Phocion, who when the people praised him, asked, What evill have I done? I will strive to deserve evill of none: but not deserving ill, it shall not grive me to heare ill of those that are evill. I know no greater argument of goodnesse, than the hatred of a wicked man. B

76

A man that comes hungry to his meale, feeds heartily on the meat set before him, not regarding the metall, or forme of the platter, wherein it is served; who afterwards when his stomacke is satisfied, begins to play with the dish, or to reade sentences on his trencher. Those auditors which can finde nothing to doe, but note elegant words and phrases, or rhetoricall colours, or perhaps an ill grace of gesture in a pithie and materiall speech, argue themselves full ere they came to the feast: and therefore goe away with a little pleasure, no profit. In hearing others, my only intention shall be to feed my mind with solid matter: if my eare can get ought by the way, I will not grudge it but I will not intend it. C

77

The joy of a Christian in these worldly things is limited, and ever awed with feare of excesse, but recompenced abundantly with his spirituall mirth: whereas the worldling gives the reines to the minde, and powres himselfe into pleasure, fearing only that hee shall not joy enough. He that is but halfe a Christian, lives but miserably; for he neither enjoyeth God, nor the world. Not God, because he hath not grace enough to make him his owne: not the world, because he hath some taste of grace; enough to shew him the vanity and sinne of his pleasures. So the sound Christian hath his heaven above, the worldlyng here below, the unsetled Christian no where. D

78

Good deeds are very fruitfull; and not so much of their nature, as of gods blessing, multipliable. We think ten in the hnndred extreme and biting usury; God gives us more than an hundred for ten; yea, above the increase of the gaine which we commend most for multiplication. For out of one good action of ours, God produceth a thousand; the harvest whereof is perpetuall: Even the faithfull actions of the old Patriarkes, the constant sufferings of ancient Martyres live still, and doe good to all successions of ages by their example. For publike actions of vertue, besides that they are presently comfortable to the doer, are also exemplary to others: and as they are more beneficiall to others, so are more crowned in us. If good deeds were utterly barren and incommodious, I would seeke after them for the conscience of their owne goodnesse: how much more shall I now be incouraged to performe them, for that they are so profitable both to my selfe, and to others, and to me in others? My principall care shall be, that while my soule lives in glory in heaven, my good actions may live upon earth; and that they may be put into the bank and multiply, while my body lies in the grave and consumeth. E

79 A Christian

A Christian for the sweet fruit hee beares to God and men, is compared to the noblest of all plants, the Vine. now as the most generous Vine, if it be not pruned, runs out into many superfluous stemmes, and growes at last weake and fruitlesse: so doth the best man, if he be cut short of his desires, and pruned with afflictions. If it be painfull to bleed, it is worse to wither. Let me be pruned that I may grow, rather than cut up to burne.

80

Those, that doe but superficially taste of divine knowledge, find little sweetnesse in it; and are ready for the unpleasant relish to abhorre it: whereas if they would dive deepe into the Sea, they should find fresh water neere to the bottome: That it savours not well at the first, is the fault not of it, but of the distempered palate that tastes it. Good metalls and mineralls are not found close under the skinne of the earth, but below in the bowels of it: No good Miner casts away his Mattocke, because he finds a veine of tough clay, or a shelfe of stone; but still delveth lower, and passing thorow many changes of soile, at last comes to his rich treasure. We are too soone discouraged in our spirituall gaines. I will still persevere to seeke, hardning my selfe against all difficulty. There is comfort even in seeking, hope; and there is joy in hoping, good successe: and in that successe, is happinesse.

He that hath any experience in spirituall matters, knowes that Satan is ever more violent at the last; then raging most furiously, when he knowes he shall rage but a while. Hence of the persecutions of the first Church, the tenth and last under Diocletian and Maximinian, and those other five Tyrants, was the bloudiest. Hence this age is the most dissolute, because neerest the conclusion. And as this is his course in the universall assaults of the whole Church: so it is the same in his conflicts with every Christian soule. Like a subtill Orator he reserves his strongest force till the shutting up: And therefore miserable is the folly of those men who defer their repentance till then, when their onset shall bee most sharp, and they through paine of body, and perplexednesse of mind shall be least able to resist. Those that have long furnisht themselves with spirituall munition, find work enough in this extreme brunt of temptation: how then should the careless man, that with the help of all opportunities could not find grace to repent, hope to atchieve it at the last gaspe, against greater force, with lesse meanes, more distraction, no leisure? Wise Princes use to prepare ten yeeres before for a field of one day: I will every day lay up somewhat for my last. If I win that skirmish, I have enough. The first and second blow begin the battell, but the last only wins it.

82

I observe three seasons wherein a wise man differs not from a foole; in his infancy, in sleepe, and in silence: for in the two former we are all fooles; and in silence all are wise. In the two former yet, there may be concealement of folly; but the tongue is a blab: there cannot be any kind of folly, either simple, or wicked, in the heart, but the tongue will bewray it. He cannot be wise that speakes much, or without sense, or out of season, nor he knowne for a foole that sayes nothing. It is a great misery to be a foole: but this is yet greater, that a man cannot be a foole but he must shew it. It were well for such a one, if he could be taught to keepe close his foolishnesse: but then there should be no fooles. I have heard some (which have scorned the opinion of folly in themselves) for a speech wherein they have hoped to shew most wit, censured of folly, by him that hath thought himselfe wiser: and another, hearing his sentence againe, hath condemned him for want of wit in censuring. Surely he is not a foole that hath unwise thoughts, but he that utters them. Even concealed folly is wisdome: and sometime wisdome uttered, is folly. While others care how to speak, my care shall be how to hold my peace.

A worke is then onely good and acceptable, when the action, meaning, and manner are all good: For to doe good with an ill meaning, (as Iudas saluted Christ to betray him) is so much more sinfull, by how much the action is better; which being good in the kind, is abused to an ill purpose: To doe ill, in a good meaning, (as Vzza in staying

the

the Arke) is ſo much amiſſe, that the good intention cannot beare out the unlawfull act: which although it may ſeeme ſome excuſe, why it ſhould not be ſo ill, yet is no warrant to juſtifie it. To meane well and doe a good action, in an ill manner, (as the Phariſee made a good prayer, but arrogantly) is ſo offenſive, that the evill manner depraveth both the other. So a thing may be evill upon one circumſtance, it cannot be good but upon all. In what ever buſineſſe I goe about, I will enquire, What I doe for the ſubſtance, How for the manner, Why for the intention: For the two firſt, I will conſult with God; for the laſt, with my owne heart. A

84

I can doe nothing without a million of Witneſſes: The conſcience is as a thouſand witneſſes; and God is as a thouſand conſciences: I will therefore ſo deale with men, as knowing that God ſees me; and ſo with God, as if the world ſaw me; ſo with my ſelfe, and both of them, as knowing that my conſcience ſeeth me: and ſo with them all, as knowing I am alwaies over-looked by my accuſer, by my Judge. B

85

Earthly inheritances are divided oft-times with much inequality. The priviledge of primogeniture ſtretcheth larger in many places now, than it did among the ancient Iewes. The younger many times ſerves the elder; and while the eldeſt aboundeth, all the latter iſſue is pinched. In heaven it is not ſo: all the ſonnes of God are heires, none underlings; and not heires under wardſhip, and hope, but inheritors; and not inheritors of any little pittance of land, but of a kingdome; nor of an earthly kingdome, ſubject to danger of loſſe, or alteration, but one glorious and everlaſting. It ſhall content mee here, that having right to all things, yet I have poſſeſſion of nothing but ſorrow. Since I ſhall have poſſeſſion above, of all that, whereto I have right below, I will ſerve willingly, that I may reigne; ſerve for a while, that I may reigne for ever. C

86

Even the beſt things ill uſed, become evills; and contrarily, the worſt things uſed well, prove good. A good tongue, uſed to deceit; a good wit, uſed to defend errour; a ſtrong arme, to murther; authority, to oppreſſe; a good profeſſion, to diſſemble; are all evill; yea Gods owne Word is the ſword of the ſpirit; which if it kill not our vices, kills our ſoules. Contrariwiſe (as poyſons are uſed to wholeſome medicine) afflictions and ſins, by a good uſe prove ſo gainfull, as nothing more. Words are as they are taken: and things are as they are uſed. There are even curſed bleſſings: O Lord, rather give me no favours, than not grace to uſe them. If I want them, thou requireſt not what thou doſt not give: but if I have them, and want their uſe, thy mercy proves my judgement.

87

Man is the beſt of all theſe inferiour creatures; yet lives in more ſorrow and diſcontentment, than the worſt of them: whiles that Reaſon wherein he excels them, and by which he might make advantage of his life, he abuſes to a ſuſpitious diſtruſt. How many haſt thou found of the fowles of the ayre, lying dead in the way for want of proviſion? They eat, and reſt, and ſing, & want nothing. Man, which hath farre better meanes to live comfortably, toileth, and careth, and wanteth; whom yet his reaſon alone might teach, that he which careth for theſe lower creatures made only for man, will much more provide for man, to whoſe uſe they were made. There is an holy careleſneſſe; free from idleneſſe; free from diſtruſt. In theſe earthly things, I will ſo depend on my Maker, that my truſt in him may not exclude all my labour; and yet ſo labour (upon my confidence on him) as my endevour may be void of perplexity. D

88

The precepts, and practice of thoſe with whom we live, availe much on either part. For a man not to be ill, where he hath no provocations to evill, is leſſe commendable; but for a man to live continently in Aſia (as he ſaid) where he ſees nothing but allurements to uncleanneſſe: for Lot to be a good man in the middeſt of Sodom, to be abſtemious in Germany, and in Italy chaſte, this is truly praiſe-worthy. To ſequeſter our ſelves from the company of the world, that we may depart from their vices, proceeds from a baſe and diſtruſting minde: as if we would ſo force goodneſſe upon our ſelves, that therefore only we would be good, becauſe wee cannot be ill. But for a man ſo to E be

A be personally, and locally in the throng of the world, as to withdraw his affections from it, to use it, and yet to contemne it at once, to compell it to his service without any infection, becomes well the noble courage of a Christian. The world shall be mine, I will not be his, and yet so mine, that his evill shall be still his owne.

He that lives in God, cannot be weary of his life, because he ever findes both somewhat to doe, and somewhat to solace himselfe with; cannot be over-loth to part with it, because he shall enter into a nearer life and society with that God in whom he delighteth. Whereas he that lives without him, lives many times uncomfortably here, because partly he knowes not any cause of joy in himselfe; and partly he findes not any worthy emploiment to while himselfe withall; dies miserably, because he either knowes not whither he goes, or knowes he goes to torment. There is no true life, but the life of
B faith. O Lord, let me live out of the world with thee (if thou wilt) but let me not live in the world without thee.

Sinne is both evill in it selfe, and the effect of a former evill, and the cause of sinne following; a cause of punishment, and lastly a punishment it selfe. It is a damnable iniquity in man, to multiply one sinne upon another; but to punish one sinne by another, in God is a judgement both most just, and most fearefull; so as all the store-house of God hath not a greater vengeance: with other punishments the body smarteth, the soule with this. I care not how God offends me with punishments, so he punish me not with offending him.

I have seene some afflict their bodies with wilfull famine, and scourges of their owne
C making; God spares me that labour; for he whips me daily with the scourge of a weake body; and sometimes with ill tongues. He holds me short many times of the feeling of his comfortable presence, which is in truth so much more miserable an hunger than that of the body, by how much the soule is more tender, and the food denied, more excellent. Hee is my Father; infinitely wise, to proportion out my correction according to my estate; and infinitely loving, in fitting me with a due measure. He is a presumptuous child, that will make choice of his owne rod. Let me learne to make a right use of his corrections, and I shall not need to correct my selfe. And if it should please God to remit his hand a little; I will governe my body, as a Master, not as a Tyrant.

If God had not said, Blessed are those that hunger, I know not what could keepe weake Christians from sinking in despaire: Many times all I can doe, is to find and complaine
D that I want him, & wish to recover him: Now this is my stay, that he in mercy esteemes us not onely by having, but by desiring also; and after a sort accounts us to have that which we want, and desire to have: and my soule assuming, tells me I doe unfainedly wish him, and long after that grace I misse. Let me desire still more, and I know I shall not desire alwayes. There was never soule miscaried with longing after grace. O blessed hunger, that ends alwayes in fulnesse! I am sory that I can but hunger; and yet I would not be full; for the blessing is promised to the hungry: Give me more, Lord, but so as I may hunger more. Let me hunger more, and I know I shall be satisfied.

There is more in the Christian than thou seest. For he is both an entire body of himselfe, and he is a limme of another more excellent; even that glorious mysticall body of his Saviour; to whom he is so united, that the actions of either are reciprocally refer-
E red to each other. For, on the one side, the Christian lives in Christ, dies in Christ, in Christ fulfils the Law, possesseth heaven: on the other, Christ is persecuted by Paul in his members, and is persecuted in Paul afterwards by others: he suffers in us, he lives in us, he workes in and by us: so thou canst not doe either good or harme to a Christian, but thou doest it to his Redeemer, to whom he is invisibly united. Thou seest him as a man, and therefore worthy of favour for humanities sake: Thou seest him not as a Christian, worthy of honour for his secret and yet true union with our Saviour. I will love every Christian, for that I see; honour him, for that I shall see.

94

Hell it ſelfe is ſcarce a more obſcure dungeon, in compariſon of the earth, than earth is in reſpect of heaven. Here, the moſt ſee nothing, and the beſt ſee little: Here, halfe our life is night; and our very day is darkneſſe, in reſpect of God. The true light of the world and the Father of lights dwelleth above: There is the light of knowledge to informe us, and the light of joy to comfort us; without all change of darkneſſe. There was never any captive loved his dungeon, and complained when he muſt bee brought out to light and liberty: Whence then is this naturall madneſſe in us men, that wee delight ſo much in this uncleane, noyſome, dark, and comfortleſſe priſon of earth? and thinke not of our releaſe to that lightſome and glorious Paradiſe above us, without griefe and repining? We are ſure that we are not perfectly well here: if we could be as ſure that we ſhould be better above, we would not feare changing. Certainly our ſenſe tells us we have ſome pleaſure here; and we have not faith to aſſure us of more pleaſure above: and hence we ſettle our ſelves to the preſent, with neglect of the future, though infinitely more excellent: The heart followes the eyes: and unknowne good is uncared for. O Lord, doe thou breake thorow this darkneſſe of ignorance, and faithleſneſſe, wherewith I am compaſſed. Let me but ſee my heaven, and I know I ſhall deſire it.

95

To be carried away with an affectation of fame, is ſo vaine, and abſurd, that I wonder it can be incident to any wiſe man. For what a mole-hill of earth is it, to which his name can extend, when it is furtheſt carried by the wings of report? And how ſhort a while doth it continue where it is once ſpred? Time (the devourer of his owne brood) conſumes both us and our memories; not braſſe, nor marble can beare age. How many flattering Poets have promiſed immortality of name to their Princes, who now together are buried long ſince in forgetfulneſſe! Thoſe names and actions, that are once on the file of heaven, are paſt the danger of defacing. I will not care whether I be knowne, or remembred, or forgotten amongſt men, if my name and good actions may live with God in the records of eternity.

96

There is no man, nor no place free from ſpirits, although they teſtifie their preſence by viſible effects but in few. Every man is an Oaſt to entertaine Angels, though not in viſible ſhapes, as Abraham and Lot. The evill ones doe nothing but provoke us to ſinne, and plot miſchieves againſt us, by caſting into our way dangerous objects, by ſuggeſting ſinfull motions to our mindes, ſtirring up enemies againſt us amongſt men, by frighting us with terrors in our ſelves, by accuſing us to God. On the contrary, The good Angels are ever removing our hinderances from good, and our occaſions of evill, mitigating our tentations; helping us againſt our enemies; delivering us from dangers; comforting us in ſorrowes; furthering our good purpoſes; and at laſt carrying up our ſoules to Heaven. It would affright a weake Chriſtian that knowes the power and malice of wicked ſpirits, to conſider their preſence, and number, but when with the eyes of Eliſhaes ſervant, he ſees thoſe on his ſide as preſent, as diligent, more powerfull; he cannot but take heart againe: eſpecially if he conſider, that neither of them is without God, limiting the one the bounds of their tentation; directing the other in the ſafeguard of his children. Whereupon it is come to paſſe, that though there be many legions of Devils, and every one more ſtrong than many legions of men, & more malicious than ſtrong, yet the little flocke of Gods Church liveth and proſpereth. I have ever with me inviſible friends, and enemies. The conſideration of mine enemies ſhall keepe me from ſecurity, and make me fearfull of doing ought to advantage them. The conſideration of my ſpirituall friends ſhall comfort me againſt the terrour of the other; ſhall remedy my ſolitarineſſe; ſhall make me wary of doing ought indecently, grieving me rather, that I have ever heretofore made them turne away their eyes, for ſhame of that whereof I have not beene aſhamed; that I have no more enjoyed their ſocietie; that I have beene no more affected with their preſence. What though I ſee them not? I beleeve them. I were no Chriſtian, if my faith were not as ſure as my ſenſe.

There is no word or action, but may be taken with two hands; either with the right hand

A hand of charitable conſtruction, or the ſiniſter interpretation of malice, and ſuſpicion: and all things doe ſo ſucceed, as they are taken. I have noted evill actions well taken, paſſe currant for either indifferent or commendable: Contrarily a good ſpeech or action ill taken, ſcarce allowed for indifferent; an indifferent one, cenſured for evill; an evill one for notorious: So favour makes vertues of vices; and ſuſpicion makes vertues faults; and faults crimes. Of the two, I had rather my right hand ſhould offend: It is alwaies ſafer offending on the better part. To conſtrue an evill act well, is but a pleaſing and profitable deceit of my ſelfe: but to miſconſtrue a good thing, is a treble wrong; to my ſelfe, the action, the author. If no good ſenſe can be made of a deed or ſpeech, let the blame light upon the author: If a good interpretation may be given, and I chuſe a worſe, let me be as much cenſured of others, as that miſconceit is puniſhment to my ſelfe.

B I know not how it comes to paſſe, that the mind of man doth naturally both overprize his owne, in compariſon of others, and yet contemne and neglect his owne, in compariſon of what he wants. The remedy of this later evill is, to compare the good things we have, with the evils which we have not, and others grone under. Thou art in health and regardeſt it not; Looke on the miſery of thoſe which on their bed of ſickneſſe, through extremity of paine and anguiſh, intreat death to releaſe them. Thou haſt cleare eye-ſight, ſound limbs, uſe of reaſon; and paſſeſt theſe over with ſleight reſpect: Think how many there are which in their uncomfortable blindneſſe, would give all the world for but one glimpſe of light: how many that deformedly crawle on all foure, after the manner of the moſt loathſome creatures: how many that in mad phrenſies are worſe than brutiſh, worſe than dead: thus thou mighteſt be, and art not. C If I be not happy for the good that I have, I am yet happy for the evils that I might have had, and have eſcaped. I have deſerved the greateſt evill; every evill that I miſſe, is a new mercy.

98

Earth, which is the baſeſt element, is both our mother that brought us forth, our ſtage that beares us alive, and our grave wherein at laſt we are entombed; giving to us both our originall, our harbour, our Sepulcher: She hath yeelded her back to beare thouſands of generations; and at laſt opened her mouth to receive them; ſo ſwallowing them up, that ſhe ſtill both beareth more, and lookes for more; not bewraying any change in her ſelfe, while ſhe ſo oft hath changed her brood, and her burden. It is a wonder we can be proud of our parentage, or of our ſelves, while we ſee both the baſeneſſe and ſtability of the earth, whence we came. What difference is there? Living earth treads upon D the dead earth, which afterwards deſcends into the grave, as ſenſeleſſe and dead, as the earth that receives it. Not many are proud of their ſoules; and none but fooles can be proud of their bodies. While we walke and looke upon the earth, we cannot but acknowledge ſenſible admonitions of humility; and while we remember them, we cannot forget our ſelves. It is a mother-like favour of the earth, that ſhe beares and nouriſhes me, and at the laſt entertaines my dead carkaſe: but it is a greater pleaſure, that ſhe teacheth me my vileneſſe by her owne, and ſends me to heaven, for what ſhe wants.

The wicked man carrieth every day a brand to his hell, till his heap be come to the height: then he ceaſeth ſinning, and begins his torment; whereas the repentant in every fit of holy ſorrow, carries away a whole fagot from the flame, and quencheth the coales that remaine, with his teares. There is no torment for the penitent; no redemption for E the obſtinate. Safety conſiſteth not in not ſinning, but in repenting: neither is it ſin that condemnes, but impenitence. ☉ Lord, I cannot be righteous, let me be repentant.

The eſtate of heavenly and earthly things is plainly repreſented to us, by the two lights of Heaven, which are appointed to rule the night and the day. Earthly things are rightly reſembled by the Moone, which being neereſt to the region of mortality, is ever in changes, and never lookes upon us twice with the ſame face; and when it is at the full, is blemiſhed with ſome darke blots, not capable of any illumination. Heavenly things are figured by the Sunne, whose great and glorious light is both naturall to it-selfe, and ever constant. That other fickle and dimme starre is fit enough for the night of misery, wherein we live here below. And this firme and beautifull light is but good enough for that Day of glory, which the Saints live in. If it be good living here where our sorrowes are changed with joyes; what is it to live above, where our joyes change not? I cannot looke upon the body of the Sunne: and yet I cannot see at all without the light of it. I cannot behold the glory of thy Saints, O Lord; yet without the knowledge of it, I am blinde. If thy creature be so glorious to us here below; how glorious shall thy selfe be to us when we are above this Sunne? This Sunne shall not shine upward, where thy glory shineth: the greater light extinguisheth the lesser. O thou Sunne of righteousnesse (which shalt onely shine to me when I am glorified) doe thou heat, enlighten, comfort me with the beames of thy presence, till I be glorified.

Amen.

OR, OF TRVE PEACE AND Tranquillitie of Minde.

By Ios. Hall.

¶ Imprinted at London, 1634.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, HENRY

Earle of Huntingdon, Lord Haſtings, Hungerford, Botreaux, Molines and Moiles, his Majeſties Lieutenant in the Counties of Leiceſter and Rutland, my ſingular good Lord:

All increaſe of true Honour, and Heaven begun upon Earth.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

I Have undertaken a great taske, to teach men how to be happy in this life: I have undertaken and performed it: wherein I haue followed Seneca, and gone beyond him; followed him as a Philoſopher, gone beyond him as a Chriſtian, as a Divine. Finding it a true cenſure of the beſt Moraliſts, that they were like to goodly Ships, graced with great titles, the Savegard, the Triumph, the Good-ſpeed, and ſuch like, when yet they have beene both extremely Sea-beaten, and at laſt wracked. The volume is little, perhaps the uſe more; I have ever thought according to the Greeke Proverbe, μέγα βιβλίον μέγα κακόν. What it is, even juſtice challengeth it to him, to whom the Author hath devoted himſelfe: The children of the bondman are the goods of the parents Maſter. I humbly betake it to your Honours protection, and your Honour to the protection of the Higheſt.

Your Honours moſt humbly devoted in all duty and ſervice,

Ios. Hall.

THE ANALYSIS OR RESOLVTION of this Treatise concerning Tranquillity.

HEAVEN VPON EARTH:

OR, Of true Peace of Mind.

Sect. I.

WHen I had ſtudiouſly read over the morall writings of ſome wiſe heathen, eſpecially thoſe of the Stoicall profeſſion, I muſt confeſſe, I found a little envie and pitie ſtriving together within me. I envied nature in them, to ſee her ſo witty in deviſing ſuch plauſible refuges for doubting and troubled minds: I pitied them, to ſee that their carefull diſquiſition of true reſt, led them in the end but to meere unquietneſſe. Wherein me thought, they were as Hounds ſwift of foot, but not exquiſite in ſent, which in an haſty purſuit take a wrong way, ſpending their mouthes, and courſes in vaine. Their praiſe of gheſſing wittily they ſhall not leeſe, their hopes both they loſt, and whoſoever followes them. If Seneca could have had grace to his wit, what wonders would he have done in this kinde? what Divine might not have yeelded him the chaire for precepts of Tranquillity without any diſparagement? As he was, this he hath gained: Never any Heathen wrote more divinely: never any Philoſopher more probably. Neither would I ever deſire better Maſter, if to this purpoſe I needed no other Miſtris than Nature. But this in truth is a taske, which Nature hath never without preſumption undertaken, and never performed without much imperfection. Like to thoſe vaine and wandring Empirickes, which in tables and pictures make great oſtentation of Cures, never approving their skill to their credulous Patients. And if ſhe could have truly effected it alone, I know not what employment in this life ſhe ſhould have left for grace to buſie her ſelfe about, nor what privilege it ſhould have been here below to be a Chriſtian, ſince this that we ſeek is the nobleſt worke of the ſoule, and in which alone conſiſts the only heaven of this world; this is the ſum of all humane deſires: which when we have attained, then only we begin to live, and are ſure we cannot thence-forth live miſerably. No marvell then if all the Heathen have diligently ſought after it, many wrote of it, none attained it. Not Athens muſt teach this leſſon, but Ieruſalem.

Cenſure of Philoſophers.

Sect. II.

YEt ſomething grace ſcorneth not to learne of Nature, as Moſes may take good counſell of a Midianite. Nature hath ever had more skill in the end, than in the way to it; and whether ſhe have diſcourſed of the good eſtate of the minde, which we call Tranquillity, or the beſt, which is happineſſe, hath more happily gheſſed at the generall definition of them, than of the meanes to compaſſe them. She teacheth us therefore without controlement, that the Tranquillity of the mind is, as of the Sea and weather, when no wind ſtirreth, when the waves doe not tumultuouſly riſe and fall upon each other, but when the face both of the Heaven and waters is ſtill, faire, and equable. That it is ſuch an even diſpoſition of the heart, wherein the ſcoales of the mind neither riſe up towards the beame, through their owne lightneſſe, or the over-weening opinion of proſperity, nor are too much depreſſed with any load of ſorrow; but hanging equall and unmoved betwixt both, give a man liberty in all occurrences to enjoy himſelfe. Not that the moſt temperate mind can be ſo the maſter of his paſſions, as not ſometimes to over-joy his griefe, or over-grieve his joy, according to the contrary occaſions of both: for not the eveneſt weights, but at their firſt putting into the ballance, ſomewhat ſway both parts thereof, not without ſome ſhew of inequality, which yet after ſome little motion, ſettle themſelves in a meet poiſe. It is enough that after ſome ſudden agitation, it can returne to it ſelfe, and reſt it ſelfe at laſt in a reſolved peace. And this due compoſednesſe of mind we require unto our Tranquillity, not for ſome ſhort fits of good mood, which ſoone after end in diſcontentment, but with the condition of perpetuity. For there is no heart makes ſo rough weather, as not ſometimes to admit of a calme, and whether for that he knoweth no preſent cauſe of his trouble, or for that he knoweth, that cauſe of trouble is countervailed with as great an occaſion of private joy, or for that the multitude of evils hath bred careleſneſſe, the man that is moſt diſordered, finds ſome reſpits of quietneſſe. The ballances that are moſt ill matched in their unſteddy motions, come to an equality, but ſtay not at it. The frantick man cannot avoid the imputation of madneſſe, though he be ſober for many Moones, if he rage in one. So then the calme mind muſt be ſetled in an habituall reſt, not then firme when there is nothing to ſhake it, but then leaſt ſhaken when it is moſt aſſailed.

Sect. III.

Inſufficiencie of humane precepts.

WHence eaſily appeares how vainly it hath beene ſought either in ſuch a conſtant eſtate of outward things, as ſhould give no diſtaſte to the minde whiles all earthly things vary with the weather, and have no ſtay but in uncertaintie, or in the naturall temper of the ſoule, ſo ordered by humane wiſdome, as that it ſhould not be affected with any caſuall events to either part; ſince that cannot ever by naturall power be held like to it ſelfe; but one while is cheerefull, ſtirring and ready to undertake; another while drowſie, dull, comfortleſſe, prone to reſt, weary of it ſelf, loathing his owne purpoſes, his owne reſolutions. In both which ſince the wiſeſt Philoſophers have grounded all the rules of their Tranquillity, it is plaine that they ſaw it afarre off, as they did heaven it ſelfe with a deſire and admiration, but knew not the way to it: whereupon alas, how ſlight and impotent are the remedies they preſcribe for unquietneſſe! For what is it that for the inconſtancy and lazineſſe of the mind ſtill diſpleaſing it ſelfe in what it doth, and for that diſtemper therof which ariſeth from the fearfull, unthriving, and reſtleſſe deſires of it, we ſhould ever be imploying our ſelves in ſome publike affaires, chuſing our buſineſſe according to our inclination, and proſecuting what we have choſen? wherewith being at laſt cloyed, we ſhould retire our ſelves, and weare the reſt of our time in private ſtudies; that we ſhould make due comparative trialls of our owne abilitie; nature of our buſineſſes; diſpoſition of our choſen friends? that in reſpect of Patrimony we ſhould be but careleſſely affected, ſo drawing it in as it may be leaſt for ſhew, moſt for uſe; removing all pompe, bridling our hopes, cutting off ſuperfluities; for croſſes, to conſider that cuſtome will abate and mitigate them, that the beſt things are but chaines and burdens to thoſe that have them, to thoſe that uſe them, that the worſt things have ſome mixture of comfort to thoſe that grone under them. Or leaving theſe lower rudiments that are given to weake and ſimple novices, to examine thoſe golden rules of Morality, which are commended to the moſt wiſe and able practitioners, what it is to account himſelfe as a Tenant at will? To fore-imagine the worſt

Senecaes rules of Tranquillitie abridged.

A in all caſuall matters? To avoid all idle and impertinent buſineſſes, all pragmaticall medling with affaires of ſtate? not to fix our ſelves upon any one eſtate, as to be impatient of a change, to call backe the mind from outward things, and draw it home into it ſelfe? to laugh at and eſteeme lightly of others miſ-demeanours? Not to depend upon others opinions, but to ſtand on our owne bottomes? to carry our ſelves in an honeſt and ſimple truth, free from a curious hypocriſie, and affectation of ſeeming other than we are, and yet as free from a baſe kind of careleſneſſe? to intermeddle retiredneſſe with ſocietie, ſo as one may give ſweetneſſe to the other, and both to us? So ſlackning the mind that we may not looſen it, and ſo bending as we may not breake it? to make moſt of our ſelves, chearing up our ſpirits with varietie of recreations, with ſacietie of meales, and all other bodily indulgence, ſaving that drunkenneſſe (me thinks) can neither beſeeme a wiſe Philoſopher to preſcribe, nor
B a vertuous man to practiſe? All theſe in their kinds pleaſe well, profit much, and are as ſoveraigne for both theſe, as they are unable to effect that for which they are propounded. Nature teacheth thee all theſe ſhould be done, ſhe cannot teach thee to doe them: and yet doe all theſe and no more, let me never have reſt, if thou have it. For neither are here the greateſt enemies of our peace ſo much as deſcried afarre off, nor thoſe that are noted are hereby ſo prevented, that upon moſt diligent practice we can promiſe our ſelves any ſecurity: wherewith who ſo inſtructed, dare confidently give challenge to all ſiniſter events, is like to ſome skilfull Fencer who ſtands upon his uſuall wards, and plaies well; but if there come a ſtrange fetch of an unwonted blow, is put beſides the rules of his Art, and with much ſhame over-taken. And for thoſe that are knowne, beleeve me, the mind of man is too weake to beare out it ſelfe hereby againſt all onſets. There are light croſſes that will take an eaſie repulſe;
C others yet ſtronger, that ſhake the houſe ſide, but breake not in upon us; others vehement, which by force make way to the heart, where they find none, breaking open the doore of the ſoule that denies entrance. Others violent, that lift the mind off the hinges, or rend the barres of it in peeces: others furious, that teare up the very foundations from the bottome, leaving no monument behinde them, but ruine. The wiſeſt and moſt reſolute Moraliſt that ever was, lookt pale when hee ſhould taſte of his hemlock; and by his timorouſneſſe made ſport to thoſe that envied his ſpeculations. The beſt of the Heathen Emperours (that was honoured with the title of pietie) juſtly magnified that courage of Chriſtians which made them inſult over their tormentors, and by their feareleſneſſe of earth-quakes, and deaths, argued the truth of their Religion. It muſt be, it can be none but a divine power, that can uphold the mind againſt the rage of main afflictions, and yet the greateſt croſſes are not the
D greateſt enemies to inward peace. Let us therefore looke up above our ſelves, and from the rules of an higher Art, ſupply the defects of naturall wiſdome, giving ſuch infallible directions for tranquillitie, that whoſoever ſhall follow, cannot but live ſweetly and with continuall delight, applauding himſelfe at home, when all the world beſides him ſhall be miſerable. To which purpoſe it ſhall be requiſite, firſt to remove all cauſes of unquietneſſe, & then to ſet downe the grounds of our happie reſt.

Allowed yet by Seneca in his laſt chapter of Tranquillitie. Senecas rules rejected as inſufficient.

Diſpoſition of the worke.

Sect. IV.

I Find on the hand two univerſall enemies of Tranquillitie; Conſcience of evill done, Senſe or feare of evill ſuffred. The former in one word, wee call ſins, the latter, croſſes. The firſt of theſe muſt be quite taken away, the ſecond duly tem-
E pered ere the heart can be at reſt. For firſt, how can that man be at peace, that is at variance with God and himſelfe? How ſhould peace be Gods gift, if it could be without him, if it could be againſt him? It is the profeſſion of ſinne, although faire ſpoken at the firſt cloſing, to be a perpetuall make-bate betwixt God and man, betwixt a man and himſelfe. And this enmitie, though it doe not continually ſhew it ſelfe, (as the mortalleſt enemies are not alwayes in pitched fields one againſt the other) for that the conſcience is not ever clamorous, but ſome-while is ſilent, otherwhiles with ſtill murmurings bewrayes his miſlikes, yet doth evermore work ſecret unquietneſſe

Enemies of inward peace divided into their rankes.

The torment of an evill conſcience.

unquietneſſe to the heart. The guiltie man may have a ſeeming truce, a true peace he cannot have. Looke upon the face of the guiltie heart, and thou ſhalt ſee it pale and ghaſtly; the ſmiles and laughters faint and heartleſſe, the ſpeeches doubtfull, and full of abrupt ſtops and unſeaſonable turnings; the purpoſes and motions unſteady, and ſavouring of much diſtraction, arguing plainly that ſin is not ſo ſmooth at her firſt motions, as turbulent afterwards: hence are thoſe vaine wearyings of places and companies together with our ſelves; that the galled ſoule doth after the wont of ſicke Patients ſeeke refreſhing in varietie; and after many toſſed and turned ſides, complaines of remedileſſe and unabated torment. Nero after ſo much innocent bloud, may change his bed-chamber, but his Fiends ever attend him, ever are within him, and are as parts of himſelfe. Alas, what availes it to ſeeke outward releefes, when thou haſt thine executioner within thee? If thou couldeſt ſhift from thy ſelfe, thou mighteſt have ſome hope of eaſe; now thou ſhalt never want furies ſo long as thou haſt thy ſelfe. Yea, what if thou wouldeſt run from thy ſelfe? Thy ſoule may flye from thy body, thy conſcience will not flye from thy ſoule, nor thy ſinne from thy conſcience. Some men indeed in the bitterneſſe of theſe pangs of ſinne, like unto thoſe fondly impatient fiſhes, that leap out of the pan into the flame, have leapt out of this private hell that is in themſelves, into the common pit, chuſing to adventure upon the future paines that they have feared, rather than to endure the preſent horrors they have felt: wherein what have they gained, but to that hell which was within them, a ſecond hell without? The conſcience leaves not where the Fiends begin, but both joyne together in torture. But there are ſome firme and obdurate fore-heads, whoſe reſolution can laugh their ſinnes out of countenance. There are ſo large and able gorges, as that they can ſwallow and digeſt bloudy murders, without complaint, who, with the ſame hands which they have ſince their laſt meale imbrued in bloud, can freely carve to themſelves large morſels at the next ſitting. Beleeveſt thou that ſuch a mans heart laughes with his face? will not hee dare to bee an Hypocrite, that durſt be a villaine? Theſe glow-wormes, when a night of ſorrow compaſſes them, make a lightſome and fiery ſhew of joy, when if thou preſſe them, thou findeſt nothing but a cold and crude moyſture. Knoweſt thou not that there are thoſe which count it no ſhame to ſinne, yet count it a ſhame to be checked with remorſe, eſpecially ſo as others eyes may deſcry? To whom repentance ſeemes baſe-mindedneſſe, unworthy of him that profeſſes wiſdome and valour. Such a man can grieve when none ſees it, but himſelfe can laugh when others ſee it, himſelfe feeles not. Aſſure thy ſelfe that mans heart bleedeth, when his face counterfets a ſmile; he weares out many waking houres, when thou thinkeſt hee reſteth: yea, as his thoughts afford him not ſleepe, ſo his very ſleepe affords him not reſt, but while his ſenſes are tyed up, his ſin is looſe; repreſenting it ſelfe to him in the uglieſt ſhape, and frighting him with horrible and helliſh dreames. And if perhaps cuſtome hath bred a careleſneſſe in him, (as we ſee that uſuall whipping makes the childe not care for the rod) yet an unwonted extremity of the blow ſhall fetch bloud of the ſoule, and make the backe that is moſt hardned, ſenſible of ſmart: and the further the blow is fetcht through intermiſſion of remorſe, the harder it muſt needs alight: Therefore I may confidently tell the careleſſe ſinner, as that bold Tragedian ſaid to his great Pompey: The time ſhall come wherein thou ſhalt fetch deepe ſighes, and therefore ſhalt ſorrow deſperately, becauſe thou ſorrowedſt not ſooner. The fire of the conſcience may lie for a time ſmoothered with a pyle of green wood, that it cannot be diſcerned, whoſe moiſture when once it hath maſtered, it ſends up ſo much greater flame, by how much it had greater reſiſtance. Hope not then to ſtop the mouth of thy conſcience from exclaiming, whiles thy ſinne continues; that endevour is both vaine and hurtfull; So I have ſeene them that have ſtopt the noſthrill for bleeding, in hope to ſtay the iſſue, when the bloud hindred in his former courſe, hath broken out of the mouth, or found way downe into the ſtomacke. The conſcience is not pacificable, while ſinne is within to vex it: no more than angry ſwelling can ceaſe throbbing and aching, whiles the thorne or the corrupted matter lies rotting underneath. Time, that remedies all other evills of the minde, increaſeth this, which

Sect. V.

THere can be therefore no peace without reconciliation, thou canſt not bee friends with thy ſelfe, till with God : for thy conſcience (which is thy beſt friend while thou ſinneſt not) like an honeſt ſervant takes his Maſters part againſt thee when thou haſt ſinned ; and will not looke ſtraight upon thee, till thou upon God; not daring to bee ſo kind to thee, as to be unfaithfull to his Maker: There can be no reconciliation without remiſſion. God can neither forget the injury of ſin, nor diſſemble hatred. It is for men and thoſe of hollow hearts, to make pretences contrary to their affections: ſoothings, and ſmiles, and embracements, where we meane not love, are from weakneſſe : Either for that we feare our inſufficiency of preſent revenge, or hope for a fitter opportunity afterwards, or for that we deſire to make our further advantage of him to whom wee meane evill. Theſe courſes are not incident into an Almighty power; who having the command of all vengeance, can ſmite where he liſt without all doubtings or delayes. There can be no remiſſion without ſatisfaction; neither dealeth God with us as we men with ſome deſperate debters, whom after long dilations of payments, and many daies broken, we altogether let goe for diſability, or at leaſt diſmiſſe them upon an eaſie compoſition. All ſins are debts ; all Gods debts muſt be diſcharged. It is a bold word, but a true; God ſhould not be juſt, if any of his debts ſhould paſſe unſatisfied. The conceit of the profane vulgar, makes him a God of all mercies ; and thereupon hopes for pardon without payment. Fond and ignorant preſumption, to disjoyne mercy and juſtice in him to whom they are both eſſentiall; to make mercy exceed juſtice in him, in whom both are infinite. Dareſt thou hope God can be ſo kind to thee, as to be unjuſt to himſelfe? God will be juſt: goe thou on to preſume and periſh. There can be no ſatisfaction by any recompence of ours : an infinite juſtice is offended, an infinite puniſhment is deſerved by every ſin, and every mans ſinnes are as neer to infinite, as number can make them. Our beſt endevour is worſe than finite, imperfect, and faulty. If it could be perfect, we owe it all in preſent ; what we are bound to doe in preſent, cannot make amends for what we have not done in time paſt : which while we offer to God as good payment, we doe with the profane traveller thinke to pleaſe him with emptie Date-ſhells in lieu of preſervation. Where ſhall we then find a payment of infinite value, but in him which is only and all infinite ? The dignitie of whoſe perſon being infinite, gave ſuch worth to his ſatisfaction, that what he ſuffered in ſhort time, was proportionable to what we ſhould have ſuffered beyond all times. Hee did all, ſuffered all, payed all, he did it for us, we in him. Where ſhall I begin to wonder at thee, O thou divine and eternall Peace-maker, the Saviour of men, the Anointed of God, Mediator between God and man, in whom there is nothing which doth not exceed not only the conceit, but the very wonder of Angels, who ſaw thee in thy humiliation with ſilence, and adore thee in thy glory with perpetuall praiſes and rejoycings ? Thou waſt for ever of thy ſelfe as God, of the Father, as the Sonne ; the eternall Sonne of an eternall Father ; not later in being, not leſſe in dignity, not other in ſubſtance. Begotten without diminution of him that begot thee, while hee communicated that wholly to thee, which he retained wholly in himſelfe, becauſe both were infinite without inequality of nature, without diviſion of eſſence ; when being in this eſtate, thine infinite love and mercy to deſperate mankind, cauſed thee, O Saviour, to empty thy ſelfe of thy glory, that thou mighteſt put on our ſhame and miſery. Wherefore not ceaſing to be God as thou wert, thou beganſt to be what thou wert not, Man ; to the end that thou mighteſt be a perfect Mediator betwixt God and man, which wert both in one perſon ; God, that thou mightſt ſatisfie ; man, that thou mightſt ſuffer : that ſince man had ſinned, and God was offended, thou which wert God and Man, mightſt ſatisfie God for man. None but thy ſelfe, which art the eternall Word, can expreſſe the depth of this myſtery, that God ſhould be clothed with fleſh, come downe downe to men, and become man, that man might bee exalted into the higheſt heavens; and that our nature might be taken into the fellowſhip of the Deity. That he to whom all powers in heaven bowed, and thought it their honour to be ſerviceable, ſhould come downe to bee a ſervant to his ſlaves, a ranſome for his enemies; together with our nature taking up our very infirmities, our ſhame, our torments, and bearing our ſinnes without ſinne. That thou whom the heavens were too ſtrait to containe, ſhouldſt lay thy ſelfe in an obſcure cratch: thou which wert attended of Angels, ſhouldſt be derided of men, rejected of thine owne, perſecuted by Tyrants, tempted with Devils, betrayed of thy ſervant, crucified among theeves, and (which waſworſe than all theſe) in thine owne apprehenſion, for the time as forſaken of thy father; That thou whom our ſins had pierced, ſhouldſt for our ſinnes both ſweat drops of bloud in the garden, and powre out ſtreames of bloud upon the Croſſe. O the invaluable purchaſe of our peace! O ranſome enough for moe worlds! Thou which wert in the counſell of thy Father, the Lambe ſlaine from the beginning of time, cam'ſt now in fulneſſe of time to be ſlaine by man, for man; being at once the Sacrifice offered, the Prieſt that did offer, and the God to whom it was offered. How graciouſly didſt thou both proclaime our peace, as a Prophet in the time of thy life upon earth, and purchaſe it by thy bloud as a prieſt at thy death, and now confirmeſt and applieſt it as a King in heaven! By thee only it was procured, by thee it is proffered. O mercy without example, without meaſure! God offers peace to man, the holy ſeekes to the unjuſt, the Potter to the clay, the King to the traitor. Wee are unworthy that we ſhould be received to peace though we deſired it; what are we then that we ſhould have peace offered for the receiving? An eaſie condition of ſo great a benefit; he requires us not to earne it, but to accept it of him: what could he give more? what could he require leſſe of us?

The remedy of an unquiet Conſcience.

Sect. VI.

The receit of our peace offered by Faith.

THe purchaſe therefore of our peace was paid at once, yet muſt be ſeverally reckoned to every ſoule whom it ſhall benefit. If we have not an hand to take what Chriſts hand doth either hold, or offer, what is ſufficient in him, cannot be effectuall to us. The ſpirituall hand, whereby we apprehend the ſweet offers of our Saviour, is faith, which in ſhort is no other than an affiance in the Mediator: receive peace and be happy, beleeve and thou haſt received. From hence it is that we are intereſſed in all that either God hath promiſed, or Chriſt hath performed. Hence have we from God both forgiveneſſe and love, the ground of all either peace or glory. Hence of enemies wee become more than friends, ſonnes: and as ſonnes, may both expect and challenge not only carefull proviſion and ſafe protection on earth, but an everlaſting patrimony above. This field is ſo ſpacious, that it were eaſie for a man to loſe himſelfe in it: and if I ſhould ſpend all my pilgrimage in this walke, my time would ſooner end than my way; wherein I would have meaſured more paſes, were it not that our ſcope is not ſo much to magnifie the benefit of our peace, as to ſeeke how to obtaine it.

A corolary of the benefit of this receit.

Behold now, after wee have ſought heaven and earth, where onely the wearied Dove may finde an Olive of peace. The apprehending of this all-ſufficient ſatisfaction, makes it ours: upon our ſatisfaction we have remiſſion; upon remiſſion, followes reconciliation; upon our reconciliation, peace. When therefore thy conſcience like a ſterne Sergeant ſhall catch thee by the throat, and arreſt thee upon Gods debt, let thy onely plea be that thou haſt already paid it: Bring forth that bloudy acquittance ſealed to thee from heaven upon thy true faith, ſtraitway thou ſhalt ſee the fierce and terrible looke of thy conſcience changed into friendly ſmiles, and that rough and violent hand that was ready to drag thee to priſon, ſhall now lovingly embrace thee, and fight for thee againſt all the wrongfull attempts of any ſpirituall adverſary. O heavenly Peace, and more than Peace, Friendſhip, whereby alone wee are leagued with our ſelves, and God with us, which who-ever wants, ſhall finde a ſad Remembrancer in the midſt of his diſſembled jollitie, and after all vaine ſtrifes, ſhall fall into many many ſecret dumps, from which his guilty heart ſhall deny to bee cheared, though all the world were his minſtrell! Oh pleaſure worthy to be pittied, and laughter worthy of teares, that is without this! Goe then, fooliſh man, and when thou feeleſt any check of thy ſinne, ſeeke after thy jocundeſt companions, deceive the time and thy ſelfe with merry purpoſes, with buſie games, feaſt away thy cares, burie them and thy ſelfe in wine and ſleep: after all theſe frivolous deferrings, it will returne upon thee, when thou wakeſt, perhaps ere thou wakeſt, nor will bee repelled till it have ſhewed thee thy hell, nor when it hath ſhewed thee, will yet bee repelled. So the ſtricken Deere having received a deadly arrow, whoſe ſhaft ſhaken out hath left the head behind it, runnes from one Thicket to another, not able to change his paine with his places, but finding his wounds ſtill the worſe with continuance. Ah foole, thy ſoule feſtereth within, and is affected ſo much more dangerouſly, by how much leſſe it appeareth. Thou maieſt while thy ſelfe with varietie, thou canſt not eaſe thee. Sin owes thee a ſpight, and wil pay it thee, perhaps when thou art in worſe caſe to ſuſtain it. This flitting doth but provide for a further violence at laſt. I have ſeene a little ſtreame of no noiſe, which upon his ſtoppage hath ſwelled up, and with a loud guſhing hath borne over the heape of turves wherewith it was reſiſted. Thy death-bed ſhall ſmart for theſe wilfull adjournings of repentance; whereon how many have we heard raving of their old neglected ſinnes, and fearfully deſpairing when they have had moſt need of comfort? In ſumme, there is no way but this: Thy conſcience muſt have either ſatisfaction or torment. Diſcharge thy ſinne betimes, and be at peace. He never breaks his ſleep for debt that paies when he takes up.

The vaine ſhifts of the guilty.

Sect. VII.

NEither can it ſuffice for peace, to have croſſed the old ſcrole of our ſins, if we prevent not the future; yea the preſent very importunity of tentation breeds unquietneſſe. Sinne where it hath got an haunt, looketh for more, as humours that fall towards their old iſſue: and if it be not ſtrongly repelled, doth neer as much vex us with ſolliciting as with yeelding. Let others envie their happineſſe, I ſhall never thinke their life ſo much as quiet, whoſe doores are continually beaten, and their morning ſleepe broken with early clients, whoſe entries are daily thronged with ſuters preſſing neere for the next audience; much leſſe that through their remiſſe anſwers are daily haunted with traitors or other inſtruments of villanie, offering their miſchievous ſervice, and inciting them to ſome peſtilent enterpriſe. Such are tentations to the ſoule. Whereof it cannot bee rid, ſo long as it holds them in any hope of entertainment: and ſo long they will hope to prevaile, while wee give them but a cold and timorous deniall. Suters are drawne on with an eaſie repulſe; counting that as halfe granted, which is but faintly gainſaid. Peremptory anſwers can only put ſin out of heart for any ſecond attempts. It is ever impudent when it meets not with a bold heart; hoping to prevaile by wearying us, and wearying us by intreaties. Let all ſuggeſtions therefore find thee reſolute: ſo ſhall thy ſoule find it ſelfe at reſt; for as the Devill, ſo ſinne his naturall brood, flies away with reſiſtance. To which purpoſe, all our heady and diſordered affections, which are the ſecret factors of ſin and Satan, muſt be reſtrained by a ſtrong and yet temperate command of Reaſon and Religion: theſe, if they find the reynes looſe in their necks (like to the wild horſes of that chaſte hunter in the Tragedie) carry us over hils and rocks, and never leave us till we be diſmembred, and they breathleſſe: but contrarily, if they be pulled in with the ſudden violence of a ſtrait hand, they fall to plunging and careering, and never leave till their ſaddle be empty, and even then dangerouſly ſtrike at their proſtrate Rider. If there be any exerciſe of Chriſtian wiſdome, it is in the managing of theſe unruly affections, which are not more neceſſary in their beſt uſe, than pernicious in their miſgovernance. Reaſon hath alwayes beene buſie in undertaking this ſo neceſſary a moderation: wherein although ſhee have prevailed with ſome of colder temper, yet thoſe which have beene of more ſtubborne metall, like unto growne ſchollers, which ſcorne the ferule that ruled their minority, have ſtill deſpiſed her weake endevours.

Sollicitation of ſinne remedied.

The ordering of affections.

Onely

Only Chriſtianity hath this power; which with our ſecond birth gives us a new nature: ſo that now, if exceſſe of paſſions bee naturall to us as men, the order of them is naturall to us as Chriſtians. Reaſon bids the angry man ſay over his Alphabet ere hee give his anſwer; hoping by this intermiſſion of time, to gaine the mitigation of his rage. He was never throughly angry, that can endure the recitall of ſo many idle letters. Chriſtianity gives not rules, but power to avoid this ſhort madneſſe. It was a wiſe ſpeech that is reported of our beſt and laſt Cardinall (I hope) that this Iland either did or ſhall ſee; who when a skilfull Aſtrologer, upon the calculation of his nativity, had foretold him ſome ſpecialties, concerning his future eſtate, anſwered, Such perhaps I was borne, but ſince that time, I have beene borne againe, and my ſecond nativity hath croſſed my firſt. The power of nature is a good plea for thoſe that acknowledge nothing above nature. But for a Chriſtian to excuſe his intemperateneſſe, by his naturall inclination, and to ſay, I am borne cholericke, ſullen, amorous, is an Apologie worſe than the fault. Wherefore ſerves Religion, but to ſubdue or governe nature? We are ſo much Chriſtians, as wee can rule our ſelves, the reſt is but forme and ſpeculation. Yea, the very thought of our profeſſion is ſo powerfull, that (like unto that precious ſtone) being caſt into this Sea, it aſſwageth thoſe inward tempeſts that were raiſed by the affections. The unregenerate mind is not capable of this power; and therefore through the continuall mutinies of his paſſions, cannot but be ſubject to perpetuall unquietneſſe. There is neither remedy nor hope in this eſtate. But the Chriſtian ſoule, that hath inured it ſelfe to the awe of God, and the exerciſes of true mortification, by the only looking up at his holy profeſſion, cureth the burning venome of theſe fiery ſerpents that lurke within him. Haſt thou nothing but nature? Reſolve to looke for no peace. God is not prodigall to caſt away his beſt bleſſings on ſo unworthy ſubjects. Art thou a Chriſtian? Doe but remember thou art ſo; and then if thou dar'ſt, if thou canſt, yeeld to the exceſſe of paſſions.

Sect. VIII.

The ſecond maine enemy to Peace, Croſſes.

HItherto the moſt inward and dangerous enemy of our peace: which if wee have once maſtered, the other field ſhalbe fought and won with leſſe bloud. Croſſes diſquiet us either in their preſent feeling, or their expectation: both of them, when they meet with weake minds, ſo extremely diſtempering them, that the patient for the time is not himſelfe. How many have we knowne, which through a lingring diſeaſe, weary of their paine, weary of their lives, have made their owne hands their executioners? How many meeting with a head-ſtrong griefe, which they could not manage, have by the violence of it beene carried quite from their wits? How many millions, what for incurable maladies, what for loſſes, what for defamations, what for ſad accidents to their children, rub out their lives in perpetuall diſcontentment, therefore living, becauſe they cannot yet die, not for that they like to live? If there could bee any humane receipt preſcribed to avoyd evils, it would bee purchaſed at an high rate: but both it is impoſſible that earth ſhould redreſſe that which is ſent from Heaven; and if it could bee done, even the want of miſeries would prove miſerable: for the mind cloyed with continuall felicity, would grow a burden to it ſelfe, loathing that at laſt, which intermiſſion would have made pleaſant. Give a free horſe the full reynes, and hee will ſoone tire. Summer is the ſweeteſt ſeaſon by all conſents, wherein the earth is both moſt rich with increaſe, and moſt gorgeous for ornament; yet if it were not received with interchanges of cold froſts and piercing winds, who could live? Summer would bee no Summer, if Winter did not both lead it in, and follow it: we may not therefore either hope or ſtrive to eſcape all croſſes; ſome we may: what thou canſt, flie from: what thou canſt not, allay and mitigate; in croſſes univerſally let this bee thy rule, Make thy ſelfe none, eſcape ſome, beare the reſt, ſweeten all.

Sect. IX.

Of crosses that arise from conceit.

Apprehension gives life to crosses: and if some be simply, most are as they are taken. I have seene many, which when God hath meant them no hurt, have framed themselves crosses out of imagination, and have found that insupportable for weight, which in truth never was, neither had ever any but a fancied being. Others againe laughing out heavy afflictions, for which they were bemoaned of the beholders. One receives a deadly wound, and lookes not so much as pale at the smart; another heares of many losses, and like Zeno, after newes of his shipwracke, (as altogether passion-lesse) goes to his rest, not breaking an houres sleepe for that, which would breake the heart of some others. Greenham that Saint of ours (whom it cannot disparage that hee was reserved for our so loose an age) can lie spread quietly upon the forme looking for the Chirurgians knife, binding himselfe as fast with a resolved patience, as others with strongest cords, abiding his flesh carved, and his bowels rifled, and not stirring more than if he felt not, while others tremble to expect, and shrinke to feele but the pricking of a veine. There can be no remedy for imaginary crosses but wisdome, which shall teach us to esteeme of all events as they are; like a true glasse representing all things to our minds in their due proportion. So as crosses may not seeme that are not, nor little and gentle ones seeme great and intolerable. Give thy body Ellebore, thy mind good counsell, thine eare to thy friend, and these fantasticall evills shall vanish away like themselves.

Of true and reall crosses.

It were idle advice to bid men avoid evils. Nature hath by a secret instinct taught brute creatures so much, whether wit or sagacity: and our selfe-love making the best advantage of reason, will easily make us so wise and carefull. It is more worth our labour, since our life is so open to calamities, and nature to impatience, to teach men to beare what evils they cannot avoid, and how by a well-disposednesse of mind wee may correct the iniquity of all hard events. Wherein it is hardly credible, how much good Art and precepts of resolution may availe us. I have seene one man, by the helpe of a little engine, lift up that weight alone, which forty helping hands by their cleare strength might have endevoured in vaine. Wee live here in an Ocean of troubles, wherein we can see no firme land; one wave falling upon another, ere the former have wrought all his spight. Mischiefes strive for places, as if they feared to lose their roome if they hasted not. So many good things as we have, so many evils arise from their privation; besides no fewer reall and positive evils that afflict us. To prescribe and apply receits to every particular crosse, were to write a Salmeron-like commentary upon Petrarchs remedies; and I doubt whether so the worke would be perfect: a life would be too little to write it, and but enough to reade it.

Sect. XI.

The first remedy of crosses before they come.

The same medicines cannot help all diseases of the body, of the soule they may. We see Fencers give their schollers the same common rules of position, of warding and weilding their weapon for offence, for defence, against all commers: such universall precepts there are for crosses. In the first whereof, I would prescribe Expectation, that either killeth or abateth evils. For crosses, after the nature of the Cockatrice, die, if they be foreseene; whether this providence makes us more strong to resist, or by some secret power makes them more unable to assault us. It is not credible what a fore-resolved mind can doe, can suffer. Could our English Milo, of whom Spaine yet speaketh since their last peace, have overthrowne that furious Beast, made now more violent through the rage of his baiting, if he had not setled himselfe in his station, & expected? The frighted multitude ran away from that overearnest sport, which begun in pleasure, ended in terrour. If hee had turned his backe with the rest, where had bin his safety, where his glory, & reward? Now he stood still, expected, overcame, by one fact he at once preserved, honoured, enriched himselfe. Evills will come never the sooner for that thou lookest for them, they will come the easier: easier: it is a labour well loſt, if they come not; and well beſtowed, if they doe come. We are ſure the worſt may come, why ſhould we be ſecure that it will not? Suddenneſſe finds weake minds ſecure, makes them miſerable, leaves them deſperate. The beſt way therefore is, to make things preſent, in conceit before they come, that they may be halfe paſt in their violence when they doe come: even as with woodden waſters, wee learne to play at the ſharp. As therefore good Souldiers exerciſe themſelves long at the pale, and there uſe thoſe activities, which afterwards they ſhall practiſe upon a true adverſary: ſo muſt wee preſent to our ſelves imaginary croſſes, and manage them in our minde, before God ſends them in event. Now I eat, ſleep, digeſt all ſoundly, without complaint: what if a languiſhing diſeaſe ſhould bereave me of my appetite and reſt? that I ſhould ſee dainties and loath them, ſurfetting of the very ſmell, of the thought of the beſt diſhes? that I ſhould count the lingring houres, and thinke Ezekias long day returned, wearying my ſelfe with changing ſides, and wiſhing any thing but what I am? How could I take this diſtemper? Now I have (if not what I would, yet) what I need; as not abounding with idle ſuperfluities, ſo not ſtraitned with penury of neceſſary things. What if poverty ſhould ruſh upon me as an armed man, ſpoiling me of all my little that I had, and ſend me to the fountaine for my beſt cellar? to the ground for my bed? for my bread to anothers cupbord? for my clothes to the Brokers ſhop, or my friends wardrobe? How could I brooke this want? I am now at home, walking in my owne grounds, looking on my young plants the hope of poſterity, conſidering the nature, advantages or feares of my ſoile, enjoying the patrimony of my Fathers. What if for my Religion, or the malicious ſentence of ſome great one, I ſhould bee exiled from my Country, wandring amongſt thoſe, whoſe habit, language, faſhion, my ignorance ſhall make me wonder at; where the ſolitude of places, and ſtrangeneſſe of perſons, ſhall make my life comfortable? How could I abide the ſmell of forraine ſmoke? how ſhould I take the contempt and hard uſage that waits upon ſtrangers? Thy proſperity is idle, and ill ſpent, if it be not medled with ſuch fore-caſting, and wiſely ſuſpicious thoughts, if it be wholly beſtowed in enjoying, no whit in preventing. Like unto a fooliſh City, which notwithſtanding a dangerous ſituation, ſpends all her wealth in rich furnitures of chambers and ſtate-houſes; while they beſtow not one ſhovell full of earth on outward Bulwarks to their defence: this is but to make our enemies the happier, and our ſelves the more readily miſerable. If thou wilt not therefore be oppreſſed with evils Expect & Exerciſe; Exerciſe thy ſelfe with conceit of evils: Expect the evils themſelves; yea exerciſe thy ſelfe in expectation: ſo while the mind pleaſeth it ſelfe in thinking, Yet I am not thus, it prepareth it ſelfe againſt it may be ſo. And if ſome that have bin good at the Foiles, have proved cowardly at the ſharp, yet on the contrary, who ever durſt point a ſingle combat in the field, that hath not bin ſomewhat trained in the Fence-ſchoole?

Sect. XII.

The next remedy of croſſes when they are come. From their Author.

NEither doth it a little blunt the edge of evils, to conſider that they come from a divine hand, whoſe almighty power is guided by a moſt wiſe providence, and tempered with a Fatherly love. Even the ſavage creatures will be ſmitten of their keeper, and repine not; if of a ſtranger, they teare him in peeces. He ſtrikes me that made me, that moderates the world; why ſtruggle I with him, why with my ſelfe? Am I a foole, or a Rebell? A foole, if I be ignorant whence my croſſes come: a Rebell, if I know it, and be impatient. My ſufferings are from a God, from my God; he hath deſtin'd me every dramme of ſorrow that I feele: thus much thou ſhalt abide, and here ſhall thy miſeries be ſtinted. All worldly helps cannot abate them, all powers of hell cannot adde one ſcruple to their weight, that he hath allotted me: I muſt therefore either blaſpheme God in my heart, detracting from his infinite juſtice, wiſdome, power, mercy, which all ſhall ſtand inviolable, when millions of ſuch wormes as I am, are gone to duſt; or elſe confeſſe that I ought to be patient. And if I profeſſe I ſhould be that I will not, I befoole my ſelfe, and bewray miſerable impotency. But (as impatience is full of excuſe) it was thine owne raſh improvidence, or the ſpight of thine enemy

A enemy that impoveriſht, that defamed thee: it was the malignity of ſome unwholſome diſh, or ſome groſſe corrupted aire, that hath diſtempered thee. Ah fooliſh curre, why doeſt thou bite at the ſtone, which could never have hurt thee, but from the hand that threw it? If I wound thee, what matters it whether with mine owne ſword, or thine, or anothers? God ſtrikes ſome immediatly from Heaven with his owne arme, or with the arme of Angels: others he buffets with their owne hands, ſome by the revenging ſword of an enemy, others with the fiſt of his dumbe creatures: God ſtrikes in all; his hand moves theirs. If thou ſee it not, blame thy carnall eyes. Why doſt thou fault the inſtrument, while thou knoweſt the agent? Even the dying theefe pardons the executioner, exclaimes on his unjuſt Judge, or his malicious accuſers. Either then blame the firſt mover, or diſcharge the meanes: which as they could not have touched thee, but as from him; ſo from him they have afflicted thee juſtly, wrongfully
B perhaps as in themſelves.

Sect. XIII.

BUt neither ſeemeth it enough to be patient in croſſes, if we be not thankfull alſo. Good things challenge more than bare contentment. Croſſes (unjuſtly termed evils) as they are ſent of him that is all goodneſſe, ſo they are ſent for good, and his end cannot be fruſtrate. What greater good can be to the diſeaſed man, than fit and proper Phyſicke to recure him? Croſſes are the only medicines of ſick minds. Thy ſound body carries within it a ſicke ſoule; thou feeleſt it not perhaps: ſo much more art thou ſicke, and ſo much more dangerouſly. Perhaps thou laboureſt of ſome plethory of pride, or of ſome dropſie of covetouſneſſe, or the ſtaggers of inconſtancy, or
C ſome fever of luxurie, or conſumption of envy, or perhaps of the Lethargie of idleneſſe, or of the phrenſie of anger: It is a rare ſoule that hath not ſome notable diſeaſe: only croſſes are thy remedies. What if they be unpleaſant? they are phyſicke: it is enough if they be wholeſome. Not pleaſant taſte, but the ſecret vertue commends medicines. If they cure thee, they ſhall pleaſe thee, even in diſpleaſing; or elſe thou loveſt thy palate above thy ſoule. What madneſſe is this? When thou complaineſt of a bodily diſeaſe, thou ſendeſt to the Phyſitian, that he may ſend thee not ſavoury, but wholeſome potions: thou receiveſt them in ſpight of thine abhorring ſtomacke, and withall both thankeſt and rewardeſt the Phyſitian. Thy ſoule is ſicke: thy heavenly Phyſitian ſees it, and pitties thee ere thou thy ſelfe; and unſent to, ſends thee not a plauſible, but a ſoveraigne remedie: thou loatheſt the ſavour, and rather wilt hazard thy life, than offend thy palate; and in ſtead of thanks, repineſt at, revileſt the Phy-
D ſitian. How comes it that we love our ſelves ſo little (if at leaſt we count our ſoules the beſt or any part) as that we had rather undergoe death than paine, chuſing rather wilfull ſickneſſe, than an harſh remedie? Surely we men are meere fooles in the eſtimation of our owne good: like children, our choyce is led altogether by ſhew, no whit by ſubſtance. We cry after every well-ſeeming toy, and put from us ſolid proffers of good things. The wiſe Arbitrator of all things ſees our folly, and corrects it, with-holding our idle deſires, and forcing upon us the ſound good we refuſe. It is ſecond folly in us, if we thank him not. The fooliſh babe cries for his fathers bright knife, or gilded pilles. The wiſer father knowes that they can but hurt him; and therefore with-holds them after all his teares. The childe thinks he is uſed but unkindly. Every wiſe man, and himſelfe at more yeares, can ſay, it was but childiſh folly, in deſiring it, in complaining that he miſſed it. The loſſe of wealth, friends, health, is ſometimes
E gaine to us. Thy body, thy eſtate, is worſe; thy ſoule is better, why complaineſt thou?

The third antidote of croſſes.

Sect. XIV.

NAy, it ſhall not be enough (me thinks) if only we be but contented and thankfull, if not alſo chearefull in afflictions; if that, as we feele their paine, ſo we looke to their end; although indeed this is not more requiſite, than rarely found, as being proper only to the good heart. Every Bird can ſing in a cleare heaven, in a temperate ſpring; that one, as moſt familiar, ſo is moſt commended, that ſings merrie notes in the midſt of a ſhower, or the dead of Winter. Every Epicure can enlarge his heart to mirth in the midſt of his cups and dalliance; only the three children can ſing in the furnace, Paul and Silas in the ſtocks, Martyrs at the ſtake. It is from heaven that this joy comes, ſo contrary to all earthly occaſions, bred in the faithfull heart, through a ſerious and feeling reſpect to the iſſue of what he feeles, the quiet and untroubled fruit of his righteouſneſſe; glory, the crowne after his fight; after his minute of paine, eternitie of joy. He never lookt over the threſhold of heaven, that cannot more rejoyce that he ſhall be glorious, than mourne in preſent that he is miſerable.

The 4. and laſt part, from their iſſue.

Sect. XV.

Of the importunitie and terror of Death.

YEa, this conſideration is ſo powerfull, that it alone is able to make a part againſt the feare or ſenſe of the laſt and greateſt of all terribles, Death it ſelfe: which in the conſcience of his owne dreadfulneſſe, juſtly laughs at all the vaine humane precepts of Tranquillitie, appaling the moſt reſolute, and vexing the moſt cheerefull mindes. Neither prophane Lucretius, with all his Epicurean rules of confidence, nor drunken Anacreon, with all his wanton Odes, can ſhift off the importunate and violent horrour of this Adverſary. Seeſt thou the Chaldean Tyrant beſet with the ſacred bowles of Ieruſalem, the late ſpoiles of Gods Temple; and (in contempt of their owner) carowſing healths to his Queenes, Concubines, Peeres, ſinging amids his cups, triumphant carols of praiſe to his molten and carved gods? Wouldeſt thou ever ſuſpect that this high courage could be abated? or that this ſumptuous and preſumptuous banquet (after ſo royall and jocond continuance) ſhould have any other concluſion, but pleaſure? Stay but one houre longer, and thou ſhalt ſee that face, that now ſhines with a ruddy gloſſe (according to the colour of his liquor) looke pale and gaſtly, ſtained with the colours of feare and death; and that proud hand, which now lifts up her maſſie Goblets in defiance of God, tremble like a leafe in a ſtorme; and thoſe ſtrong knees, which never ſtooped to the burden of their laden body, now not able to beare up themſelves, but looſened with a ſudden palſie of feare, one knocking againſt the other: and all this, for that Death writes him a letter of ſummons to appeare that night before him; and accordingly ere the next Sunne, ſent two Eunuches for his honorable conveiance into another world. Where now are thoſe delicate morſels, thoſe deep draughts, thoſe merry ditties, wherewith the palate and eare ſo pleaſed themſelves? What is now become of all thoſe cheerefull lookes, looſe laughters, ſtately port, revels, triumphs of the feaſting Court? Why doth none of his gallant Nobles revive the fainted courage of their Lord with a new cup? or with ſome ſtirring jeſt ſhake him out of this unſeaſonable melancholy? O death, how imperious art thou to carnall mindes? aggravating their miſery not only by expectation of future paine, but by the remembrance of the wonted cauſes of their joy; and not ſuffering them to ſee ought but what may torment them? Even that monſter of Ceſars, that had been ſo well acquainted with bloud, and never had found better ſport than in cutting of throats; when now it came to his owne turne, how effeminate, how deſperately cowardous did he ſhew himſelfe! to the wonder of all readers, that he which was ever ſo valiant in killing, ſhould be ſo womaniſhly heartleſſe in dying.

Sect. XVI.

The grounds of the feare of death.

THere are that feare not ſo much to be dead, as to die; the very act of diſſolution frighting them with a tormenting expectation of a ſhort, but intolerable painfulneſſe. Which let if the wiſdome of God had not interpoſed to timorous nature, there would have been many more Lucreces, Cleopatres, Achitophels; and good lawes ſhould have found little opportunity of execution, through the wilfull funerals of malefactors. For the ſoule that comes into the body without any (at leaſt ſenſible) pleaſure, departs not from it without an extremitie of paine; which varying according to the manner and meanes of ſeparation, yet in all violent deaths eſpecially retaineth a violence not to be avoided, hard to be endured. And if diſeaſes, which are

A are deſtin'd towards death as their end, be ſo painfull, what muſt the end & perfection of diſeaſes be? Since as diſeaſes are the maladies of the body, ſo death is the malady of diſeaſes. There are that feare not ſo much to die, as to be dead. If the pang be bitter, yet it is but ſhort: the comfortleſſe ſtate of the dead ſtrikes ſome that could well reſolve for the act of their paſſage. Not the worſt of the Heathen Emperours, made that moanfull dittie on his death-bed, wherein he bewraieth (to all memory) much feeling pittie of his ſoule, for her doubtfull and impotent condition after her parture. How doth Plato's worldling bewaile the miſery of the grave, beſides all reſpect of paine! Woe is me, that I ſhall lie alone rotting in the ſilent earth, among ſt the crawling Wormes, not ſeeing ought above, not ſeene. Very not-being is ſufficiently abhorred of nature, if death had no more to make it fearefull. But thoſe that have lived under light enough, to ſhew them the gates of hell, after their paſſage thorow the gates of death, (and have B learned, that death is not only horrible for our not-being here, but for being infinitly, eternally miſerable in a future world, nor ſo much for the diſſolution of life, as the beginning of torment) thoſe cannot, without the certaine hope of their immunitie, but carnally feare to die, and helliſhly feare to be dead. For if it be ſuch paine to die, what is it to be ever dying? and if the ſtraining or luxation of one joynt can ſo afflict us, what ſhall the racking of the whole body, and the torturing of the ſoule, whoſe animation alone makes the body to feele and complaine of ſmart? And if men have deviſed ſuch exquiſite torments, what can ſpirits, more ſubtile, more malicious? And if our momentanie ſufferings ſeeme long, how long ſhall that be that is eternall? And if the ſorrowes indifferently incident to Gods deare ones upon earth, be ſo extreme, as ſometimes to drive them within ſight of deſpairing, what ſhall thoſe be that are reſerved only for thoſe that hate him, and that he hateth? None but thoſe who have C heard the deſperate complaints of ſome guiltie Spyra, or whoſe ſoules have been a little ſcorched with theſe flames, can enough conceive of the horror of this eſtate; it being the policy of our common enemie to conceale it ſo long, that we may ſee and feele it at once, leſt we ſhould feare it, before it be too late to be avoided.

'Ωποῖόν τι κεῖσομαι, &c.

Sect. XVII.

NOw when this great Adverſary, like a proud Giant, comes ſtalking out in his fearefull ſhape, and inſults over our fraile mortalitie, daring the world to match him with an equall Champion, whiles a whole hoſt of worldlings ſhew him their backes for feare, the true Chriſtian (armed only with confidence and reſolution of his future happineſſe) dares boldly encounter him, and can wound him D in the forehead (the wonted ſeat of terror) and trampling upon him, can cut off his head with his owne ſword, and victoriouſly returning, can ſing in triumph, O death, where is thy ſting? An happy victory! We die, and are not foiled: yea, we are conquerours in dying: we could not overcome death, if we died not. That diſſolution is well beſtowed, that parts the ſoule from the body, that it may unite both to God. All our life here (as that heavenly Doctor well tearmes it) is but a vitall death. How advantagious is that death that determines this falſe and dying life, and begins a true one, above all the titles of happineſſe! The Epicure or Sadduce dare not die, for feare of not being. The guiltie and looſe worldling dares not die, for feare of being miſerable. The diſtruſtfull and doubting ſemi-Chriſtian dares not die, becauſe he knowes not, whether he ſhall be, or be miſerable, or not be at all. The reſolued Chriſtian dares, and would die, becauſe he knowes he ſhall be happy; and looking merrily towards hea- E ven (the place of his reſt) can unfainedly ſay, I deſire to be diſſolved: I ſee thee, my home, I ſee thee, (a ſweet and glorious home, after a weary pilgrimage) I ſee thee; and now after many lingring hopes, I aſpire to thee. How oft have I looked up at thee, with admiration and raviſhment of ſoule! and by the goodly beames that I have ſeene, gheſſed at the glory that is above them! How oft have I ſcorned theſe dead and unpleaſant pleaſures of earth, in compariſon of thine! I come now, my joyes, I come to poſſeſſe you: I come through paine and death; yea if hell it ſelfe were in the way betwixt you and me, I would paſſe thorow hell it ſelfe to enjoy you. And (in truth)

Remedy of the laſt and greateſt breach of peace, ariſing from death.

Auguſtine.

Tul. Tuſcul. Callimach. Epigram.

Auguſt. de Hæreſ.

Mors acerba, Fama perpetua.

if that Heathen Cleombrotus (a follower of the ancient Academie) but upon only reading of his Maſter Platoes diſcourſes of the immortalitie of the ſoule, could caſt downe himſelfe head-long from an high rocke, and wilfully breake his necke, that he might be poſſeſſed of that immortality which he beleeved to follow upon death; how contented ſhould they be to die, that knew they ſhall be (more than immortall) glorious? He went, not in an hate of the fleſh, as the Patrician Hereticks of old; but in a blind love to his ſoule, out of bare opinion: We, upon an holy love grounded upon aſſured knowledge. He, upon an opinion of future life: we on knowledge of future glory. He went, unſent for; we, called for by our Maker. Why ſhould his courage exceed ours, ſince our ground, our eſtate ſo far exceeds his? Even this age, within the reach of our memorie, bred that peremptory Italian, which in imitation of old Romane courage (leſt, in that degenerated Nation, there ſhould be no ſtep left of the qualities of their Anceſtors) entring upon his torment for killing a Tyrant, cheered himſelfe with this confidence; My death is ſharp: my fame ſhall be everlaſting. The voice of a Romane, not of a Chriſtian. My fame ſhall be eternall: an idle comfort. My fame ſhall live; not my ſoule live to ſee it. What ſhall it availe thee to be talkt of, while thou art not? Then fame only is precious, when a man lives to enjoy it. The fame that ſurvives the ſoule, is bootleſſe. Yet even this hope cheered him againſt the violence of his death. What ſhould it doe us, that (not our fame, but) our life, our glory after death, cannot die? He that hath Stephens eyes to looke into heaven, cannot but have the tongue of the Saints, Come Lord: How long? That man, ſeeing the glory of the end, cannot but contemne the hardneſſe of the way. But who wants thoſe eyes, if he ſay and ſweares that he feares not death, beleeve him not: if hee proteſt this Tranquillitie, and yet feare death, beleeve him not: beleeve him not, if he ſay he is not miſerable.

Sect. XVIII.

The ſecond ranke of the enemies of peace.

Hippocr. Aphoriſ.

THeſe are enemies on the left hand. There want not ſome on the right, which with leſſe profeſſion of hoſtilitie, hurt no leſſe. Not ſo eaſily perceiued becauſe they diſtemper the mind, not without ſome kind of pleaſure. Surfet kils more than famine. Theſe are the over-deſiring and over-joying of theſe earthly things. All immoderations are enemies, as to health, ſo to peace. He that deſires, wants as much, as he that hath nothing. The drunken man is as thirſty as the ſweating traveller. Hence are the ſtudies, cares, feares, jealouſies, hopes, griefes, envies, wiſhes, platformes of atchieving, alterations of purpoſes, and a thouſand like; whereof each one is enough to make the life troubleſome. One is ſicke of his neighbours field, whoſe miſhapen angles disfigure his, and hinder his Lordſhip of entireneſſe: what he hath, is not regarded, for the want of what he cannot have. Another feeds on cruſts, to purchaſe what he muſt leave (perhaps) to a foole, or, (which is not much better) to a prodigall heire. Another, in the extremity of covetous folly, chuſes to die an unpitied death; hanging himſelfe for the fall of the market, while the commons laugh at that loſſe, and in their ſpeeches Epitaph upon him, as on that Pope, He lived as a Wolfe, and died as a Dog. One cares not what attendance he dances at all houres, on whoſe ſtaires he ſits, what vices he ſoothes, what deformities he imitates, what ſervile offices he doth in an hope to riſe, Another ſtomacks the covered head and ſtiffe knee of his inferiour; angry that other men think him not ſo good as he thinks himſelfe. Another eats his owne heart, with envy at the richer furniture, and better eſtate, or more honour of his neighbour; thinking his owne not good, becauſe a nother hath better. Another vexeth himſelfe with a word of diſgrace, paſt from the mouth of an enemie, which he neither can digeſt, nor caſt up; reſolving becauſe another will be his enemie, to be his owne. Theſe humours are as manifold, as there are men that ſeeme proſperous. For the avoiding of all which ridiculous, and yet ſpightfull inconveniences, the mind muſt be ſetled in a perſwaſion of the worthleſneſſe of theſe outward things. Let it know, that theſe riches have made many prouder, none better: That, as never man was, ſo never wiſe wise man thought himselfe better for enjoying them. Would that wise Philosopher have cast his gold into the Sea, if he had not knowne he should live more happily without it? If he knew not the use of riches, he was no wise man: if he knew not the best way to quietnes, he was no Philosopher: now even by the voyce of their Oracle, hee was confessed to be both; yet cast away his gold, that he might be happy. Would that wise Prophet have prayed as well against riches, as povertie? Would so many great men (whereof our little Iland hath yeelded nine crowned Kings while it was held of old by the Saxons) after they had continued their life in the Throne, have ended it in the Cell, and changed their Scepter for a Booke, if they could have found as much felicitie in the highest estate, as securitie in the lowest? I heare Peter and Iohn (the eldest and dearest Apostles) say, Gold and Silver have I none: I heare the Devill say, All these will I give thee; and they are mine, to give. Whether shall I desire to be in the state of these Saints, or that devill? He was therefore a better husband than a Philosopher, that first tearmed riches Goods: and he mended the title well, that (adding a fit Epithet) called them goods of Fortune; false goods ascribed to a false patron. There is no fortune, to give or guide riches: there is no true goodnes in riches to be guided. His meaning then was (as I can interpret it) to teach us, in this title; that it is a chance, if euer riches were good to any. In summe, who would account those as riches, or those riches as goods, which hurt the owner, disquiet others? which the worst have; which the best have not; which those that have not, want not; which those want that have them: which are lost in a night; and a man is not worse, when he hath lost them? It is true of them, that we say of fire and water; They are good servants, ill masters. Make them thy slaves, they shall be goods indeed: in vse, if not in nature; good to thy selfe, good to others by thee: But if they be thy masters, thou hast condemned thy selfe to thine owne Gallies. If a servant rule, he proves a Tyrant. What madnesse is this? thou hast made thy selfe, at once a slave and a foole. What if thy chaines be of Gold? or if, with Heliogabalus, thou hast made thee silken halters? thy servitude may be glorious: it is no lesse miserable.

Socrates. A proofe, that with Christians deserues no credit; but with Heathens commands it.

Sect. XIX.

HOnour, perhaps, is yet better; such is the confused opinion of those that know little: but a distinct and curious head shall find an hard taske, to define in what point the goodnesse thereof consisteth. Is it in high discent of bloud? I would think so, if nature were tied by any law to produce children like qualities to their parents. But, although in the bruit creatures she be ever thus regular, that ye shall never find a young Pigeon hatched in an Eagles nest; neither can I think that true, or (if true, it was monstrous) that Nicippus his sheepe should yeane a Lyon: yet in the best creature (which hath his forme, and her attending qualities from above) with a likenesse of face and features, is commonly found an unlikenesse of disposition: only the earthly part followes the seed; wildome, valour, vertue, are of another beginning. Shall I bow to a molten calfe, because it was made of golden eare-rings? Shall I condemne all honour of the first head (though vpon never so noble deserving) because it can shew nothing before it selfe, but a white shield? If Cæsar or Agathocles, be a Potters sonne, shall I contemne him? Or if wise Bion be the sonne of an infamous Curtizan, shall the censorious Lawyer raze him out of the Catalogue, with Partus sequitur ventrem? Lastly, shall I account that good, which is incident to the worst? Either therefore greatnesse must shew some Charter, wherein it is priviledged with succession of vertue; or else the goodnesse of honour cannot consist in bloud. Is it then in the admiration and high opinion that others have conceived of thee, which drawes all dutifull respect, and humble offices from them, to thee? O fickle good, that is ever in the keeping of others! especially of the unstable vulgar, that beast of many heads: whose divided tongues, as they never agree with each other; so seldome (when ever) agree long with themselves. Doe we not see the superstitious Liſtrians, that ere-while would needs make Paul a God, against his will; and in devout zeale, drew crowned bulls to the Altars of their new Iupiter

The second enemy on the right hand, Honour.

Olympia. Diog. Laert.

Iupiter and Mercury? violence can ſcarce hold them from ſacrificing to him: now not many houres after, gather up ſtones againſt him; having in their conceits turned him, from a God into a malefactor; and are ready to kill him, in ſtead of killing a ſacrifice to him. Such is the multitude; and ſuch the ſtedfaſtneſſe of their honour. There then only is true honour, where bloud and vertue meet together: the greatneſſe whereof is from bloud; the goodneſſe from vertue. Rejoyce ye great men, that your bloud is ennobled with the vertues and deſerts of your Anceſtors. This onely is yours: this onely challengeth all vnfained reſpect of your inferiours. Count it praiſe-worthy, not that you have, but that you deſerve honour. Bloud may bee tainted; the opinion of the vulgar cannot be conſtant; onely vertue is ever like it ſelfe, and onely wins reverence, even of thoſe that hate it. Without which, greatneſſe is as a Beacon of vice, to draw mens eyes the more to behold it: and thoſe that ſee it dare loath it, though they dare not cenſure it. So, while the knee bendeth, the mind abhorreth, and telleth the body, it honours an unworthy ſubject: within it ſelfe, ſecretly, compariug that vicious great man (on whom his ſubmiſſe courteſie is caſt away) to ſome goodly faire bound Senecaes Tragedies, that is curiouſly gilded without; which if a man open, he ſhall find Thyeſtes the tombe of his owne children; or Oedipus the husband of his owne mother, or ſome ſuch monſtrous part: which he (at once) reades, and hates.

Sect. XX.

The ſecond remedy of over-joyed proſperitie.

LEt him think, that not only theſe outward things are not in themſelves good, but that they expoſe their honours to miſery. For, beſides that God uſually puniſhes our over-loving them, with their loſſe, (becauſe he thinkes them unworthy Rivals to himſelfe, who challengeth all height of love, as his only right) ſo that the way to loſe, is to love much; the largeneſſe moreover either of affection, or eſtate, makes an open way to ruine: while a man walkes on plaine ground, he falls not; or, if he fall, he doth but meaſure his length on the ground, and riſe againe without harme: but he that climbeth high, is in danger of falling; and if he fall, of killing. All the ſailes hoiſed, give vantage to a tempeſt; which (through the Mariners foreſight giving timely roome thereto) by their fall, deliver the veſſell from the danger of that guſt, whoſe rage now paſſeth over with only beating her with waves for anger that he was prevented. So the larger our eſtate is, the fairer marke hath miſchiefe given to hit; and (which is worſe) that which makes us ſo eaſie to hit, makes our wound more deepe and grievous. If poore Codrus his houſe burne, he ſtands by & warmes him with the flame, becauſe he knowes it is but the loſſe of an outſide; which (by gathering ſome few ſtickes, ſtraw, and clay) may with little labour, and no coſt, be repaired. But when the many lofts of the rich man doe one give fire to another, he cries out one while of his Counting houſe, another while of his Wardrobe, then of ſome noted cheſt, and ſtraight of ſome rich Cabinet: and lamenting both the frame and the furniture, is therefore impatient, becauſe he had ſomething.

Sect. XXI.

The vanitie of pleaſure; the third enemy on the right hand.

BUt, if there be any Sorcereſſe upon earth, it is pleaſure: which ſo inchanteth the mindes of men, and worketh the diſturbance of our Peace, with ſuch ſecret delight, that fooliſh men think this want of Tranquillitie, happineſſe. She turneth men into ſwine, with ſuch ſweet charmes, that they would not change their brutiſh nature, for their former reaſon. It is a good unquietneſſe (ſay they) that contenteth: it is a good enemy that profiteth. Is it any wonder that men ſhould be ſottiſh, when their reaſon is maſtered with ſenſualitie? Thou foole, thy pleaſure contents thee: how much? how long? If ſhe have not more befriended thee than ever ſhe did any earthly favourite: yea, if ſhe have not given thee more, than ſhe hath her ſelfe; thy beſt delight hath had ſome mixture of diſcontentment. For either ſome circumſtance croſſeth thy deſire, or the inward diſtaſte of thy conſcience (checking thine appetite) permits thee not any entire fruition of thy joy. Even the ſweeteſt of all flowres

A flowers hath his thornes: and who can determine whether the ſent be more delectable, or the pricks more irkeſome? It is enough for heaven to have abſolute pleaſures: which if they could be found here below, certainly that heaven, which is now not enough deſired, would then be feared. God will have our pleaſures here (according to the faſhion of our ſelves) compounded: ſo as the beſt delights may ſtill ſavour of their earth. See how that great King, which never had any match for wiſdome, ſcarce ever any ſuperiour for wealth, traverſed over all this inferiour world, with diligent inquirie, and obſervation, and all to find out that goodneſſe of the children of men which they enjoy under the Sunne; abridging himſelfe of nothing that either his eyes, or his heart could ſuggeſt to him: (as what is it, that he could not either know or purchaſe?) and now comming home to himſelfe (after the diſquiſition of all naturall and humane things) complaines, that Behold, all is not onely B vanitie, but vexation. Goe then, thou wiſe ſcholler of experience, and make a more accurate ſearch for that which he ſought, and miſſed. Perhaps ſome-where (betwixt the talleſt Cedar in Lebanon, and the ſhrubby Hyſop upon the wall) Pleaſure ſhrouded her ſelfe, that ſhe could not be deſcried of him; whether through ignorance, or negligence: thine inſight may be more piercing, thy meanes more commodious, thy ſucceſſe happier. If it were poſſible for any man to entertaine ſuch hopes, his vaine experience could not make him a greater foole: it could but teach him what he is and knoweth not. And yet ſo imperfect, as our Pleaſures are, they have their ſatiety: and as their Continuance is not good, ſo their Concluſion is worſe: looke to the end, and ſee how ſudden, how bitter it is. Their only Courteſie is, to ſalute us with a farewell; and ſuch a one, as makes their ſalutation uncomfortable. This Dalila ſhewes and ſpeakes faire; but in the end ſhe will bereave thee of thy ſtrength, of C thy ſight, yea of thy ſelfe. Theſe gnats flie about thine eares, and make thee muſicke a while; but evermore they ſting, ere they part. Sorrow and Repentance is the beſt end of Pleaſure: Paine is yet worſe; but the worſt is Deſpaire. If thou miſſe of the firſt of theſe, one of the latter ſhall find thee; perhaps both. How much better is it for thee to want a little honie, than to be ſwolne up with a venomous ſting?

Thus then, the mind reſolved that theſe earthly things (Honour, Wealth, Pleaſures) are caſuall, unſtable, deceitfull, imperfect, dangerous; muſt learne to uſe them without truſt, & to want them without griefe; thinking ſtill, If I have them, I have ſome benefit with a great charge: If I have them not; with little reſpect of others, I have much ſecurity and eaſe, in my ſelfe: which once obtained, we cannot fare amiſſe in either eſtate; and without which, we cannot but miſcary in both.

Sect. XXII.

ALL the enemies of our inward peace, are thus deſcried & diſcomforted. Which done, we have enough to preſerve us from miſerie: but (ſince we moreover ſeek how to live well & happily) there yet remaine thoſe Poſitive rules whereby our Tranquillitie may be both had, continued, and confirmed. Wherein, I feare not leſt I ſhould ſeeme over divine, in caſting the Anchor of Quietneſſe ſo deepe as Heaven (the only ſeat of conſtancie;) whiles it can find no hold at all upon earth. All earthly things are full of variableneſſe: and therefore having no ſtay in themſelves, can give none to us. He that will have and hold right Tranquillitie, muſt find in himſelfe a ſweet fruition of God, and a feeling apprehenſion of his preſence; that when he findes manifold occaſions of vexation in theſe earthly things, he (over- E looking them all, and having recourſe to his Comforter) may find in him ſuch matter of contentment, that he may paſſe over all theſe pettie grievances with contempt: which whoſoever wants, may be ſecure, cannot be quiet. The mind of man cannot want ſome refuge, and (as we ſay of the Elephant) cannot reſt, unleſſe it have ſomething to leane upon. The Covetous man, (whoſe heaven is his cheſt) when he heares himſelfe rated and curſed for oppreſſion, comes home; and ſeeing his baggs ſafe, applauds himſelfe againſt all cenſurers. The Glutton, when he loſeth friends or good name, yet joyeth in his well furniſht table, and the laughter of his Wine: more plea-

ſing

ſing himſelfe in one diſh, than he can be grieved with all the worlds miſ-cariage. The needy Scholler (whoſe wealth lies all in his braine) cheeres himſelfe againſt iniquitie of times, with the conceit of his knowledge. Theſe ſtarting holes the mind cannot want, when it is hard driven. Now, when as like to ſome chaſed Siſera, it ſhrowds it ſelfe under the harbour of theſe Iaels; although they give it houſe-roome and milke for a time, yet at laſt either they entertaine it with a naile in the Temples, or (being guilty to their owne impotencie) ſend it out of themſelves, for ſafetie and peace. For, if the Croſſe light in that which it made his refuge (as, if the covetous man be croſſed in his riches) what earthly thing can ſtay him from a deſperate phrenſie? Or, if the Croſſe fall in a degree above the height of his ſtay; as if the rich man be ſick, or dying (wherein, all wealth is either contemned, or remembred with anguiſh) how doe all his comforts (like vermine, from an houſe on fire) run away from him, and leave him over to his ruine! whiles the Soule, that hath placed his refuge above, is ſure that the ground of his comfort cannot be matched with an earthly ſorrow, cannot be made variable by the change of any event; but is infinitely above all caſualties, and without all uncertainties. What ſtate is there, wherein this heavenly ſtay ſhall not affoord me, not only Peace, but Ioy? Am I in priſon? or in the hell of priſons (in ſome darke, low, and deſolate dungeon?) Loe there Algerius (that ſweet Martyr) finds more light than above; and pities the darkneſſe of our liberty. We have but a Sunne to enlighten our world, which every cloud dimmeth, and hideth from our eyes: but the Father of lights (in reſpect of whom, all the bright ſtars of heaven are but as the ſnuffe of a dimme candle) ſhines into his pit, and the preſence of his glorious Angels make that an heaven to him, which the world purpoſed as an hell of diſcomfort. What walls can keepe out that infinite Spirit, that fills all things? What darkneſſe can be where the God of this Sun dwelleth? What ſorrow where he comforteth? Am I wandring in baniſhment? Can I goe whither God is not? what Sea can divide betwixt him and me? then would I feare exile, if I could be driven away as well from God, as my country. Now he is as much in all earths: His title is alike to all places; and mine in him: His Sun ſhines to me; his ſea or earth beares me up; his preſence cheereth me, whitherſoever I goe. He cannot be ſaid to flit, that never changeth his Hoſt. He alone is a thouſand companions; he alone is a world of friends. That man never knew what it was to be familiar with God, that complains of the want of home, of friends, of companions, while God is with him. Am I contemned of the world? It is enough for me, that I am honoured of God: of both, I cannot. The world would love me more, if I were leſſe friends with God. It cannot hate me ſo much as God hates it. What care I to be hated of them whom God hateth? He is unworthy of Gods favour, that cannot think it happineſſe enough without the worlds. How eaſie is it for ſuch a man, whiles the world diſgraces him, at once to ſcorne and pitie it, that it cannot think nothing more contemptible than it ſelfe? I am impoverſhed with loſſes: That was never throughly good, that may be loſt. My riches will not leeſe me, yea, though I forgoe all, to my skin, yet have I not loſt any part of my wealth. For, if he be rich that hath ſomething; how rich is he, that hath the Maker and owner of all things? I am weake and diſeaſed in body: He cannot miſcarry, that hath his Maker for his Phyſitian. Yet my ſoule (the better part) is found; for that cannot be weake, whoſe ſtrength God is. How many are ſick in that, and complaine not? I can be content to be let bloud in the arme or foot, for the curing of the head or heart. The health of the principall part is more joy to me, than it is trouble to be diſtempered in the inferiour. Let me know that God favours me: then I have libertie in priſon, home in baniſhment, honour in contempt, in loſſes wealth, health in infirmitie, life in death; and in all theſe happineſſe. And (ſurely) if our perfect fruition of God be our compleat heaven; it muſt needs be, that our inchoate converſing with him is our heaven imperfectly, and the entrance into the other: which (me thinks) differs from this, not in the kind of it, but in the degree. For the continuation of which happy ſociety (ſith ſtrangeneſſe loſeth acquaintance & breedeth neglect) on our part muſt be a daily renuing of heavenly familiaritie, by ſeeking him up, even with the contempt of all inferiour diſtraction; by talking talking with him in our ſecret invocations; by hearing his conference with us; and by mutuall entertainment of each other in the ſweet diſcourſes of our daily meditations. He is a ſullen and unſociable friend, that wants words. God ſhall take no pleaſure in us if we be ſilent. The heart that is full of love, cannot but have a buſie tongue. All our talke with God is either Suits or Thankes. In them the Chriſtian heart powres out it ſelfe to his Maker; and would not change this privilege for a world. All his annoiances, all his wants, all his diſlikes are powred into the boſome of his inviſible friend; who likes us ſtill ſo much more as we aske more, as we complaine more. Oh the eaſie and happy recourſe that the poore ſoule hath to the high throne of Heaven! we ſtay not for the holding out of a golden ſcepter, to warne our admiſſion, before which our preſence ſhould be preſumption and death. No houre is unſeaſonable, no perſon too baſe, no words too homely, no fact too hard, no imoprtunitie too great. We ſpeak familiarly, we are heard, anſwered, comforted. Another while God interchangeably ſpeakes unto us by the ſecret voice of his ſpirit; or by the audible ſound of his word; we heare, adore, anſwer him; by both which the minde ſo communicates it ſelfe to God, and hath God ſo plentifully communicated unto it, that hereby it growes to ſuch an habit of heavenlineſſe, as that now it wants nothing, but diſſolution, of full glory.

Sect. XXIII.

OUt of this maine ground once ſetled in the heart (like as ſo many rivers from one common ſea) flow thoſe ſubordinate reſolutions, which we require as neceſſary to our peace, whether in reſpect of our actions, or our eſtate. For our actions, there muſt be a ſecret vow paſſed in the ſoule, both of conſtant refraining from whatſoever may offend that Majeſtie we reſt upon; and above this, of true and canonicall obedience to God, without all care of difficulty, and in ſpight of all contradictions of nature. Not out of the confidence of our owne power; impotent men, who are we, that we ſhould either vow or performe? But as he ſaid; Give what thou bidſt, and bid what thou wilt. Hence the courage of Moſes durſt venture his hand to take up the crawling and hiſſing Serpent. Hence Peter durſt walke upon the pavement of the waves. Hence that heroicall ſpirit of Luther (a man made of metall fit for ſo great a work) durſt reſolve and profeſſe to enter into that fore-warned Citie, though there had been as many Devils in their ſtreets as tiles on their houſes. Both theſe vowes as wee once ſolemnly made by others; ſo, for our peace wee muſt renew in our ſelves. Thus the experienced minde both knowing that it hath met with a good friend, and withall what the price of a friend is, cannot but be carefull to retaine him, and warie of diſpleaſing, and therefore to cut off all dangers of variance, voluntarily takes a double oath of allegeance of it ſelfe to God; which neither benefit ſhall induce us to break, if we might gaine a world, nor feare urge us thereto, though wee muſt loſe our ſelves. The wavering heart that finds continuall combats in it ſelfe betwixt Pleaſure and Conſcience, ſo equally matched that neither gets the day, is not yet capable of peace; and whether ever overcommeth, is troubled both with reſiſtance and victory. Barren Rebecca found more eaſe, than when her twins ſtruggled in her wombe. If Iacob had been there alone, ſhe had not complained of that painfull contention: One while Pleaſure holds the Fort, and Conſcience aſſaults it; which when it hath entred at laſt by ſtrong hand, after many batteries of judgements denounced; ere long Pleaſure either corrupts the watch, or by ſome cunning ſtratagem, findes way to recover her firſt hold. So, one part is ever attempting, and ever reſiſting. Betwixt both, the heart cannot have peace, becauſe it reſolves not. For while the ſoule is held in ſuſpence, it cannot enjoy the pleaſure it uſeth; becauſe it is halfe taken up with feare; only a ſtrong and reſolute repulſe of pleaſure is truly pleaſant: for therein the Conſcience (filling us with heavenly delight) maketh ſweet triumphs in it ſelfe; as being now the Lord of his owne dominions, & knowing what to truſt to. No man knowes the pleaſure of this thought, I have done well, but he that hath felt it: and hee that hath felt it, contemnes all pleaſure to it. It is a falſe ſlander raiſed on Chriſtianitie, that it maketh men dumpiſh and melancholicke: for therefore are we heavie, becauſe we are not not enough Christians. We have religion enough to mislike pleasures, not enough to overcome them. But if we be once conquerours over our selves, and have devoted our selves wholly to God, there can be nothing but heavenly mirth in the soule. Loe here, ye Philosophers, the true musicke of Heaven, which the good heart continually heareth, and answers it in the just measures of joy. Others may talke of mirth, as a thing they have heard of, or vainly fancied; onely the Christian feeles it; and in comparison thereof scorneth the idle, ribaldish, and scurrilous mirth of the prophane.

The ſubordinate rules of Tranquillitie. 1. For actions.

Sect. XXIV.

2. Rule for our actions.

And this resolution which we call for, must not only exclude manifestly evill actions, but also doubting and suspension of mind in actions suspected, and questionable; wherein the judgement must ever give confident determination one way. For this Tranquillitie consisteth in a steadinesse of the mind: and how can that vessell which is beaten upon, by contrary waves and winds (and tottereth to either part) be said to keepe a steady course? Resolution is the only mother of securitie. For instance: I see, that Usury which was wont to be condemned for no better than a Legall theft, hath now obtained (with many) the reputation of an honest Trade; and is both used by many, and by some defended. It is pittie that a bad practice should find any learned or religious Patron. The summe of my patrimony lieth dead by me, sealed up in the bag of my Father: my thriftier friends advise me to this easie and sure improvement. Their councell and my gaine prevaile; my yeerely summes come in with no cost but of time, wax, parchment: my estate likes it well; better than my conscience; which tells me still, he doubts, my trade is too easie to be honest: Yet I continue my illiberall course not without some scruple and contradiction: so as my feare of offence hinders the joy of my profit, and the pleasure of my gaine heartens me against the feare of injustice; I would be rich with ease; and yet I would not be uncharitable, I would not be unjust. All the while I live in unquiet doubts, and distraction: Others are not so much entangled in my bonds, as I in my owne. At last, that I may be both just and quiet, I conclude to referre this case wholly to the sentence of my inward Judge, the Conscience: the Advocates Gaine and justice plead on either part at this barre with doubtfull successe. Gaine informes the Judge of a new and nice distinction, of toothlesse, and biting Interest, and brings presidents of particular cases of Usury so farre from any breach of charity or justice, that both parts therein confesse themselves advantaged. Justice pleads even the most toothlesse usury to have sharp gummes, and finds in the most harmelesse and profitable practice of it, an insensible wrong to the common body; besides the infinite wracks of private estates. The weake Judge suspends in such probable allegations, and demurreth; as being overcome of both, and of neither part: and leaves me yet no whit more quiet, no whit lesse uncertaine. I suspend my practice accordingly; being sure it is good not to doe, what I am not sure is good to be done: and now Gaine sollicits me as much as Justice did before. Betwixt both I live troublesomely: nor ever shall doe other, till (in a resolute detestation) I have whipped this evill Merchant out of the Temple of my heart. This rigour is my peace. Before, I could not be well, either full or fasting. uncertaintie is much paine, even in a more tolerable action. Neither is it (I think) easie to determine, whether it bee worse to doe a lawfull act with doubting, or an evill with resolution: since that which in it selfe is good, is made evill to me by my doubt: and what is in nature evill, is in this one point not evill to me, that I doe it upon a verdict of a Conscience: so now my judgement offends in not following the truth: I offend not in that I follow my judgement: Wherein if the most wise God had left us to rove only according to the aime of our owne conjectures, it should have been lesse faulty to be Scepticks in our actions, and either not to judge at all, or to judge amisse: but now that he hath given us a perfect rule of eternall equitie, and truth, whereby to direct the sentences of our judgement; that uncertainty which alloweth no peace to us, will afford us no excuse

A cuſe before the tribunall of Heaven: wherefore, then only is the heart quiet, when our actions are grounded upon judgement, and our judgement upon truth.

Sect. XXV.

FOr his eſtate, the quiet mind muſt firſt roll it ſelfe upon the providence of the Higheſt. For whoſoever ſo caſts himſelfe upon theſe outward things, that in their proſperous eſtate he rejoyceth, and (contrarily) is caſt downe in their miſcarriage; I know not whether he ſhall find more uncertainty of reſt, or more certainty of unquietneſſe; ſince he muſt needs be like a light unballaced Veſſell, that riſes and falls with every wave, and depends onely on the mercy of wind and water: But who relies on the inevitable decree, and all-ſeeing providence of God, (which can neither be croſſed with ſecond thoughts, nor with events unlooked for,) layes a ſure ground of Tranquillity. Let the world toſſe how it liſt, and vary it ſelfe (as it ever doth) in ſtormes and calmes; his reſt is pitched aloft, above the ſphere of changeable mortality. To begin, is harder than to proſecute: What counſell had God in the firſt moulding of thee in the womb of thy mother? what aid ſhall hee have in repairing thee from the womb of the earth? And if he could make, and ſhall reſtore thee without thee, why ſhall hee not much more (without thy endevour) diſpoſe of thee? Is God wiſe enough to guide the Heavens, and to produce all creatures in their kinds and ſeaſons? And ſhall he not be able to order thee alone? Thou ſayeſt, I have friends, and (which is my beſt friend) I have wealth to make both them and mee; and wit to put both to beſt uſe. O the broken reeds of humane confidence! Who ever truſted on friends, that could truſt to himſelfe? Who ever was ſo wiſe, as not ſometimes to bee a foole in his owne conceit? oft-times in the conceit of others? Who was ever more diſcontent, than the wealthy? Friends may be falſe: Wealth cannot but be deceitfull: Wit hath made many fooles. Truſt thou to that, which (if thou wouldeſt) cannot faile thee. Not that thou deſireſt ſhall come to paſſe; but that which God hath decreed. Neither thy feares, nor thy hopes, nor vowes ſhall either foreſlow or alter it. The unexperienced paſſenger, when hee ſees the veſſell goe amiſſe or too farre, layes faſt hold on the contrary part, or on the Maſt for remedy: the Pilot laughes at his folly; knowing, that (what-ever he labours) the Barke will goe which way the wind and his ſterne directeth it. Thy goods are embarked: Now thou wiſheſt a direct North-wind to drive thee to the Straits; and then a Weſt, to run in: and now, when thou haſt emptied and laded againe, thou calleſt as earneſtly for the South, and South-eaſt, to returne; and lowreſt, if all theſe anſwer thee not: As if Heaven and Earth had nothing elſe to doe, but to wait upon thy pleaſure; and ſerved only, to bee commanded ſervice by thee. Another that hath contrary occaſion, askes for winds quite oppoſite to thine. Hee that ſits in Heaven, neither fits thy fancy nor his: but bids his winds ſpet ſometimes in thy face; ſometimes to favour thee with a ſide blaſt; ſometimes, to be boyſtrous; otherwhiles, to be ſilent, at his owne pleaſure. Whether the Mariner ſing or curſe, it ſhall goe, whither it is ſent. Strive, or lye ſtill, thy deſtiny ſhall run on; and what muſt be, ſhall be: Not that we ſhould hence exclude benefit of meanes, (which are alwaies neceſſarily included in this wiſe preordination of all things) but perplexity of cares, and wreſtling with providence. Oh, the idle and ill-ſpent cares of curious men, that conſult with ſtars, and ſpirits for their deſtinies, under colour of prevention! If it be not thy deſtiny; why wouldſt thou know it, what needſt thou reſiſt it? If it be thy deſtiny; why wouldſt thou know that thou canſt not prevent? That which God hath decreed, is already done in Heaven, and muſt be done on Earth. This kind of expectation doth but haſten ſlow evils, and prolong them in their continuance: haſten them, not in their event, but in our conceit. Shortly then, if thou ſwimmeſt againſt the ſtreame of this providence, thou canſt not eſcape drowning; every wave turnes thee over, like a Porkviſce before a tempeſt: But if thou ſwimmeſt with the ſtreame, doe but caſt thine armes abroad, thou paſſeſt with ſafety, and with eaſe: it both beares thee up, and carries thee on to the Haven (whither God hath determined thine arrivall) in peace.

Rules for eſtate:
1. Reliance upon the providence of God.

Sect. XXVI.

The second rule for estate. A perswasion of the goodnesse and fitnesse of it for us.

NExt to this, the mind of the unquiet man must bee so wrought by these former resolutions, that it be throughly perswaded, The estate wherein he is, is best of all; if not in it selfe, yet to him: Not out of pride, but out of contentment: Which whosoever wanteth, cannot but be continually vexed with envy, and racked with ambition. Yea, if it were possible to be in Heaven without this, he could not be happy, for it is as impossible, for the mind at once to long after and enjoy, as for a man to feed and sleep at once. And this is the more to bee striven for, because we are all naturally prone to afflict our selves with our owne frowardnesse: ingratefully contemning all we have, for what we would have. Even the best of the Patriarkes could say, O Lord, what wilt thou give mee, since I goe childlesse? The bond-man desires now, nothing but liberty: that alone would make him happy. Once free (forgetting his former thought) he wishes some wealth, to make use of his freedome; and saies, it were as good be straited in place, as in ability. Once rich, he longeth after Nobility, thinking it no praise, to be a wealthy peasant. Once noble, he begins to deeme it a base matter to be subject: nothing can now content him but a Crowne. Then it is a small matter to rule, so long as he hath but little Dominions, and greater neighbours. He would therefore be an Universall Monarch: whither then? surely it vexeth him as much, that the earth is so small a globe, so little a molehill; and that there are no more worlds to conquer. And now that he hath attained the highest dignity amongst men, he would needs be a God, conceits his immortality, erects Temples to his owne name, commands his dead Statues to be adored, and (not thus contented) is angry that he cannot command heaven, and controll nature. O vaine fooles! whither doth our restlesse ambition climb? What shall be at length the period of our wishes? I could not blame these desires, if contentment consisted in having much: but, now that he onely hath much, that hath contentment, (and that it is as easily obtained in a low estate,) I can account of these thoughts no better than proudly foolish. Thou art poore: what difference is there betwixt a greater man and thee? save that he doth his businesses by others; thou doest them thy selfe. He hath Caters, Cookes, Baylives, Stewards, Secretaries, and all other officers for his severall services: thou providest, dressest, gathereſt, receivest, expendest, writest for thy selfe. His patrimony is large, thine earnings small. If Briareus feed fifty bellies with his hundred hands; what is he the better, than he that with two hands feedeth one? He is served in silver: thou in vessell of the same colour, of lesser price; as good for use, though not for value. His dishes are more dainty, thine as well relished to thee, and no lesse wholsome. Hee eats Olives, thou Garlike: he misslikes not more the smell of thy sawce, than thou doest the taste of his. Thou wantest somewhat that he hath: he wisheth something which thou hast, and regardest not. Thou couldst be content to have the rich mans purse, but his gout thou wouldst not have: he would have thy health, but not thy fare. If wee might picke out of all mens estate, that which is laudable, omitting the inconveniences, we would make our selves complete: but if wee must take all together, wee should perhaps little advantage our selves with the change. For the most wise God hath so proportion'd out every mans condition, that hee hath some just cause of sorrow inseparably mixed with other contentments, and hath allotted to no man living, an absolute happinesse, without some grievances; nor to any man such an exquisite misery, as that he findeth not somewhat wherein to solace himselfe: the weight whereof varies, according to our estimation of them. One hath much wealth, but no child to inherit it: he envies at the poore mans fruitfulnesse, which hath many heires, and no lands; and could bee content, with all his abundance to purchase a successor of his owne loynes. Another hath many children, little maintenance: hee commendeth the careleſse quietnesse of the barren; and thinks, fewer mouthes and more meat would do better. The labouring man hath the blessing of a strong body, fit to digest any fare, to endure any labour: yet he wisheth himselfe weaker, on condition hee might bee wealthier. The man of nice education hath a feeble

A feeble ſtomacke; and (raſping ſince his laſt meale) doubts, whether he ſhould eat of his beſt diſh, or nothing: this man repines at nothing more, than to ſee his hungry Plough-men feed on a cruſt; and wiſheth to change eſtates, on condition he might change bodies with him. Say that God ſhould give thee thy wiſh: what wouldeſt thou deſire? Let me (thou ſaieſt) be wiſe, healthfull, rich, honourable, ſtrong, learned, beautifull, immortall. I know thou loveſt thy ſelfe ſo well, that thou canſt wiſh all theſe and more. But ſay that God hath ſo ſhared out theſe gifts (by a moſt wiſe and juſt diſtribution) that thou canſt have but ſome of theſe, perhaps but one; which wouldeſt thou ſingle out for thy ſelfe? Any thing, beſide what thou haſt: If learned, thou wouldeſt be ſtrong; if ſtrong, honourable; if honourable, long lived: Some of theſe thou art already. Thou foole! cannot God chuſe better for thee, than thou for thy ſelfe? In other matches thou truſteſt the choice of a skilfuller chapman: when
B thou ſeeſt a goodly horſe in the Faire (though his ſhape pleaſe thine eye well) yet thou dareſt not buy him, if a cunning Horſe-maſter ſhall tell thee he is faulty; and art willing to take a plainer and ſounder, on his commendation, againſt thy fancy. How much more ſhould we in this caſe, allow his choyce that cannot deceive us; that cannot be deceived? But, thou knoweſt that other thou deſireſt, to be better than what thou haſt: Better perhaps for him that hath it; not better for thee. Liberty is ſweet and profitable to thoſe that can uſe it: but fetters are better for the franticke man. Wine is good nouriſhment for the healthfull; poyſon to the aguiſh. It is good for a ſound body to ſleep in a whole skinne; but hee that complaines of ſwelling ſores, cannot ſleep till it be broken. Hemlocke to the Goat, and Spiders to the Monkey, turne to good ſuſtenance; which to other creatures are accounted deadly. As in diets,
C ſo in eſtimation of good and evill, of greater and leſſer good, there is much variety. All palats commend not one diſh; and what one commends for moſt delicate, another rejects for unſavoury. And if thou know what diſh is moſt pleaſant to thee, thy Phyſitian knowes beſt which is wholſome. Thou wouldeſt follow thine appetite too much; and (as the French have in their Proverbe) wouldſt dig thy owne grave with thy teeth: thy wiſe Phyſitian over-ſees and over-rules thee. He ſees, if thou wert more eſteemed, thou wouldſt be proud; if more ſtrong, licentious; if richer, covetous; if healthfuller, more ſecure: but thou thinkeſt not thus hardly of thy ſelfe. Fond
D man! what knoweſt thou future things? beleeve thou him, that only knowes what would be, what will be. Thou wouldeſt willingly goe to heaven; what better guide canſt thou have, than him that dwels there? If he lead thee thorow deepe ſloughs, and brakie thickets; know, that he knowes this the nearer way, though more comberſome. Can there be in him any want of wiſdome, not to foreſee the beſt? Can there be any want of power, not to effect the beſt? any want of love, not to give thee what he knowes is beſt? How canſt thou then faile of the beſt? Since what his power can doe, and what his Wiſdome ſees ſhould be done, his Love hath done, becauſe all are infinite. He willeth not things, becauſe they are good, but they are good, becauſe he wills them. Yea, if ought had beene better, this had not beene. God willeth what he doth: and if thy will accord not with his, whether wilt thou condemne of imperfection?

Sect. XXVII.

The concluſion of the whole.

E I Have chalked out the way of Peace: What remaineth, but that we walke alone in it? I have conducted my Reader to the Mine, yea, to the Mint of happineſſe; and ſhewed him thoſe glorious heaps, which may eternally enrich him: If (now) he ſhall goe away with his hands and skirt empty; how is he but worthy of a miſerable want? Who ſhall pity us, whiſe we have no mercy on our ſelves? Wilfull diſtreſſe hath neither remedy, nor compaſſion. And to ſpeak freely, I have oft wondered at this painfull folly of us men, who in the open view of our peace (as if we were condemned to a neceſſary and fatall unquietneſſe) live upon our owne rack, finding no more joy, than if we were under no other hands, but our executioners. One droupeth under a fained evill; another augments a ſmall ſorrow through impatience; another drawes upon himſelfe an uncertaine evill through feare; one ſeeks true content- A ment, but not enough; another hath juſt cauſe of joy, and perceives it not: One is vexed, for that his grounds of joy are matched with equall grievances; another cannot complaine of any preſent occaſion of ſorrow, yet lives ſullenly, becauſe he finds not any preſent cauſe of comfort; one is haunted with his ſinne; another diſtracted with his paſſion: amongſt all which, he is a miracle of all men that lives, not ſome way diſcontented. So we live not while we doe live, onely for that wee want either wiſdome, or will, to husband our lives to our owne beſt advantage. O the inequality of our cares! Let riches or honour be in queſtion, we ſue to them, we ſeeke for them with importunity, with ſervile ambition: our paines need no ſollicitor; yea, there is no way wrong that leads to this end; wee abhorre the patience to ſtay till they enquire for us. And if ever (as it rarely happens) our deſert and worthineſſe wins us the favour of this proffer, we meet it with both hands, not daring with our modeſt de- B nials to whet the inſtancie, and double the intreaties of ſo welcome ſuiters. Yet loe, here the only true and precious riches, the higheſt advancement of the ſoule, peace and happines, ſeeks for us, ſues to us for acceptation; our anſwers are coy and overly, ſuch as we give to thoſe clients that looke to gaine by our favours. If our want were through the ſcarcity of good, we might yet hope for pity to eaſe us: but now that it is through negligence, and that we periſh with our hands in our boſome, wee are rather worthy of ſtripes, for the wrong wee doe our ſelves, than of pity for what wee ſuffer. That wee may and will not, in opportunity of hurting others, is noble and Chriſtian: but in our owne benefit ſluggiſh, and ſavouring of the worſt kind of unthriftineſſe.

Saieſt thou then, this peace is good to have, but hard to get? It were a ſhamefull neglect that hath no pretence. Is difficulty ſufficient excuſe to hinder thee from the C purſuit of riches, of preferment, of learning, of bodily pleaſures? Art thou content to ſit ſhrugging in a baſe cottage, ragged, famiſhed, becauſe houſe, clothes, and food will neither bee had without money, nor money without labour, nor labour without trouble and painfulneſſe? Who is ſo mercifull, as not to ſay that a whip is the beſt almes for ſo lazy and wilfull need? Peace ſhould not be good if it were not hard: Goe, and by this excuſe ſhut thy ſelfe out of heaven at thy death, and live miſerably till thy death, becauſe the good of both worlds is hard to compaſſe. There is nothing but miſery on earth and hell below, that thou canſt come to without labour: And if we can be content to caſt away ſuch immoderate and unſeaſonable paines upon theſe earthly trifles, as to weare our bodies with violence, and to encroach upon the night for time to get them; what madneſſe ſhall it ſeeme in us, not to afford a leſſe labour to that which is infinitely better, and which only gives worth and goodneſſe to the other? D Wherefore if we have not vowed enmity with our ſelves, if wee be not in love with miſery and vexation, if we be not obſtinately careleſſe of our owne good; let us ſhake off this unthrifty, dangerous, and deſperate negligence, and quicken theſe dull hearts, to a lively and effectuall ſearch of what only can yeeld them ſweet and abiding contentment: which once attained, how ſhall wee inſult over evils, and bid them doe their worſt? How ſhall we under this calme and quiet day, laugh at the rough weather and unſteady motions of the world? How ſhall heaven and earth ſmile upon us, and we on them; commanding the one, aſpiring to the other? How pleaſant ſhall our life bee, while neither joyes nor ſorrowes can diſtemper it with exceſſe? yea while the matter of joy that is within us, turnes all the moſt ſad occurrences into pleaſure? How deare and welcome ſhall our death be, that ſhall but lead us from one heaven to ano- E ther, from peace to glory? Goe now, yee vaine and idle worldlings, and pleaſe your ſelves in the large extent of your rich Mannors, or in the homage of thoſe whom baſeneſſe of mind hath made ſlaves to your greatneſſe, or in the price and faſhions of your full ward-robe, or in the wanton varieties of your delicate Gardens, or in your coffers full of red and white earth; or if there be any other earthly thing, more alluring, more precious, enjoy it, poſſeſſe it, and let it poſſeſſe you: Let me have only my Peace; and let me never want it, till I envy you.

¶ Imprinted at LONDON, 1633.

TO THE RIGHT WORSHIPFVLL, SIR Richard Lea, Knight,

ALL INCREASE OF TRVE Honour with God and men.

SIR, ever since I began to bestow my selfe upon the common good, studying wherein my labours might bee most serviceable; I still found they could be no way so well improved, as in that part which concerneth devotion, and the practice of true pietie. For on the one side I perceived the number of Polemicall bookes, rather to breed than end strifes; and those which are doctrinall by reason of their multitude, rather to oppresse than satisfie the Reader; wherein, if we write the same things, we are judged tedious; if indifferent, singular. On the other part, respecting the Reader, I saw the braines of men never more stuffed, their tongues never more stirring, their hearts never more empty, nor their hands more idle. Wherefore after those sudden meditations which passed me without rule, I was easily induced by their successe (as a small thing moves the willing) to send forth this rule of Meditation; and after my Heaven upon Earth, to discourse (although by way of example) of Heaven above. In this Art of mine, I confesse to have received more light from one obscure nameless Monke, which wrote some hundred and twelve yeeres agoe, than from the directions of all other Writers. I would his humility had not made him niggardly of his name, that wee might haue knowne whom to haue thanked. It had beene easie to haue framed it with more curiositie: but God and my soule know, that I made profit the scope of my labour, and not applause; and therefore (to chuse) I wished rather to be rude than unprofitable. If now the simplicity of any Reader shall bereave him of the benefit of my precepts, I know he may make his use of my examples. Why I haue honoured it with your name, I need not give account to the world, which already knoweth your worth and deserts; and shall see by this, that I acknowledge them. Goe you on happily (according to the heavenly advice of your Iunius) in your worthy and glorious profession, still bearing your selfe as one that knoweth vertue the truest Nobilitie, and Religion the best vertue. The God whom you serve, shall honour you with men, and crowne you in heaven. To his grace I humbly commend you: requesting you onely to accept the worke, and continue your favour to the Author.

not

Your Worships humbly devoted,

Ios. Hall.

THE

THE ART OF DIVINE MEDITATION.

CHAP. I.

IT is not, I ſuppoſe, a more bold than profitable labour, after the endevours of ſo many contemplative men, to teach the Art of Meditation: An heavenly buſineſſe, as any belongeth either to man or Chriſtian; and ſuch as whereby the ſoule doth unſpeakably benefit it ſelfe. For by this doe we ranſack our deep and falſe hearts, find out our ſecret enemies, buckle with them, expell them, arme our ſelves againſt their re-entrance. By this, we make uſe of all good meanes, fit our ſelves to all good duties; by this wee diſcry our weakneſſe, obtaine redreſſe, prevent tentations, cheere up our ſolitarineſſe, temper our occaſions of delight, get more light unto our knowledge, more heat to our affections, more life to our devotion. By this we grow to be (as we are) ſtrangers upon earth; and, out of a right eſtimation of all earthly things, into a ſweet fruition of inviſible comforts. By this, we ſee our Saviour with Steven, we talk with God as Moſes, and by this we are raviſhed with bleſſed Paul into Paradiſe, and ſee that Heaven which we are loth to leave, which we cannot utter. This alone is the remedy of ſecurity and worldlineſſe, the paſtime of Saints, the ladder of heaven, and in ſhort, the beſt improvement of Chriſtianity. Learne it who can, and neglect it who liſt; he ſhall never find joy, neither in God nor in himſelfe, which doth not both know and practiſe it. And how-ever of old ſome hidden Cloyſters have ingroſſed it to themſelves, and confined it within their Cells, who indeed profeſſing nothing but contemplation, through their immunity from thoſe cares which accompany an active life, might have the beſt leiſure to this buſineſſe: yet ſeeing there is no man ſo taken up with action, as not ſometimes to have a free mind; and there is no reaſonable mind ſo ſimple, as not to be able both to diſcourſe ſomewhat and to better it ſelfe by her ſecret thoughts; I deeme it an envious wrong to conceale that from any, whoſe benefit may be univerſall. Thoſe that have but a little ſtock, had need to know the beſt rules of thrift.

The benefit and uſes of Meditation.

Which are uniuerſall to all Chriſtians. and not to be appropriated to ſome profeſſions.

CHAP. II.

THe rather, for that whereas our Divine Meditation is nothing elſe but a bending of the mind upon ſome ſpirituall object, through divers formes of diſcourſe, untill our thoughts come to an iſſue: and this muſt needs bee either ther Extemporall, and occaſioned by outward occurrences offered to the mind; or deliberate, and wrought out of our owne heart: which againe is either in matter of Knowledge, for the finding out of ſome hidden truth, and convincing of an hereſie by profound traverſing of reaſon: or in matter of Affection, for the enkindling of our love to God: the former of theſe two laſt, wee ſending to the Schooles and Maſters of Controverſies, ſearch after the latter; which is both of larger uſe, and ſuch as no Chriſtian can reject, as either unneceſſary, or over-difficult: for, both every Chriſtian had need of fire put to his affections, and weaker judgements are no leſſe capable of this divine heat, which proceeds not ſo much from reaſon, as from faith. A

The deſcription and kinds of Meditation.

One ſaith (and I beleeve him) that Gods Schoole is more of Affection, than Underſtanding: Both leſſons very needfull, very profitable; but for this age, eſpecially the latter: for if there be ſome that have much zeale, little knowledge, there are more that have much knowledge without zeale. And he that hath much skill, and no affection, may doe good to others by information of judgement, but ſhall never have thanke either of his owne heart, or of God, who uſeth not to caſt away his love on thoſe, of whom he is but knowne, not loved. B

Chap. III.

Concerning Meditation Extemporall.

OF Extemporall Meditation there may bee much uſe, no rule: foraſmuch as our conceits herein vary according to the infinite multitude of objects, and their divers manner of profering themſelves to the mind; as alſo for the ſuddenneſſe of this act. Man is placed in this Stage of the world, to view the ſeverall natures and actions of the creature; to view them, not idly, without his uſe, as they doe him: God made all theſe for man, and man for his owne ſake. Both theſe purpoſes were loſt, if man ſhould let the creatures paſſe careleſly by him, onely ſeene, not thought upon. He only can make benefit of what he ſees; which if he doe not, it is all one, as if he were blind or bruit. Whence it is, that wiſe Salomon putteth the ſluggard to ſchoole unto the Ant; and our Saviour ſendeth the diſtruſtfull to the Lilly of the field. C

In this kind was that Meditation of the divine Pſalmiſt, which upon the view of the glorious frame of the Heavens, was led to wonder at the mercifull reſpect God hath to ſo poore a creature as man. Thus our Saviour tooke occaſion of the water fetcht up ſolemnly to the Altar, from the Well of Shilo, on the day of the great Hoſanna, to meditate and diſcourſe of the Water of life. Thus holy and ſweet Auguſtine, from occaſion of the water-courſe neere to his lodging, running among the pebbles, ſometimes more ſilently, ſometimes in a baſer murmure, and ſometimes in a ſhriller note, entred into the thought and diſcourſe of that excellent order which God hath ſetled in all theſe inferiour things. Thus that learned and heavenly ſoule of our late Eſtye, when we ſate together and heard a ſweet conſort of Muſicke, ſeemed upon this occaſion carried up for the time before-hand to the place of his reſt, ſaying, not without ſome paſſion, What Muſicke may we think there is in heaven? Thus laſtly (for who knowes not that examples of this kind are infinite?) that faithfull and reverend Deering, when the Sun ſhined on his face now lying on his death-bed, fell into a ſweet Meditation of the glory of God, and his approaching joy. The thoughts of this nature are not only lawfull, but ſo behovefull, that wee cannot omit them, without neglect of God, his creatures, our ſelves. The creatures are halfe loſt, if we onely employ them, not learne ſomething of them. God is wronged, if his creatures be unregarded; our ſelves moſt of all, if we reade this great volume of the creatures, and take out no leſſon for our inſtruction. D E

Chap. IV.

Cautions of Extemporall Meditation.

WHerein yet caution is to bee had, that our Meditations bee not either too farre fetcht, or ſavouring of ſuperſtition. Farre fetcht I call thoſe which have not a faire and eaſie reſemblance unto the matter from whence whence they are raiſed; in which caſe our thoughts prove looſe and heartleſſe, making no memorable impreſſion in the mind. Superſtitious, when we make choiſe of thoſe grounds of Meditation, which are forbidden us as Teachers of Vanitie; or imploy our owne devices (though well grounded) to an uſe above their reach; making them, upon our owne pleaſures, not onely furtherances, but parts of Gods worſhip; in both which, our Meditations degenerate, and grow rather perillous to the ſoule. Whereto adde, that the mind be not too much cloyed with too frequent iteration of the ſame thought; which at laſt breeds a wearineſſe in our ſelues, and an unpleaſantneſſe of that conceit, which at the firſt entertainment, promiſed much delight. Our nature is too ready to abuſe familiarity in any kind: and it is with Meditations, as with Medicines; which with over-ordinary uſe, loſe their ſoveraignty; and fill, inſtead of purging. God hath not ſtraited us for matter, having given us the ſcope of the whole world; ſo that there is no creature, event, action, ſpeech, which may not afford us new matter of Meditation. And that which we are wont to ſay of fine wits, we may as truly affirme of the Chriſtian heart, that it can make uſe of any thing. Wherefore as travellers in a foraine country make every ſight a leſſon; ſo ought we in this our pilgrimage. Thou ſeeſt the heaven rolling above thine head, in a conſtant and unmoveable motion; the ſtarres ſo overlooking one another, that the greateſt ſhew little, the leaſt greateſt, all glorious: the aire full of the bottles of raine, or fleeces of ſnow, or divers formes of fiery Exhalations: the Sea under one vniforme face, full of ſtrange and monſtrous ſhapes beneath: the earth ſo adorned with variety of plants, that thou canſt not but tread on many at once with every foot; beſides the ſtore of creatures, that flie about it, walke vpon it, live in it. Thou idle Truant, doeſt thou learne nothing of ſo many maſters? Haſt thou ſo long read theſe capitall letters of Gods great Booke, and canſt thou not yet ſpell one word of them? The brute creatures ſee the ſame things, with as cleere, perhaps better eies. If thine inward eyes ſee not their uſe, as well as thy bodily eies their ſhape, I know not whether is more reaſonable or leſſe brutiſh.

Chap. V

Of Meditation deliberate.

Wherein firſt, the qualities of the perſon.

Of whom is required: Firſt, that he bee pure from his ſins.

Deliberate Meditation is that we chiefly inquire for; which both may be well guided, and ſhall be not a little furthered by precepts; part whereof the labours of others ſhall yeeld us, and part the plaineſt miſtreſſe, Experience: wherein order requires of us firſt, the qualities of the perſon fit for meditation; then the circumſtances, manner, and proceedings of the work.

The hill of Meditation may not be climbed with a profane foot; but as in the delivery of the Law, ſo here, no beaſt may touch Gods hill, leſt he die; only the pure of heart, have promiſe to ſee God. Sin dimmeth and dazeleth the eye, that it cannot behold ſpirituall things. The Guard of heavenly Souldiers was about Eliſhaes ſervant before; he ſaw them not before, through the ſcales of his infidelity. The ſoule muſt therefore be purged, ere it can profitably meditate. And as of old they were wont to ſearch for, and thruſt out malefactors from the preſence, ere they went to ſacrifice; ſo muſt we our ſins, ere we offer our thoughts to God. Firſt, ſaith David, I will waſh my hands in innocency, then I will compaſſe thine Altar. Whereupon not unfitly did that worthy Chancellour of Paris make the firſt ſtaire of his Ladder of Contemplation, Humble Repentance. The cloth that is white (which is wont to be the colour of innocencie) is capable of any Dye; the black, of none other. Not that we require an abſolute perfection, (which, as it is incident unto none, ſo if it were would exclud all need and uſe of Meditation) but rather an honeſt ſincerity of the heart, not willingly ſinning, willingly repenting when we have ſinned: which who ſo finds in himſelfe, let him not think any weakneſſe a lawfull barre to Meditation. He that pleads this excuſe, is like ſome ſimple man, which being halfe ſtarved with cold, refuſeth to come neere the fire, becauſe he findeth not heat enough in himſelfe.

Chap. VI.

Secondly, that hee bee free from worldly thoughts.

NEither may the ſoule that hopeth to profit by meditation, ſuffer it ſelfe for the time intangled with the world; which is all one, as to come to Gods flaming buſh on the hill of viſions, with our ſhooes on our feet. Thou ſeeſt the bird, whoſe feathers are limed, unable to take her former flight: ſo are we, when our thoughts are clinged together by the world, to ſoare up to our heaven in Meditation. The paire of brothers muſt leave their nets if they will follow Chriſt; Eliſha his oxen, if he will attend a Prophet. It muſt be a free and a light mind that can aſcend this Mount of Contemplation, overcomming this height, this ſteepneſſe. Cares are an heavy load, and uneaſie: theſe muſt be laid downe at the bottome of this hill, if we ever looke to attaine the top. Thou art loaded with houſhold cares, perhaps publike; I bid thee not caſt them away: even theſe have their ſeaſon, which thou canſt not omit without impiety: I bid thee lay them downe at thy Cloſet dore, when thou attempteſt this worke. Let them in with thee, thou ſhalt find them troubleſome companions, ever diſtracting thee from thy beſt errand. Thou wouldeſt think of heaven, thy Barne comes in thy way, or perhaps thy count-Booke, or thy Coffers, or it may be, thy mind is before hand travelling upon the morrowes journey. So, while thou thinkeſt of many things, thou thinkeſt of nothing; while thou wouldeſt goe many wayes, thou ſtandeſt ſtill. And as in a crowd, while many preſſe forward at once thorow one doore, none proceedeth; ſo when variety of thoughts tumultuouſly throng in upon the mind, each proveth a barre to the other, and all an hinderance to him that entertaines them.

Chap. VII.

Thirdly, that he be conſtant: and that, Firſt, in time and matter.

AND as our Clyent of Meditation muſt both be pure and free in undertaking this taske, ſo alſo conſtant in continuing it; Conſtant both in time and in matter, both in a ſet courſe and houre reſerved for this worke, and in an unwearied proſecution of it once begun. Thoſe that meditate by ſnatches and uncertaine fits, when onely all other employments forſake them, or when good motions are thruſt upon them by neceſſity, let them never hope to reach to any perfection. For theſe feeble beginnings of luke-warme grace, which are wrought in them by one fit of ſerious Meditation, are ſoone extinguiſhed by intermiſſion, and by miſ-wonting periſh: This daies meale (though large and liberall) ſtrengthens thee not for to morrow: the body languiſheth, if there be not a daily ſupply of repaſt. Thus feed thy ſoule by meditation. Set thine houres and keepe them, and yeeld not to an eaſie diſtraction. There is no hardneſſe in this practice, but in the beginning; uſe ſhall give it not eaſe onely, but delight. Thy companion entertaineth thee this while in loving diſcourſes, or ſome inexpected buſineſſe offers to interrupt thee. Never any good worke ſhall want ſome hinderance: Either breake thorow the lets, except it be with incivilitie or loſſe; or if they be importunate, pay thy ſelfe the time that was unſeaſonably borrowed; and recompence thine omitted houres with the double labors of another day: For thou ſhalt find, that deferring breeds (beſide the loſſe) an indiſpoſition to good; So that what was before pleaſant to thee being omitted, to morrow growes harſh; the next day unneceſſary; afterward odious. To day thou canſt, but wilt not; to morrow thou couldeſt, but liſteſt not; the next day thou neither wilt nor canſt bend thy mind on theſe thoughts. So I have ſeene friends that upon neglect of duty grow overly: upon overlineſſe ſtrang; upon ſtrangneſſe to utter defiance. Thoſe, whoſe very trade is Divinity, (me thinks) ſhould omit no day without his line of Meditation: thoſe which are ſecular men, not many; remembring that they have a common calling of Chriſtianity to attend, as well as a ſpeciall vocation in the world: and that other being more noble and important, may juſtly challeng both often and diligent ſervice.

Chap.

Chap. VIII.

And as this constancy requires thee to keepe day with thy selfe, unles thou wilt prove bankrupt in good exercises; so also that thy mind should dwell vpon the same thought without flitting, without wearinesse, untill it have attained to some issue of spirituall profit: otherwise it attempteth much, effecteth nothing. What availeth it to knock at the doore of the heart, if we depart ere we have an answer? What are we the warmer, if we passe hastily along by the heart, and stay not at it? Those that doe only travell thorow Africke, become not blackmoores: but those which are borne there, those that inhabite there. We account those damosels too light of their love, which betroth themselves upon the first sight, upon the first motion: and those we deeme of much price, which require long and earnest solliciting. He deceiveth himselfe that thinketh grace so easily wonne; there must be much suit and importunitie, ere it will yeeld to our desires: Not that we call for a perpetuity of this labour of Meditation; Humane frailtie could never beare so great a toyle. Nothing under heaven is capable of a continuall motion without complaint. It is enough for the glorified spirits above, to be euer thinking and never weary. The mind of man is of a strang metall; if it be not used, it rusteth; if used hardly it breaketh: briefly is sooner dulled than satisfied with a continuall Meditation. Whence it came to passe that those ancient Monkes, who intermedled bodily labour with their contemplations, proved so excellent in this divine businesse; when those at this day, which having mewed and mured up themselves from the world, spend themselves wholy upon their Beads, and Crucifix, pretending no other worke but Meditation, have, cold hearts to God, and to the world shew nothing but a dull shadow of devotion: for, that if the thoughts of these latter were as divine as they are superstitious; yet being, without all interchangablenesse bent upon the same discourse, the mind must needs grow weary, the thoughts remisse and languishing, the objects tedious: while the other refreshed themselves with this wise variety, employing the hands, while they called off the mind, as good Comœdians so mix their parts, that the pleasantnesse of the one, may temper the austerenesse of the other; whereupon they gained both enough to the body, and to the soule more than if it had beene all the while busied.

Secondly that he be constant in the continuance.

Besides, the excellency of the object letteth this assiduity of Meditation, which is so glorious, that like unto the Sunne, it may abide to have an eye cast up to it for a while, will not be gazed upon; whosoeuer ventureth so farre, loseth both his hope and his wits. If we hold with that blessed Monica, that such like cogitations are the food of the mind, yet even the mind also hath her satiety, and may surfet of too much. It shall be sufficient therefore, that we persever in our Meditation, without any such affectation of perpetuity, and leave without a light fickleness; making alwayes not our Houreglasse, but some competent increase of our devotion, the measure of our continuance; knowing, that as for Heaven, so for our pursuit of grace, it shall availe us little to have begun well, without perseverance, and withall that the soule of man is not alwayes in the like disposition: but sometimes is longer in setling, through some unquietnesse, or more obstinate distraction; sometimes heavier, and sometimes more active, and nimble to dispatch. * Gerson (whose authority I rather use, because our adversaries, disclaime him for theirs) professeth, he hath beene sometimes foure houres together working his heart, ere he could frame it to purpose. A singular patterne of unwearied constancy, of an unconquerable spirit; whom his present, unfitnesse did not so much discourage, as it whetted him to strive with himselfe till he could overcome. And surely other victories are hazzardous, this certaine, if we will persist to strive: other fights are upon hope, this upon assurance; whiles our successe dependeth upon the promise of God, which cannot disapoint us. Persist therefore, and prevaile: persist till thou hast prevailed: so that which thou beganst with difficultie, shall end in comfort.

* Saving our just quarrell against him for the Councell of Constance.

Chap. IX.

Of the Circumſtance of Meditation.

And therein, Firſt of the place.

FRom the qualities of the Perſon, we deſcend towards the action it ſelfe: where firſt we meet with thoſe circumſtances which are neceſſary for our prediſpoſition to the worke; Place, Time, Site of the body.

Solitarineſſe of Place is fitteſt for Meditation. Retire thy ſelfe from others, if thou wouldſt talke profitably with thy ſelfe. So Ieſus meditates alone in the Mount, Iſaac in the fields, Iohn Baptiſt in the Deſart, David on his bed, Chryſoſtome in the Bath, each in ſeverall places; but all ſolitary. There is no place free from God, none to which he is more tied; one finds his Cloſet moſt convenient, where his eyes being limited by the knowne walls, call the mind after a ſort from wandring abroad. Another findeth his ſoule more free, when it beholdeth his heaven above and about him. It matters not ſo we be ſolitary and ſilent. It was a wittie and divine ſpeech of Bernard, that the Spouſe of the ſoule, Chriſt Ieſus, is baſhfull, neither willingly commeth to his Bride in the preſence of a multitude. And hence is that ſweet invitation which we find of her: Come, my welbeloved, let us goe forth into the fields: let us lodge in the villages: Let us goe up early to the Vines: let us ſee if the Vine flouriſh, whether it hath diſcloſed the firſt Grape, or whether the Pomegranates bloſſome; there will I give thee my love. Abandon therefore all worldly ſocietie, that thou mayeſt change it for the company of God and his Angels; the ſociety, I ſay, of the world, not outward only, but inward alſo. There be many that ſequeſter themſelves from the viſible company of men, which yet carry a world within them; who being alone in body, are haunted with a throng of fancies: as Ierome, in his wildeſt Deſart, found himſelfe too oft in his thoughts amongſt the dances, of the Roman Dames. This company is worſe than the other: for it is more poſſible for ſome thoughtfull men to have a ſolitary mind in the mideſt of a market, than for a man thus diſpoſed to be alone in a wilderneſſe. Both companies are enemies to Meditations: whither tendeth that ancient counſell of a great Maſter in this Art, of three things requiſite to this buſineſſe, Secrecie, Silence, Reſt: whereof the firſt excludeth company, the ſecond noiſe, the third motion. It cannot be ſpoken how ſubject we are in this worke, to diſtraction, like Salomons old man, whom the noiſe of every bird wakeneth: ſenſuall delights wee are not drawne from with the three-fold cords of Iudgement; but our ſpirituall pleaſures are eaſily hindered. Make choice therefore of that place, which ſhall admit the feweſt occaſions of withdrawing thy ſoule from good thoughts: wherein alſo even change of places is ſomewhat prejudiciall; and I know not how it falls out, that we find God neerer us in the place where we have beene accuſtomed familiarly to meet him: not for that his preſence is confined to one place above others, but that our thoughts are, through cuſtome more eaſily gathered to the place where we have ordinarily converſed with him.

Chap. X.

Secondly, of the time.

ONe Time cannot be preſcribed to all: for neither is God bound to houres, neither doth the contrary diſpoſition of men agree in one choyce of opportunities: the golden houres of the morning ſome find fitteſt for Meditation, when the body newly raiſed, is well calmed with his late reſt, and the ſoule hath not as yet had from theſe outward things any motives of alienation. Others find it beſt to learne wiſdome of their reines in the night; hoping with Iob, that their bed will bring them comfort in their Meditation; when both all other things are ſtill, and themſelves, wearied with theſe earthly cares, doe out of a contempt of them, grow into greater liking and love of heavenly things. I have ever found Iſaacs time fitteſt, who went out in the evening, to meditate. No precept, no practiſe of others can preſcribe to us in this circumſtance. It ſhall be enough, that firſt we ſet our ſelves a time: ſecondly, that we ſet apart that time, wherein wee are apteſt for this ſervice. And as no time is prejudiced with unfitneſſe, but every day is without difference ſeaſonable for this worke, ſo eſpecially Gods Day. No day is barren of grace

A grace to the ſearcher of it, none alike fruitfull to this; which being by God ſanctified to himſelfe, and to be ſanctified by us to God, is priviledged with bleſſings above others: for the plentifull inſtruction of that Day ſtirreth thee up to this action, and fills thee with matter; and the zeale of thy publike ſervice warmeth thy heart to this other buſineſſe of devotion. No Manna fell to the Iſraelites on their Sabboth; our ſpirituall Manna falleth on ours, moſt frequent: if thou wouldſt have a full ſoule, gather as it falls; gather it by hearing, reading, meditation: ſpirituall idleneſſe is a fault this Day, perhaps not leſſe than bodily worke.

Chap. XI.

Of the Site and geſture of the body.

B NEither is there leſſe variety in the Site and geſture of the body: the due compoſedneſſe whereof is no little advantage to this exerciſe; even in our ſpeech to God, we obſerve not alwayes one and the ſame poſition; ſometimes we fal groveling on our faces; ſometimes we bow our knees: ſometimes ſtand on our feet; ſometimes we lift up our hands, ſometimes caſt downe our eyes. God is a Spirit, who therefore being a ſevere obſerver of the diſpoſition of the ſoule, is not ſcrupulous for the body; requiring not ſo much, that the geſture thereof ſhould bee uniforme, as reverent. No marvell therefore though in this all our teachers of Meditation have commended ſeverall poſitions of body, according to their diſpoſit ion and practice. * One, ſitting with the face turned up to heaven-ward, according to the precept of the philoſopher, who taught him, that by ſitting and reſting, the mind gathereth wiſdome. * Another, leaning to ſome Reſt, towards the left ſide, for the greater quieting of the heart. * A third, ſtanding with the eyes lift up to C Heaven, but ſhut, for feare of diſtractions. But of all other (me thinketh) Iſaacs choyce the beſt, who meditated walking. In this let every man be his owne maſter; ſo be we uſe that frame of body that may both teſtifie reverence and in ſome caſes help to ſtirre up further devotion; which alſo muſt needs be varied according to the matter of our Meditation. If we think of our ſinnes, Ahabs ſoft paſe, the Publicans dejected eyes, and his hand beating his breſt, are moſt ſeaſonable. If of the joyes of heaven, Stevens countenance fixed above, and Davids hands lift up on high, are moſt fitting. In all which, the body, as it is the inſtrument and vaſſall of the ſoule, ſo will eaſily follow the affections thereof; and in truth then is our devotion moſt kindly, when the body is thus commanded his ſervice by the Spirit, and not ſuffered to goe before it, and by his forwardneſſe to provoke his maſter to emulation.

Chap. XII.

Of the matter and ſubject of our Meditation.

NOw time and order call us from theſe circumſtances, to the matter & ſubject of Meditation: which muſt be Divine and Spirituall; not evill, nor worldly. O the Carnall and unprofitable thoughts of men! We all meditate; one, how to doe ill to others; another, how to doe ſome earthly good to himſelfe: another, to hurt himſelfe, under a colour of good, as how to accompliſh his lewd deſires, the fulfilling whereof proveth the bane of the ſoule; how he may ſinne unſeene, and goe to hell with the leaſt noiſe of the world. Or perhaps, ſome better mindes bend their thoughts upon the ſearch of naturall things; the motions of every heaven, and of every ſtarre; the reaſon and courſe of the ebbing and flowing of the Sea; the manifold E kinds of ſimples that grow out of the earth, and creatures that creepe upon it; with all their ſtrange qualities, and operations. Or perhaps, the ſeverall formes of government, and rules of State take up their buſie heads: ſo that while they would be acquainted with the whole world, they are ſtrangers at home, and while thy ſeeke to know all other things, they remaine unknowne of themſelves. The God that made them, the vileneſſe of their nature, the danger of their ſinnes, the multitude of their imperfections, the Saviour that bought them, the Heaven that he bought for them, are in the meane time as unknowne, as unregarded, as if they were not.

Thus doe fooliſh children ſpend their time and labour, in turning over leaves to looke for painted babes, not at all reſpecting the ſolid matter under their hands. We fooles, when will we be wiſe, and turning our eyes from vanity, with that ſweet Singer of Iſrael, make Gods ſtatutes our ſong and meditation in the houſe of our pilgrimage? A

Earthly things profer themſelves with importunitie. Heavenly things muſt with importunitie be ſued to. Thoſe, if they were not ſo little worth, would not be ſo forward, and being forward, need not any Meditation to ſolicite them: Theſe, by how much more hard they are to intreat, by ſo much more, precious they are being obtained; and therefore worthier our indevour. As then we cannot goe amiſſe, ſo long as we keepe our ſelves in the tracke of Divinitie; while the ſoule is taken up with the thoughts either of the Deity in his eſſence, and perſons (ſparingly yet in this point, and more in faith and admiration than inquirie) or of his attributes, his Iuſtice, Power, Wiſdome, Mercy, Truth: or of his workes, in the creation, preſervation, government of all things; according to the Pſalmiſt, I will meditate of the beautie of thy glorious Majeſtie, and thy wonderfull workes: ſo, moſt directly in our way, and beſt fitting our exerciſe of Meditation, are thoſe matters in Divinitie, which can moſt of all worke compunction in the heart, and moſt ſtirre us up to devotion. Of which kind are the Meditations concerning Chriſt Ieſus our Mediator, his Incarnation, Miracles, Life, Paſſion, Buriall, Reſurrection, Aſcention, Interceſſion, the benefit of our Redemption, the certaintie of our Election, the graces and proceeding of our Sanctificaion, our glorious eſtate in Paradiſe loſt in our firſt Parents, our preſent vilenes, our inclination to ſinne, our ſeverall actuall offences, the tentations and ſleights of evill Angells, the uſe of the Sacraments, nature and practice of Faith and Repentance: the miſeries of our life, with the frailtie of it; the certaintie and uncertaintie of our death, the glory of Gods Saints above, the awfullneſſe of Iudgement, the terrours of hell, and the reſt of this quality: wherein both it is fit to have variety (for that even the ſtrongeſt ſtomack doth not alwaies delight in one diſh) and yet ſo to change, that our choyce may be free from wildneſſe and inconſtancie. B C

Chap. XIII.

The order of the worke it ſelfe.

NOw after that we have thus orderly ſuited the perſon and his qualities, with the due circumſtances of time, place, diſpoſition of body, and ſubſtance of the matter diſcuſſed, I know not what can remaine, beſides the maine buſineſſe it ſelfe, and the manner and degrees of our proſecution thereof; which above all other calleth for an intentive Reader, and reſolute practice. Wherein that we may avoid all niceneſſe and obſcuritie (ſince we ſtrive to profit) we will give direction for the Entrance, Proceeding, Concluſion of this Divine worke. D

Chap. XIV.

The entrance into the worke.

A Goodly building muſt ſhew ſome magnificence in the gate; and great perſonages have ſeemely Vſhers to goe before them; who by their uncovered heads command reverence and way. Even very Poets of old had wont, before their Ballads to implore the aid of their gods. And the Heathen Romans entred not upon any publike civill buſineſſe, without a ſolemne apprecation of good ſucceſſe: How much leſſe ſhould a Chriſtian dare to undertake a ſpirituall worke of ſuch importance, not having craved the aſſiſtance of his God? which (me thinks) is no leſſe, than to profeſſe he could doe well without Gods leave. When we think evill, it is from our ſelves: when good, from God. As Prayer is our ſpeech to God, ſo is each good Meditation (according to Bernard) Gods ſpeech to the heart: The heart muſt ſpeake to God, that God may ſpeake to it. Prayer therefore and Meditation, are as thoſe famous Twinnes in the ſtory, or as Two loving Turtles, whereof ſeparate one, the other languiſheth. E

1 the common entrance, which is Prayer.

Prayer maketh way for Meditation. Meditation giveth matter, ſtrength, & life to our our prayers. By which, as all other things are ſanctified to us, ſo we are ſanctified to all holly things. This is as ſome royall Eunuch to perfume and dreſſe our ſoules, that they may be fit to converſe with the King of Heaven.

But the prayer that leadeth in Meditation would not be long, requiring rather that the extenſion and length ſhould be put into the vigour and fervencie of it; for that is not here intended to be the principall buſineſſe, but an introduction to another; and no otherwiſe, than as a Portall to this building of Meditation: The matter whereof ſhall be, that the courſe of our Meditation may be guided aright and bleſſed; that all diſtractions may be avoided; our iudgement enlightned, our inventions quickned, our wills rectified, our affections whetted to heavenly things, our hearts enlarged to God-ward, our devotion enkindled; ſo that we may find our corruptions abated, our graces thriven, our ſoules and lives every way bettered by this exerciſe.

Chap. XV.

SUch is the common entrance into this worke: there is another yet more particular and proper; wherein the mind, recollecting it ſelfe, maketh choyce of that Theme or matter whereupon it will beſtow it ſelfe for the preſent; ſetling it ſelfe on that which it hath choſen: which is done by an inward inquiſition made into our heart, of what we both doe, and ſhould think upon: rejecting what is unexpedient and unprofitable. In both which, the Soule, like unto ſome noble Hawke, lets paſſe the Crowes, and Larkes, and ſuch other worthleſſe Birds that croſſe her way and ſtoopeth upon a Fowle of price, worthy of her flight: after this manner.

Particular and proper entrance into the matter, which is in our choyce thereof.

What wilt thou muſe upon, O my ſoule? thou ſeeſt how little it availeth thee to wander and rone about in uncertainties: thou findeſt how little favour there is in theſe earthly things, where with thou haſt wearied thy ſelfe; Trouble not thy ſelfe any longer (with Martha) about the many and needleſſe thoughts of the world: None but heavenly things can afford thee comfort: up then, my ſoule, and minde thoſe things that are above, whence thy ſelfe art: Amongſt all which wherein ſhouldeſt thou rather meditate than of the life and glory of Gods Saints? A worthyer imployment thou canſt never find, than to thinke upon that eſtate thou ſhalt once poſſeſſe, and now deſireſt.

Chap. XVI.

HItherto the entrance; after which, our Meditation muſt proceed in due order, not troubledly, not prepoſterouſly: It begins in the underſtanding, endeth in the affection; It begins in the braine, deſcends to the heart; Begins on earth, aſcends to Heaven; Not ſuddenly, but by certaine ſtaires and degrees, till we come to the higheſt.

The proceeding of our Meditation.

I have found a ſubtill ſcale of Meditation, admired by ſome Profeſſors of this Art, above all other humane devices, and farre preferred by them to the beſt directions of Origen, Auſten, Bernard, Hugo Bonaventure, Gerſon, and whoſoever hath beene reputed of greateſt perfection in this skill. The ſeverall ſtaires whereof (leſt I ſhould ſeeme to defraud my Reader through envy) I would willingly deſcribe, were it not that I feared, to ſcarre him rather with the danger of obſcuritie, from venturing further upon this ſo worthy a buſineſſe: yet leſt any man perhaps might complaine of an unknowne loſſe, my Margent ſhall find roome for that which I hold too knottie for my Text.

And therein a Method allowed by ſome Authors rejected by us.

* In all which, (after the incredible commendations of ſome practitioners) I doubt not but an ordinary Reader will eaſily eſpie a double fault at the leaſt, Darkneſſe and Coincidence: that they are both too obſcurely delivered, and that divers of them fall into other, not without ſome vaine ſuperfluitie. For this part therefore which-concerneth the vnderſtanding, I had rather to require only a deepe and firme Conſideration of the thing propounded: which ſhall bee done if we follow it in our diſcourſe, through all, or the principall of thoſe places which naturall reaſon doth afford us: wherein, let no man pleade ignorance, or feare difficultie: we are all thus farre borne Logicians; neither is there, in this, ſo much need of skill, as of induſtrie. In which courſe yet, wee may not be too curious, in a preciſe ſearch of everie place and argument, without omiſſion of any (though to bee fetcht in with racking the invention.) For as the mind, if it goe looſe and without rule, roves to no purpoſe; ſo if it be too much fettered, with the gieves of ſtrict regularitie, moveth nothing at all.

Chap. XVII.

Premonitions concerning our proceeding in the firſt part of Meditation.

ERe I enter therefore into any particular tractation, there are three things wherof I would premoniſh my Reader, concerning this firſt part, which is in the underſtanding. Firſt, that I deſire not to binde every man to the ſame uniforme proceeding in this part: Practiſe and cuſtome may perhaps have taught other courſes more familiar, and not leſſe direct. If then we can, by any other method, worke in our hearts ſo deepe an apprehenſion of the matter meditated, as it may duly ſtirre the affections, it is that only we require.

Secondly, that whoſever applieth himſelfe to this direction, think him not neceſſarily tied to the proſecution of all theſe Logicall places, which he findeth in the ſequell of our Treatiſe, ſo as his Meditation ſhould be lame and imperfect without the whole number: for there are ſome Themes will not beare all theſe; as when we meditate of God, there is no roome for Cauſes or Compariſons, and others yeeld them with ſuch difficultie, that their ſearch, interrupteth the chiefe worke intended. It ſhall be ſufficient, if we take the moſt pregnant, and moſt voluntary.

Thirdly, that when we ſticke in the diſpoſition of any the places following (as if, meditating of Sinne, I cannot readily meet with the Materiall and Formall Cauſes, or the Appendances of it) we racke not our mindes too much with the inquiry thereof; which were to ſtriue more for Logique, than devotion: but without too much diſturbance of our thoughts, quietly paſſe over to the next. If we breake our teeth with the ſhell, we ſhall find ſmall pleaſure in the kernell.

Now then for that my only feare is, leſt this part of my diſcourſe ſhall ſeeme over-perplexed unto the unlearned Reader; I will in this whole proceſſe, ſecond my rule with his example, that ſo what might ſeeme obſcure in the one, may by the other be explained; and the ſame ſteps he ſeeth me take in this, he may accordingly tread in any other Theme.

Chap.

Chap. XVIII.

The practice of Meditation; wherein, First, we begin with some description of that wee meditate of.

FIrst therefore it shall be expedient to consider seriously, what the thing is whereof we meditate.

what then, O my soule, is the life of the Saints, whereof thou studiest? who are the Saints, but those which having beene weakly holy upon earth, are perfectly holy above? which even on earth were perfectly holy in their Saviour, now are so in themselves? which overcomming on earth, are truely canonized in Heaven? what is their life, but that blessed estate above, wherein their glorified soule hath a full fruition of God?

Chap. XIX.

Secondly, followes an easie and voluntary division of the matter meditated.

THe nature whereof, after we have thus shadowed out to our selves by a description, not curious alwayes, and exactly framed according to the rules of Art, but sufficient for our owne conceit; the next is (if it shall seeme needfull or if the matter will beare, or offer it) some easie and voluntarie division, whereby our thoughts shall have more roome made for them, and our proceeding shall be more distinct.

There is a life of nature, when thou, my soule, dwellest in this body, and informest thine earthly burthen. There is a life of grace, when the Spirit of God dwells in thee. There is a life of glory when the body being united to thee, both shall be united to God: or when, in the meane time, being separated from thy companion, thou enjoyest God alone. This life of thine therefore, as the other, hath his ages, hath his statures; for it entreth upon his birth, when thou passest out of thy body, & changest this earthly house for an Heavenly: It enters into his full vigour, when at the day of the common resurrection, thou resumest this thy companion, unlike to it selfe, like to thee, like to thy Saviour, immortall now, and glorious. In this life here may be degrees; there can be no imperfection. If some be like the Skie, others like the Starres, yet all shine. If some sit at their Saviours right hand, others at his left, all are blessed. If some vessels hold more, all are full; none complaineth of want, none enviteth him that hath more.

Chap. XX.

3 A consideration of the causes thereof in all kinds of them.

WHich done, it shall be requisit for our perfecter understanding, and for the laying grounds of matter for our affection, to carry it thorow those other principall places, and heads of reason, which nature hath taught every man, both for knowledge and amplification: the first whereof are the Causes, of all sorts.

whence is this eternall life, but from him which onely is eternall, which onely is the fountaine of life, yea life it selfe? who but the same God that gives our temporall life, giveth also that eternall? The Father bestoweth it, the Sonne meriteth it, the holy Ghost seales and applieth it. Expect it onely from him, O my soule, whose free election gave thee the first title to it, to be purchased by the bloud of thy Saviour. For thou shalt not therefore be happy, because he saw that thou wouldst be good; but therefore art thou good, because he hath ordained, thou shalt be happy. He hath ordained thee to life; he hath given thee a Saviour to give this life unto thee; faith, whereby thou mightest attaine to this Saviour; his Word, by which thou mightst attaine to this faith; what is there in this not his? And yet not his so simply, as that it is without thee: without thy merite indeed, not without thine act. Thou livest here through his blessing, but by bread; thou shalt live above through his mercy, but by thy faith below, apprehending the Author of thy life. And yet as he will not save thee without thy faith, so thou canst never have faith without his gift. Looke up to him therefore O my soule, as the beginner and finisher of thy salvation; and while thou magnifiest the Author, be ravished with the glory of the worke: which farre passeth both the tongue of Angels, and the heart of man. It can be no good thing that is not there How can they want water, that have the spring? where God is enjoyed, in whom only all things are good, what good can be wanting? And what perfection of blisse is there, where all goodnes is met and united? In thy presence is fulnesse of Joy, and at thy right hand are pleasures for evermore. O blessed reflection of glory! We see there, as we are seene, in that we are seene it is our glory; in that we see, it is Gods glory; therefore doth he glorifie us, that our glory should be to his. How worthy art thou, O Lord, that through us thou shouldest looke at thy selfe!

Chap. XXI.

4 The consideration of the Fruits and Effects.

THe next place shall be the fruits and effects following upon their severall causes: which also affords very feeling and copious matter to our meditation; wherein it shall be ever best, not so much to seeke for all, as to chuse out the chiefest.

No marvell then if from this glory proceed unspeakable joy, and from this joy the sweet songs of praise and thanksgiving. The Spirit bids us, when we are merry sing: How much more then, when we are merry without all mixture of sorrow, beyond all measure of our earthly affections, shall we sing joyfull Hallelu-jahs and Hosannahs to him that dwelleth in the highest Heavens? our hearts shall be so full, that we cannot chuse but sing, and we cannot but sing melodiously. There is no iar in this Musicke, no end of this song. O blessed change of the Saints! They doe nothing but weepe below and now nothing but sing above. We sowed in teares, reape in ioy; there was some comfort in those teares, when they were at worst; but there is no danger of complaint in this heavenly mirth. If we cannot sing here with Angels, On earth peace, yet there we shall sing with them, Glory to God on high; and ioyning our voyces to theirs, shall make up that celestiall consort, which none can either heare or beare part in, and not be happy.

Chap. XXII.

5 Consideration of the Subject wherein, or whereabout it is.

AFter which comes to be considered the Subject, either wherein that is, or where about that is imployed, which we meditate of: As,

And indeed, what lesse happinesse doth the very place promise, wherein this glory is exhibited? which is no other than the Paradise of God. Here below we dwell, or rather we wander in a continued wildernes, there we shall rest as in the true Eden: I am come into my Garden, my Sister, my Spouse. Kings use not to dwell in cottages of Clay, but in Royall Courts fit for their estate: How much more shall the King of Heaven, who hath prepared for men so faire mansions on earth, make himselfe an habitation sutable to his Majestie? even earthly Princes have dwelt in Cedar and Yuory: But the great City, Holy Jerusalem, the Palace of the Highest, hath her walls of Iasper, her building of gold, her foundation of precious stones, her gates of pearle: How glorious things are spoken of thee, O thou City of God! we see but the pavement, and yet how goodly it is! The beleeving Centurion, thought himselfe unworthy that Christ should come under his roofe: yet wert thou, O Saviour, in thine humbled estate, in the forme of a servant: How then shall I thinke my selfe worthy to come under this roofe of thine, so shining and glorious? O, if this clay of mine may come to this honour above, let it be trampled upon and despised on earth.

Chap. XXIII.

6 Consid. of the Appendances and Qualities of it.

SIxtly, shall follow the Appendances and Qualities, which cleave unto the subject whereof we meditate: As,

But were the place lesse noble and majesticall; yet the company which it affordeth, hath enough to make the soule blessed. For, not the place giveth ornament to the guest, so much as the guest to the place. How loath are we to leave this earth, onely for the society of some few friends in whom we delight, which yet are subject every day to mutuall dislikes? what pleasure shall we then take in the enjoying of the Saints; when there is nothing in them not amiable, nothing in us that may coole the fervour of our loue? There shalt thou, my soule, thy selfe glorified, meet with thy deare Parents and friends alike glorious, never to be severed: There thou shalt see and converse with those ancient Worthies of the former world; the blessed Patriarkes and Prophets, with the crowned Martyrs and Confessors; with the holy Apostles, and the Fathers

A Fathers of that Primitive and this present Church, shining each one according to the measure of his blessed labours. There shalt thou live familiarly in the sight of those Angels, whom now thou receivest good from, but seest not. There (which is the head of all thy felicity,) thine eies shall see Him whom now thine heart longeth for, (that Saviour of thine) in the only hope of whom now thou livest. Alas, how dimly, and afarre off dost thou now behold him? How imperfectly dost thou enjoy him, while every temptation bereaves thee, for the time, of his presence? I sought him whom my soule loveth: I sought him, but found him not; his back is now towards thee many times, through thy sins, and therefore thou hardly discernest him. Otherwhile and often thy back is turned unto him through negligence, that when thou mightest obscurely see him, thou dost not: now thou shalt see him, and thine eyes thus fixed shall not be removed. yet neither could this glory make us happy, if being thus absolute, it were not perpetuall. To be happy, is not so sweet a state, as it is miserable to have beene happy. Lest ought therefore B should be wanting, behold, this felicity knoweth no end, feareth no intermission, and is as eternall for the continuance, as he that had no beginning. O blessednesse truly infinite! Our earthly joyes doe scarce ever begin, but when they begin, their end bordereth upon their beginning. One houre seeth us oft-times joyfull and miserable: here alone is nothing but eternity. If then the Divine Prophet thought here one day in gods earthly house, better than a thousand other where; what shall I compare to thousands of millions of yeeres in Gods heavenly Temple? Yea, millions of yeers are not so much as a minute to eternity, and that other house not a cottage to this.

Chap. XXIV.

7 Of that which is divers from it, or contrary to it.

C Seventhly, our thoughts, leaving a while the consideration of the thing as it is in it selfe, shall descend unto it as respectively with others; and therefore first shall meditate of that which is divers from it, or contrary unto it.

What dost thou here then, O my soule? what dost thou here groveling upon earth? where the best things are vanitie, the rest no better than vexation. Looke round about thee, and see whether thine eies can meet with any thing but either sinnes or miseries. Those few and short pleasures thou seest, and ever sorrowfully; and in the meane time are intermingled with many grievances. Here thou heares one cry out of a sick body, whereof there is no part which affords not choise of diseases. This man layeth his hand upon his consuming lungs, and complaineth of short wind: that other, upon his rising spleene: a third shaketh his painefull head: another roares out for the torment of his reines or bladder: another for the racking of his gowty joynts: one is distempered with a watery Dropsie, another with a windie Collicke, a third with a fiery Ague, a fourth with an earthen melancholy; one grovels and soweth with the falling sickneese; D another lyeth bed-rid, halfe senseleese with a dead Palsie. There are but few bodies that complaine not of some disease; and that thou maist not looke farre, it is a wonder if thy selfe feele not alwaies one of these evills within thee. There, thou heares another lament his losse: either his estate is impaired by suretiship, or stealth, or shipwracke, or oppression; or his child is unruly, or miscaried; or his wife dead, or disloyall; another tormented with passions; each one is some way miserable. But, that which is yet more irkesome, thy one eare is beaten with cursings and blasphemies; thy other with scornefull or wanton, or murthering speeches; thine eies see nothing but pride, filthinesse, profanenesse, bloud, excesse, and whatsoever else might vex a righteous soule: and if all the world besides were innocent, thou findest enough within, thy selfe to make thy selfe weary, and thy life loathsome. Thou needest not fetch cause of complaint from others; thy corruptions yeeld thee too much at home; ever sinning, ever presuming; Sinning even when thou hast repented: yea, even while thou repentest, sinning. Goe E to now, my soule, and solace thy selfe here below, and suffer thy selfe besotted with these goodly contentments; worthy of no better, while thou fixest thy selfe, on these: see if thou canst find any of these above; and if thou canst meet with any distemper, any losse, any sinne, any complaint, from thy selfe or any other above, despise thine Heaven, as much as now thou lovest the earth. Or if all this cannot enough commend unto thee the state of Heavenly Glory, cast downe thine eyes yet lower, into that deepe and bottomlesse pit, full of horrour full of torment, where there is nothing but flames, and teares and shricks, and gnashing of teeth, nothing but fiends, and tortures: where there is palpable darknesse, and yet perpetuall fire; where the damned are ever boyling, never consumed; ever dying never dead; ever complaining, never pitied; where the Glutton, that once would not give a crust of bread, now begs for one drop of water; and yet alas, if whole rivers of water should fall into his mouth, how should they quench those rivers of Brimstone that feed this flame? where there is no intermission of complaints, no breathing from paine, & after millions of yeeres, no possibilitie of comfort. And if the rod wherewith thou chastisest thy children, O Lord, even in this life, be so smart and galling, that they have beene brought downe to the brim of despaire, and in the bitternesse of their soule have intreated death to release them: what shall I think of their plagues, in whose righteous confusion thou confoundest, and saiest; Aha, I will avenge me of mine enemies? Even that thou shalt not be thus miserable, O my soule, is some kind of happinesse: but that thou shalt be as happy, as the reprobate are miserable, how worthy is it of more estimation, than thy selfe is capable of?

Chap. XXV.

8 Of comparisons and similitudes whereby it may be most fitly set forth.

After this opposition, the mind shall make comparison of the matter meditated, with what may neerest resemble it; and shall illustrate it with fittest similitudes, which give no small light to the understanding, nor lesse force to the affection.

Wonder then, O my soule, as much as thou canst, at this glory; and in comparison thereof, contemne this earth, which now thou treadest upon; whose joyes if they were perfect, are but short; and if they were long, are imperfect. One day when thou art above, looking downe from the height of thy glory, and seeing the sonnes of men creeping like so many Ants on this Molehill of earth, thou shalt thinke, Alas, how basely I once lived! was yonder silly dungeon the place I so loved, and was so loth to leave? Thinke so now before hand; and since of heaven thou canst not, yet account of the earth as it is worthy: How heartlesse and irkesome are ye, O yee best earthly pleasures, if ye be matched with the least of those above? How vile are you, O yee sumptuous buildings of Kings, even if all the entrailes of the earth had agreed to enrich you, in comparison of this frame not made with hands? It is not so high above the earth in distance of place, as in worth and Majesty. Wee may see the face of heaven from the heart of the earth; but from the neerest part of the earth who can see the least glory of heaven? The three Disciples, on mount Tabor, saw but a glimpse of this glory shining upon the face of their Saviour; & yet being ravished with the sight, cryed out, Master, it is good being here; and, thinking of building of three Tabernacles (for Christ, Moses, Elias) could have beene content themselves to have lien without shelter, so they might always have enjoyed that sight. Alas, how could earthly Tabernacles have fitted those heavenly bodies? They knew what they saw; what they said, they knew not. Loe, these three Disciples were not transfigured; yet how deepely they were afflicted even with the glory of others! How happy shall we be, when our selves shall be changed into glorious? and shall have Tabernacles not of our owne making, but prepared for us by God? and yet not Tabernacles, but eternall Mansions. Moses saw God but a while, and shined: how shall we shine that shall behold his face for ever? What greater honour is there than in Soveraignty? What greater pleasure than in feasting? This life is both a Kingdome and a feast. A Kingdome: He that overcomes, shall rule the Nations, and shall sit with me in my Throne: O blessed promotion! Oh large dominion, and royall seat! to which Salomons Throne of Yuory was not worthy to become a foot-stoole. A feast: Blessed are they that are called to the Mariage-supper of the Lamb. Feasts have more than necessitie of provision, more than ordinary dyet; but mariage feasts yet more than common abundance; but the Mariage-feast of the sonne of God to his blessed Spouse the Church, must so farre exceed in all heavenly munificence and variety, as the persons are of the greater state and Majesty. There is new wine, pure Manna, & all manner of spirituall dainties; and with the continuall cheere, a sweet and answerable welcome; while the Bridgroome lovingly cheereth us up, Eat, O friends, drinke, and make you mery, O welbeloved; yea, there shalt thou be my soule, not a guest, but (how unworthy soever) the Bride her selfe, whom he hath everlastingly espoused to himselfe in truth and righteousnesse. the contract is passed here below, the mariage is consummate above, and solemnized with a perpetuall feast: so that now thou maist safely say, My welbeloved is mine, and I am

A am his: wherefore hearken, O my ſoule, and conſider and incline thine eare, forget alſo thine owne people, and thy fathers houſe, (thy ſuppoſed home of this world) ſo ſhall the King have pleaſure in thy beauty; for he is the Lord, and worſhip thou him.

Chap. XXVI.

9. The Titles and Names of the thing conſidered.

THe very Names and Titles of the matter conſidered, yeeld no ſmall ſtore to our Meditation: which being commonly ſo impoſed, that they ſecretly comprehend the nature of the thing which they repreſent, are not unworthy of our diſcourſe.

What need I ſeeke thoſe reſemblances, when the very name of life implieth ſweetneſſe to men on earth, even to them which confeſſe to live with ſome diſcontentment? Surely the light is a B pleaſant thing, and it is good to the eyes to ſee the Sunne: yet when Temporall is added to Life, I know not how this addition detracteth ſomething, and doth greatly abate the pleaſure of Life; for thoſe which joy to think of Life, grieve to think it but Temporall: ſo vexing is the end of that whoſe continuance was delightfull. But now when there is an addition (above Time) of Eternity, it maketh life ſo much more ſweet as it is moſt laſting; and laſting infinitely, what can it give leſſe than an infinite contentment? Oh dying and falſe life, which we enjoy here, and ſcarce a ſhadow and counterfeit of that other! what is more eſteemed than glory? which is ſo precious to men of ſpirit, that it makes them prodigall of their bloud, proud of their wounds, careleſſe of themſelves: and yet (alas) how pent, and how fading is this glory, affected with ſuch dangers and death? hardly after all Trophees and monuments, either knowne to the next Sea, or ſurviving him that dieth for it: It is true glory to triumph in heaven, where is
C neither envy nor forgetfulneſſe.

What is more deare to us than our Countrey? which the worthy and faithfull Patriots of all times have reſpected above their parents, their Children, their lives; counting it only happy to live in it, and to dye for it. The baniſht man pines for the want of it: the traveller digeſteth all the tediouſneſſe of his way, all the ſorrowes of an ill journey, in the only hope of home; forgetting all his forraine miſeries, when he feeleth his owne ſmoke. Where is our Countrey but above? Thence thou cameſt, O my ſoule; thither thou art going, in a ſhort, but weary pilgrimage. O miſerable men, if we account our ſelves at home in our pilgrimage; if in our journey, we long not for home! Doeſt thou ſee men ſo in love with their native ſoyle, that even when it is all deformed with the deſolations of warre, and turned into rude heaps, or while it is even D now flaming with the fire of civill broiles, they covet yet ſtill to live in it, preferring it to all other places of more peace and pleaſure? and ſhalt thou, ſeeing nothing but peace and bleſſednеſſe at home, nothing but trouble abroad, content thy ſelfe with a faint wiſh of thy diſſolution? If heaven were thy Iayle, thou couldeſt but think of it uncomfortably. Oh what affection can be worthy of ſuch an home!

Chap. XXVII.

10. Conſid. of fit teſtimonies of Scripture, concerning our Theme.

LAſtly, if wee can recall any pregnant Teſtimonies of Scripture concerning our Theme, thoſe ſhall fitly conclude this part of our Meditation. Of Scripture; for that in theſe matters of God, none but divine authority can command aſſent, and ſettle the conſcience. Witneſſes of holy men may ſerve for colours; but the ground muſt be only from God.

There it is (ſaith the Spirit of God, which cannot deceive thee) that all teares ſhall be wiped E from our eyes; there ſhall be no more death, nor ſorrow, nor crying, neither ſhall there be any more paine: yea, there ſhall not only be an end of ſorrowes, but an abundant recompence for the ſorrowes of our life; as hee that was rapt up into the third Heaven, and there ſaw what cannot be ſpoken, ſpeaketh yet thus of what he ſaw: I count, that the afflictions of this preſent time are not worthy of the glory which ſhall be ſhewed to us: It was ſhewed unto him what ſhould hereafter be ſhewed unto us; and he ſaw, that if all the world full of miſeries were laid in one ballance, and the leaſt glory of heaven in another, thoſe would be incomparably light, yea (as that divine Father) that one dayes felicity above, were worth a thouſand yeeres torment below; what then can bee matched with the eternity of ſuch joyes? Oh how great therfore is this thy goodneſſe, O Lord, which thou haſt laid up for them that feare thee, and done to them that truſt in thee, before the ſonnes of men! A

Chap. XXVIII.

Of our ſecond part of Meditation: which is in the affections.

THe moſt difficult and knotty part of Meditation thus finiſhed, there remaineth that which is both more lively, and more eaſie unto a good heart to bee wrought altogether by the affections: which if our diſcourſes reach not unto, they prove vaine and to no purpoſe. That which followeth therefore, is the very ſoule of Meditation, whereto all that is paſt ſerveth but as an inſtrument. A man is a man by his underſtanding part: but he is a Chriſtian by his will and affections. Seeing therefore, that all our former labour of the braine is only to affect the heart, after that the mind hath thus traverſed the point propoſed through all the heads of reaſon, it ſhall endevour to find in the firſt place ſome feeling touch, and ſweet reliſh in that which it hath thus chewed; which fruit through the bleſſing of God, will voluntarily follow upon a ſerious Meditation. David ſaith, Oh taſte, and ſee how ſweet the Lord is. In Meditation we doe both ſee and taſte; but we ſee before we taſte: ſight, is of the underſtanding: taſte, of the affection; neither can we ſee, but we muſt taſte; we cannot know aright, but we muſt needs be affected. Let the heart therfore firſt conceive and feele in it ſelfe the ſweetneſſe or litterneſſe of the matter meditated: which is never done, without ſome paſſion; nor expreſſed, without ſome hearty exclamation.

Wherein is required a Taſte and reliſh of what we have thought upon. B

Oh bleſſed eſtate of the Saints! O glory not to be expreſſed, even by thoſe which are glorified! O incomprehenſible ſalvation! What ſavour hath this earth to thee? Who can regard the world, that beleeveth thee? Who can thinke of thee, and not be raviſhed with wonder and deſire? Who can hope for thee, and not rejoyce? Who can know thee, and not be ſwallowed up with admiration C at the mercy of him that beſtoweth thee? O bleſſednes worthy of Chriſts blood to purchaſe thee! Worthy of the continuall ſongs of Saints and Angels to celebrate thee! How ſhould I magniſie thee! How ſhould I long for thee? How ſhould I hate all this world for thee?

Chap. XXIX.

Secondly, a Complaint, bewailing our wants and untowardneſſe.

AFter this Taſte ſhall follow a Complaint, wherein the heart bewaileth to it ſelfe his own poverty, dulneſſe, and imperfection; chiding and abaſing it ſelfe in reſpect of his wants and indiſpoſition: wherein Humiliation truly goeth before glory. For the more we are caſt downe in our conceit, the higher ſhall God lift us up at the end of this exerciſe, in ſpirituall rejoycing.

But alas, where is my love? Where is my longing? Where art thou, O my ſoule? What heavineſſe hath overtaken thee? How hath the world bewitched and poſſeſſed thee, that thou art becom ſo careleſſe of thine home, ſo ſenſeleſſe of ſpirituall delights, ſo fond upon theſe vanities? D Doeſt thou doubt whether there be an heaven? or whether thou have a God, and a Saviour there? O farre be from thee this Atheiſme; far be from thee the leaſt thought of this deſperate impiety. Woe were thee, if thou beleevedſt not: But, O thou of little Faith, doeſt thou beleeve there is happineſſe, and happineſſe for thee, and deſireſt it not, and delighteſt not in it? Alas, how weak and unbeleeving is thy beleefe! How cold and faint are thy deſires? Tell me, what ſuch goodly entertainment haſt thou met with all here on earth, that was worthy to withdraw thee from theſe heavenly joyes? What pleaſure in it ever gave thee contentment? or what cauſe of diſlike findeſt thou above? Oh no, my ſoule, it is only thy miſerable drouſineſſe, only thy ſecurity: The world, the world hath beſotted thee, hath undone thee with careleſneſſe. Alas, if thy delight be ſo cold, what difference is there in thee from an ignorant Heathen, that doubts of another life: yea, from an Epicure E that denies it? Art thou a Chriſtian, or art thou none? If thou be what thou profeſſeſt, away with this dull and ſenſeleſſe worldlineſſe; away with this earthly uncheerefulneſſe; ſhake off at laſt this profane and godleſſe ſecurity, that hath thus long weighed thee downe from mounting up to thy joyes. Looke up to thy God, and to thy Crowne, and ſay with confidence, O Lord, I have waited for thy ſalvation.

Chap.

Chap. XXX.

After this Complaint, must succeed an hearty and passionate Wish of the soule, which ariseth cleerely from the two former degrees : For, that which a man hath found sweet, and comfortable, and complaines that he still wanteth, hee cannot but wish to enjoy.

Thirdly an hearty Wish of the soule, for what it complaineth to want.

O Lord, that I could wait and long for thy salvation! Oh that I could mind the things above: that as I am a stranger indeed, so I could be also in affection! Oh that mine eyes, like the eies of thy first Martyr, could by the light of Faith see but a glimpse of heaven! Oh that my heart could be rapt up thither in desire! How should I trample upon these poore vanities of the earth! How willingly should I endure all sorrowes, all torments! How scornefully should I passe by all pleasures! How should I be in travaile of my dissolution! Oh when shall that blessed day come, when all this wretched worldlinesse removed, I shall solace my selfe in my God? Behold, as the Heart brayeth for the rivers of waters, so panteth my soule after thee, O God: My soule thirsteth for God, even for the living God; Oh when shall I come and appeare before the presence of God?

Chap. XXXI.

After this Wishing, shall follow humble Confession, by just order of nature: for, having bemoaned our want, and wished supply, not finding this hope in our selves, we must needs acknowledge it to him, of whom only we may both seeke and find; where it is to be duly observed, how the mind is by turnes depressed, and lifted up: being lifted up with our estate of joy, it is cast downe with Complaint: lift up with Wishes, it is cast downe with Confession; which order doth best hold it in ure, and just temper; and maketh it more feeling of the comfort which followeth in the conclusion. This Confession must derogate all from our selves, and ascribe all to God.

4. An humble Confession of our disabilitie to effect what we with.

Thus I desire, O Lord, to be aright affected towards thee and thy glory; I desire to come to thee: but, alas, how weakely? how heartlesly? Thou knowest that I can neither come to thee, nor desire to come, but from thee. It is Nature that holds me from thee; this treacherous Nature favours it selfe, loveth the world, hateth to think of a dissolution, and chuseth rather to dwell in this dungeon with continuall sorrow and complaint, than to endure a parting, although to liberty and joy. Alas, Lord, it is my misery that I love my paine. How long shall these vanities thus besot mee? It is thou only that canst turne away mine eyes from regarding these follies, and my heart from affecting them: thou only, who as thou shalt one day receive my soule into heaven, so now before-hand canst fix my soule upon heaven and thee.

Chap. XXXII.

After Confession, naturally followes Petition; earnestly requesting that at his hands, which we acknowledge our selves unable, and none but God able to performe.

5. An earnest Petition for that which we confesse to want.

O carry it up therefore, thou that hast created and redeemed it, carry it up to thy glory: Oh let me not alwayes be thus dull and brutish; let not these scales of earthly affection alwayes dim and blind mine eies: Oh thou that layedst clay upon the blindmans eies, take away this clay from mine eyes, wherewith (alas) they are so daubed up, that they cannot see Heaven. Illuminate them from above, and in thy light let me see light. Oh thou that hast prepared a place for my soule, prepare my soule for that place; prepare it with holinesse, prepare it with desire: and even while it sojourneth on earth, let it dwell in heaven with thee, beholding ever the beauty of thy face, the glory of thy Saints, and of it selfe.

Chap. XXXIII.

6 A vehement Enforcement of our petition.

After Petition shall follow the Enforcement of our request, from argument and importunate obsecration; wherein we must take heed of complementing in termes with God, as knowing that he will not be mocked by any fashionable forme of suit, but requireth holy and feeling intreatie.

How graciously hast thou proclaimed to the world, that who-ever wants wisdome, shall aske it of thee, which neither denyest nor upbraidest! O Lord, I want heavenly wisdome, to conceive aright of heaven; I want it, and aske it of thee; give me to aske it instantly, and give me according to thy promise abundantly. Thou seest, it is no strange favour that I begge of thee: no other than that which thou hast richly bestowed upon all thy valiant Martyrs, Confessors, Servants, from the beginning: who never could have so cheerefully embraced death and torment, if through the middest of their flames and paine they had not seene their Crowne of glory. The poore Theefe on the Crosse had no sooner craved thy remembrance when thou camest to thy Kingdome, than thou promisedst to take him with thee into heaven. Presence was better to him than remembrance. Behold, now thou art in thy Kingdome, I am on earth; remember thine unworthy servant, and let my soule in conceit, in affection, in conversation, be this day and forever with thee in Paradise. I see, man walketh in a vaine shadow, and disquieteth himselfe in vaine: they are pittifull pleasures he enjoyeth, while he forgetteth thee; I am as vaine, make me more wise: Oh let me see heaven, and I know, I shall never envie, nor follow them. My times are in thine hand: I am no better than my fathers, a stranger on earth. As I speake of them, so the next, yea this generation shall speake of me as one that was. My life is a bubble, a smoake, a shadow, a thought: I know, it is no abiding in this thorow-fare: Oh suffer me not so mad, as while I passe on the way, I should forget the end. It is that other life that I must trust to: with thee it is that I shall continue: Oh let me not be so foolish, as to settle my selfe on what I must leave, and to neglect eternitie. I have seene enough of this earth, and yet I love it too much. O let me see heaven another while, and love it so much more than the earth, by how much the things there are more worthy to be loved. Oh God, looke downe on thy wretched Pilgrim; and teach me to looke up to thee, and to see thy goodnesse in the Land of the living. Thou that boughtest heaven for me, guide me thither; and for the price that it cost thee, for thy mercies sake, in spight of all tentations, enlighten thou my soule, direct it, crowne it.

Chap. XXXIV.

7. A cheerefull Confidence of obtaining what we have requested and enforced.

After this Enforcement, doth follow Confidence; wherein the soule, after many doubtfull and unquiet bickerings, gathereth up her forces, and cheerefully rowzeth up it selfe; and like one of Davids Worthies, breaketh thorow a whole Armie of doubts, and fetcheth comfort from the Well of life, which, though in some latter, yet in all is a sure reward from God of sincere Meditation.

Yea, be thou bold, O my soule, and doe not meerely crave, but challenge this favour of God, as that which he oweth thee, he oweth it thee, because he hath promised it, and by his mercy hath made his gift, his debt: Faithfull is he that hath promised, which will also doe it. Hath he not given thee not only his hand in the sweet hopes of the Gospell, but his seale also in the Sacraments? Yea, besides promise, hand, seale; hath he not given thee a sure earnest of thy salvation, in some weake, but true graces? Yet more, hath he not given thee, besides Earnest, possession? while he that is the Truth and Life, saith, He that beleeveth hath everlasting life, and hath passed from death to life. Canst thou not then be content to cast thy selfe upon this blessed issue; If God be mercifull, I am glorious; I have thee already, Oh my life? God is faithfull, and I doe beleeve: who shall seperate me from the love of Christ? from my glory with Christ? who shall pull me out of my heaven? Goe to then, and returne to thy rest, O my soule; make use of that heaven wherein thou art, and be happy.

Thus we have found, that our Meditation, like the wind, gathereth strength in proceeding; and as naturall bodies, the neerer they come to their places, move with more celeritie; so doth the soule in this course of Meditation, to the unspeakable benefit of it selfe.

Chap

Chap. XXXV.

THe Concluſion remaineth: wherein we muſt adviſe (like as Phyſitians doe in their ſweats and exerciſe) that we ceaſe not over-ſuddenly, but leave off by little and little. The mind may not bee ſuffered to fall head-long from this height, but muſt alſo deſcend by degrees.

The Concluſion of our Meditation, in what order it muſt bee.

The firſt whereof, after our Confidence, ſhall be an hearty Gratulation, and thankſgiving. For, as man naturally cannot be miſerable, but he muſt complaine, and crave remedy; ſo the good heart cannot find it ſelfe happy, and not be thankfull: and this thankfulneſſe which it feeleth and expreſſeth, maketh it yet more good, and affecteth it more.

First, with Thankſgiving.

What ſhall I then doe to thee for this mercy, O thou Saviour of men? What ſhould I render to my Lord, for all his benefits? Alas! what can I give thee, which is not thine owne before? Oh that I could give thee but all thine! Thou giveſt me to drinke of this cup of ſalvation: I will therefore take the cup of ſalvation, and call upon the name of the Lord: Praiſe thou the Lord, O my ſoule; and all that is within me, praiſe his holy name. And ſince here thou beginneſt thine heaven, begin here alſo that joyfull ſong of thankſgiving, which there thou ſhalt ſing more ſweetly, and never end.

Chap. XXXVI.

AFter this Thankſgiving, ſhall follow a faithfull recommendation of our ſelves to God; wherein the ſoule doth cheerefully give up it ſelfe, and repoſe it ſelfe wholly upon her Maker and Redeemer; committing her ſelfe to him in all her wayes, ſubmitting her ſelfe to him in all his wayes, deſiring in all things to glorifie him, and to walk worthy of her high and glorious calling.

Secondly, with Recommendation of our ſoules and wayes to God.

Both which latter ſhall be done (as I have ever found) with much life and comfort, if for the full concluſion, we ſhall lift up our heart and voyce to God, in ſinging ſome Verſicle of Davids divine Pſalmes, anſwerable to our diſpoſition, and matter; whereby the heart cloſes up it ſelfe with much ſweetneſſe and contentment.

This courſe of Meditation thus heartily obſerved, let him that practiſeth it, tell me whether hee find not that his ſoule, which at the beginning of this exerciſe did but creepe and grovell upon earth, do not now in the concluſion ſoare aloft in Heaven; and being before aloofe off, doe not now find it ſelfe neere to God, yea with him and in him.

Chap. XXXVII.

THus have I endevoured (Right Worſhipfull Sir) according to my ſlender faculty, to preſcribe a method of Meditation: not upon ſo ſtrict tearmes of neceſſity, that whoſoever goeth not my way, erreth. Divers paths lead oft-times to the ſame end, and every man aboundeth in his owne ſenſe. If experience and cuſtome hath made another forme familiar to any man, I forbid it not: as that learned Father ſaid of his Tranſlation, Let him uſe his owne, not contemne mine. If any man be to chuſe, and begin, let him practice mine, till he meet with a better Maſter: If another courſe may be better, I am ſure this is good. Neither is it to be ſuffered, that like as fantaſticall men, while they doubt what faſhioned ſute they ſhould weare, put on nothing; ſo, that we Chriſtians ſhould neglect the matter of this worthy buſineſſe, while we nicely ſtand upon the forme thereof. Wherein give me leave to complaine with juſt ſorrow and ſhame, that if there be any Chriſtian duty, whoſe omiſſion is notoriouſly ſhamefull and prejudiciall to the ſoules of Profeſſors, it is this of Meditation. This is the very end God hath given us our ſoules for: we miſ-ſpend them, if we uſe them not thus. How lamentable is it, that we ſo employ them, as if our faculty of diſcourſe ſerved for nothing but our earthly proviſion? as if our reaſonable and Chriſtian minds were appointed for the ſlaves and drudges of this body, only to bee the Caters and Cookes of our Appetite?

An Epilogue.

Reproving the neglect of Meditation.

The world filleth us, yea cloyeth us: we find our ſelves worke enough to thinke; What have I yet? How may I get more? What muſt I lay out? What ſhall I leave for poſterity? How may I prevent the wrong of mine Adverſary? How may I returne it? What anſwers ſhall I make to ſuch allegations? What entertainment ſhall I give to ſuch friends! What courſes ſhall I take in ſuch ſuits? In what paſtime ſhall I ſpend this day? In what the next? What advantage ſhall I reape by this practice, what loſſe? What was ſaid, anſwered, replied, done, followed? A Goodly thoughts, and fit for ſpirituall minds! Say there were no other world; how could wee ſpend our cares otherwiſe? Unto this only neglect, let mee aſcribe the commonneſſe of that Laodicean temper of men, or (if that be worſe) of the dead coldneſſe which hath ſtricken the hearts of many, having left them nothing but the bodies of men, and viſors of Chriſtians; to this only, They have not meditated. It is not more impoſſible to live without an heart, than to bee devout without Meditation. B

Exhorting to the uſe of Meditation.

Would God therefore my words could bee in this (as the Wiſe-man ſaith the words of the wiſe are) like unto Goads in the ſides of every Reader, to quicken him up out of this dull and lazy ſecurity, to a cheerefull practice of this Divine Meditation. Let him curſe me upon his death-bed, if looking backe from thence to the beſtowing of his former times, he acknowledge not theſe houres placed the moſt happily in his whole life; if he then wiſh not he had worne out more dayes in ſo profitable and heavenly a worke.

A MEDITATION OF DEATH ACCORDING to the former Rules.

AND now, my ſoule, that thou haſt thought of the end, what can fit thee better than to think of the way? And though the forepart of the way to Heaven be a good life, the latter and more immediate is death: Shall I call it the way, or the gate of life? Sure I am, that by it onely wee [illegible] into that bleſſednesse, whereof wee have ſo thought, that wee have found it cannot be thought of enough. The Entrance.

What then is this death, but the taking downe of theſe ſtickes, whereof this earthly Tent is compoſed? The ſeparation of two great and old friends till they meet againe? The Gaole-delivery of a long priſoner? Our journey into that other world, for which wee, and this thorow-fare were made? Our payment of our firſt debt to Nature, the ſleepe of the body, and the awaking of the ſoule? The Deſcription.

But leſt thou ſhouldeſt ſeeme to flatter him, whoſe name and face hath ever ſeemed terrible to others, remember that there are more deaths than one: if the firſt death be not ſo fearefull as he is made, (his horrour lying more in the conceit of the beholder, than in his owne aſpect) ſurely, the ſecond is not made ſo fearefull as he is. No living eye can behold the terrours thereof: it is as impoſſible to ſee them, as to feele them, and live. Nothing but a name is common to both: The firſt hath men, caſualties, diſeaſes, for his executioners: the ſecond, Devils. The power of the firſt is in the grave: the ſecond, in hell. The worſt of the firſt, is ſenſleſneſſe; the eaſieſt of the ſecond, is, a perpetuall ſenſe of all the paine that can make a man exquiſitely miſerable. The diviſion.

Thou ſhalt have no buſineſſe, O my ſoule, with the ſecond death: Thy firſt Reſurrection hath ſecured thee: Thanke him that hath redeemed thee, for thy ſafety. And, how can I thanke thee enough, O my Saviour, which haſt ſo mercifully bought off my torment, with thy owne; and haſt drunke off that bitter potion of thy Fathers wrath, whereof the very taſte had beene our death? Yea, ſuch is thy mercy, O thou Redeemer of men, that thou haſt not onely ſubdued the ſecond death, but reconciled the firſt; ſo as thy children taſte not at all of the ſecond, and find the firſt ſo ſweetned to them by thee, that they complaine of bitterneſſe. It was not thou, O God, that madeſt death; our hands are they that were guilty of this evill. Thou ſaweſt all thy work that it was good; wee brought forth ſin, and ſin brought forth death. To the diſcharge of thy Juſtice and Mercy, we acknowledge this miſerable conception; and needs muſt that child be ugly, that hath ſuch parents. Certainly, if Being and Good be (as they are) of an equall extent, then the diſſolution of our Being muſt needs in it ſelfe bee evill. How full of darkneſſe and horrour then is the privation of this vitall light? eſpecially ſince thy wiſdome intended it to the revenge of ſinne, which is no leſſe than the violation of an infinite Juſtice? it was thy juſt pleaſure to The Cauſes.

plague us with this brood of our owne begetting: Behold, that death which was not till then in the world, is now in every thing: one great Conquerour finds it in a Slate, another finds it in a Fly; one finds it in the kernel of a Grape, another in the prick of a thorne; one in the taſte of an herb, another in the ſmell of a flower; one in a bit of meat, another in a mouthfull of aire; one in the very ſight of a danger, another in the conceit of what might have beene: Nothing in all our life is too little to hide death under it: There need no cords, nor knives, nor ſwords, nor Peeces: wee have made our ſelves as many wayes to death, as there are helps of living. A

But if we were the authors of our death, it was thou that didſt alter it: our diſobedience made it, and thy mercy made it not to be evill. It had beene all one to thee, to have taken away the very Being of death from thine owne: but thou thoughteſt it beſt to take away the ſting of it only, as good Phyſitians, when they would apply their Leeches, ſcowre them with Salt and Nettles, and when their corrupt bloud is voyded, imploy them to the health of the patient. It is more glory to thee, that thou haſt removed enmity from this Eſau, that now hee meets us with kiſſes in ſtead of frownes: and if wee receive a blow from this rough hand, yet that very ſtripe is healing. Oh how much more powerfull is thy death, than our ſinne! O my Saviour, how haſt thou perfumed and ſoftned this bed of my grave by dying? How can it grieve me to tread in thy ſteps to glory? B

The Effects. Our ſinne made death our laſt enemy; thy goodneſſe hath made it the firſt friend that we meet with, in our paſſage to another world: For as ſhe that receives us from the knees of our mother, in our firſt entrance to the light, waſheth, cleanſeth, dreſſeth us, and preſents us to the breſt of our nurſe, or the armes of our mother, challenges [illegible]ne intereſt in us when we come to our growth; ſo death, which in our paſſage to that other life, is the firſt that receives and preſents our naked ſoules to the hands of thoſe Angels, which carry it up to her glory, cannot but thinke this office friendly & meritorious. What if this guide lead my carcaſe through corruption and rottenneſſe, when my ſoule in the very inſtant of her ſeparation knowes it ſelfe happy? What if my friends mourne about my bed and coffin, when my ſoule ſees the ſmiling face and loving embracements of him that was dead, and is alive? What care I, who ſhuts theſe earthen eyes, when death opens the eye of my ſoule, to ſee as I am ſeene? What if my name be forgotten of men, when I live above with the God of Spirits? C

The Subject. If death would be ſtill an enemy, it is the worſt part of me that he hath any thing to doe withall: the beſt is above his reach, and gaines more than the other can leeſe. The worſt peece of the horrour of death is the grave: and ſet aſide infidelity, what ſo great miſery is this? That part which is corrupted, feeles it not: that which is free from corruption, feeles an abundant recompence, aud foreſees a joyfull reparation. What is here but a juſt reſtitution? We carry heaven and earth wrapt up in our boſomes: each part returnes homeward: And if the exceeding glory of heaven cannot countervaile the doleſomeneſſe of the grave, what doe I beleeving? But if the beauty of that celeſtiall Sanctuary doe more than equalize the horrour of the bottomeleſſe pit, how can I ſhrinke at earth like my ſelfe, when I know my glory? And if examples can move thee any whit, looke behind thee, O my ſoule, and ſee which of the Worthies of that ancient latter world, which of the Patriarchs, Kings, Prophets, Apoſtles, have not trod in theſe red ſteps. Where are thoſe millions of generations, which have hitherto peopled the earth? How many paſſing-bels haſt thou heard for thy known friends? How many ſick beds haſt thou viſited? How many eyes haſt thou ſeene cloſed? How many vaine men haſt thou ſeene that have gone into the field to ſeeke death, in hope to find an honour as fooliſh as themſelves? How many poore creatures haſt thou mulcted with death for thine own pleaſure? And canſt thou hope that that God will make a by-way and a Poſterne for thee alone, that thou maiſt paſſe to the next world, not by the gates of death, not by the bottome of the grave? D

The Adjunct. What then doeſt thou feare, O my ſoule? There are but two ſtages of death, the bed and the grave: This latter, if it have ſenſeleſneſſe, yet it hath reſt: The former, if it have paine, yet it hath ſpeedineſſe; and when it lights upon a faithfull heart, meets with E

A with many and ſtrong antidotes of comfort. The evill that is ever in motion, is not fearefull: That which both time and eternity finds ſtanding where it was, is worthy of terrour. Well may thoſe tremble at death, which find more diſtreſſe within, than without, whoſe conſciences are more ſick, and neerer to death, than their bodies. It was thy Fathers wrath that did ſo terrifie thy ſoule, O my Saviour, that it put thy body into a bloudy ſweat. The mention and thought of thy death ended in a Pſalme, but this began in an agony. Then didſt thou ſweat out my feares. The power of that agony doth more comfort all thine, than the Angels could comfort thee. That very voice deſerved an eternall ſeparation of horrour from death, where thou ſaidſt, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? Thou hadſt not complained of being left, if thou wouldeſt have any of thine left deſtitute of comfort in their parting. I know not whom I can feare, while I know whom I have beleeved, how can I be diſcoura-
B raged with the ſight of my loſſe, when I ſee ſo cleere an advantage?

The contrary.

What diſcomfort is this, to leave a fraile body, to be joyned unto a glorious head? To forſake vaine pleaſures, falſe honours, bootleſſe hopes, unſatisfying wealth, ſtormy contentments, ſinfull men, perillous tentations, a ſea of troubles, a gally of ſervitude, an evill world, and a conſuming life; for Freedome, Reſt, Happineſſe, Eternitie? And if thou wert ſentenced, O my ſoule, to live a thouſand yeeres in this body, with theſe infirmities, how wouldſt thou be wearie, not of being only, but of complaining? Whiles, ere the firſt hundred, I ſhould be a child; ere the ſecond, a beaſt; a ſtone, ere the third; and therefore ſhould be ſo farre from finding pleaſure in my continuance, that I ſhould not have ſenſe enough left, to feele my ſelfe miſerable. And when I am once gone, what difference is there betwixt the aged ſt of the firſt Patriarchs, and me, and the child that did but live to be borne, ſave only in what was;
C and that which was, is not? And if this body had no weakneſſe, to make my life tedious, yet what a torment is it, that while I live, I muſt ſin? Alas my ſoule every one of thy knowne ſins is not a diſeaſe, but a death. What an enemie art thou to thy ſelfe, if thou canſt not be content, that one bodily death ſhould excuſe thee from many ſpirituall; to caſt off thy body, that thou mayeſt be ſtripped of the rags, yea the fetters of thy ſin, and cloathed with the Robes of glory? Yet theſe termes are too hard: Thou ſhalt not be caſt off, O my body; rather thou ſhalt be put to making: this chang is no leſſe happy for thee, than for thy partner. This very skin of thine, which is now tawnie, and wrinkled, ſhall once ſhine; this earth ſhall be heaven, this duſt ſhall be glorious. Theſe eyes, that are now wearie of being witneſſes of thy ſins and miſeries, ſhall then never be weary of ſeeing the beauty of thy Saviour, and thine owne in his. Theſe eares, that have beene now tormented with the impious tongues
D of men, ſhall firſt heare the voice of the Sonne of God, and then the voices of Saints and Angels in their ſongs of Alleluja. And this tongue, that now complaines of miſeries, and feares, ſhall then beare a part in that divine harmony.

The compariſons.

In the meane time, thou ſhalt but ſleep in this bed of earth: he that hath tried the worſt of death, hath called it no worſe; very Heathens have termed them couſins; & it is no unuſuall thing for couſins of bloud, to carry both the ſame names & features. Haſt thou wont, O my body, when the day hath wearied thee, to lie downe unwillingly to thy reſt? Behold in this ſleep there is more quietneſſe, more pleaſure of viſions, more certaintie of waking, more cheerefulneſſe in riſing: why then art thou loth to thinke of laying off thy rags, and repoſing thy ſelfe? Why art thou like a child, unwilling to goe to bed? Haſt thou ever ſeene any bird, which when the cage hath bin opened, would rather ſit ſtill and ſing within her grates, than flie forth unto her free-
E dome in the woods? Haſt thou ever ſeene any priſoner, in love with his bolts and fetters? Did the Chiefe of the Apoſtles, when the Angell of God ſhined in his Jayle, and ſtrooke him on the ſide, and looſed his two chaines, and bade him, Ariſe quickly and opened both the woodden, and Iron gate, ſay, What, ſo ſoone? yet, a little ſleep? What madneſſe had it beene, rather to ſlumber betwixt his two Keepers, than to follow the Angell of God into liberty? Haſt thou ever ſeene any Mariner that hath ſaluted the Sea with ſongs, and the Hauen with teares? What ſhall I ſay to this diffidence, O my ſoule, that thou art unwilling to think of reſt after thy toile, of freedome after thy durance of the Haven after an unquiet and tempestuous passage? How many are there that seeke death, and cannot find it? meerely out of the irksomnesse of life. Hath it found thee, and offered thee better conditions, not of immunitie from evils, but of possession of more good, than thou canst think, and wouldest thou now flie from happinesse, to be rid of it? A

The Names.

What? Is it a name that troubles thee? what if men would call sleepe death, wouldst thou be afraid to close thine eyes? what hurt is it then, if he that sent the first sleepe upon man, whilest he made him an helper, send this last and soundest sleepe upon me, whiles he prepares my soule for a glorious spouse to himselfe? It is but a parting, which we call death; as two friends, when they have lead each other on the way, shake hands till they returne from their journey: If either could miscarry, there were cause of sorrow; now they are more sure of a meeting, than of a parture; what folly is it, not to be content to redeeme the unspeakable gaine of so deare a friend, with a little inrermission of enjoying him? He will returne laden with the riches of heaven, and will fetch his old partner to the participation of this glorious wealth. Goe then, my Soule, to this sure and gainfull traffique, and leave my other halfe in an harbour as safe, though not so blessed; yet so shalt thou be separated, that my very dust shall be united to thee still, and to my Saviour in thee. B

The Testimonies.

Wert thou unwilling at the command of thy Creator to joyne thy selfe at the first with this body of mine? why art thou then loath to part with that, which thou hast found, though intire, yet troublesome? Doest thou not heare Salomon say, The day of death is better than the day of thy birth? dost thou not beleeve him? or art thou in love with the worse, and displeased with the better? If any man could have found a life worthy to be preferred vnto death, so great a King must needs have done it; now in his very Throne, he commends his Coffin. Yea, what wilt thou say to those Heathens that mourned at the birth, and feasted at the death of their children? They knew the miseries of living as well as thou, the happinesse of dying they could not know; and if they rejoyced out of a conceit of ceasing to be miserable; how shouldest thou cheere thy selfe, in an expectation, yea an assurance of being happy? He that is the Lord of Life, and tried what it was to die, hath proclaimed them blessed that die in the Lord. Those are blessed, I know, that live in him, but they rest not from their labours; Toyle and sorrow is betweene them, and a perfect enjoying of that blessednesse, which they now possesse only in hope and inchoation; when death hath added rest, their happinesse is finished. C

The taste of our Meditation.

O death, how sweet is that rest, wherewith thou refreshest the weary Pilgrims of this vale of mortality? How pleasant is thy face to those eyes, that have accquainted themselves with the sight of it, which to strangers is grim and gastly? How worthy art thou to be welcome, unto those that know whence thou art, and whither thou tendest? who that knowes thee, can feare thee? who that is not all nature, would rather hide himselfe amongst the baggage of this vile life, than follow thee to a Crowne? what indifferent Judge that should see life painted over, with vaine semblances of pleasures, attended with troups of sorrowes on the one side, and on the other with uncertaintie of continuance; and certaintie of dissolution; and then should turne his eies unto death, and see her black, but comely, attended on the one hand with a momentany paine with eternity of glory on the other, would not say, out of choice that which the Prophet said out of passion, It is better for me to die than to live? D

The Complaint.

But, O my Soule, what ailes thee to be thus suddenly backward, and fearefull? No heart hath more freely discoursed of death, in speculation; no tongue hath more extolled it in absence. And now, that it is come to thy beds side, and hath drawne thy curtaines, and takes thee by the hand, and offers thee service, thou shrinkest inward and by the paleneſse of thy face, & wildnes of thine eye, bewraiest an amazement at the presence of such a guest. That face, which was so familiar to thy thoughts, is now unwelcome to thine eies; I am ashamed of this weak irresolution. Whitherto have tended all thy serious meditations? what hath Christianity done to thee, if thy feares be still heathenish? is this thine imitation of so many worthy Saints of God, whom thou hast seene entertaine the violentest deaths with smiles and songs? Is this the E fruit

A fruit of thy long and frequent inſtruction? Didſt thou thinke death would have been contentwith words? didſt thou hope it would ſuffice thee to talke, while all other ſuffer? Where is thy faith? Yea, where art thou thy ſelfe, O my ſoule? Is heaven worthy of no more thanks, no more joy? Shall Hereticks, ſhall Pagans give death a better welcome than thou? Hath thy Maker, thy Redeemer ſent for thee, and art thou loth to goe? hath he ſent for thee, to put thee in poſſeſſion of that glorious Inheritrance, which thy wardſhip hath cheerfully expected, and art thou loth to goe? Hath God with this Sergeant of his, ſent his Angels to fetch thee, and art thou loth to goe? Rouſe up thy ſelfe for ſhame, O my ſoule: and if ever thou haſt truly beleeved, ſhake off this unchriſtian diffidence, and addreſſe thy ſelfe joyfully for thy glory.

The wiſh.

Yea, O my Lord, it is thou, that muſt raiſe up this faint and drooping heart of mine; thou only canſt rid me of this weake and cowardly diſtruſt; Thou that ſendeſt
B for my ſoule, canſt prepare it for thy ſelfe; thou only canſt make thy meſſenger welcome to me. O that I could but ſee thy face through death! O that I could ſee death, not as it was, but as thou haſt made it! Oh that I could heartily pledge thee, my Saviour, in this cup, that ſo I might drink new wine with thee, in thy Fathers Kingdome!

The Confeſſion.

But alas, O my God, nature is ſtrong and weake in me, at once: I cannot wiſh to welcome death, as it is worthy; when I look for moſt courage, I find ſtrongeſt temptations: I ſee and confeſſe, that when I am my ſelfe, thou haſt no ſuch coward as I: Let me alone, and I ſhall ſhame that name of thine, which I have profeſſed: every ſecure worldling ſhall laugh at my feebleneſſe. O God, were thy Martyrs thus haled to their ſtakes? might they not have been looſed from their racks, and chooſe to dye in thoſe torments? Let it be no ſhame for thy ſervant to take up that complaint which thou mad'ſt of thy better Attendants; The ſpirit is willing, but the fleſh is weake.

The Petition and enforcement.

C O thou God of ſpirits, that haſt coupled theſe two together, unite them in a deſire of their diſſolution; weaken this fleſh to receive, and encourage this ſpirit either to deſire, or to contemne death; and now, as I grow neerer to my home, let me increaſe in the ſenſe of my joyes: I am thine, ſave mee, O Lord; It was thou that didſt put ſuch courage into thine ancient, and late witneſſes, that they either invited, or challenged death; and held their perſecutors their beſt friends, for letting them looſe from theſe gieves of fleſh. I know, thine hand is not ſhortned; neither any of them hath received more proofes of thy former mercies; Oh let thy goodneſſe enable me to reach them in the comfortable ſteadineſſe of my paſſage: Doe but draw this Vaile a little, that I may ſee my glory, and I cannot but be inflamed with the deſire of it: It was not I, that either made this body for the earth, or this ſoule for my body, or this heaven for my ſoule, or this glory of Heaven, or this entrance into glory: All is thine owne worke; Oh perfect what thou haſt begun, that thy praiſe and my happineſſe may be conſummate at once.

The aſſurance or Confidence.

Yea, O my ſoule, what need'ſt thou wiſh the God of mercies to bee tender of his owne honour? Art thou not a member of that body, wherof thy Saviour is the Head? canſt thou drowne, when thy Head is above? was it not for thee, that hee triumpht over death? Is there any feare in a foyled adverſary? Oh my Redeemer, I have already overcome in thee: how can I miſcarry in my ſelfe? Oh my ſoule, thou haſt marched valiantly! Behold, the Damoſels of that heavenly Jeruſalem come forth with Timbrels and Harps to meet thee, and to applaud thy ſucceſſe: And now, there remaines nothing for thee but a Crowne of righteouſnes, which that righteous Judge ſhall give thee, at that Day: Oh Death, where is thy ſting? Oh grave, where is thy victory?

The Thankſgiving.

Returne now unto thy reſt, O my ſoule; for the Lord hath beene beneficiall unto E thee. O Lord God, the ſtrength of my ſalvation, thou haſt covered my head in the day of battell: O my God, and King, I will extoll thee, and will bleſſe thy name for ever, and ever. I will bleſſe thee daily, and praiſe thy Name for ever, and ever. Great is the Lord, and moſt worthy to be praiſed, and his greatneſſe is incomprehenſible: I will meditate of the beauty of thy glorious Majeſty, and thy wonderfull works: Hoſanna, thou that dwelleſt in the higheſt Heavens. Amen.

HOLY OBSERVATIONS.

LIB. I.

By Ios. Hall.

¶ Imprinted at London, 1634.

OBSERVATIONS

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE EDWARD LORD DENNY, BARON Of Waltham, My moſt bountifull Patron; Grace and Peace.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

THis advantage a Scholler hath above others, that he cannot be idle, and that he can worke without inſtruments. For, the mind inured to contemplation, will ſet it ſelfe on worke, when other occaſions faile: and hath no more power not to ſtudy, than the eye which is open, hath, not to ſee ſome thing; in which buſineſſe it carries about his owne Library, neither can complaine to want Bookes while it enjoyeth it ſelfe.

I could not then neglect the commodity of this plentifull leaſure in my ſo eaſie attendance here; but (though beſides my courſe, and without the helpe of others writings) muſt needs buſie my ſelfe in ſuch thoughts as I have ever given account of, to your Lordſhip: ſuch as I hope ſhall not bee unprofitable, nor unwelcome to their Patron, to their Readers. I ſend them forth from hence, under your Honourable name; to ſhew you that no abſence, no imployment can make me forget my due reſpect to your Lordſhip: to whom (next under my gracious Maſter) I have deſervedly bequeathed my ſelfe and my endevours. Your goodneſſe hath not wont to magnifie it ſelfe more in giving, than in receiving ſuch like holy preſents: the knowledge whereof hath intitled you to more labours of this nature (if I have numbred aright) than any of your Peeres. I miſdoubt not either your acceptation, or their uſe. That God, who hath above all his other favours given your Lordſhip, euen in theſe careleſſe times, an heart truly religious, give you an happie increaſe of all his heavenly graces by my unworthy ſervice. To his gracious care I daily commend your Lordſhip with my Honourable Lady; wiſhing you both, all that little joy earth can affoord you, and fulneſſe of glory above.

Non-ſuch. July 3.

Your Lordſhips

Moſt humbly devoted for ever in all dutie and obſervance,

Ios. Hall.

HOLY OBSERVATIONS.

1

AS there is nothing ſooner dry than a teare; ſo there is nothing ſooner out of ſeaſon than worldly ſorrow: which if it be freſh and ſtill bleeding, finds ſome to comfort and pity it; if ſtale and skinned over with time, is rather entertained with ſmiles, than commiſeration: But the ſorrow of repentance comes never out of time. All times are alike unto that Eternity, whereto we make our ſpiritual mones: That which is paſt, that which is future, are both preſent with him. It is neither weake nor uncomely, for an old C man to weepe for the ſinns of his youth. Thoſe teares can never be ſhed either too ſoone, or too late.

Some men live to be their owne executors for their good name; which they ſee (not honeſtly) buried, before themſelves die. Some other of great place, and ill deſert, part with their good name and breath, at once. There is ſcarce a vicious man, whoſe name is not rotten before his carcaſſe. Contrarily, the good mans name is oft-times heire to his life; either borne after the death of the parent, for that envy would not ſuffer it to come forth before: or perhaps ſo well growne up in his life-time, that the hope thereof is the ſtaffe of his age, and joy of his death. A wicked mans name may be feared a while; ſoone after, it is either forgotten or curſed: The good man either D ſleepeth with his body in peace, or waketh (as his ſoule) in glory.

Oft-times thoſe which ſhew much valour while there is equall poſſibility of life, when they ſee a preſent neceſſity of death, are found moſt ſhamefully timorous. Their courage was before grounded upon hope: that, cut off, leaves them at once deſperate and cowardly: whereas men of feebler ſpirits meet more cheerfully with death; becauſe though their courage be leſſe, yet their expectation was more.

I have ſeldome ſeene the ſonne of an excellent and famous man, excellent: But that an ill bird hath an ill egge, is not rare; children poſſeſſing as the bodily diſeaſes, ſo the vices of their parents. Vertue is not propagated: Vice is; even in them which have it not reigning in themſelves. The graine is ſowne pure, but comes up with chaffe and E huske. Haſt thou a good ſonne? He is Gods, not thine. Is he evill? Nothing but his ſinne is thine. Help by thy prayers and endevours to take away that which thou haſt given him, and to obtaine from God that which thou haſt, and canſt not give: Elſe thou maiſt name him a poſſeſſion; but thou ſhalt find him a loſſe.

Theſe things be comely and pleaſant to ſee, and worthy of honour from the beholder: A young Saint, an old Martyr, a religious Souldier, a conſcionable Stateſman, a great man courteous, a learned man humble, a ſilent woman, a child underſtanding the eye of his Parent, a merry companion without vanity, a friend not changed with honour, a ſick man cheerefull, a ſoule departing with comfort and aſſurance. A

I have oft obſerved in merry meetings ſolemnly made, that ſomewhat hath fallen out croſſe, either in the time, or immediatly upon it; to ſeaſon (as I think) our immoderation in deſiring or enjoying our friends: and againe, events ſuſpected, have proved ever beſt; God herein bleſſing our awfull ſubmiſſion with good ſucceſſe. In all theſe humane things, indifferency is ſafe. Let thy doubts be ever equall to thy deſires: ſo thy diſappointment ſhall not be grievous, becauſe thy expectation was not peremptory.

You ſhall rarely find a man eminent in ſundry faculties of mind, or ſundry manuary trades. If his memory be excellent, his fantaſie is but dull: if his fancy bee buſie and quicke, his judgement is but ſhallow: If his judgement be deepe, his utterance is harſh: which alſo holds no leſſe in the activities of the hand. And if it happen that one man be qualified with skill of divers trades, and practiſe this variety, you ſhall ſeldome find ſuch one thriving in his eſtate: with ſpirituall gifts it is otherwiſe; which are ſo chained together, that who excels in one, hath ſome eminency in more, yea, in all. Look upon faith: ſhe is attended with a Bevy of Graces: Hee that beleeves, cannot but have hope: if hope, patience. He that beleeves and hopes, muſt needs find joy in God: if joy, love of God; hee that loves God, cannot but love his brother: his love to God, breeds piety and care to pleaſe, ſorrow for offending, feare to offend: his love to men, fidelity and Chriſtian beneficence. Vices are ſeldome ſingle; but vertues goe ever in troups: they goe ſo thick, that ſometimes ſome are hid in the crowd; which yet are, but appeare not. They may be ſhut out from ſight; they cannot be ſevered. B C

8

The heaven ever moves, and yet is the place of our reſt: Earth ever reſts, and yet is the place of our trouble. Outward motion can be no enemy to inward reſt; as outward reſt may well ſtand with inward unquietneſſe.

None live ſo ill, but they content themſelves in ſomewhat: Even the begger likes the ſmell of his diſh. It is a rare evill that hath not ſomething to ſweeten it, either in ſenſe, or in hope: otherwiſe men would grow deſperate, mutinous, envious of others, weary of themſelves. The better that thing is wherein wee place our comfort, the happier we live: and the more we love good things, the better they are to us. The worldlings comfort, though it be good to him becauſe he loves it; yet becauſe it is not abſolutely and eternally good, it failes him: wherein the Chriſtian hath juſt advantage of him, while he hath all the ſame cauſes of joy refined and exalted; beſides, more and higher, which the other knowes not of: the worldling laughes more, but the Chriſtian is more delighted. Theſe two are eaſily ſevered. Thou ſeeſt a goodly picture, or an heape of thy gold: thou laugheſt not, yet thy delight is more than in a jeſt that ſhaketh thy ſpleene. As griefe, ſo joy is not leſſe when it is leaſt expreſſed. D

10

I have ſeene the worſt natures, and moſt depraved minds, not affecting all ſins: but ſtill ſome they have condemned in others, and abhorred in themſelves. One exclaimes on covetouſnes, yet he can too well abide riotous good fellowſhip. Another inveighs againſt drunkenneſſe and exceſſe, not caring how cruell he be in uſury and oppreſſion. One cannot endure a rough and quarrellous diſpoſition, yet gives himſelfe over to unclean and laſcivious courſes. Another hates all wrongs, ſave wrong to God. One is a civill Atheiſt, another a religious Uſurer, a third an honeſt Drunkard, a fourth an unchaſte Juſticer, a fift a chaſte Quarreller. I know not whether every Devil excel in all ſins: I am ſure ſome of them have denomination from ſome ſins more ſpeciall. Let no man applaud himſelfe for thoſe ſins he wanteth, but condemne himſelfe rather for that ſinne he hath. Thou cenſureſt another mans ſin, he thine; God curſeth both. E

11

A Gold is the heavieſt of all metals: It is no wonder that the rich man is uſually carried downeward to his place. It is hard for the ſoule, clogged with many weights, to aſcend to Heaven: It muſt be a ſtrong and nimble ſoule, that can carry up it ſelfe, and ſuch a load, yet Adam and Noah flew up thither with the double Monarchy of the world, the Patriarks with much wealth, many holy Kings with maſſie Crownes and Scepters. The burthen of covetous deſires is more heavy to an empty ſoule, than much treaſure to the full. Our affections give poize or lightneſſe to earthly things. Either abate of thy load, if thou find it too preſſing, whether by having leſſe, or loving leſſe: or adde to thy ſtrength and activity, that thou maieſt yet aſcend. It is more commendable, by how much more hard, to climb into heaven with a burden.

B A Chriſtian in all his wayes muſt have three guides: Truth, Charity, Wiſdome. Truth to goe before him; Charity and Wiſdome on either hand. If any of the three be abſent, he walkes amiſſe. I have ſeene ſome doe hurt by following a truth uncharitably. And others, while they would ſalve up an error with love, have failed in their wiſdome, and offended againſt juſtice. A charitable untruth, and an uncharitable truth, and an unwiſe menaging of truth or love, are all to be carefully avoided of him, that would goe with a right foot in the narrow way.

God brought man forth at firſt, not into a wilderneſſe, but a Garden; yet then he expected the beſt ſervice of him. I never find that he delights in the miſery, but in the proſperity of his ſervants. Cheerefulneſſe pleaſes him better than a dejected and dull heavineſſe of heart. If we can be good with pleaſure, hee grudgeth not our
C joy: If not, it is beſt to ſtint our ſelves; not for that theſe comforts are not good, but becauſe our hearts are evill: faulting not their nature, but our uſe and corruption.

The homelieſt ſervice that we doe in an honeſt calling, though it be but to plow, or dig, if done in obedience, and conſcience of Gods Commandement, is crowned with an ample reward; whereas the beſt workes for their kind (preaching, praying, offering Evangelicall ſacrifices) if without reſpect of Gods injunction and glory, are loaded with curſes. God loveth adverbs; and cares not how good, but how well.

The golden infancy of ſome hath proceeded to a brazen youth, and ended in a leaden age. All humane maturities have their period: only grace hath none. I durſt never lay too much hope on the forward beginnings of wit and memory, which D have been applauded in children. I knew, they could but attaine their vigor; and that if ſooner, no whit the better: for the earlier is their perfection of wiſdome, the longer ſhall be their witleſſe age. Seaſonableneſſe is the beſt in all theſe things which have their ripeneſſe and decay. We can never hope too much of the timely bloſſomes of grace, whoſe ſpring is perpetuall, and whoſe harveſt begins with our end.

A man muſt give thankes for ſomewhat which he may not pray for. It hath beene ſaid of Courtiers, that they muſt receive injuries, and give thankes. God cannot wrong his, but hee will croſſe them; thoſe croſſes are beneficiall; all benefits challenge thanks: yet I have read, that Gods children have with condition prayed againſt them, never for them. In good things, we pray both for them, and their good uſe: in evill, for their good uſe, not themſelves; yet we muſt give thanks for both. For there
E is no evill of paine which God doth not; nothing that God doth, is not good; no good thing but is worthy of thankes.

One halfe of the world knowes not how the other lives: & therfore the better ſort pitty not the diſtreſſed; and the miſerable envy not thoſe which fare better, becauſe they know it not. Each man judges of others conditions, by his owne. The worſt ſort would be too much diſcontented, if they ſaw how far more pleaſant the life of others is. And if the better ſort (ſuch we call thoſe which are greater) could look downe to the the infinite miſeries of inferiours, it would make them either miſerable in compaſſion, or proud in conceit. It is good, ſometimes, for the delicate rich man to looke into the poore mans Cupbord : and ſeeing God in mercy gives him not to know their ſorrow by experience, to know it yet in ſpeculation : This ſhall teach him more thanks to God, more mercy to men, more contentment in himſelfe. A

Such as a mans prayer is for another, it ſhall be in time of his extremity for himſelfe : for though he love himſelfe more than others, yet his apprehenſion of God is alike for both. Such as his prayer is in a former extremity, it ſhall be alſo in death: this way we may have experience even of a thing future : If God have been farre off from thee in a fit of thine ordinary ſickneſſe, feare leſt hee will not bee neerer thee in thy laſt : what differs that from this, but in time ? Correct thy dulneſſe upon former proofes ; or elſe at laſt thy devotion ſhall want life before thy body. B

19

Thoſe that come to their meat as to a medicine (as Auguſtine reports of himſelfe) live in an auſtere and Chriſtian temper, and ſhall be ſure not to joy too much in the creature, nor to abuſe themſelves: Thoſe that come to their medicine as to meat, ſhal be ſure to live miſerably and dye ſoone. To come to meat, if without a gluttonous appetite and palate, is allowed to Chriſtians : To come to meat as to a ſacrifice unto the belly, is a moſt baſe and brutiſh idolatry.

20

The worſt that ever were, even Cain and Iudas, have had ſome Fautors that have honoured them for Saints : and the Serpent that beguiled our firſt Parents, hath in that name had divine honour and thanks. Never any man trod ſo perillous and deep ſteps, but ſome have followed, and admired him. Each maſter of Hereſie hath found ſome clients ; even hee, that taught all mens opinions were true. Againe, no man hath beene ſo exquiſite, but ſome have detracted from him, even in thoſe qualities, which have ſeemed moſt worthy of wonder to others. A man ſhall be ſure to be backed by ſome, either in good or evill, and by ſome ſhouldred in both. It is good for a man not to ſtand upon his Abbetters, but his quarrell, and not to depend upon others, but himſelfe. C

21

Wee ſee thouſands of creatures dye for our uſe, and never doe ſo much as pitty them : why doe we think much to dye once for God ? They are not ours ſo much as we are his ; nor our pleaſure ſo much to us, as his glory to him : their lives are loſt to us, ours but changed to him.

22

Much ornament is no good ſigne : painting of the face argues an ill complexion of body, a worſe mind. Truth hath a face both honeſt and comely, and lookes beſt in her owne colours : but, above all, Divine Truth is moſt faire, and moſt ſcorneth to borrow beauty of mans wit or tongue : ſhee loveth to come forth in her native grace, like a princely Matron ; and counts it the greateſt indignity, to bee dallied with as a wanton Strumpet : ſhee looks to command reverence, not pleaſure : ſhee would bee kneeled to, not laughed at. To prank her up in vaine dreſſes and faſhions, or to ſport with her in a light and youthfull manner, is moſt abhorring from her nature : they know her not, that give her ſuch entertainment; and ſhall firſt know her angry, when they doe know her. Againe, ſhe would be plaine, but not baſe, not ſluttiſh: ſhe would be clad, not gariſhly, yet not in rags : ſhe likes as little to be ſet out by a baſe ſoile, as to ſeeme credited with gay colours. It is no ſmall wiſdome to know her juſt guiſe, but more to follow it ; and ſo to keep the meane, that while we pleaſe her, we diſcontent not the beholders. D E

23

In worldly carriage, ſo much is a man made of, as he takes upon himſelfe : but ſuch is Gods bleſſing upon true humility, that it ſtil procureth reverence. I never ſaw Chriſtian leſſe honoured for a wiſe neglect of himſelfe. If our dejection proceed from the conſcience of our want, it is poſſible we ſhould be as little eſteemed of others, as of our ſelves:

A ſelves: but if we have true graces, and prize them not at the higheſt, others ſhall value both them in us, and us for them, and with uſury give us that honour we withheld modeſtly from our ſelves.

He that takes his full liberty in what he may, ſhall repent him: how much more in what he ſhould not? I never read of Chriſtian that repented him of too little worldly delight. The ſureſt courſe I have ſtill found in all earthly pleaſures, to riſe with an appetite, and to be ſatisfied with a little.

There is a time when Kings goe not forth to warfare: our ſpirituall warre admits no intermiſſion: it knowes no night, no winter, abides no peace, no truce. This calls us not into garriſon, where we may have eaſe and reſpit, but into pitched fields con-
B tinually: we ſee our enemies in the face alwayes, and are alwayes ſeene and aſſaulted; ever reſiſting, ever defending, receiving and returning blowes. If either we be negligent or weary, wee dye: what other hope is there while one fights, and the other ſtands ſtill? We can never have ſafety and peace, but in victory. There muſt our reſiſtance be couragious and conſtant, where both yeelding is death, and all treaties of peace mortall.

Neutrality in things good or evill, is both odious, and prejudiciall; but in matters of an indifferent nature is ſafe and commendable. Herein taking of parts maketh ſides, and breaketh unity. In an unjuſt cauſe of ſeparation, hee that favoureth both parts may (perhaps) have leaſt love of either ſide, but hath moſt charity in himſelfe.

27

C Nothing is more abſurd than that Epicurean reſolution, Let us eat and drinke, to morrow we ſhall dye: As if we were made only for the panch, and lived that we might live: yet there was never any naturall man found ſavour in that meat which hee knew ſhould be his laſt: whereas they ſhould ſay, Let us faſt and pray, to morrow wee ſhall dye: for, to what purpoſe is the body ſtrengthned, that it may periſh? Whoſe greater ſtrength makes our death more violent. No man beſtowes a coſtly roofe on a ruinous tenement: that mans end is eaſie and happy, whom death finds with a weake body, and a ſtrong ſoule.

Sometime, even things in themſelves naturally good, are to be refuſed for thoſe, which (being evill) may be an occaſion to a greater good. Life is in it ſelfe good, and death evill: elſe David, Elias, and many excellent Martyrs would not have fled, to hold
D life, and avoid death; nor Ezechiah have prayed for it, nor our Saviour have bidden us to flee for it, nor God promiſed it to his for a reward: yet if in ſome caſes we hate not life, wee love not God, nor our ſoules. Herein, as much as in any thing, the perverſeneſſe of our nature appeares, that we wiſh death, or love life upon wrong cauſes: we would live for pleaſure, or we would dye for paine; Iob for his ſores, Elias for his perſecution, Ionas for his Gourd would preſently die, and will needs out-face God that it is better for him to dye than to live: wherein wee are like to garriſon-ſouldiers, that while they live within ſafe walls, and ſhew themſelves once a day rather for ceremonie and pompe, than need or danger, like warfare well enough; but if once called forth to the field, they wiſh themſelves at home.

E Not onely the leaſt, but the worſt is ever in the bottome: what ſhould God doe with the dregs of our age? When ſinne will admit thee his Client no longer, then God ſhall bee beholden to thee for thy ſervice: Thus is God dealt with in all other offerings: The worſt and leaſt ſheafe muſt be Gods Tenth: The deformedſt or ſimpleſt of our children muſt be Gods Miniſters: the uncleanlieſt and moſt careleſſe houſe muſt be Gods Temple: the idleſt and ſleepieſt houres of the day muſt bee reſerved for our prayers: The worſt part of our age for devotion. We would have God give us ſtill of the beſt, and are ready to murmure at every little evill he ſends us: yet nothing is bad enough for him, of whom we receive all. Nature condemnes this inequality; equality; and tels us, that he which is the Author of good, ſhould have the beſt; and he which gives all ſhould have his choyce. A

When we goe about an evill buſineſſe, it is ſtrange how ready the devill is to ſet us forward; how carefull, that we ſhould want no furtherances. So that if a man would be lewdly witty, he ſhall be ſure to be furniſhed with ſtore of prophane jeſts, wherein a looſe heart hath double advantage of the conſcionable. If hee would be voluptuous, he ſhall want neither objects nor opportunities. The currant paſſage of ill enterpriſes is ſo farre from giving cauſe of encouragement, that it ſhould juſtly fright a man to looke backe to the Author; and to conſider that hee therefore goes faſt, becauſe the devill drives him.

In the choyce of companions for our converſation, it is good dealing with men of good natures: for though grace exerciſeth her power in bridling nature, yet, (ſith we are ſtill men, at the beſt) ſome ſwinge ſhe will have in the moſt mortified. Auſterity, ſullenneſſe, or ſtrangeneſſe of diſpoſition, and whatſoever qualities may make a man unſociable, cleave faſter to our nature, than thoſe which are morally evill. True Chriſtian love may bee ſeparated from acquaintance, and acquaintance from intireneſſe: Theſe are not qualities to hinder our love, but our familiaritie. B

32

Ignorance, as it makes bold, intruding men careleſly into unknowne dangers; ſo alſo it makes men oft-times cauſeleſly fearefull. Herod feared Chriſts comming, becauſe he miſtooke it: if that Tyrant had knowne the manner of his ſpirituall Regiment, hee had ſpared both his owne fright and the bloud of other. And hence it is that we feare death, becauſe we are not acquainted with the vertue of it. Nothing but innocency and knowledge can give ſound confidence to the heart. C

33

Where are divers opinions, they may be all falſe; there can be but one true: and that one truth oft-times muſt bee fetcht by peece-meale out of divers branches of contrary opinions. For, it falls out not ſeldome, that Truth is through ignorance or raſh vehemency, ſcattered into ſundry parts; and like to a little Silver melted amongſt the ruines of a burnt houſe, muſt be tried out from heaps of much ſuperfluous aſhes. There is much paines in the ſearch of it; much skill in finding it: the value of it once found, requites the coſt of both.

34

Affectation of ſuperfluity, is in all things a ſigne of weakneſſe: As, in words, he that uſeth circumlocutions to expreſſe himſelfe, ſhewes want of memory and want of proper ſpeech: And much talke argues a braine feeble and diſtempered. What good can any earthly thing yeeld us beſide his uſe? and what is it but vanity, to affect that which doth us no good? and what uſe is in that which is ſuperfluous? It is a great skill to know what is enough, and great wiſdome to care for no more. D

35

Good things, which in abſence were deſired, now offering themſelves to our preſence, are ſcarce entertained; or at leaſt not with our purpoſed cheerefulneſſe. Chriſts comming to us, and our going to him, are in our profeſſion well eſteemed, much wiſhed: but when hee ſingleth us out by a direct meſſage of death, or by ſome fearefull ſigne giveth likelihood of a preſent returne, we are as much affected with feare, as before with deſire. All changes, although to the better, are troubleſome for the time, untill our ſetling: There is no remedy hereof but inward prevention: Our mind muſt change, before our eſtate be changed. E

36

Thoſe are greateſt enemies to Religion, that are not moſt irreligious. Atheiſts, though in themſelves they be the worſt, yet are ſeldome found hot Perſecutors of others: whereas thoſe which in ſome one fundamentall point be heretical, are commonly moſt violent in oppoſitions. One hurts by ſecret infection, the other by open reſiſtance: One is careleſſe of all truth, the other vehement for ſome untruth.

truth. An Atheist is worthy of more hatred, an Heretike of more feare; both of avoydance.

Wayes, if never used, cannot but be faire; if much used, are made commodiously passable; if before oft used, and now seldome, they become deepe and dangerous. If the heart be not at all inured to meditation, it findeth no fault with it selfe; not for that it is innocent, but secure; if often, it findeth comfortable passage for his thoughts; if rarely, and with intermission, tedious and troublesome. In things of this nature, we only escape complaint, if we use them either alwayes or never.

38

Our sensuall hand holds fast whatsoever delight it apprehendeth: our spirituall hand easily remitteth; because appetite is stronger in us than grace: whence it is, that we so hardly deliver our selves of earthly pleasures, which we have once entertained; and with such difficulty draw our selves to a constant course of faith, hope, and spirituall joy, or to the renued acts of them once intermitted. Age is naturally weak, and youth vigorous; but in us the old man is strong, the new faint and feeble: the fault is not in grace, but in us: Faith doth not want strength, but we want faith.

39

It is not good in worldly estates for a man to make himselfe necessary; for hereupon hee is both more toyled, and more suspected: but in the sacred Commonwealth of the Church, a man cannot be engaged too deeply by his service. The ambition of spirituall well-doing breeds no danger. He that doth best, and may worst bee spared, is happiest.

40

It was a fit comparison of worldly cares, to thornes: for as they choke the Word, so they pricke our soules: Neither the Word can grow up amongst them, nor the heart can rest upon them: Neither body nor soule can find ease while they are within, or close to us. Spirituall cares are as sharp; but more profitable: they paine us, but leave the soule better. They breake our sleep, but for a sweeter rest: we are not well, but either while we have them, or after we have had them. It is as impossible to have spirituall health without these, as to have bodily strength with the other.

41

In temporall good things, it is best to live in doubt; not making full account of that which we hold in so weake a tenure: In spirituall, with confidence; not fearing that which is warranted to us by an infallible promise and sure earnest. Hee lives more contentedly, that is most secure for this world, most resolute for the other.

42

God hath in nature given every man inclinations to some one particular calling; which if he follow, he excells; if he crosse, he proves a non-proficient, and changeable: but all mens natures are equally indisposed to grace, and to the common vocation of Christianity: we are all borne Heathens. To doe well, Nature must in the first be observed and followed, in the other crossed and overcome.

43

Good-man is a title given to the lowest; whereas all Titles of Greatnesse, Worship, Honour, are observed and attributed with choyce. The speech of the world bewrayes their mind, and shews the common estimation of goodnesse compared with other qualities. The World therefore is an ill Herald, and unskilfull in the true stiles. It were happy that Goodnesse were so common; and pity that it either should not stand with Greatnesse, or not be preferred to it.

Amongst all actions, Satan is ever busiest in the best, and most in the best part of the best; as in the end of Prayer, when the heart should close up it selfe with most comfort. He never feares us, but when we are well employed: and the more likelihood he sees of our profit, the more is his envy and labour to distract us. We should love our selves as much as he hates us; and therefore strive so much the more towards our good, as his malice striveth to interrupt it. Wee doe nothing, if we contend not, when when we are reſiſted. The good ſoule is ever in contradiction; denying what is granted, and contending for that which is denied; ſuſpecting when it is gain-ſaid, and fearing liberty. A

God fore-warnes ere he trie, becauſe he would be prevented: Satan ſteales upon us ſuddenly by temptations, becauſe he would foile us. If we relent not upon Gods premonition, and meet not the lingring paſe of his puniſhments, to fore-ſtall them, hee puniſheth more, by how much his warning was more evident and more large. Gods trialls muſt be met when they come: Satans muſt bee ſeene before they come; and if we be not armed ere we be aſſaulted, we ſhall be foyled ere wee can be armed.

46

It is not good to be continuall in denunciation of judgement: The noiſe to which we are accuſtomed (though loud) wakes us not; whereas a leſſe (if unuſuall) ſtirreth us. The next way to make threatnings contemned, is to make them common. It is a profitable rod that ſtrikes ſparingly, and frights ſomewhat oftner than it ſmiteth. B

47

Want of uſe cauſeth diſability, and cuſtome perfection. Thoſe that have not uſed to pray in their Cloſet, cannot pray in publike, but coldly and in forme. He that diſcontinues meditation, ſhall be long in recovering; whereas the man inured to theſe exerciſes (who is not dreſſed till he have prayed, nor hath ſupped till he have meditated) doth both theſe well, and with eaſe. Hee that intermits good duties, incurres a double loſſe: of the bleſſing that followeth good; of the faculty of doing it.

48

Chriſtianity is both an eaſie yoke, and a hard; hard to take up; eaſie to beare when once taken. The heart requires much labour, ere it can be induced to ſtoop under it; and finds as much contentment when it hath ſtooped. The worldling thinks Religion ſervility; but the Chriſtian knowes whoſe ſlave he was, till he entred into this ſervice; and that no bondage can be ſo evill, as freedome from theſe bonds. C

49

It is a wonder how full of ſhifts Nature is; ready to turne over all good purpoſes. If we thinke of death, ſhe ſuggeſts ſecretly; Tuſh, it ſhall not come yet: If of judgement for ſinne; This concernes not thee; it ſhall not come at all: If of heaven, and our labour to reach it; Trouble not thy ſelfe; it will come ſoone enough alone. Addreſſe thy ſelfe to pray; It is yet unſeaſonable; ſtay for a better opportunity: To give almes; Thou knoweſt not thine owne future wants: To reprove; What needſt thou thruſt thy ſelfe into wilfull hatred? Every good action hath his let: He can never be good, that is not reſolute. D

50

All Arts are Maids to Divinity; therefore they both vaile to her, and doe her ſervice, and ſhe, like a grave Miſtreſſe, controlls them at pleaſure: Naturall Philoſophy teacheth, that of nothing can be nothing made; and that from the privation to the habit, is no returne: Divinity takes her up for theſe; and upon ſupernaturall principles, teaches her a Creation, a Reſurrection. Philoſophy teaches us to follow ſenſe, as an infallible guide: Divinity tells her, that faith is of things not ſeene. Logick teaches us firſt to diſcourſe, then to reſolve: Divinity, to aſſent without arguing. Civill Law teacheth, that long cuſtome preſcribeth: Divinity, that old things are paſſed. Morall Philoſophy, that tallying of injuries is juſtice: Divinity, that good muſt be returned for ill. Policy, that better is a miſchiefe than an inconvenience: Divinity, that we may not doe evill, that good may enſue. The Schoole is well ordered, while Divinity keeps the Chaire: but if any other skill uſurpe it, and check their Miſtreſſe, there can follow nothing but confuſion and Atheiſme. E

51

Much difference is to be made betwixt a revolter and a man trained up in errour. A Jew and an Arrian both deny Chriſts Deity, yet this opinion is not in both puniſht with bodily death. Yea, a revolt to a leſſe errour, is more puniſhable than education

in

in a capitall Heriſie. Errours of judgement, though leſſe regarded than errours of practice, yet are more pernicious: but none ſo deadly as theirs, that once were in the truth. If truth be not ſued to, it is dangerous; but if forſaken, deſperate.

52

It is an ill argument of a good action not well done, when wee are glad that it is done. To be affected with the comfort of the conſcience of well performing it, is good: but meerely to rejoyce that the act is over, is carnall. Hee never can begin cheerefully, that is glad he hath ended.

53

He that doth not ſecret ſervice to God with ſome delight, doth but counterfeit in publike. The truth of any act or paſſion is then beſt tried, when it is without witneſſe. Openly, many ſiniſter reſpects may draw from us a forme of religious duties: ſecretly, nothing but the power of a good conſcience. It is to be feared, God hath more true and devout ſervice in Cloſets, than in Churches.

54

Words and diſeaſes grow upon us with yeeres. In age, we talke much, becauſe we have ſeene much, & ſoone after ſhall ceaſe talking for ever: We are moſt diſeaſed, becauſe nature is weakeſt; and death which is neere, muſt have harbingers: ſuch is the old age of the World. No marvell, if this laſt time be full of writing, and weak diſcourſe, full of ſects and hereſies, which are the ſickneſſes of this great and decayed body.

55

The beſt ground untilled, ſooneſt runs out into ranke weeds. Such are Gods Children; Over-growne with ſecuritie ere they are aware, unleſſe they be well exerciſed both with Gods plow of affliction, and their owne induſtry in meditation. A man of knowledge that is either negligent or un-corrected, cannot but grow wilde and godleſſe.

56

With us, vileſt things are moſt common; But with God the beſt things are moſt frequently given. Grace, which is the nobleſt of all Gods favours, is unpartially beſtowed upon all willing receivers; whereas Nobilitie of bloud and height of place, bleſſings of an inferiour nature, are reſerved for few. Herein the Chriſtian followes his Father; his prayers which are his richeſt portion, he communicates to all; his ſubſtance according to his ability, to few.

57

God therefore gives, becauſe he hath given; making his former favours, arguments for more; Man therefore ſhuts his hand, becauſe he hath opened it. There is no ſuch way to procure more from God, as to urge him with what he hath done. All Gods bleſſings are profitable and excellent; not ſo much in themſelves, as that they are inducements to greater.

58

Gods immediate actions are beſt, at firſt. The frame of this creation how exquiſite was it under his hand! afterward, blemiſhed by our ſinne: mans indevours are weak in their beginnings, and perfecter by degrees. No ſcience, no device hath ever beene perfect in his cradle; or at once hath ſeene his birth and maturitie: of the ſame nature are thoſe actions which God worketh mediately by us according to our meaſure of receit. The cauſe of both is, on the one ſide the infiniteneſſe of his wiſdome and power, which cannot be corrected by any ſecond aſſayes: On the other, our weakneſſe, helping it ſelfe by former grounds and trialls. He is an happy man that detracts nothing from Gods workes, and addes moſt to his owne.

59

The old ſaying is more common than true; that thoſe which are in hell, know no other heaven: for this makes the damned perfectly miſerable, that out of their owne torment, they ſee the felicitie of the Saints; together with their impoſſibility of attaining it. Sight without hope of fruition, is a torment alone: Thoſe that here might ſee God and will not, or doe ſee him obſcurely and love him not, ſhall once ſee him with anguiſh of ſoule and not enjoy him.

60

Sometimes evill ſpeeches come from good men, in their unadviſedneſſe: and ſometimes even the good ſpeeches of men may proceed from an ill ſpirit. No confeſſion could be better than Satan gave of Chriſt: It is not enough to conſider what is ſpoken, or by whom; but whence, and for what. The ſpirit is oftentimes tried by the ſpeech: but other-times the ſpeech muſt be examined by the ſpirit; and the ſpirit, by the rule of an higher word.

61

Greatneſſe puts high thoughts, and bigge words into a man; whereas the dejected mind takes, careleſly, what offers it ſelfe. Every worldling is baſe-minded; and therefore his thoughts creepe ſtill low upon the earth. The Chriſtian both is and knowes himſelfe truly great; and thereupon mindeth and ſpeaketh of ſpirituall, immortall, glorious, heavenly things. So much as the ſoule ſtoopeth unto earthly thoughts, ſo much is it unregenerate.

62

Long accquaintance, as it maketh thoſe things which are evill, to ſeeme leſſe evill; ſo it makes good things, which at firſt were unpleaſant, delightfull. There is no evill of paine, nor no morall good action, which is not harſh at the firſt. Continuance of evill, which might ſeeme to weary us, is the remedie and abatement of wearineſſe: and the practice of good, as it profiteth, ſo it pleaſeth. He that is a ſtranger to good and evill, finds both of them troubleſome. God therefore doth well for us, while he exerciſeth us with long afflictions; and we doe well to our ſelves, while we continually buſie our ſelves in good exerciſes.

63

Sometimes it is well taken by men, that we humble our ſelves lower than there is cauſe. Thy ſervant Iacob, ſaith that good Patriarch, to his brother, to his inferiour. And no leſſe well doth God take theſe ſubmiſſe extenuations of our ſelves; I am a worme, and no man: Surely I am more fooliſh than a man, and have not the underſtanding of a man in me. But I never find that any man bragged to God, although in a matter of truth, and within the compaſſe of his deſert, and was accepted. A man may be too lowly in his dealing with men, even unto contempt: with God he cannot; but the lower he falleth, the higher is his exaltation.

64

The ſoule is fed as the body, ſtarved with hunger as the body, requires proportionable diet and neceſſary variety, as the body. All ages and ſtatures of the ſoule beare not the ſame nouriſhment. There is milke for ſpirituall Infants, ſtrong meat for the growne Chriſtian. The ſpoone is fit for one, the knife for the other. The beſt Chriſtian is not ſo growne, that he need to ſcorne the ſpoone: but the weake Chriſtian may find a ſtrong feed dangerous. How many have beene caſt away with ſpirituall ſurfets; becauſe being but new-borne, they have ſwallowed downe bigge morſels of the higheſt miſteries of godlineſſe, which they never could digeſt; but together with them have caſt up their proper nouriſhment? A man muſt firſt know the power of his ſtomack, ere he know how with ſafetie and profit to frequent Gods Ordinary.

65

It is very hard for the beſt man in a ſudden extremity of death, to ſatisfie himſelfe in apprehending his ſtay, and repoſing his heart upon it: for the ſoule is ſo oppreſſed with ſudden terrour, that it cannot well command it ſelfe, till it have digeſted an evill. It were miſerable for the beſt Chriſtian, if all his former prayers and meditations did not ſerve to aid him in his laſt ſtraits, and meet together in the center of his extremitie; yeeding, though not ſenſible releefe, yet ſecret benefit to the ſoule: whereas the worldly man in this caſe, having not laid up for this houre, hath no comfort from God, or from others, or from himſelfe.

All externall good or evill is meaſured by ſenſe: neither can we account that either good or ill, which doth neither actually availe, nor hurt us: ſpiritually this rule holds not. All our beſt good is inſenſible. For all our future (which is the greateſt) good, we hold

A hold only in hope, and the preſent favour of God we have many times; and feele not. The ſtomack finds the beſt digeſtion even in ſleep, when we leaſt perceive it: and whiles we are moſt awake, this power worketh in us either to further ſtrength or diſeaſe, without our knowledge of what is done within: And on the other ſide; that man is moſt dangerouſly ſick, in whom nature decayes without his feeling, without complaint. To know our ſelves happy, is good: but woe were to us Chriſtians, if we could not be happy, and know it not.

There are none that ever did ſo much miſcheife to the Church, as thoſe that have beene excellent in wit and learning. Others may be ſpightfull enough, but want power to accompliſh their malice. An enemie that hath both ſtrength and craft, is worthy to be feared. None can ſinne againſt the Holy Ghoſt, but thoſe which have had former illu-
B mination. Tell not me what parts a man hath, but what grace: honeſt ſottiſhneſſe is better than prophane eminence.

The entertainment of all ſpirituall events muſt be with feare, or hope; but, of all earthly extremities, muſt be with contempt or deriſion. For what is terrible, is worthy of a Chriſtians contempt; what is pleaſant, to be turned over with a ſcorne. The meane requires a meane affection betwixt love and hatred. We may not love them, becauſe of their vanity: we may not hate them, becauſe of their neceſſary uſe. It is an hard thing to be a wiſe Oaſt, and to fit our entertainment to all commers: which if it be not done, the ſoule is ſoone waſted, either for want of cuſtomers, or for the miſ-rule of ill gueſts.

69

C God and man build in a contrary order. Man layes the foundation firſt, then addes the walles, the roofe laſt. God began the roofe firſt, ſpreading out this vault of heaven, ere he laid the Baſe of the earth. Our thoughts muſt follow the order of his workmanſhip. Heaven muſt be minded firſt; earth afterward: and ſo much more, as it is ſeene more. Our meditation muſt herein follow our ſence: A few miles give bounds to our view of earth; whereas we may neere-ſee halfe the heaven at once. He that thinks moſt both of that which is moſt ſeene, and of that which is not ſeene at all, is happieſt.

I have ever noted it a true ſigne of a falſe-heart, To be ſcrupulous and nice in ſmall matters, negligent in the maine: whereas the good ſoule is ſtill curious in ſubſtantiall points, and not careleſſe in things of an inferiour nature; accounting no duty ſo ſmall
D as to be neglected, and no care great enough for principall duties: not ſo tything Mint and Cummin, that he ſhould forget juſtice and judgement; nor yet ſo regarding judgement and juſtice, that he ſhould contemne Mint and Cummin. He that thus miſplaces his conſcience, will be found either hypocriticall or ſuperſtitious.

It argues the world full of Atheiſts, that thoſe offences which may impeach humaine ſocietie, are entertained with an anſwerable hatred and rigour: thoſe which doe immediately wrong the ſupreme majeſtie of God, are turned over with ſcarce ſo much as diſlike. If we converſed with God as we doe with men, his right would be at leaſt as precious to us as our owne. All that converſe not with God, are without God: not onely thoſe that are againſt God, but thoſe that are without God, are Atheiſts. We may be too charitable: I feare not to ſay, that theſe our laſt times abound
E with honeſt Atheiſts.

The beſt thing corrupted, is worſt: An ill man is the worſt of all creatures, an ill Chriſtian the worſt of all men, an ill profeſſour the worſt of all Chriſtians, an ill Miniſter the worſt of all profeſſours.

73

Naturally, life is before death; and death is only a privation of life: Spiritually, it is contrary. As Paul ſaith of the graine, ſo may we of man in the buſineſſe of regeneration: He muſt die before he can live: yet this death preſuppoſes a life that was once and ſhould be. God chuſes to have the difficulteſt firſt: we muſt be content with the paine of dying, ere we feele the comfort of life. As we die to nature, ere we live in glory: ſo we muſt die to ſinne, ere we can live to grace. A

Death did not firſt ſtrike Adam the firſt ſinfull man; nor Caine the firſt hypocrite; but Abel the innocent and righteous. The firſt ſoule that met with death, overcame death: the firſt ſoule that parted from earth, went to heaven. Death argues not diſpleaſure; becauſe he whom God loved beſt, dies firſt; and the murtherer is puniſhed with living.

75

The lives of moſt are miſ-ſpent, only for want of a certaine end of their actions: wherein they doe as unwiſe Archers, ſhoot away their arrowes they know not at what mark. They live only out of the preſent, not directing themſelves and their proceedings to one univerſall ſcope: whence they alter upon all change of occaſions, and never reach any perfection; neither can doe other but continue in uncertaintie, and end in diſcomfort. Others aime at one certaine mark, but a wrong one. Some (though fewer) levell at the right end, but amiſſe. To live without one maine and common end, is idleneſſe and folly. To live to a falſe end, is deceit and loſſe. True Chriſtian wiſdome both ſhews the end, and finds the way. And as cunning Politicks have many plots to compaſſe one and the ſame deſigne by a determined ſucceſſion; ſo the wiſe Chriſtian failing in the meanes, yet ſtill fetcheth about to his ſteady end with a conſtant change of endevours: ſuch one only lives to purpoſe, and at laſt repents not that he hath lived. B

76

The ſhipwrack of a good conſcience, is the caſting away of all other excellencies. It is no rare thing to note the ſoule of a wilfull ſinner ſtripped of all her graces, and by degrees expoſed to ſhame: ſo thoſe, whom we have knowne admired, have fallen to be levell with their fellows; and from thence beneath them, to a mediocritie; and afterwards to ſottiſhneſſe and contempt, below the vulgar, Since they have caſt away the beſt, it is juſt with God to take away the worſt; and to caſt off them in leſſer regards, which have rejected him in greater. C

77

It hath ever been counted more noble and ſucceſſefull to ſet upon an open enemie in his owne home, than to expect till he ſet upon us, whiles he make only a defenſive warre. This rule ſerves us for our laſt enemy Death: whence that old demand of Epicure is eaſily anſwered, Whether it be better Death ſhould come to us, or that wee ſhould meet him in the way: meet him in our minds, ere he ſeize upon our bodies. Our cowardlineſſe, our unpreparation is his advantage: whereas true boldneſſe in confronting him, diſmaies and weakens his forces. Happy is that ſoule, that can ſend out the ſcouts of his thoughts before-hand, to diſcover the power of death afarre off; and then can reſolutely encounter him at unawares upon advantage: ſuch one lives with ſecurity, dies with comfort. D

78

Many a man ſends others to heaven, and yet goes to hell himſelf: and not few having drawne others to hell, yet themſelves returne by a late repentance, to life. In a good action, it is not good to ſearch too deeply into the intention of the agent, but in ſilence to make our beſt benefit of the work: In an evill, it is not ſafe to regard the qualitie of the perſon, or his ſucceſſe, but to conſider the action abſtracted from all circumſtances, in his owne kind. So we ſhall neither neglect good deeds, becauſe they ſpeed not well in ſome hands, nor affect a proſperous evill. E

79

God doth ſome ſingular actions, wherein we cannot imitate him; ſome, wherein we may not: moſt, wherein he may and would faine be followed. He fetcheth good out of evill; ſo may we turne our owne and others ſinnes to private or publike good: we may not do evill for a good uſe; but we muſt uſe our evill once done, to good. I hope I ſhall not offend, to ſay, that the good uſe which is made of ſins, is as gainfull

to

A to God, as that which ariſes from good actions. Happy is that man, that can uſe either his good well, or his evill.

80

There is no difference betwixt anger and madneſſe, but continuance: for, raging anger is a ſhort madneſſe. What elſe argues the ſhaking of the hands and lips, paleneſſe, or redneſſe, or ſwelling of the face, glaring of the eyes, ſtammering of the tongue, ſtamping with the feet, unſteady motions of the whole body, raſh actions which we remember not to have done, diſtracted and wild ſpeeches? and madneſſe againe is nothing but a continued rage, yea ſome madneſſe rageth not: ſuch a mild madneſſe is more tolerable, than frequent and furious anger.

81

B Thoſe that would keepe ſtate, muſt keepe aloofe off; eſpecially if their qualities be not anſwerable in height to their place. For many great perſons are like a welwrought picture upon a courſe cloth; which afarre off ſhewes faire, but neer-hand the roundneſſe of the threed marres the good workmanſhip. Concealment of gifts, after ſome one commended act, is the beſt way to admiration, and ſecret honour: but he that would profit, muſt vent himſelfe oft, and liberally, and ſhew what he is, without all private regard. As therefore, many times, honour followes modeſty unlookt for; ſo, contrarily, a man may ſhew no leſſe pride in ſilence and obſcuritie, than others, which ſpeak and writ for glory. And that other pride is ſo much the worſe, as it is more unprofitable: for whereas thoſe which put forth their gifts, benefit others whiles they ſeeke themſelves; theſe are ſo wholly devoted to themſelves, that their ſecrecie doth no good to others.

82

C Such as a mans delights and cares are in health, ſuch are both his thoughts and ſpeeches commonly on his death-bed: The proud man talks of his faire ſutes, the glutton of his diſhes, the wanton of his beaſtlineſſe, the religious man of heavenly things. The tongue will hardly leave that to which the heart is inured. If we would have good motions to viſit us while we are ſick, we muſt ſend for them familiarly in our health.

He is a rare man, that hath not ſome kind of madneſſe raigning in him: One a dull madneſſe of melancholy, another a conceited madneſſe of pride; another a ſuperſtitious madneſſe of falſe devotion; a fourth of ambition, or covetouſneſſe; a fift, the furious madneſſe of anger; a ſixt, the laughing madneſſe of extreme mirth; a ſeventh, a drunken madneſſe; an eight, of outragious luſt; a ninth, the learned madneſſe of curioſitie; a tenth, the worſt madneſſe of prophaneneſſe and Atheiſme. It is as hard to reckon up
D all kinds of madneſſes, as of diſpoſitions. Some are more noted and puniſhed than others; ſo that, the mad-man in one kind as much condemnes another, as the ſober man condemnes him. Only that man is both good, and wiſe, and happie, that is free from all kinds of phrenſie.

There be ſome honeſt errours, where-with I never found that God was offended. That an husband ſhould think his owne Wife comely, although ill-favoured in the eyes of others: That a man ſhould think more meanly of his owne good parts, than of weaker in others: To give charitable (though miſtaken) conſtructions of doubtfull actions and perſons (which are the effects of naturall affection, humility, love) were never cenſured by God: Herein alone we erre, if we erre not.

85

E No marvell if the worldling eſcape earthly afflictions. God corrects him not, becauſe he loves him not. He is baſe borne and begot. God will not doe him the favour to whip him. The world afflicts him not, becauſe it loves him: for each man is indulgent to his owne: God uſes not the rod where he meanes to uſe the ſword. The Pillory or ſcourge is for thoſe malefactors which ſhall eſcape execution.

86

Weak ſtomacks which cannot digeſt large meals, feed oft and little: For our ſoules, that which we want in meaſure, we muſt ſupply in frequence. We can never fully enough comprehend in our thoughts the joyes of heaven, the meritorious ſuffe- A rings of Chriſt, the terrours of the ſecond death: therefore we muſt meditate of them often.

87

The ſame thoughts do commonly meet us in the ſame places, as if we had left them there till our returne. For that the mind doth ſecretly frame to it ſelfe memorative heads, whereby it recalls eaſily the ſame conceits. It is beſt to imploy our mind there, where it is moſt fixed. Our devotion is ſo dull, it cannot have too many advantages.

I finde but one example in all Scripture, of any bodily cure which our Saviour wrought by degrees: only the blind man, whoſe weak faith craved help by others, not by himſelf, ſaw men firſt like trees, then in their true ſhape. All other miraculous cures of Chriſt were done at once, and perfect at firſt. Contrarily, I find but one example B of a ſoule fully healed (that is) ſanctified and glorified, both in a day; all other by degrees and leiſure. The ſteps of grace are ſoft and ſhort. Thoſe externall miracles he wrought immediatly by himſelf; and therefore no marvell if they were abſolute like their Author. The miraculous work of our Regeneration he works together with us: He giveth it efficacie; wee give it imperfection.

DAVIDS PSALMES
for a taste of the rest.

Imprinted at London, 1634.

TO MY LOVING AND LEARNED COVSIN,

Mr. Samuel Burton,

Archdeacon of Gloceſter.

INdeed, my Poetry was long ſithence out of date, and yeelded her place to graver ſtudies: but whoſe veine would it not revive, to looke into thoſe heavenly Songs? I were not worthy to be a Divine, if it ſhould repent me to be a Poet with David, after I ſhall have aged in the Pulpit. This worke is holy and ſtrict, and abides not any youthfull or heathenish liberty, but requires hands free from prophaneneſſe, looſeneſſe, affection. It is a ſervice to God and the Church by ſo much more carefully to be regarded, as it is more common. For who is there that will not challenge a part in this labour? and that ſhall not finde himſelfe much more affected with holy meaſure rightly compoſed? Wherefore I have oft wondred, how it could be offenſive to our adverſaries, that theſe divine Ditties which the Spirit of God wrote in verſe, ſhould be ſung in verſe; and that an Hebrew Poem ſhould be made Engliſh. For if this kind of compoſition had beene unfit, God would never have made choice of numbers, wherein to expreſſe himſelfe. Yea, who knows not that ſome other Scriptures, which the Spirit hath indited in proſe, have yet beene happily and with good allowance put into ſtrict numbers? If hiſtories tell us of a Wanton Poet of old, which loſt his eyes while hee went about to turne Moſes into verſe? yet every ſtudent knowes with what good ſucceſſe and commendation Nonnus hath turned Iohns Goſpell into Greeke Heroicks. And Appollinarius, that learned Syrian matched with Baſil and Gregory (who lived in his time) in the termes of this equality, that Baſils ſpeech Was μετρος, but Appollinaries ἀσπονδος, wrote, as Suidas reports, all the Hebrew Scripture in Heroicks, as Sozomen (ſomewhat more reſtrainedly) all the Archaiology of the Iewes, till Sauls government, in 24. parts; or as Socrates yet more particularly, all Moſes in Heroiks, and all the other Hiſtories in divers metres: but how-ever his other labours lie hid, his Metaphraſe of the Pſalmes is ſtill in our hands, with the applauſe of all the learned: beſides the the labours of their owne Flaminius and Arias Montanus (to ſeeke for no more) which have worthily beſtowed themſelves in this ſubject. Neither doe I ſee how it can be offenſive to our friends, that we ſhould deſire our Engliſh Metaphraſe bettered. I ſay nothing to the diſgrace of that we have: I know how glad our adverſaries are of all ſuch advantages; which they are ready enough to find out without me, ever reprochfully upbraiding us with theſe defects. But ſince our whole Tranſlation is now univerſally reviſed; what inconvenience or ſhew of innovation can it beare, that the verſe ſhould accompany the proſe? eſpecially ſince it is well knowne how rude and homely our Engliſh Poeſie was in thoſe times, compared with the preſent; wherein, if ever, it ſeeth her full perfection. I have beene ſollicited by ſome reverend friends to undertake this taske; as that which ſeemed well to accord with the former exerciſes of my youth, and my preſent profeſſion. The difficulties I found many, the worke long and great; yet not more painfull than beneficiall to Gods Church. whereto as I dare not profeſſe any ſufficiency; ſo I will not deny my readineſſe and utmoſt endevour, if I ſhall be emploied by Authority: wherefore, in this part, I doe humbly ſubmit my ſelfe to the grave cenſures of them, whoſe wiſdome manageth theſe common affaires of the Church: and am ready either to ſtand ſtill or proceed, as I ſhall ſee their Cloud or Fire goe before or behinde me. Only (howſoever) I ſhall for my true affection to the Church, wiſh it done by better workmen. wherein as you approve, ſo further my bold, but not unprofitable motion, and commend it unto greater cares: as I doe you to the Greateſt.

Non-ſuch. Iuly 5.

Your loving Kinſman

Ios. Hall.

Some few of DAVIDS Psalmes Metaphrased.

PSALME 1.

In the tune of the 148. Psalme.

Give laud unto the Lord.

WHo hath not walkt astray,
In wicked mens advice,
Nor stood in sinners way;
Nor in their companies
That scorners are,
As their fit mate,
In scoffing chaire,
Hath ever sate.

2 But in thy lawes divine,
O Lord sets his delight,
And in those lawes of thine
Studies all day and night;
Oh, how that man
Thrice blessed is!
And sure shall gaine
Eternall blisse.

3 He shall be like the tree
Set by the water-springs,
Which when his seasons be
Most pleasant fruit forth brings:
Whose boughs so greene
Shall never fade,
But covered beene
With comely shade.

So, to this happy wight,
All his designes shall thrive:
4 Whereas the man unright,
As chaffe which winds do drive,
With every blast
Is tost on hie,
Nor can at last
In safety lie.

5 Wherefore in that sad doome,
They dare not rise from dust:
Nor shall no sinner come,
To glory of the just.
For, God will grace
The just mans way;
While sinners race
Runs to decay.

PSALME 2.

In the tune of the 125. Psalme.

Those that doe put their confidence.

WHy doe the Gentiles tumults make,
And nations all conspire in vaine,
2 And earthly Princes counsell take Against their God; against the Raigne
Of his deare Christ? let us, they saine,
3 Breake all their bonds: and from us shake
Their thraldome, yoke, and servile chaine.
4 Whiles thus (alas) they fondly spake,

He that aloft rides on the skies,
Laughs all their lewd device to scorne,
5 And when his wrathfull rage shall rise,
With plagues shall make them all forlorne,
And in his fury thus replies;
6 But I, my King with sacred horne
Anointing, shall in princely guise
His head with royall Crowne adorne.

Upon my Sions holy mount
His Empires glorious seat shall be.
And I thus rais'd shall farre recount
The tenour of his true degree.
7 My Sonne thou art, said God, I thee
Begat this day by due account:
Thy Scepter, doe but aske of me,
All earthly kingdomes shall surmount.

8 All nations to thy rightfull sway,
I will subject from furthest end
9 Of all the world, and thou shalt bray
Those stubborne foes that will not bend, with iron Mace (like Potters clay)
10 In peeces small: ye Kings attend;
And yee, whom others wont obey,
Learne wisdome, and at last amend.

11 See,

11 See, ye ſerve God, with greater dread
Than others you: and in your feare
Rejoyce the while; and (lowly ſpread)
12 Doe homage to his Sonne ſo deare:
Leſt he be wroth, and doe you dead
13 Amids your way, If kindled
His wrath ſhall be; O bleſſed thoſe,
That doe on him their truſt repoſe.

PSALME. 3

As the 113. Pſalme.

Ye children which, &c.

AH Lord! how many be my foes!
How many are againſt me roſe,
2 That to my grieved ſoule have ſed,
Tuſh, God ſhall him no ſuccour yeeld;
3 Whiles thou, Lord, art my praiſe, my ſhield,
And doſt advance my carefull head!

4 Loud with my voice to God I cry'd:
His Grace unto my ſute reply'd,
From out his holy hill.
5 I laid me downe, ſlept, roſe againe:
For thou, O Lord, doſt me ſuſtaine,
And ſav'ſt my ſoule from feared ill.

6 Not if ten thouſand armed foes
My naked ſide ſhould round encloſe,
Would I be thereof ought a-dread.
Vp, Lord, and ſhield me from diſgrace:
7 For thou haſt broke my foe-mens face,
And all the wickeds teeth haſt ſhed.

8 From thee, O God, is ſafe defence;
Doe thou thy free beneficence
Vpon thy people largely ſpread.

PSALME 4.

As the ten Commandements.

Attend my people.

THou witneſſe of my truth ſincere,
My God, unto my poore requeſt
Vouchſafe to lend thy gracious eare:
Thou haſt my ſoule from thrall releaſt.

2 Favour me ſtill, and daigne to heare
Mine humble ſute. O wretched wights,
3 How long will ye mine honour deare
Turne into ſhame through your deſpights?

Still will ye love what thing is vaine,
4 And ſeeke falſe hopes? know then at laſt,
That God hath choſe, and will maintaine
His favorite, whom ye diſgrac't.

God will regard my inſtant mone.
5 Oh! tremble then, and ceaſe offending;
And on your ſilens bed alone,
Talke with your hearts, your wayes amending.

6 Offer the trueſt ſacrifice
Of broken hearts; on God beſetting
7 Your only truſt. The moſt deviſe
The wayes of worldly treaſure getting:

But thou, O Lord, lift up to me
The light of that ſweet looke of thine;
8 So ſhall my ſoule more gladſome be,
Than theirs with all their corne and wine.

9 So I in peace ſhall lay me downe,
And on my bed take quiet ſleepe;
whiles thou, O Lord, ſhalt me alone
From dangers all ſecurely keepe.

PSALME 5.

In the tune of the 124. Pſalme.

Now Iſrael may ſay, &c.

BOw downe thine eare,
Lord, to theſe words of mine,
And well regard the ſecret plaints I make.
2 My King, my God,
to thee I doe betake
My ſad eſtate:
oh doe thine eare incline
To theſe loud cries that to thee powred bin.

3 At early morne
thou ſhalt my voice attend:
For, at day breake,
I will my ſelfe addreſſe
Thee to implore,
and wait for due redreſſe.
4 Thou doſt not, Lord, delight in wickedneſſe;
Nor to bad men
wilt thy protection lend.

5 The boaſters proud cannot before thee ſtay:
Thou hat'ſt all thoſe that that are to ſinne deuoted:

6 The lying lips,
and who with bloud are ſpotted,
Thou doeſt abhorre,
And wilt for ever ſlay:
7 But I unto thine houſe ſhall take the way.

And through thy grace abundant ſhall adore,
With humble feare
within thy holy place.
8 Oh! lead me, Lord, within thy righteous trace:
Even for their ſakes that malice me ſo ſore,
Make ſmooth thy paths
my dimmer eyes before.

9 within their mouth
no truth is ever found:
Pure miſchiefe is their heart: a gaping tombe 10 Is their wide throat;
and yet their tongues ſtill ſound,
11 with ſmoothing words.
O Lord, give them their doome,
And let them fall
in thoſe their plots profound.
In their exceſſe
of miſchiefe them deſtroy

12 That Rebels are;
ſo thoſe that to thee flye,
Shall all rejoyce
and ſing eternally:
13 And whom thou doſt protect, and who love thee,
And thy deere name,
in thee ſhall ever joy;
Since thou with bliſſe
the righteous doſt reward,
And with thy grace.
as with a ſhield him guard.

PSALME 6.

As the 50. Pſalme.

The mighty God, &c.

LEt me not, Lord,
be in thy wrath reproved:
Oh! ſcourge me not when thy fierce wrath is moved.
2 Pity me, Lord,
that doe with languor pine:
Heale me whoſe bones
with paine diſſolved bin;
3 Whoſe weary ſoule
is vexed above meaſure.
Oh Lord, how long
ſhall I bide thy diſpleaſure!
4 Turne thee, O Lord,
reſcue my ſoule diſtreſt;
5 And ſave me of thy grace.
'Mongſt thoſe that reſt
In ſilent death can none remember thee;
And in the grave
how ſhouldſt thou praiſed be?
6 Weary with ſighs
all night I cauſ'd my bed
To ſwim: with teares.
my couch I watered.
7 Deepe ſorrow hath conſum'd my dimmed eyne, Sunk in with griefe
at theſe lewd foes of mine:
8 But now hence, hence,
vaine plotters of mine ill:
The Lord hath heard
my Lamentations ſhrill;
9 God heard my ſuit
and ſtill attends the ſame:
10 Bluſh now my foes,
and flye with ſudden ſhame.

PSALME 7.

As the 112. Pſalme.

The man is bleſt that God, &c.

ON thee, O Lord my God, relies
My only truſt: from bloudy ſpight
Of all my raging enemies
Oh! let thy mercy me acquite.
2 Leſt they like greedy Lyons rend
My ſoule while none ſhall it defend.

3 O Lord, if I this thing have wrought,
If in my hands be found ſuch ill:
4 If I with miſchiefe ever ſought
To pay good turnes, or did not ſtill
Doe good unto my cauſleſſe foe,
That thirſted for my overthrow;

5 Then let my foe in eager chaſe,
Ore-take my ſoule, and proudly tread
My life below, and with diſgrace
In duſt lay downe mine honour dead.
6 Riſe up in rage, O Lord, eft-ſoone

Advance thine arme against my foe:

And wake for me, till thou fulfill
7 My promis'd right; so shall glad throngs
Of people flocke unto thine hill.
For their sakes then revenge my wrongs.
8 And rouse thy selfe. Thy judgements be O're all the world: Lord judge thou me.

As truth and honest innocence
Thou find'st in me, Lord, judge thou me,
9 Settle the just with sure defence:
Let me the wicked's malice see
10 Brought to an end. For thy just eye
Doth heart and inward reines descry.

11 My safety stands in God, who shields
The sound in heart: whose doome each day
12 To iust men and contemners yeelds
13 Their due. Except he change his way,
His sword is whet, to bloud intended.
His murdering Bow is ready bended.

14 weapons of death he hath addrest
And arrowes keene to pierce my foe,
15 who late bred mischiefe in his brest;
But when he doth on travell goe,
16 Brings forth a lye; deep pits doth delve,
And fall into his pits himselve.

17 Back to his owne head shall rebound
His plotted mischiefe; and his wrongs
18 His crowne shall craze: But I shall sound
Iehovah's praise with thankfull songs,
And will his glorious name expresse,
And tell of all his righteousnesse.

PSALME 8.

As the 113. Psalme.

Ye children which, &c.

HOw noble is thy mighty Name, (frame,
O Lord, o're all the worlds wide Whose glory is advanc't on high above the rowling heavens rack!
2 How for the graceless scorners sake,
To still th'avenging enemy,
Hast thou by tender infants tongue,
The praise of thy great name made strong,
While they hang sucking on the brest!
3 But when I see the heavens bright,
The moone and glittering stars of night,
By thine almighty hand addrest,
4 Oh! what is man, poore silly man,
That thou so mind'st him, and dost daine
To looke at his unworthy seed!
5 Thou hast him set not much beneath
Thine Angels bright; and with a wreath
Of glory hast adorn'd his head.
6 Thou hast him made high soveraigne
7 Of all thy workes, and strecht his raigne
Vnto the heards, and beasts untame,
8 To fowles, and to the scaly traine,
That glideth through the watry Maine.
9 How noble each-where is thy Name!

PSALME 9.

To the tune of that knowne song, beginning;

Preserve us, Lord.

THee, and thy wondrous deeds, O God,
With all my soule I sound abroad:
2 My joy, my triumph is in thee.
Of thy dread name my song shall be,

3 O highest God: since put to flighe,
And fal'ne and vanisht at thy sight
4 Are all my foes; for thou hast past
Iust sentence on my cause at last:

And sitting on thy throne above,
A rightfull Iudge thy self dost prove:
5 The troups profane thy checks have stroid,
And made their name for ever void.

6 Wheres now, my foes, your threatned wrack?
So well you did our Cities sack,
And bring to dust; while that ye say,
Their name shall dye as well as they.

7 Loe, in eternall state God sits:
And his high Throne to justice fits:
8 whose righteous hand the world shall weeld,
And to all folke just doome shall yeeld.

9 The poore from high find his releese;
The poore in needfull times of griefe:
10 Who knowes the Lord, to thee shall cleave,
That never dost thy clients leave.

11 Oh! sing the God that doth abide,
On Sion mount; and blaze on wide
12 His worthy deeds. For he pursues
The guiltlesse bloud with vengeance due:

He minds their cause, nor can passe o're
Sad clamours of the wronged poore.

13 Oh!

A 13 Oh! mercy Lord: thou that do'st save
My soule from gates of death and grove:

Oh! see the wrong my foes have done:
14 That I thy praise, to all that gone Through daughter Sions beauteous gate, with thankfull songs may loud relate;

And may rejoyce in thy safe aid.
15 Behold, the Gentiles whiles they made
A deadly pit my soule to drowne,
Into their pit are sunken downe;

B In that close snare they hid for me,
Loe, their owne feet entangled be 16 By this just doome the Lord is knowne,
That th'ill are punisht with their owne.

17 Downe shall the wicked backward fall
To deepest hell, and nations all 18 That God forget; nor shall the poore
Forgotten be for evermore.

The constant hope of soules oppresst
C 19 Shall not aye dye. Rise from thy rest,
Oh Lord, Let not men base and rude
Prevaile: judge thou the multitude

20 Of lawlesse Pagans: strike pale feare
Into those brests that stubborne were:
And let the Gentiles feele and find,
They beene but men of mortall kind.

PSALME 10.

As the 51. Psalme.

O God, consider.

WHy stand'st thou Lord, aloofe so long,
And hid'st thee in due times of need,
2 whiles lewd men proudly offer wrong
Vnto the poore? In their owne deed,
And their device let them be caught.
3 For loe, the wicked braves and boasts
In his vile and outragious thought,
And blesseth him that ravines most.

E 4 On God he dares insult: his pride
Scornes to enquire of powers above,
But his stout thoughts have still deni'd
5 There is a God; His wayes yet prove Aye prosperous: thy judgements hye
Doe farre surmount his dimmer sight.
6 Therefore doth he all foes defie:
His heart saith, I shall stand in spight,

Nor ever move; nor danger bide.
7 His mouth is fil'd with curses foule,
And with close fraud: His tongue doth hide
8 Mischiefe and ill: he seeks the soule
Of harmelesse men in secret wait,
And in the corners of the street
Doth shed their bloud; with scorne and hate,
His eyes upon the poore are set.

9 As some fell Lion in his den,
He closely lurks the poore to spoyle:
He spoiles the poore and helplesse men,
when once he snares them in his toyle.
10 He crowcheth low in cunning wile
And bowes his brest; whereon whole throngs
Of poore, whom his faire shewes beguile,
Fall to be subject to his wrongs.

11 God hath forgot (in soule he sayes)
He hides his face to never see.
12 Lord God, arise, thine hand up-raise:
Let not thy poore forgotten be.
13 Shall these insulting wretches scorne
Their God; and say, thou wilt not care?
14 Thou see'st (for all thou hast forborne)
Thou see'st what all their mischiefes are;

That to thine hand of vengeance just
Thou maist them take: the poore distressed
Relye on thee with constant trust,
D The helpe of Orphans and oppressed.
15 Oh! breake the wickeds arme of might,
And search out all their cursed traines,
And let them vanish out of sight.
16 The Lord as King for ever reignes.

From forth his coasts, the heathen fell
17 Are rooted quite: thou Lord attendst
To poore mens suits; thou do'st direct
Their hearts: to them thine eare thou bendst;
18 That thou mayst rescue from despight,
The wofull fatherlesse, and poore:
That so, the vaine and earthen wight
On us may tyrannize no more.

A PREMONITION OF THE TITLE AND VSE of Characters.

READER,

THe Diuines of the old Heathens were their Morall Philoſophers: Theſe receiued the Acts of an inbred law, in the Sinai of Nature, and deliuered them with many expoſitions to the multitude: Theſe were the Ouerſeers of manners, Correctors of vices, Directors of liues, Doctors of vertue, which yet taught their people the body of their naturall Diuinity, not after one manner: While ſome ſpent themſelues in deepe diſcourſes of humane felicity, and the way to it in common; others thought it beſt to apply the generall precepts of goodneſſe or decency, to particular conditions and perſons. A third ſort in a meane courſe betwixt the two other, and compounded of them both, beſtowed their time in drawing out the true lineaments of euery vertue and vice, ſo liuely, that who ſaw the medals, might know the face: which Art they ſignificantly tearmed Charactery. Their papers were ſo many tables, their writings ſo many ſpeaking pictures, or liuing images, whereby the ruder multitude might euen by their ſenſe learne to know vertue, and diſcerne what to deteſt. I am deceiued if any courſe could be more likely to preuaile; for herein the groſſe conceit is led on with pleaſure, and informed while it feeles nothing but delight: And if pictures haue beene accounted the bookes of Idiots, behold here the benefit of an image without the offence. It is no ſhame for us to learne wit of Heathens; neither is it materiall, in whoſe Schoole we take out a good leſſon: yea, it is more ſhame not to follow their good, than not to lead them better. As one therefore that in worthy examples hold imitation better than inuention. I haue trod in their paths, but with an higher & wider ſtep; and out of their Tablets haue drawn theſe larger portraitures of both ſorts. More might be ſaid, I deny not, of euery Vertue, of euery Vice: I deſired not to ſay all, but enough. If thou doe but read or like theſe, I haue ſpent good houres ill; but if thou ſhalt hence abjure thoſe Vices; which before thou thoughteſt not ill-fauoured, or fall in loue with any of theſe goodly faces of Vertue; or ſhalt hence find where thou haſt any little touch of theſe euils, to cleare thy ſelfe or where any defect in theſe graces to ſupply it, neither of us ſhall need to repent of our labour.

CHARACTERISMES OF VERTVES.

By Ios. Hall.

¶ Imprinted at London, 1634.

THE PROOEME.

Vertue is not loved enough, becauſe ſhee is not ſeene; & Vice loſeth much deteſtation, becauſe her uglineſſe is ſecret. Certainly, my Lords, there are ſo many beauties, and ſo many graces in the face of Goodneſſe, that no eye can poſſibly ſee it without affection, without raviſhment: and the viſage of Evill is ſo monſtrous through loathſome deformities, that if her lovers were not ignorant, they would bee mad with diſdaine and aſtoniſhment. What need wee more than to diſcover theſe two to the world? This Worke ſhall ſave the labour of exhorting, and diſſwaſion. I have here done it as I could, following that ancient Maſter of Morality, who thought this the fitteſt taske for the ninety and ninth yeare of his age, and the profitableſt monument that he could leave for a fare-well to his Grecians. Loe here then Vertue and Vice ſtript naked to the open view, and deſpoiled, one of her rags, the other of her ornaments, and nothing left them but bare preſence to plead for affection: ſee now whether ſhall find more ſuters. And if ſtill the vaine minds of lewd men ſhall dote upon their old miſtreſſe, it will appeare to be, not becauſe ſhee is not foule, but for that they are blind, and bewitched. And firſt behold the goodly features of Wiſdome, an amiable Vertue, and worthy to lead this Stage: which as ſhe extends her ſelfe to all the following Graces, ſo amongſt the reſt is for her largeneſſe moſt conſpicuous.

Theophraſtus.

CHARACTER OF THE WISE MAN.

THere is nothing that he desires not to know, but most and first himselfe: and not so much his owne strength, as his weaknesses; neither is his knowledge reduced to discourse, but practice. Hee is a skilfull Logician, not by nature so much as use; his working mind doth nothing all his time but make syllogismes, and draw out conclusions, every thing that he sees and heares, serves for one of the premisses: with these he cares first to informe himselfe, then to direct others. Both his eyes are never at once from home, but one keeps house while the other roves abroad for intelligence. In materiall and weighty points he abides not his mind suspended in uncertainties; but hates doubting, where he may, where he should be resolute: and first he makes sure worke for his soule; accounting it no safety to be unsetled in the foreknowledge of his finall estate. The best is first regarded; and vaine is that regard which endeth not in security. Every care hath his just order; neither is there any one either neglected or misplaced. He is seldome over-seene with credulity; for knowing the falsenesse of the world, he hath learn'd to trust himselfe alwayes; others so farre, as he may not be dammaged by their disappointment. He seekes his quietnesse in secrecy, and is wont both to hide himselfe in retiredness, and his tongue in himselfe. He loves to be guessed at, not knowne; and to see the world unseene; and when he is forced into the light, shewes by his actions that his obscurity was neither from affectation nor weaknesse. His purposes are neither so variable as may argue inconstancy; nor obstinately unchangeable, but framed according to his after-wits, or the strength of new occasions. He is both an apt scholler and an excellent master; for both every thing he sees informes him, and his mind enriched with plentifull observation, can give the best precepts. His free discourse runs backe to the ages past, and recovers events out of memory, and then preventeth Time in flying forward to future things; and comparing one with the other, can give a verdict well-neere prophetically: wherin his conjectures are better than anothers judgements. His passions, are so many good servants, which stand in a dilligent attendance ready to be commanded by reason, by Religion; and if at any time forgetting their duty, they be miscarried to rebell, he can first conceale their mutiny; then suppresse it. In all his just and worthy designes, he is never at a losse, but hath so projected all his courses, that a second begins where the first failed; and fetcheth strength from that which succeeded not. There be wrongs which he will not see; neither doth he alwaies look that way which he meaneth; nor take notice of his secret smarts, when they come from great ones. In good turnes, he loves not to owe more than he must; in evill to owe and not pay. Just censures hee deserves not, for hee lives without the compasse of an adversary; unjust he contemneth, and had rather suffer false infamy to dye alone, than lay hands upon it in an open violence. He confineth himselfe in the circle of his owne affaires, and lists not to thrust his finger into a needlesse fire. He stands like a center unmoved, while

while the circumference of his eſtate is drawne above, beneath, about him. Finally, his wit hath coſt him much; and he can both keep, and value, and employ it. He is his owne Lawyer; the treaſury of knowledge, the oracle of counſell; blind in no mans cauſe, beſt ſighted in his owne.

Of an Honeſt man.

HE lookes not to what he might doe, but what he ſhould. Juſtice is his firſt guide; the ſecond law of his actions, is expedience. He had rather complaine than offend, and hates ſin more for the indignity of it, than the danger: his ſimple uprightneſſe works in him that confidence, which oft-times wrongs him, and gives advantage to the ſubtill, when he rather pities their faithleſnes, than repents of his credulity: he hath but one heart, and that lies open to ſight; and were it not for diſcretion, he never thinks ought whereof he would avoid a witneſſe: his word is his parchment, and his yea, his oath, which he will not violate for feare, or for loſſe. The miſ-haps of following events, may cauſe him to blame his providence, can never cauſe him to eat his promiſe: neither ſaith he, This I ſaw not, but, This I ſaid. When he is made his friends Executor, he defraies debts, payes legacies, and ſcorneth to gaine by Orphans, or to ranſack graves; and therefore will be true to a dead friend, becauſe hee ſees him not. All his dealings are ſquare and above the boord: he bewrayes the fault of what he ſels, & reſtores the overſeene gaine of a falſe reckoning. He eſteemes a bribe venomous, though it come guilded over with the colour of gratuity. His cheekes are never ſtained with the bluſhes of recantation; neither doth his tongue falter, to make good a lye with the ſecret gloſſes of double or reſerved ſenſes; and when his name is traduced, his innocency beares him out with courage: then, loe, he goes on the plaine way of truth, and will either triumph in his integrity, or ſuffer with it. His conſcience over-rules his providence; ſo as in all things good or ill, he reſpects the nature of the actions, not the ſequell. If he ſee what he muſt doe, let God ſee what ſhall follow. He never loadeth himſelfe with burdens above his ſtrength, beyond his will; and once bound, what he can he will doe, neither doth he will but what he can doe. His eare is the Sanctuary of his abſent friends name, of his preſent friends ſecret: neither of them can miſ-carry in his truſt. He remembers the wrongs of his youth, and repaies them with that uſury which he himſelfe would not take. He would rather want, than borrow, and beg, than not to pay: his faire conditions are without diſſembling; and he loves actions above words. Finally, he hates falſhood worſe than death: he is a faithful client of truth; no mans enemy; and it is a queſtion, whether more another mans friend or his owne; and if there were no heaven, yet he would be vertuous.

Of the Faithfull man,

HIs eyes have no other objects, but abſent and inviſible; which they ſee ſo cleerly, as that to them ſenſe is blind: that which is preſent they ſee not; if I may not rather ſay, that what is paſt or future, is preſent to them. Herein he exceeds all others, that to him nothing is impoſſible, nothing difficult, whether to beare, or undertake. He walks every day with his Maker, and talks with him familiarly, and lives ever in heaven, and ſees all earthly things beneath him: when he goes in, to converſe with God, he weares not his owne clothes, but takes them ſtill out of the rich Wardrobe of his Redeemer, and then dare boldly preaſe in and challenge a bleſſing. The celeſtiall ſpirits doe not ſcorne his company, yea, his ſervice. He deales in theſe worldly affaires as a ſtranger, and hath his heart ever at home: without a written warrant hee dare doe nothing, and with it any thing. His warre is perpetuall, without without truce, without intermission; and his victory certaine: hee meets with the infernall powers, and tramples them under feet. The shield that he ever beares before him, can neither be missed, nor pierced; if his hand be wounded, yet his heart is safe: he is often tripped, seldome foyled; and if sometimes foyled, never vanquished. He hath white hands, and a cleane soule, fit to lodge God in, all the roomes whereof are set apart for his Holinesse: Iniquity hath oft called at the doore, and craved entertainment, but with a repulse; or if sin of force will be his tenant, his Lord he cannot. His faults are few, and those he hath, God will not see. He is allied so high, that hee dare call God Father, his Saviour Brother: heaven his Patrimony, and thinkes it no presumption to trust to the attendance of Angels. His understanding is inlightned with the beames of divine truth; God hath acquainted him with his will; and what he knowes, hee dare confesse: there is not more love in his heart, than liberty in his tongue. If torments stand betwixt him and Christ, if death, he contemnes them; and if his owne parents lye in his way to God, his holy carelesnesse makes them his footsteps. His experiments have drawne forth rules of confidence, which he dares oppose against all the feares of distrust: where in hee thinks it safe to charge God with what he hath done; with what he hath promised. Examples are his proofes, and instances his demonstrations. What hath God given, which he cannot give? What have others suffered, which he may not be enabled to endure? Is he threatned banishment? There hee sees the deare Evangelist in Pathmos. Cutting in peeces? hee sees Esay under the saw. Drowning? he sees Ionas diving in the living gulfe. Burning? he sees the three Children in the hot walke of the Furnace. Devouring? hee sees Daniel in the sealed den amids his terrible companions. Stoning? he sees the first Martyr under his heape of many grave-stones. Heading? loe there the Baptists necke bleeding in Herodias platter. He emulates their paine, their strength, their glory. He wearies not himselfe with cares; for he knowes he lives not of his owne cost: not idlely, omitting meanes, but not using them with diffidence. In the midst of ill rumours and amazements, his countenance changeth not; for he knowes both whom he hath trusted, and whither death can lead him. He is not so sure he shall dye, as that he shall be restored; and outfaceth his death with his resurrection. Finally, he is rich in works, busie in obedience, cheerfull and unmoved in expectation, better with evils, in common opinion miserable, but in true judgement more than a man.

Of the Humble man.

HE is a friendly enemy to himselfe: for though he be not out of his owne favour, no man sets so low a value of his worth as himselfe; not out of ignorance, or carelesnesse, but of a voluntary and meeke dejectednesse. Hee admires every thing in another, whiles the same or better in himselfe he thinks not unworthily contemned: his eyes are full of his owne wants, and others perfections. He loves rather to give than take honour, not in a fashion of complementall courtesie, but in simplicity of his judgement; neither doth he fret at those, on whom hee forceth precedency, as one that hoped their modesty would have refused; but holds his mind unfainedly below his place, and is ready to goe lower (if need be) without discontent. When he hath but his due, hee magnifieth courtesie, and disclaimes his deserts. He can be more ashamed of honour, than grieved with contempt; because he thinkes that causelesse, this deserved. His face, his carriage, his habit, savour of lowlinesse without affectation, and yet he is much under that he seemeth. His words are few and soft, never either peremptory or censorious, because hee thinkes both each man more wise, and none more faulty than himselfe: and when he approacheth to the Throne of God, he is so taken up with the divine greatnesse, that in his owne eyes he is either vile or nothing. Places of publike charge are faine to sue to him, and hale him out of his chosen obscurity; which he holds off, not cunningly to cause importunity, but sincerely in the conscience of his defects. Hee frequenteth not the ſtages of common reſorts, and then alone thinkes himſelfe in his naturall element, when he is ſhrowded within his owne wals. He is ever jealous over himſelfe, and ſtill ſuſpecteth that which others applaud. There is no better object of beneficence; for what he receives, he aſcribes meerely to the bounty of the giver; nothing to merit. He emulates no man in any thing but goodneſſe, and that with more deſire, than hope to overtake. No man is ſo contented with his little, and ſo patient under miſeries, becauſe he knowes the greateſt evils are below his ſinnes, and the leaſt favours above his deſervings. Hee walkes ever in awe, and dare not but ſubject every word and action to an high and juſt cenſure. He is a lowly valley ſweetly planted and well watered; the proud mans earth, whereon he trampleth; but ſecretly full of wealthy Mines, more worth than he that walkes over them; a rich ſtone ſet in Lead; and laſtly, a true Temple of God built with a low rooſe.

Of a Valiant man.

HE undertakes without raſhneſſe, and performes without feare: he ſeeks not for dangers; but when they find him, hee beares them over with courage, with ſucceſſe. He hath oft times lookt Death in the face, and paſſed by it with a ſmile, and when he ſees he muſt yeeld, doth at once welcome and contemne it. Hee fore-caſts the worſt of all events, and encounters them before they come in a ſecret and mentall warre; and if the ſuddenneſſe of an unexpected evill have ſurprized his thoughts, and infected his cheeks with paleneſſe; he hath no ſooner digeſted it in his conceit, than he gathers up himſelfe, and inſults over miſchiefe. He is the maſter of himſelfe, and ſubdues his paſſions to reaſon; and by his inward victory workes his owne peace. Hee is afraid of nothing but the diſpleaſure of the Higheſt, and runs away from nothing but ſin: he looks not on his hands, but his cauſe; not how ſtrong he is, but how innocent: and where goodneſſe is his warrant, he may be over-maſtered, he cannot be foyled. The ſword is to him the laſt of all trials, which he drawes forth ſtill as Defendant, not as Challenger, with a willing kind of unwillingneſſe: no man can better mannage it with more ſafety, with more favour: he had rather have his bloud ſeene than his back; and diſdaines life upon baſe condition. No man is more milde to a relenting or vanquiſht adverſary, or more hates to ſet his foot on a carcaſe. He had rather ſmother an injury, than revenge himſelfe of the impotent: and I know not whether more deteſts cowardlineſſe or cruelty. He talks little, and brags leſſe; and loves rather the ſilent language of the hand; to be ſeene than heard. He lies ever cloſe within himſelfe, armed with wiſe reſolution, and will not be diſcovered but by death or danger. He is neither prodigall of bloud to miſ-ſpend it idlely, nor niggardly to grudge it, when either God calls for it, or his Countrey; neither is he more liberall of his owne life than of others. His power is limited by his will, and he holds it the nobleſt revenge, that he might hurt and doth not. He commands without tyranny and imperiouſneſſe, obeyes without ſervility, and changes not his mind with his eſtate. The height of his ſpirits over-lookes all caſualties, and his boldneſſe proceeds neither from ignorance nor ſenſeleſneſſe: but firſt he values evils, and then deſpiſes them: he is ſo ballaced with wiſdome, that hee floats ſteddily in the midſt of all tempeſts. Deliberate in his purpoſes, firme in reſolution, bold in enterpriſing, unwearied in atchieving, and howſoever, happy in ſucceſſe: and if ever he be overcome, his heart yeelds laſt.

Of

Of a Patient man.

THe patient man is made of a metall, not ſo hard as flexible: his ſhoulders are large, fit for a load of injuries; which hee beares not out of baſeneſſe and cowardlineſſe, becauſe he dare not revenge, but out of Chriſtian fortitude, becauſe he may not: he hath ſo conquered himſelfe, that wrongs cannot conquer him; and herein alone finds, that victory conſiſts in yeelding. He is above nature, while he ſeemes below himſelfe. The vildeſt creature knowes how to turne againe, but to command himſelfe not to reſiſt being urged, is more than heroicall. His conſtructions are ever full of charity and favour; either this wrong was not done, or not with intent of wrong; or if that, upon miſ-information; or if none of theſe, raſhneſſe (though a fault) ſhal ſerve for an excuſe. Himſelfe craves the offendors pardon, before his confeſſion; and a ſlight anſwer contents, where the offended deſires to forgive. He is Gods beſt witneſſe, and when he ſtands before the barre for truth, his tongue is calmely free, his fore-head firme, and he with erect and ſetled countenance heares his juſt ſentence, and rejoyces in it. The Jaylors that attend him, are to him his Pages of honour; his dungeon, the lower part of the vault of heaven; his rack or wheele, the ſtaires of his aſcent to glory; he challengeth his executioners, and encounters the fierceſt paines with ſtrength of reſolution, and while he ſuffers, the beholders pity him, the tormentors complaine of wearineſſe, and both of them wonder. No anguiſh can maſter him whether by violence or by lingring. He accounts expectation no puniſhment, and can abide to have his hopes adjourned till a new day. Good lawes ſerve for his protection, not for his revenge; and his owne power, to avoyd indignities, not to returne them. His hopes are ſo ſtrong, that they can inſult over the greateſt diſcouragements; and his apprehenſions ſo deepe, that when he hath once faſtned, he ſooner leaveth his life than his hold. Neither time nor perverſeneſſe can make him caſt off his charitable endevours, and deſpaire of prevailing; but in ſpight of all croſſes, and all denials, he redoubleth his beneficiall offers of love. Hee trieth the ſea after many ſhipwracks, and beats ſtill at that doore which he never ſaw opened. Contrariety of events doth but exerciſe, not diſmay him; and when croſſes afflict him, he ſees a divine hand inviſibly ſtriking with theſe ſenſible ſcourges: againſt which he dares not rebell or murmure. Hence all things befall him alike; and he goes with the ſame mind to the ſhambles, and to the fold. His recreations are calme and gentle; and not more full of relaxation than void of fury. This man only can turne neceſſity into vertue, and put evill to good uſe. He is the ſureſt friend, the lateſt and eaſieſt enemy, the greateſt conquerour, and ſo much more happy than others, by how much he could abide to be more miſerable.

Of the true Friend.

HIs affections are both united and divided; united to him he loveth; divided betwixt another and himſelfe; and his owne heart is ſo parted, that whiles he hath ſome, his friend hath all. His choice is led by vertue, or by the beſt of vertues, Religion; not by gaine, not by pleaſure; yet not without reſpect of equall condition, of diſpoſition not unlike; which once made, admits of no change, except he whom he loveth, be changed quite from himſelfe; nor that ſuddenly, but after long expectation. Extremity doth but faſten him, whiles he, like a wel-wrought vault, lies the ſtronger, by how much more weight he beares. When neceſſity calls him to it, he can be a ſervant to his equall, with the ſame will wherewith hee can command his inferior; and though he riſe to honour, forgets not his familiarity, nor ſuffers inequality of eſtate to work ſtrangeneſſe of countenance; on the other ſide, he lifts up his friend to advancement, with a willing hand, without envy, without diſſimulation. When his mate is dead, he accounts himſelfe but halfe alive; then his love not diſſolved by death, derives it ſelfe to thoſe orphans which never knew the price of their father; they become the heires of his affection, and the burden of his cares. He embraces a free community of all things, ſave thoſe which either honeſty reſerves proper, or nature; and hates to enjoy that which would doe his friend more good; his charity ſerves to cloke noted infirmities, not by untruth, not by flattery, but by diſcreet ſecrecy; neither is he more favourable in concealement, than round in his private reprehenſions; and when anothers ſimple fidelity ſhews it ſelfe in his reproofe, he loves his monitor ſo much the more, by how much more hee ſmarteth. His boſome is his friends cloſet, where he may ſafely lay up his complaints, his doubts, his cares; and look how he leaves, ſo he finds them; ſave for ſome addition of ſeaſonable counſell for redreſſe. If ſome unhappy ſuggeſtion ſhall either diſjoynt his affection, or breake it, it ſoone knits againe, and growes the ſtronger by that ſtreſſe. Hee is ſo ſenſible of anothers injuries, that when his friend is ſtricken, he cries out, and equally ſmarteth untouched, as one affected not with ſympathy, but with a reall feeling of paine: and in what miſchiefe may be prevented, he interpoſeth his aid, and offers to redeeme his friend with himſelfe; no houre can be unſeaſonable, no buſineſſe difficult, nor paine grievous in condition of his eaſe: and what either he doth or ſuffereth, he neither cares nor deſires to have knowne; leſt he ſhould ſeeme to looke for thanks. If he can therefore ſteale the performance of a good office unſeene, the conſcience of his faithfulneſſe herein is ſo much ſweeter as it is more ſecret. In favours done, his memory is fraile; in benefits received, eternall: he ſcorneth either to regard recompence, or not to offer it. He is the comfort of miſeries, the guide of difficulties, the joy of life, the treaſure of earth; and no other than a good Angell clothed in fleſh.

Of the Truly-Noble.

HE ſtands not upon what he borrowed of his Anceſtors, but thinkes he muſt work out his owne honour: and if he cannot reach the vertue of them that gave him outward glory by inheritance, he is more abaſhed of his impotency, than tranſported with a great name. Greatneſſe doth not make him ſcornfull and imperious, but rather like the fixed ſtars; the higher he is, the leſſe he deſires to ſeeme. Neither cares he ſo much for pompe and frothy oſtentation, as for the ſolid truth of Nobleneſſe. Courteſie & ſweet affability can be no more ſevered from him, than life from his ſoule; not out of a baſe and ſervile popularity, & deſire of ambitious inſinuation; but of a native gentleneſſe of diſpoſition, and true value of himſelfe. His hand is open and bounteous, yet not ſo as that he ſhould rather reſpect his glory, than his eſtate; wherein his wiſdome can diſtinguiſh betwixt paraſites and friends, betwixt changing of favours and expending them. He ſcorneth to make his height a privilege of looſenes, but accounts his titles vaine, if he be inferiour to others in goodneſſe: and thinks he ſhould be more ſtrict, the more eminent he is, becauſe he is more obſerved, and now his offences are become exemplar. There is no vertue that he holds unfit for ornament, for uſe; nor any vice which he condemnes not as ſordid, and a fit companion of baſeneſſe; and whereof he doth not more hate the blemiſh, than affect the pleaſure. He ſo ſtudies, as one that knows, ignorance can neither purchaſe honor, nor wield it; & that knowledge muſt both guide & grace him. His exerciſes are from his childhood ingenious, manly, decent, & ſuch as tend ſtill to wit, valor, activity: and if (as ſeldome) he deſcend to diſports of chance, his games ſhall never make him either pale with feare, or hot with deſire of gain. He doth not ſo uſe his followers, as if he thought they were made for nothing but his ſervitude; whoſe felicity were only to be commanded and pleaſe: wearing them to the back, and then either finding or framing excuſes to diſcard them empty: but upon all opportunities lets them feele the ſweetnes of their owne ſerviceableneſſe and his bounty. Silence in officious ſervice is the beſt

Oratory

A Oratory to plead for his reſpect : All diligence is but lent to him, none loſt. His wealth ſtands in receiving, his honor in giving: he cares not either how many hold of his goodnes, or to how few he is beholden: and if he have caſt away favours, he hates either to upbraid them to his enemy, or to challenge reſtitution. None can be more pitifull to the diſtreſſed, or more prone to ſuccour ; and then moſt, where is leaſt meanes to ſollicite, leaſt poſſibility of requitall. He is equally addreſſed to warre and peace ; and knowes not more how to command others, than how to be his Countries ſervant in both. He is more carefull to give true honour to his Maker, than to receive civill honour from men. He knowes that his ſervice is free and noble, and ever loaded with ſincere glory ; and how vaine it is to hunt after applauſe from the world, till he be ſure of him that moldeth all hearts, and powreth contempt on Princes; and ſhortly, ſo demeanes himſelfe, as one that accounts the body of Nobility to conſiſt
B in Bloud, the ſoule in the eminence of Vertue.

Of the good Magiſtrate.

HE is the faithfull Deputy of his Maker, whoſe obedience is the rule wherby he ruleth; his breſt is the Ocean whereinto all the cares of private men empty themſelves ; which as he receives without complaint and overflowing, ſo he ſends them forth again by a wiſe conveyance in the ſtreames of juſtice: his doores, his eares are ever open to ſuters; and not who comes firſt ſpeeds well, but whoſe cauſe is beſt. His nights, his meales are ſhort and interrupted ; all which he beares well, be-
C cauſe he knowes himſelfe made for a publike ſervant of Peace and Juſtice. Hee ſits quietly at the ſterne, and commands one to the top-ſaile, another to the main, a third to the plummet, a fourth to the anchor, as he ſees the need of their courſe & weather requires; and doth no leſſe by his tongue, than all the Marriners with their hands. On the Bench hee is another from himſelfe at home ; now all private reſpects of bloud, alliance, amity are forgotten; and if his owne Son come under triall, he knowes him not : Pity which in all others is wont to be the beſt praiſe of humanity, and the fruit of Chriſtian love, is by him throwne over the bar for corruption : as for Favour, the falſe Advocate of the gracious, he allowes him not to appeare in the Court; there only cauſes are heard ſpeake, not perſons : Eloquence is then only not diſcouraged, when ſhe ſerves for a Client of truth : meere narrations are allowed in this Oratory, not Proems, not excurſions, not Gloſſes: Truth muſt ſtrip her ſelfe, and come in naked to D his barre, without falſe bodies, or colors without diſguiſes: A bride in his Cloſet, or a letter on the Bench, or the whiſpering and winks of a great neighbour, are anſwered with an angry and couragious repulſe. Diſpleaſure, Revenge, Recompence, ſtand on both ſides the Bench, but hee ſcornes to turne his eye towards them ; looking onely right forward at Equity, which ſtands full before him. His ſentence is ever deliberate and guided with ripe wiſdome, yet his hand is ſlower than his tongue; but when he is urged by occaſion either to doome, or execution, he ſhewes how much he hateth mercifull injuſtice: neither can his reſolution or act be reverſed with partiall importunity. His forehead is rugged and ſevere, able to diſcountenance villany, yet his words are more awfull than his brow, and his hand than his words. I know not whether hee be more feared or loved, both affections are ſo ſweetly contempered in all hearts. The good feare him lovingly, the middle ſort love him fearefully, and onely
E the wicked man feares him ſlaviſhly without love. He hates to pay private wrongs with the advantage of his Office; and if ever he be partiall, it is to his enemy. He is not more ſage in his gown, than valarous in armes, & increaſeth in the rigor of diſcipline, as the times in danger. His ſword hath neither ruſted for want of uſe, nor ſurfetteth of bloud, but after many threats is unſheathed, as the dreadfull inſtrument of divine revenge He is the Guard of good laws, the Refuge of innocency, the Comet of the guilty, the Pay-maſter of good deſerts, the Champion of juſtice, the Patron of peace, the Tutor of the Church, the Father of his Country, & as it were another God upon earth.

Of the Penitent.

HE hath a wounded heart and a ſad face; yet not ſo much for feare, as for unkindneſſe: The wrong of his ſinne troubles him more than the danger: None but he is the better for his ſorrow; neither is any paſſion more hurtfull to others, than this is gainfull to him; The more hee ſeeks to hide his griefe, the leſſe it will be hid; Every man may read it not only in his eyes but in his bones. Whiles he is in charity with all others, he is ſo fallen out with himſelfe, that none but God can reconcile him: He hath ſued himſelfe in all Courts, accuſeth, arraigneth, ſentenceth, puniſheth himſelfe unpartially, and ſooner may find mercy at any hand, than at his owne. He onely hath pulled off the faire viſor of ſin; ſo as that appeares not but maſked unto others, is ſeene of him barefac'd; and bewrayes that fearfull uglineſſe, which none can conceive but he that hath viewed it. Hee hath lookt into the depth of the bottomleſſe pit, and hath ſeene his owne offence tormented in others, and the ſame brands ſhaken at him. He hath ſeene the change of faces in that evill one, as a tempter as a tormenter; and hath heard the noiſe of a conſcience, and is ſo frighted with all theſe, that he can never have reſt, till he have run out of himſelfe, to God; in whoſe face at firſt, he finds rigour, but afterwards, ſweetneſſe in his boſome: He bleeds firſt from the hand that heales him. The Law of God hath made worke for mercy; which he hath no ſooner apprehended; than he forgets his wounds, and looks careleſly upon all theſe terrors of guiltineſſe. When he caſts his eye backe upon himſelfe, he wonders where he was, and how he came there; and grants, that if there were not ſome witchcraft in ſinne, hee could not have beene ſo ſottiſhly graceleſſe. And now, in the iſſue, Satan finds, (not without indignation and repentance) that he hath done him a good turne in tempting him: For he had never beene ſo good if he had not ſinned; he had never fought with ſuch courage if he had not ſeene his bloud, and beene aſhamed of his foyle: Now he is ſeene, and felt in the front of the ſpirituall battell; and can teach others how to fight, and incourage them in fighting. His heart was never more taken up with the pleaſure of ſinne, than now with care of avoyding it: The very ſight of that cup, wherein ſuch a fulſome potion was brought him, turnes his ſtomack: the firſt offers of ſinne make him tremble more now, than he did before at the judgements of his ſinne; neither dares he ſo much as look towards Sodom: All the powers and craft of hell cannot fetch him in for a cuſtomer to evill; his infirmity may yeeld once, his reſolution never. There is none of his ſenſes or parts, which hee hath not within covenants for their good behaviour; which they cannot ever breake with impunity. The wrongs of his ſin he repaies to men with recompence, as hating it ſhould be ſaid, he owes any thing to his offence; to God (what in him lies) with ſighs, teares, vowes, and endevours of amendment. No heart is more waxen to the impreſſions of forgiveneſſe; neither are his hands more open to receive, than to give pardon. All the injuries which are offered to him, are ſwallowed up in his wrongs to his Maker, and Redeemer; neither can he call for the arrerages of his farthings, when he looks upon the millions forgiven him; hee feeles not what hee ſuffers from men, when hee thinks of what he hath done, and ſhould have ſuffered. Hee is a thankfull Herauld of the mercies of his God; which if all the world heare not from his mouth, it is no fault of his: Neither did he ſo burne with the evill fires of concupiſcence, as now with the holy flames of zeale to that glory which hee hath blemiſhed: and his eyes are full of moiſture, as his heart of heat. The gates of heaven are not ſo knockt at by any ſuter, whether for frequence, or importunity. You ſhall find his cheeks furrowed, his knees hard, his lips ſealed up, ſave when he muſt accuſe himſelfe, or glorifie God, his eyes humbly dejected, and ſometimes you ſhall take him breaking off a ſigh in the midſt; as one that would ſteale an humiliation unknowne, and would bee offended with any part that ſhould not keep his counſell. When hee finds his ſoule oppreſſed with the heavy guilt of a ſinne, he gives it vent thorow his mouth, into the

A the care of his ſpirituall Phyſitian, from whom hee receives Cordials anſwerable to his complaint. He is a ſevere exactor of diſcipline, firſt upon himſelfe, on whom hee impoſes more than one Lent; then, upon others, as one that vowed to bee revenged on ſinne whereſoever he finds it; and though but one hath offended him, yet his deteſtation is univerſall. He is his owne taske-maſter for devotion; and if Chriſtianity have any worke more difficult, or perillous than other, that he enjoynes himſelfe, and reſolves contentment even in miſcarriage. It is no marvell if the acquaintance of his wilder times know him not; for he is quite another from himſelfe; and if his mind could have had any intermiſſion of dwelling within his breſt, it could not have knowne this was the lodging: Nothing but an out-ſide is the ſame it was, and that altred more with Regeneration, than with age. None but he can reliſh the promiſes of the Goſpell; which he finds ſo ſweet, that he complaines not, his thirſt after them
B is unſatiable; and now that he hath found his Saviour he hugs him ſo faſt, and holds him ſo deare, that he feeles not when his life is fetcht away from him, for his martyrdome. The latter part of his life is ſo led, as if he deſired to unlive his youth; and his laſt Teſtament is full of reſtitutions, and legacies of piety. In ſumme, he hath ſo lived and died, as that Satan hath no ſuch match, ſinne hath no ſuch enemy, God hath no ſuch ſervant as he.

He is an Happy man,

C THat hath learn'd to read himſelfe more than all books; and hath ſo taken out this leſſon, that he can never forget it; That knowes the world, and cares not for it; That after many traverſes of thoughts, is grown to know what he may truſt to, and ſtands now equally armed for all events. That hath got the maſtery at home, ſo as he can croſſe his will without a mutiny, and ſo pleaſe it, that he makes it not a wanton: That in earthly things wiſhes no more than nature; in ſpirituall is ever graciouſly ambitious: That for his condition, ſtands on his owne feet, not needing to leane upon the great; and can ſo frame his thoughts to his eſtate, that when he hath leaſt, he cannot want, becauſe he is as free from deſire, as ſuperfluity: That hath ſeaſonably broken the head-ſtrong reſtineſſe of proſperity, and can now menage it at pleaſure: Upon whom, all ſmaller croſſes light as haile-ſtones upon a roofe; and for the greater calamities, he can take them as tributes of life, and tokens of love; and if his ſhip be toſſed, yet he is ſure his Anchor is faſt. If all the world were his, hee could
D be no other than he is; no whit gladder of himſelfe, no whit higher in his carriage, becauſe he knowes, contentment lies not in the things he hath, but in the mind that values them. The powers of his reſolution can either multiply, or ſubſtract at pleaſure. He can make his cottage a Mannor, or a Palace when he liſts; and his home-cloſe, a large dominion; his ſtaind-cloth, Arras; his earth, plate, and can ſee ſtate in the attendance of one ſervant; as one that hath learned, a mans greatneſſe or baſeneſſe is in himſelfe; and in this hee may even conteſt with the proud, that hee thinks his owne the beſt. Or, if he muſt be outwardly great, he can but turne the other end of the glaſſe, and make his ſtately Manor a low and ſtrait Cottage; and in all his coſtly furniture, he can ſee, not richneſſe, but uſe; he can ſee droſſe in the beſt metall, and earth thorow the beſt clothes; and in all his troup, he can he ſee himſelfe his owne ſervant.
E He lives quietly at home, out of the noiſe of the world, and loves to enjoy himſelfe alwaies, and ſometimes his friend, and hath as full ſcope to his thoughts, as to his eies. He walks ever even, in the mid-way betwixt hopes and feares, reſolved to feare nothing but God, to hope for nothing but that which he muſt have. He hath a wiſe and vertuous mind in a ſerviceable body; which that better part affects as a preſent ſervant and a future companion; ſo cheriſhing his fleſh, as one that would ſcorne to bee all fleſh. He hath no enemies, not for that all love him, but becauſe he knowes to make a gaine of malice. He is not ſo ingaged to any earthly thing, that they two cannot part on even tearmes; there is neither laughter in their meeting, nor in their ſhaking of hands, hands, teares. He keeps ever the beſt company, the God of Spirits, and the Spirits of that God; whom he entertaines continually in an awfull familiarity, not being hindred, either with too much light, or with none at all. His conſcience and his hand are friends, and (what Devill ſoever tempt him) will not fall out. That divine part goes ever uprightly and freely, not ſtooping under the burden of a willing ſinne, not fettered with the gieves of unjuſt ſcruples. He would not, if he could, run away ffom himſelfe, or from God; not caring from whom he lies hid, ſo he may looke theſe two in the face. Cenſures and applauſes are paſſengers to him not gueſts; his eare is their thorow-fare, not their harbour; he hath learned to fetch both his counſell, and his ſentence from his owne breſt. He doth not lay weight upon his owne ſhoulders, as one that loves to torment himſelfe with the honour of much imploiment, but as hee makes work his game, ſo doth he not liſt to make himſelfe worke. His ſtrife is ever to redeeme, and not to ſpend time. It is his trade to doe good; and to think of it, his recreation. He hath hands enow for himſelfe and others, which are ever ſtretched forth for beneficence, not for need. He walks cheerefully in the way that God hath chalked, and never wiſhes it more wide, or more ſmooth. Thoſe very tentations whereby he is foiled, ſtrengthen him; he comes forth crowned, and triumphing out of the ſpirituall Battels, and thoſe ſcars that he hath, make him beautifull. His ſoule is every day dilated to receive that God, in whom hee is; and hath attained to love himſelfe for God, and God for his owne ſake. His eyes ſtick ſo faſt in heaven, that no earthly object can remove them; yea his whole ſelfe is there before his time, and ſees with Steven, and heares with Paul, and enjoyes with Lazarus, the glory that hee ſhall have; and takes poſſeſſion before-hand of his roome amongſt the Saints: and theſe heavenly contentments have ſo taken him up, that now he looks downe diſpleaſedly upon the earth, as the Region of his ſorrow and baniſhment; yet joying more in hope than troubled with the ſenſe of evils, he holds it no great matter to live, & his greateſt buſines to die; and is ſo well acquainted with his laſt gueſt, that he feares no unkindneſſe from him: neither makes he any other of dying, than of walking home when he is abroad, or of going to bed when he is weary of the day. He is well provided for both worlds, and is ſure of peace here, of glory hereafter; and therefore hath a light heart, and a cheerfull face. All his fellow-creatures rejoyce to ſerve him; his betters, the Angels, love to obſerve him; God himſelfe takes pleaſure to converſe with him, and hath Sainted him afore his death, and in his death crowned him.

THE PROOEME.

Have ſhewed you many faire Vertues: I ſpeak not for them; if their ſight cannot command affection, let them loſe it. They ſhall pleaſe yet better, after you have troubled your eyes a little with the view of deformities; and by how much more they pleaſe, ſo much more odious, and like themſelves, ſhall theſe deformities appeare. This light, contraries give to each other, in the midſt of their enmity, that one makes the other ſeeme more good, or ill. Perhaps in ſome of theſe (which thing I doe at once feare, and hate) my ſtile ſhall ſeeme to ſome leſſe grave, more Satyricall: if you find me not without cauſe jealous, let it pleaſe you to impute it to the nature of thoſe Vices, which will not be otherwiſe handled. The faſhions of ſome evils are beſides the odiouſneſſe, ridiculous; which to repeat, is to ſeeme bitterly merry. I abhorre to make ſport with wickedneſſe, and forbid any laughter here, but of diſdaine. Hypocriſie ſhall leade this ring; worthily, I thinke, becauſe both ſhe commeth neereſt to Vertue, and is the worſt of Vices.

CHARACTER OF THE HYPOCRITE.

AN Hypocrite is the worſt kinde of Player, by ſo much as he acts the better part; which hath alwayes two faces, oft-times two hearts: That can compoſe his forehead to ſadneſſe and gravity (while hee bids his heart be wanton and careleſſe within,) and (in the meane time) laughs within himſelfe, to think how ſmoothly he hath cozened the beholder, In whoſe ſilent face are written the charecters of Religion, which his tongue and geſtures pronounce, but his hands recant. That hath a clean face and garment, with a foule ſoule: whoſe mouth belies his heart; and his fingers belie his mouth. Walking early up into the Citty, he turnes into the great Church, and ſalutes one of the pillars on one knee, worſhipping that God which at home he cares not for; while his eye is fixed on ſome window, on ſome paſſenger, and his heart knowes not whether his lips goe. He riſes, and looking about with admiration, complaines on our frozen charity, commends the ancient. At Church he will ever ſit where he may be ſeene beſt, and in the middeſt of the Sermon puls out his Tables in haſte, as if he feared to loſe that note; when he writes either his forgotten errand, or nothing: then he turnes his Bible with a noiſe, to ſeeke an omitted quotation; and folds the leafe, as if he had found it; and askes aloud the name of the Preacher, and repeats it, whom he publikely ſalutes, thanks, praiſes, invites, entertaines with tedious good counſell, with good diſcourſe, if it had come from an honeſter mouth. He can command teares when hee ſpeaks of his youth; indeed becauſe it is paſt, not becauſe it was ſinfull: himſelfe is now better, but the times are worſe. All other ſinnes he reckons up with deteſtation, while he loves and hides his darling in his boſome. All his ſpeech returnes to himſelf, and every occurrent drawes in a ſtory to his owne praiſe. When he ſhould give, he lookes about him, and ſayes, Who ſees me? No almes, no prayers, fall from him without a witneſſe; belike leſt God ſhould deny that he hath received them: and when he hath done (leſt the world ſhould not know it) his owne mouth is his Trumpet to proclaime it. With the ſuperfluity of his uſury he builds an Hoſpitall, and harbours them whom his extortion hath ſpoiled; ſo while he makes many beggers, he keeps ſome. He turneth all Gnats into Camels, and cares not to undoe the world for a circumſtance. Fleſh on a Friday is more abomination to him than his neighbours bed: Hee abhorres more not to uncover at the name of Jeſus, then to ſweare by the name of God. When a Rimer reads his Poeme to him, he begs a Copie, and perſwades the Preſſe; there is nothing that he diſlikes in preſence, that in abſence he cenſures not. Hee comes to the ſicke bed of his ſtepmother, and weeps, when he ſecretly feares her recovery. He greets his friend in the ſtreet with ſo cleare a countenance, ſo faſt a cloſure, that the other thinks he reads his heart in his face; and ſhakes hands with an indefinite invitation of When will you come? and when his back is turned, joyes that he is ſo well rid of a gueſt: yet if that gueſt viſite him unfeared, he counterfets a ſmiling welcome, and excuſes his cheare, when cloſely he frownes on his wife for too much. He ſhewes well, and ſaies well; and himſelfe is the worſt thing he hath. In briefe, he is the ſtrangers Saint, the neighbours diſeaſe, the blot of goodneſſe; a rotten ſticke in a darke night, a Poppie in a corne field, an ill tempered candle, with a great ſnuffe, that in going out ſmels ill; and an Angell abroad, a Devill at home; and worſe when an Angell, than when a Devill.

Of the Buſie-bodie.

HIs eſtate is too narrow for his mind, & therefore he is faine to make himſelfe roome in others affaires; yet ever in pretence of love. No newes can ſtir but by his doore; neither can he know that, which he muſt not tell. What every man ventures in Guiana voyage, and what they gained, he knowes to a haire. Whether Holland will have peace he knowes, and on what conditions, and with what ſucceſſe, is familiar to him ere it be concluded. No Poſt can paſſe him without a queſtion, and rather than he will leeſe the newes, he rides backe with him to appoſe him of tidings; and then to the next man he meets, he ſupplies the wants of his haſty intelligence, and makes up a perfect tale; wherewith he ſo haunteth the patient auditor, that after many excuſes, he is faine to endure rather the cenſure of his manners in running away, than the tediouſneſſe of an impertinent diſcourſe. His ſpeech is oft broken off with a ſucceſſion of long parentheſis, which he ever vowes to fill up ere the concluſion, & perhaps would effect it, if the others eare were as unweariable as his tongue. If he ſee but two men talke and reade a letter in the ſtreet, he runs to them, and askes if he may not be partner of that ſecret relation; and if they deny it, he offers to tell, ſince he may not heare, wonders: and then falls upon the report of the Scottiſh Mine, or of the great Fiſh taken up at Linne, or of the freezing of the Thames; and after many thanks and diſmiſſions, is hardly intreated ſilence. He undertakes as much as he performes little: this man will thruſt himſelfe forward to be the guide of the way he knowes not; and calls at his neighbours window, and askes why his ſervants are not at worke. The Market hath no commoditie which he prizeth not, and which the next table ſhall not here recited. His tongue, like the taile of Sampſons Foxes, carries firebrands, and is enough to ſet the whole field of the world on a flame. Himſelfe begins table-talke of his neigbour at anothers boord; to whom he beares the firſt newes, and adjures him to conceale the reporter: whoſe cholirick anſwer he returnes to his firſt Oaſt, inlarged with a ſecond edition; ſo, as it uſes to be done in the fight of unwilling Maſtives, he claps each on the ſide apart, and provokes them to an eager conflict. There can no act paſſe without his Comment, which is ever farre-fetcht, raſh, ſuſpicious, delatorie. His eares are longe, and his eyes quicke, but moſt of all to imperfections; which as he eaſily ſees, ſo he increaſes with intermedling. Hee harbours another mans ſervant, and amids his entertainment askes what fare is uſuall at home, what houres are kept, what talke paſſeth their meales, what his Maſters diſpoſition is, what his government, what his gueſts? and when he hath by curious inquiries extracted all the juice and ſpirit of hoped intelligence, turnes him off whence he came, and works on a new. He hates conſtancie as an earthen dulneſſe, unfit for men of ſpirit: and loves to change his worke & his place; neither yet can he be ſo ſoone weary of any place, as every place is weary of him; for as he ſets himſelfe on worke, ſo others pay him with hatred, and looke how many maſters he hath, ſo many enemies: neither is it poſſible that any ſhould not hate him, but who know him not. So then he labours without thanks, talks without credit, lives without love, dies without teares, without pitie; ſave that ſome ſay it was pity he died no ſooner.

Of the Superſtitious.

SVperſtition is godleſſe Religion, devout impietie. The ſuperſtitious is fond in obſervation, ſervile in feare, he worſhips God but as he liſts: he gives God what he askes askes not, more than he askes; and all but what he ſhould give; and makes more ſinne than the Ten Commandements. This man dares not ſtirre forth till his breſt be croſſed, and his face ſprinkled: if but an Hare croſſe him the way, he retornes; or if his journey began unawares on the diſmall day; or if he ſtumble at the threſhold. If he ſee a Snake unkilled, he feares a miſchiefe; if the ſalt fall towards him, he lookes pale and red, and is not quiet till one of the waiters have powred wine on his lappe; and when he neezeth, thinks them not his friends that uncover not. In the morning he liſtens whether the Crow crieth even or odde, and by that token preſages of the weather. If he heare but a Raven croke from the next roofe, he makes his will, or if a Bittour flie over his head by night: but if his troubled fancie ſhall ſecond his thoughts with the dreame of a faire garden, or greene ruſhes, or the ſalutation of a dead friend, he takes leave of the world, and ſaies he cannot live. He will never ſet to ſea but on a Sunday; neither ever goes without an Erra Pater in his pocket. Saint Pauls day and Saint Swithunes with the Twelve, are his Oracles; which he dares beleeve againſt the Almanacke. When he lies ſicke on his death-bed, no ſin troubles him ſo much, as that he did once eat fleſh on a friday, no repentance can expiate that; the reſt need none. There is no dreame of his without an interpretation, without a prediction; and if the event anſwer not his expoſition, he expounds it according to the event. Every darke grove and pictured wall ſtrikes him with an awfull, but carnall devotion. Old wives and Starres are his counſellers; his night ſpell is his guard, and charmes his Phiſitian. He weares Paracelſian Characters for the tooth-ach, and a little hollowed wax is his Antidote for all evils. This man is ſtrangely credulous, and calls impoſſible things, miraculous: If he heare that ſome ſacred blocke ſpeaks, moves, weepes, ſmiles, his beare feet carry him thether with an offering: and if a danger miſſe him in the way, his Saint hath the thankes. Some way he will not goe, and ſome he dares not; either there he bugges, or he faineth them; every lanterne is a ghoſt, and every noiſe is of chaines. He knowes not why, but his cuſtome is to goe a little about, and to leave the croſſe ſtill on the right hand. One event is enough to make a rule; out of theſe he concludes faſhions proper to himſelfe, and nothing can turne him out of his owne courſe. If he have done his taske, he is ſafe, it matters not with what affection. Finally, if God will let him be the carver of his owne obedience, he could not have a better ſubject, as he is, he cannot have a worſe.

Of the Profane.

THe ſuperſtitious hath too many gods: the profane man hath none at all, unleſſe perhaps himſelfe be his owne deitie, and the world his heaven. To matter of Religion, his heart is a peece of dead fleſh, without feeling of love, of feare, of care, or of paine from the deafe ſtrokes of a revenging conſcience. Cuſtome of ſinne hath wrought this ſenſleſneſſe, which now hath been ſo long entertained, that it pleads preſcription, and knowes not to be altered. This is no ſudden evill: we are borne ſinfull, but have made our ſelves profane; through many degrees we climbe to this height of impiety. At firſt he ſinned, and cared not; now he ſinneth and knoweth not. Appetite is his Lord, and Reaſon his ſervant, and Religion his drudge. Senſe is the rule of his beleefe; and if Pietie may be an advantage, hee can at once counterfeit and deride it. When ought ſucceedeth to him, he ſacrifices to his nets, and thanks either his fortune, or his wit; and will rather make a falſe God, than acknowledge the true: if contrary, he cries out of deſtinie, and blames him to whom he will not be beholden. His conſcience would faine ſpeake with him, but he will not heare it; ſets the day, but he diſappoints it; and when it cries loud for audience, he drownes the noiſe with good fellowſhip. He never names God, but in his oathes; never thinks of him, but in extremity; and then he knowes not how to think of him, becauſe he begins but then. He quarrels for the hard conditions of his pleaſure, for his future damnation; and from himſelfe laies all the fault upon his Maker; and from his decree fetcheth excuſes of his wickedneſſe. The inevitable neceſſity of Gods counſell makes him deſperarely careleſſe : ſo with good food he poyſons himſelfe. Goodneſſe is his Minſtrell ; neither is any mirth ſo cordiall to him as his ſport with Gods fooles. Every vertue hath his ſlander, and his jeſt to laugh it out of faſhion : every vice his colour. His uſualleſt theame is the boaſt of his young ſinnes, which he can ſtill joy in, though he cannot commit ; and (if it may be) his ſpeech makes him worſe than he is. He cannot thinke of death with patience, without terrour, which he therefore feares worſe than hell, becauſe this he is ſure of, the other he but doubts of. He comes to Church as to the Theater, ſaving that not ſo willingly ; for company, for cuſtome, for recreation, perhaps for ſleepe ; or to feed his eyes or his eares : as for his ſoule, he cares no more than if he had none. He loves none but himſelfe, and that not enough to ſeeke his true good ; neither cares he on whom he treads that he may riſe. His life is full of licence, and his practice of outrage. He is hated of God, as much as he hateth goodneſſe, and differs little from a Devill, but that he hath a body.

Of the Male-content.

HE is neither well full nor faſting ; and though he abound with complaints, yet nothing diſlikes him but the preſent : for what he condemned while it was, once paſt he magnifies, and ſtrives to recall it out of the jawes of Time. What he hath, he ſees not, his eyes are ſo taken up with what he wants ; and what he ſees he cares not for, becauſe he cares ſo much for that which is not. When his friend carves him the beſt morſell, he murmures that it is an happy feaſt wherein each one may cut for himſelfe. When a preſent is ſent him, he askes, Is this all? and What, no better? and ſo accepts it, as if he would have his friend know how much he is bound to him for vouchſafing to receive it. It is hard to entertaine him with a proportionable gift. If nothing, he cries out of unthankfulneſſe; if little, that he is baſely regarded; if much, he exclaimes of flattery, and expectation of a large requitall. Every bleſſing hath ſomewhat to diſparage and diſtaſte it : Children bring cares, ſingle life is wilde and ſolitary ; eminencie is envious, retiredneſſe obſcure ; faſting painfull; facietie unweildie; Religion nicely ſevere; libertie is lawleſſe ; wealth burdenſome ; mediocrity contemptible : Every thing faulteth, either in too much, or too little. This man is ever head-ſtrong, and ſelfe-willed, neither is he alwaies tied to eſteeme or pronounce according to reaſon ; ſome things he muſt diſlike he knowes not wherefore, but he likes them not: and other-where rather than not cenſure, he will accuſe a man of vertue. Every thing he medleth with, he either findeth imperfect, or maketh ſo : neither is there any thing that ſoundeth ſo harſh in his eare, as the commendation of another, whereto yet perhaps he faſhionably and coldly aſſenteth, but with ſuch an after-clauſe of exception, as doth more than marre his former allowance, and if he liſt not to giue a verball diſgrace, yet he ſhakes his head and ſmiles, as if his ſilence ſhould ſay, I could and will not. And when himſelfe is praiſed without exceſſe, he complaines that ſuch imperfect kindneſſe hath not done him right. If but an unſeaſonable ſhowre croſſe his recreation, he is ready to fall out with heaven, and thinks he is wronged, if God will not take his times when to raine, when to ſhine. He is a ſlave to envie, and loſeth fleſh with fretting, not ſo much at his owne infelicitie, as at others good ; neither hath he leiſure to joy in his owne bleſſings whileſt another proſpereth. Faine would he ſee ſome mutinies, but dares not raiſe them ; and ſuffers his lawleſſe tongue to walke thorow the dangerous paths of conceited alterations ; but ſo, as in good manners he had rather thruſt every man before him when it comes to acting. Nothing but feare keepes him from conſpiracies, and no man is more cruell when he is not manicled with danger. He ſpeakes nothing but Satyrs and Libels, and lodgeth no gueſts in his heart but Rebels. The inconſtant and hee agree well in their felicitie, which both place in change : but herein they differ ; the inconſtant man affects that which will be, the male-content commonly that which was. Finally, he is a querulous curre, whom whom no horſe can paſſe by without barking at; yea, in the deepe ſilence of night the very moone-ſhine openeth his clamorous mouth: hee is the wheele of a well-couched fire-worke; that flies out on all ſides, not without ſcorching it ſelfe. Every eare is long agoe weary of him, and he is now almoſt weary of himſelfe. Give him but a little reſpit, and he will die alone; of no other death, than others welfare.

Of the Unconſtant.

THe inconſtant man treads upon a mooving earth, and keepes no paſe. His proceedings are ever heady and peremptory; for hee hath not the patience to conſult with reaſon, but determines meerly upon fancie. No man is ſo hot in the purſuit of what he liketh; no man ſooner weary. He is fiery in his paſſions, which yet are not more violent than momentanie: it is a wonder if his love or hatred laſt ſo many dayes as a wonder. His heart is the Inne of all good motions, wherein if they lodge for a night, it is well; by morning they are gone, and take no leave: and if they come that way againe, they are entertained as gueſts, not as friends. At firſt like another Eccbolius he loved ſimple truth; thence diverting his eyes, he fell in love with idolatrie; thoſe heatheniſh ſhrines had never any more doting and beſotted client; and now of late he is leapt from Rome to Munſter, and is growne to giddie Anabaptiſme: what he will be next, as yet he knoweth not; but ere he have wintred his opinion, it will be manifeſt. He is good to make an enemie of, ill for a friend; becauſe as there is no truſt in his affection, ſo no rancor in his diſpleaſure. The multitude of his changed purpoſes brings with it forgetfulneſſe; and not of others more than of himſelfe. He ſaies, ſweares, renounces, becauſe what he promiſed, he meant not long enough to make an impreſſion. Herein alone he is good for a common-wealth, that he ſets many on work, with building, ruining, altering; and makes more buſineſſe than Time it ſelfe; neither is he a greater enemie to thrift, than to idleneſſe. Proprietie is to him enough cauſe of diſlike; each thing pleaſes him better that is not his owne. Even in the beſt things, long continuance is a juſt quarrell; Manna it ſelfe growes tedious with age, and Noveltie is the higheſt ſtile of commendation to the meaneſt offers: neither doth he in bookes and faſhions aske How good, but, How new. Varietie carries him away with delight, and no uniforme pleaſure can be without an irkſome fulneſſe. He is ſo transformable into all apinions, manners, qualities, that he ſeemes rather made immediately of the firſt matter, than of well tempered elements; and therefore is in poſſibilitie any thing, or every thing; nothing in preſent ſubſtance. Finally, he is ſervile in imitation, waxey to perſwations, witty to wrong himſelf, a gueſt, in his owne houſe, an Ape of others, and in a word, any thing rather than himſelfe.

Of the Flatterer.

FLatterie is nothing but falſe friendſhip, fawning hypocriſie, diſhoneſt civility, baſe merchandize of words, a plauſible diſcord of the heart and lips. The Flatterer is bleare-eyed to ill, and cannot ſee vices; and his tongue walkes ever in one track of unjuſt praiſes, and can no more tell how to diſcommend, than to ſpeak true. His ſpeeches are full of wondring interjections; and all his titles are ſuperlative, and both of them ſeldome ever but in preſence. his baſe mind is well matched with a mercenary tongue, which is a willing ſlave to another mans eare; neither regardeth he how true, but how pleaſing. His Art is nothing but a delightfull coozenage, whoſe rules are ſmoothing, and garded with perjurie; whoſe ſcope is to make men fooles, in teaching them to over-value themſelves, and to tickle his friends to death. This man is a Porter of all good tales, and mends them in the carriage: One of Fames beſt friends, and his owne; that helps to furniſh her with thoſe rumours, that may advantage himſelfe. Conſcience hath no greater adverſarie; for when ſhe is about to play her juſt part of accuſation, he ſtops her mouth with good tearmes, and wel-neere ſtrangleth her with ſhifts, Like that ſubtill fiſh, hee turnes himſelfe into the colour of every ſtone, for a bootie. In himſelfe he is nothing, but what pleaſeth his Great-one, whoſe vertues he cannot more extoll, than imitate his imperfections, that he may think his worſt gracefull. Let him ſay it is hot, he wipes his forehead and unbraceth himſelfe; if cold, he ſhivers, and calls for a warmer garment. When he walkes with his friend, he ſweares to him, that no man elſe is looked at; no man talked of; and that whomſoever he vouchſafes to look on and nod to, is graced enough: That he knowes not his owne worth, leſt he ſhould be too happy; and when he tells what others ſay in his praiſe, he interrupts himſelfe modeſtly, and dares not ſpeake the reſt: ſo his concealement is more inſinuating than his ſpeech. Hee hangs upon the lips which he admireth, as if they could let fall nothing but Oracles, and finds occaſion to cite ſome approved ſentence, under the name he honoureth; and when ought is nobly ſpoken, both his hands are little enough to bleſſe him. Sometimes even in abſcence he extolleth his Patron, where hee may preſume of ſafe conveyance to his eares; and in preſence ſo whiſpereth his commendation to a common friend, that it may not be unheard where he meant it. He hath ſalves for every ſore, to hide them, not to heale them; complexion for every face: ſin hath not any more Artificiall Broker, or more impudent Baud. There is no vice, that hath not from him his colour, his allurement; and his beſt ſervice is, either to further guiltineſſe, or ſmother it. If hee grant evill things inexpedient, or crimes errours, he hath yeelded much; either thy eſtate gives privilege of liberty, or thy youth; or if neither, What if it be ill? yet it is pleaſant. Honeſtie to him is nice ſingularity, repentance ſuperſtitious melancholie, gravitie, dulneſſe, and all vertue; an innocent conceit of the baſe-minded. In ſhort, he is the Moth of liberall mens coats, the Eare-wig of the mighty, the bane of Courts, a friend & a ſlave to the trencher, and good for nothing but to be a factor for the Devil.

Of the Slothfull.

HE is a religious man, and weares the time in his Cloiſter; and as the cloke of his doing nothing, pleads contemplation; yet is he no whit the leaner for his thoughts, no whit learneder. He takes no leſſe care how to ſpend time, than others how to gaine by the expenſe; and when buſineſſe importunes him, is more troubled to fore-think what he muſt doe, than another to effect it. Summer is out of his favour, for nothing but long daies that make no haſt to their even. He loves ſtill to have the Sunne witneſſe of his riſing; and lies long, more for lothneſſe to dreſſe him, than will to ſleep: and after ſome ſtreaking and yawning, calls for dinner, unwaſhed; which having digeſted with a ſleep in his chaire, he walks forth to the bench in the Market-place, and lookes for Companions: whomſoever he meets, he ſtaies with idle queſtions, and lingring diſcourſe; how the daies are lengthned, how kindly the weather is, how falſe the clock, how forward the Spring, and ends ever with what ſhal we doe? It pleaſes him no leſſe to hinder others, than not to work himſelfe. When all the people are gone from Church, he is left ſleeping in his ſeat alone. He enters bonds, and forfeits them by forgetting the day; and askes his neighbour when his owne field was fallowed, whether the next peece of ground belong not to himſelfe. His care is either none, or too late: when Winter is come, after ſome ſharpe viſitations, he looks on his pile of wood, and askes how much was cropped the laſt Spring. Neceſſitie drives him to every action, and what he cannot avoid, he will yet deferre. Every change troubles him, although to the better; and his dulneſſe counterfeits a kind of contentment. When he is warned on a Jury, he had rather pay the mulct, than appeare. All but that which nature will not permit, he doth by a Deputy, and counts it troubleſome to doe nothing; but to doe any thing yet more. He is wittie in nothing but framing excuſes to ſit ſtill, which if the occaſion yeeld not, he coyneth with eaſe. There is no work that is not either dangerous or thankleſſe, and whereof he foreſees

A foreſees not the inconvenience and gainleſneſſe before he enters; which if it be verified in event, his next idleneſſe hath found a reaſon to patronize it. Hee had rather freeze than fetch wood, and chuſes rather to ſteale than worke; to begge than take paines to ſteale, and in many things to want than begge. Hee is ſo loth to leave his neighbours fire, that he is faine to walk home in the dark; and if he be not lookt to, weares out the night in the chimney corner; or if not that, lies downe in his clothes to ſave two labours. He eates and prayes himſelfe aſleepe; and dreames of no other torment but work. This man is a ſtanding Poole, and cannot chuſe but gather corruption: he is deſcried amongſt a thouſand neighbours by a dry and naſty hand, that ſtill ſavours of the ſheet, a beard uncut, unkembed; an eye and eare yellow, with their excretions; a coat ſhaken on, ragged, unbruſht; by linnen and face ſtriving whether ſhall excell in uncleanneſſe. For body, he hath a ſwolne legge, a dusky and ſwiniſh eye,
B a blowne cheeke, a drawling tongue, an heavy foot, and is nothing but a colder earth molded with ſtanding water. To conclude, is a man in nothing but in ſpeech & ſhape.

Of the Covetous.

HEE is a ſervant to himſelfe, yea to his ſervant; and doth baſe homage to that which ſhould be the worſt drudge. A liveleſſe peece of earth is his Maſter, yee his God, which he ſhrines in his coffer, and to which hee ſacrifices his heart. Every face of his coine is a new image, which he adores with the higheſt veneration; yet takes upon him to be Protector of that he worſhippeth: which hee
C feares to keep, and abhorres to loſe: not daring to truſt either any other god, or his owne. Like a true Chymiſt he turnes every thing into ſilver, both what he ſhould eat, and what he ſhould weare; and that he keeps to looke on, not to uſe. When he retornes from his field, he askes, not without much rage, what became of the looſe cruſt in his cup-bord, and who hath rioted among his Leekes. He never eats good meale but on his neighbours trencher; and there he makes amends to his complaining ſtomacke for his former and future faſts. He bids his neighbours to dinner, and when they have done, ſends in a trencher for the ſhot. Once in a yeere perhaps, he gives himſelfe leave to feaſt, and for the time thinks no man more laviſh; wherein he liſts not to fetch his diſhes from farre; nor will be beholden to the ſhambles, his owne proviſion ſhall furniſh his boord with an inſenſible coſt, and when his gueſts are parted, talkes how much every man devoured, and how many cups were emptied, and
D feeds his family with the mouldy remnants a moneth after. If his ſervant breake but an earthen diſh for want of light, he abates it out of his quarters wages. He chips his bread, and ſends it backe to exchange for ſtaler. He lets money, and ſells Time for a price; and will not be importuned either to prevent or deferre his day; and in the meane time looks for ſecret gratuities, beſides the maine intereſt which he ſels and returnes into the ſtocke. He breeds of money to the third generation; neither hath it ſooner any being, than he ſets it to beget more. In all things he affects ſecrecy and propriety; he grudgeth his neighbour the water of his Well: and next to ſtealing, he hates borrowing. In his ſhort and unquiet ſleepes he dreames of theeves, and runs to the doore, and names more men then he hath. The leaſt ſheafe he ever culls out for Tithe; and to rob God, holds it the beſt paſtime, the cleereſt gaine. This man cries out above others, of the prodigalitie of our times, and tells of the thrift of our E fore-fathers: How that great Prince thought himſefe royally attired, when he beſtowed thirteene ſhillings and foure pence on halfe a ſute. How one wedding gowne ſerved our Grandmothers, till they exchanged it for a winding ſheet; & praiſes plainneſſe, not for leſſe ſin, but for leſſe coſt. For himſelf he is ſtill knowne by his fore-fathers coat, which hee meanes with his bleſſing, to bequeath to the many deſcents of his heires. He neither would be poore, nor be accounted rich. No man complains ſo much of want, to avoid a Subſidie; no man is ſo importunate in begging, ſo cruell in exaction; and when he moſt complaines of want, he feares that which he complains to have.

No

No way is indirect to wealth; whether of fraud or violence. Gaine is his godlineſſe; which if conſcience goe about to prejudice, and grow troubleſome by exclaiming againſt, he is condemned for a common Barretor. Like another Ahab, he is ſick of the next field, and thinks he is ill ſeated, while he dwels by neighbours. Shortly, his neighbours doe not much more hate him, than he himſelfe. Hee cares not (for no great advantage) to loſe his friend, pine his body, damne his ſoule; and would diſpatch himſelfe when corne falls, but that he is loth to caſt away money on a cord.

Of the Vaine-glorious.

ALL his humour riſes up into the froth of oſtentation; which if it once ſettle, falls downe into a narrow roome. If the exceſſe be in the underſtanding part, all his wit is in print; the Preſſe hath left his head empty; yea, not only what he had, but what he could borrow without leave. If his glory be in his devotion, he gives not an Almes but on record; and if he have once done well, God heares of it often; for upon every unkindneſſe he is ready to upbraid him with merits. Over and above his owne diſcharge, he hath ſome ſatisfactions to ſpare for the common treaſure. He can fulfill the Law with eaſe, and earne God with ſuperfluity. If he have beſtowed but a little ſumme in the glazing, paving, parieting of Gods houſe, you ſhall find it in the Church-window. Or if a more gallant humour poſſeſſe him, he weares all his land on his backe; and walking high, lookes over his left ſhoulder, to ſee if the point of his Rapier follow him with a Grace. He is proud of another mans horſe; and well mounted, thinkes every man wrongs him, that lookes not at him. A bare head in the ſtreet doth him more good than a meales meat. He ſweares bigge at an Ordinary, and talkes of the Court with a ſharp accent; neither vouchſafes to name any not honourable, nor thoſe without ſome tearme of familiarity; and likes well to ſee the hearer look upon him amazedly, as if he ſaid, How happy is this man that is ſo great with Great-Ones! Uuder pretence of ſeeking for a ſcrol of newes, he drawes out an handful of letters indorſed with his owne ſtile, to the height: and halfe reading every title, paſſes over the latter part with a murmur; not without ſignifying, what Lord ſent this, what great Lady the other; and for what ſutes; the laſt paper (as it happens) is his newes from his honourable friend in the French Court. In the midſt of dinner, his Lacquay comes ſweating in, with a ſealed note from his Creditor, who now threatens a ſpeedy arreſt, and whiſpers the ill newes in his Maſters eare, when he aloud names a Councellor of State, and profeſſes to know the employment. The ſame meſſenger he calls with an imperious nod; and after expoſtulation, where he hath left his fellowes, in his eare ſends him for ſome new ſpur-lethers or ſtockings by this time footed; and when he is gone halfe the roome, recalls him, and ſaith aloud, It is no matter, Let the greater bagge alone till I come; and yet againe calling him cloſer, whiſpers (ſo that all the Table may heare) that if his crimſon ſuit be ready againſt the day, the reſt need no haſte. He picks his teeth when his ſtomacke is empty, and calls for Pheſants at a common Inne. You ſhall find him prizing the richeſt Jewels, and faireſt horſes, when his purſe yeelds not money enough for earneſt. He thruſts himſelfe into the preaſe, before ſome great Ladies; and loves to be ſeene neere the head of a great traine. His talke is how many Mourners he furniſht with gownes at his Fathers funerals, how many meſſes, how rich his Coat is, and how ancient, how great his alliance: what challenges he hath made and anſwered; what exploits he did at Cales or Newport; and when he hath commended others buildings, furnitures, ſutes, compares them with his owne. When he hath undertaken to be the Broker for ſome rich Diamond, he weares it; and pulling of his Glove to ſtroke up his haire, thinks no eye ſhould have any other object. Entertaining his friend, he chides his Cooke for no better cheere, and names the diſhes he meant, and wants. To conclude, he is ever on the Stage, and acts ſtill a glorious part abroad, when no man caries a baſer heart, no man is more ſordid and careleſſe at home. He is a Spaniſh Souldier on an Italian Theater; a Bladder full of wind, a skin full of words, a fooles wonder, and a wiſe mans foole.

Of

Of the Presumptuous.

PResumption is nothing but hope out of his wits, an high house upon weak pillars. The presumptuous man loves to attempt great things, only because they are hard and rare: his actions are bold and venturous, and more full of hazard than use. He hoiseth saile in a tempest, and saith, never any of his Ancestors were drowned: he goes into an infected house, and saies, the plague dares not seize on noble bloud: he runs on high battlements, gallops downe steepe hills, rides over narrow bridges, walkes on weak Ice, and never thinks, What if I fall? but, What if I runne over and fall not? He is a confident Alchymist, and braggeth, that the wombe of his Furnace hath conceived a burthen that will do all the world good: which yet he desires secretly borne, for feare of his owne bondage: in the meane time, his Glasse breakes; yet he upon better luting laies wagers of the successe, and promiseth wedges before hand to his friend. He saith, I will sinne, and be sorry, and escape; either God will not see, or not be angry, or not punish it; or remit the measure. If I doe well, he is just to reward; if ill, he is mercifull to forgive. Thus his praises wrong God no lesse than his offence; and hurt himselfe no lesse than they wrong God. Any patterne is enough to encourage him: shew him the way where any foot hath trod, he dare follow, although he see no steps returning; what if a thousand have attempted, and miscarried; if but one have prevailed, it sufficeth. He suggests to himselfe false hopes of never too late; as if he could command either Time or repentance: and dare defere the expectation of mercy, till betwixt the bridge and the water. Give him but where to set his foot, and he will remove the earth. He fore-knowes the mutations of States, the events of warre, the temper of the seasons; either his old prophecy tels it him, or his starres. Yea, he is no stranger to the Records of Gods secret counsell, but he turnes them over, and copies them out at pleasure. I know not whether in all his enterprises he shew lesse feare, or wisdome: no man promises himself more, no man more beleeves himselfe. I will goe and sell, and returne and purchase, and spend and leave my sonnes such estates; all which if it succeed, he thanks himselfe; if not, he blames not himselfe. His purposes are measured, not by his ability, but his will, and his actions by his purposes. Lastly, he is ever credulous in assent, rash in undertaking, peremptory in resolving, witlesse in proceeding, and in his ending miserable; which is never other, than either the laughter of the wise, or the pittie of fooles.

Of the Distrustfull.

THE distrustfull man hath his heart in his eyes, or in his hand; nothing is sure to him but what he sees, what he handles. He is either very simple, or very false; and therefore beleeves not others, because he knows how little himself is worthy of beleefe. In spirituall things, either God must leave a pawne with him, or seeke some other Creditor. All absent things and unusuall, have no other but a conditionall entertainment: they are strange, if true. If he see two neighbours whisper in his presence, he bids them speake out, and charges them to say no more than they can justifie. When hee hath committed a message to his servant, he sends a second after him, to listen how it is delivered. He is his owne Secretary, and of his owne counsell, for what he hath, for what he purposeth: and when he tells over his bags, looks thorow the key-hole, to see if he have any hidden witnesse, and askes aloud who is there? when no man heares him. He borrowes money when he needs not, for feare lest others should borrow of him. He is ever timorous, and cowardly; and askes every mans errand at the doore, ere he opens. After his first sleepe, he starts up, and askes if the furthest gate were barred, and out of a fearefull sweat calls up his seruant, and bolts the doore after him; and then ſtudies whether it were better to lie ſtill and beleeve, or riſe and ſee. Neither is his heart fuller of feares, than his head full of ſtrange projects, and farre-fetcht conſtructions: What meanes the ſtate, thinke you, in ſuch an action, and whither tends this courſe? Learne of me (if you know not:) the wayes of deepe policies are ſecret, and full of unknowne windings; that is their act, this will be their iſſue: ſo caſting beyond the Moone, he makes wiſe and juſt proceedings ſuſpected. In all his predictions and imaginations, he ever lights upon the worſt; not what is moſt likely will fall out, but what is moſt ill. There is nothing that he takes not with the left hand: no text which his gloſſe corrupts not. Words, oathes, parchments, ſeales, are but broken Reeds; theſe ſhall never deceive him; he loves no payments but reall. If but one in an age have miſcarried by a rare caſualtie, he miſdoubts the ſame event. If but a Tile falne from an high roofe, have brained a paſſenger, or the breaking of a Coach-wheele have endangered the burden, he ſweares he will keepe home, or take him to his horſe. He dares not come to Church, for feare of the croud; not ſpare the Sabbaths labour, for feare of the want; not come neer the Parliament houſe, becauſe it ſhould have been blowne up. What might have been, affects him as much as what will be. Argue, vow, proteſt, ſweare; he heares thee, and beleeves himſelfe. He is a Scepticke, and dare hardly give credit to his ſenſes, which he hath often arraigned of falſe intelligence. He ſo lives, as if he thought all the world were theeves, and were not ſure whether himſelfe were one. He is uncharitable in his cenſures, unquiet in his feares; bad enough alwaies, but in his owne opinion much worſe than he is.

and

Of the Ambitious.

Ambition is a proud covetouſneſſe, a dry thirſt of honour, the longing diſeaſe of reaſon, an aſpiring and gallant madneſſe. The ambitious climbes up high and perillous ſtaires, and never cares how to come downe; the deſire of riſing hath ſwallowed up his feare of a fall. Having once cleaved (like a burre) to ſome great mans coat, he reſolves not to be ſhaken off with any ſmall indignities, and finding his hold thorowly faſt, caſts how to inſinuate yet neerer; and therefore he is buſie and ſervile in his endevours to please, and all his officious reſpects turne home to himſelf. He can be at once a ſlave to command, an Intelligencer to informe, a Paraſite to ſooth and flatter, a Champion to defend, an Executioner to revenge any thing for an advantage of favour. Hee hath projected a plot to riſe, and woe be to the friend that ſtands in his way. He ſtill haunteth the Court, and his unquiet ſpirit haunteth him; which having fetcht him from the ſecure peace of his Country-reſt, ſets him new and impoſſible taskes; and after many diſappointments, incourages him to try the ſame ſea in ſpight of his ſhipwracks, and promiſes better ſucceſſe. A ſmall hope gives him heart againſt great difficulties, and drawes on new expence, new ſervilitie; perſwading him (like fooliſh boies) to ſhoot away a ſecond ſhaft, that he may find the firſt. He yeeldeth, and now ſecure of the iſſue, applauds himſelfe in that honour, which he ſtill affecteth, ſtill miſſeth; and for the laſt of all trialls, will rather bribe for a troubleſome preferment, than returne void of a title. But now when he finds himſelfe deſperately croſſed, and at once ſpoiled both of advancement and hope, both of fruition and poſſibility, all his deſire is turned into rage, his thirſt is now only of revenge; his tongue ſounds of nothing but detraction and ſlander: Now the place he ſought for, is baſe, his rivall unworthy, his adverſary injurious, officers corrupt, Court infectious; and how well is he that may be his owne man, his owne maſter; that may live ſafely in a meane diſtance, at pleaſure, free from ſtarving, free from burning? But if his deſignes ſpeed well; ere he be warme in that ſeat, his mind is poſſeſſed of an higher. What he hath, is but a degree to what he would have: now he ſcorneth what he formerly aſpired to; his ſucceſſe doth not give him ſo much contentment as provocation; neither can he be at reſt, ſo long as he hath one, either to over-look, or to match, or to emulate him. When his Country-friend comes to viſite him, hee carries him up to the awfull preſence; and and now in his ſight crowding neerer to the Chaire of State, deſires to be lookt on, deſires to be ſpoken to by the greateſt, and ſtudies how to offer an occaſion, leſt he ſhould ſeeme unknowne, unregarded; and if any geſture of the leaſt grace fall haply upon him, he lookes backe upon his friend, leſt he ſhould careleſly let it paſſe, without a note: and what he wanteth in ſenſe, he ſupplies in Hiſtory. His diſpoſition is never but ſhamefully unthankfull: for unleſſe he have all, he hath nothing. It muſt be a large draught, whereof he will not ſay, that thoſe few drops doe not ſlake, but inflame him: ſo ſtill hee thinks himſelfe the worſe for ſmall favours. His wit ſo contrives the likely plots of his promotion, as if he would ſteale it away without Gods knowledge, beſides his will: neither doth he ever looke up, and conſult in his forecaſts, with the ſupreme Moderator of all things; as one that thinks honour is ruled by Fortune, and that heaven medleth not with the diſpoſing of theſe earthly lots: and therefore it is juſt with that wiſe God to defeat his faireſt hopes, and to bring him to a loſſe in the hotteſt of his chace; and to cauſe honour to flie away ſo much the faſter, by how much it is more eagarly purſued. Finally, he is an importunate ſuter, a corrupt client, a violent undertaker, a ſmooth Factor, but untruſty, a reſtleſſe maſter of his owne; a Bladder puft up with the wind of hope, and ſelfe-love. He is in the common body, as a Mole in the earth, ever unquietly caſting; and in one word, is nothing but a confuſed heape of envy, pride, covetouſneſſe.

Of the Unthrift.

HE ranges beyond his pale, and lives without compaſſe. His expence is meaſured, not by abilitie, but will. His pleaſures are immoderate, and not honeſt. A wanton eye, a lickoriſh tongue, a gameſome hand have impoveriſht him. The vulgar ſort call him bountifull, and applaud him while he ſpends, and recompence him with wiſhes when he gives, with pitie when he wants. Neither can it be denied that he raught true liberality, but overwent it. No man could have lived more laudably, if when he was at the beſt, he had ſtayed there. While he is preſent, none of the wealthier gueſts may pay ought to the ſhot, without much vehemency, without danger of unkindneſſe. Uſe hath made it unpleaſant to him, not to ſpend. Hee is in all things more ambitious of the title of good fellowſhip, than of wiſdome. When he looks into the wealthy cheſt of his Father, his conceit ſuggeſts that it cannot be emptied; and while he takes out ſome deale every day, he perceives not any diminution; and when the heape is ſenſibly abated, yet ſtill flatters himſelfe with enough. One hand couzens the other, and the belly deceives both: he doth not ſo much beſtow benefits, as ſcatter them. True merit doth not carry them, but ſmoothneſſe of adulation. His ſenſes are too much his guides, and his purveyors; and appetite is his ſteward. He is an impotent ſervant to his luſts; and knowes not to governe either his mind or his purſe. Improvidence is ever the companion of unthriftineſſe; This man cannot looke beyond the preſent, and neither thinks nor cares what ſhall bee; much leſſe ſuſpects what may bee: and while he laviſhes out his ſubſtance in ſuperfluities, thinks he onely knowes what the world is worth, and that others overprize it. He feeles poverty before he ſees it, never complaines till he be pinched with wants; never ſpares till the bottome, when it is too late either to ſpend or recover. He is every mans friend ſave his owne, and then wrongs himſelfe moſt, when he courteth himſelfe with moſt kindneſſe. He vies Time with the ſlothfull, and it is an hard match, whether chaſes away good houres to worſe purpoſe; the one by doing nothing, or the other by idle paſtime. Hee hath ſo dilated him ſelfe with the beames of proſperitie, that he lies open to all dangers, and cannot gather up himſelfe, on juſt warning, to avoid a miſcheife. Hee were good for an Almner, ill for a Steward. Finally, hee is the living tombe of his fore-fathers, of his poſterity; and when he hath ſwallowed both, is more empty than before hee devoured them.

Of the Envious.

HE feeds on others evils, and hath no diſeaſe but his neighbours welfare: whatſoever God doe for him, he cannot be happy with company; and if he were put to chuſe, whether he would rather have equals in a common felicitie; or ſuperiours in miſery, hee would demurre upon the election. His eye caſts out too much, and never retornes home, but to make compariſons with anothers good. He is an ill prizer of forraine commoditie; worſe of his owne; for, that he rates too high, this under value. You ſhall have him ever inquiring into the eſtates of his equals and betters; wherein he is not more deſirous to heare all, than loth to heare any thing overgood: and if juſt report relate ought better than he would, he redoubles the queſtion, as being hard to beleeve what he likes not; and hopes yet, if that be averred againe to his griefe, that there is ſomewhat concealed in the relation, which if it were knowne, would argue the commended partie miſerable, and blemiſh him with ſecret ſhame. He is ready to quarrell with God, becauſe the next field is fairer growne; and angerly calculates his coſt, and time, and tillage. Whom he dares not openly backbite, nor wound with a direct cenſure, he ſtrikes ſmoothly with an over-cold praiſe; and when he ſees that he muſt either malicioufly oppugne the juſt praiſe of another, (which were unſafe) or approve it by aſſent, he yeeldeth; but ſhewes withall that his meanes were ſuch, both by nature and education, that he could not, without much neglect, be leſſe commendable: ſo his happineſſe ſhall be made the colour of detraction. When an wholeſome law is propounded, he croſſeth it, either by open, or cloſe oppoſition; not for any incommodity or inexpedience, but becauſe it proceeded from any mouth beſides his owne. And it muſt be a cauſe rarely plauſible, that will not admit ſome probable contradiction. When his equall ſhould riſe to honour, he ſtrives againſt it unſeene; and rather with much coſt ſuborneth great adverſaries; and when he ſees his reſiſtance vaine, he can give an hollow gratulation in preſence; but in ſecret, diſparages that advancement; either the man is unfit for the place, or the place for the man: or if fit, yet leſſe gainfull, or more common than opinion: whereto he addes, that himſelfe might have had the ſame dignitie upon better termes, and refuſed it. He is wittie in devising ſuggeſtions, to bring his Rivall out of love, into ſuſpition. If he be curteous, he is ſeditiouſly popular; if bountifull, he bindes over his clients to a faction; if ſucceſſefull in warre, he is dangerous in peace; if wealthy, he layes up for a day; if powerfull, nothing wants but opportunity of rebellion. His ſubmiſſion is ambitious hypocriſie; his religion, politike inſinuation; no action is ſafe from a jealous conſtruction. When he receives a good report of him whom he emulates, he ſaith, Fame is partiall, and is wont to blanch miſcheifes; and pleaſeth himſelfe with hope to finde it worſe; and if Ill-will have diſperſed any more ſpightfull narration, he laies hold on that, againſt all witneſſes, and brocheth that rumour for trueſt, becauſe worſt: and when he ſees him perfectly miſerable, he can at once pittie him, and rejoyce. What himſelfe cannot doe, others ſhall not: he hath gained well, if he have hindred the ſucceſſe of what he would have done, and could not. He conceales his beſt skill, not ſo as it may not be knowne that he knowes it, but ſo as it may not be learned; becauſe he would have the world miſſe him. He attained to a ſoveraigne medicine, by the ſecret Legacy of a dying Empericke, whereof he will leave no heire, leſt the praiſe ſhould be divided. Finally, he is an enemie to Gods favours, if they fall beſide himſelfe; the beſt nurſe of ill Fame; a man of the worſt diet; for he conſumes himſelfe; and delights in pining; a thorne-hedge covered with nettles; a peeviſh Interpreter of good things, and no other then a leane and pale carcaſe quickened with a Fiend.

With an open and plaine Paraphraſe upon the SONG OF SONGS.

By IOS. HALL.

¶ Imprinted at LONDON, 1634.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, AND HOPEFVLL LORD, ROBERT, EARLE OF ESSEX, my singular good Lord, all increase of Grace and true Honour.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

Whilest I desired to congratulate your happy returne with some worthy present; I fell upon this: which I dare not onely offer, but commend; the royallest Phylosopher and wisest King, giving you those precepts, which the Spirit of God gave him. The matter is all his: nothing is mine, but the method, which I doe willingly submit to censure. In that, hee could not erre; in this, I cannot but have erred, either in Art, or application, or sense, or disorder, or defect: yet not wilfully. I have meant it well, and faithfully to the Church of God, and to your Honour, as one of her great hopes. If any man shall cavill, that I have gone about to correct Salomons order, or to controule Ezekias servants: I complaine both of his charity, and wisdome; and appeale to more lawfull judgement. Let him as well say, that every Concordance perverts the Text. I have onely endevoured to be the common place-booke of that great King, and to referre his Divine rules to their heads, for more ease of finding,

for better memory, for readier uſe. See how that God, whoſe wiſdome thought good to bereave mankind of Salomons profound Commentaries of Nature, hath reſerved theſe his Divine Morals, to out-live the world; as knowing, that thoſe would but feed mans curioſity, theſe would both direct his life, and judge it. He hath not done this without expectation of our good, and glory to himſelfe: which if wee anſwer, the gaine is ours. I know how little need there is, either to entreat your Lordſhips acceptation, or to adviſe your uſe. It is enough to have humbly preſented them to your hands, and through them to the Church: the deſire of whoſe good is my good; yea, my recompence and glory. The ſame God, whoſe hand hath led and returned you in ſafety, from all forraine evils, guide your wayes at home, and graciouſly increaſe you in the ground of all true honour, Goodneſſe. My prayers ſhall ever follow you:

Who vow my ſelfe your Honours in all humble and true duty,

Behaviour and Manners.

THE FIRST BOOKE.

FELICITIE.

§ 1. of Ethicks in common
- The description.
- The chiefe end which is Felicity.

ETHICKS is a Doctrine of wisdome and knowledge to live well, and of the madnesse and foolishnesse of vice: or instruction to doe wisely by justice, and judgement, and equity, and to doe good in our life. The end whereof is, D to see and attaine that chiefe goodnesse of the children of men, which they enioy under the Sunne, the whole number of the dayes of their life. Ec.1.17. Ec.7.27. Pr.1.3. Ec.3.12. Ec.2.3.

§ 2. Wherein Felicity is not.
- Not in pleasure,
- Not in wealth: for herein is
  1. No satisfaction.
  2. Increased expence.
  3. Restlessnesse.
  4. Want of fruition.
  5. Vncertainty.
  6. Necessity of leaving it.

E WHich consists not in pleasure; for I said in my heart, Goe to now, I will prove thee with joy, therefore take thou pleasure in pleasant things; yea, I with-drew not my heart from any joy: for my heart rejoyced in all my labour: and who could eat, and who could haste to outward things more than I? and behold, this also is vanity. Ec.2.1. Ec.2.10. Ec.2.25. Ec.2.1.

Not in riches. 1. For hee that loveth silver, shall not be satisfied with silver, and hee that loveth riches, shall be without the fruit of them: this also is vanity. Ec.5.9.

2. When riches increase, they are increased that eat them: and what good commeth to the owners thereof, but the beholding thereof with their eyes? yea much evill; Ec.5.10. Ec.5.11.

for

for whereas the ſleepe of him that travelleth is ſweet, whether he eat little or much; contrarily, The ſatiety of the rich will not ſuffer him to ſleepe; ſo there is an evill ſickneſſe, which I have ſeene under the Sunne, riches reſerved to the owners thereof, for their evill, and ofter, not for their good: for there is another evill, which I have ſeene under the Sunne, and it is frequent among men; A man to whom God hath given riches, and treaſures, and honour, and he wanteth nothing for his ſoule, of all it deſireth; but God giveth him not power to eat thereof; and if he have that, yet how long? Riches remaine not alwayes, but taketh her to her wings as an Eagle, and flieth to the heavens. And for their owner. As he came forth of his mothers belly, he ſhall returne naked, to goe as he came, and ſhall beare away nothing of his labour, which he cauſed to paſſe by his hand: And this is alſo an evill ſickneſſe, that in all points as he came, ſo ſhall he goe: and what profit hath he, that he hath travelled for the wind?

- of works,
  - Planting,
  - Gathering Treaſures,
  - Building, &c.

Not in honour and magnificence. I the Preacher have beene King over Iſrael in Jeruſalem, and I was great, and increaſed above all that were before me in Jeruſalem, which alſo I ſhewed in effect; for I made me great workes, I built me houſes, I planted me Vineyards, I made me Gardens, and Orchards, and planted in them Trees of all fruits; I made me ponds of water, to water therewith the woods that grow with trees; I got men ſervants, and maids, and had children borne in the houſe; alſo I had great poſſeſſions of beeves, and ſheepe, above all that were before me in Jeruſalem; I gathered to me alſo ſilver and gold, and the chiefe treaſures of Kings and Provinces; I provided Men-ſingers, and Women-ſingers, and the delights of the ſons of men, muſicall conſorts of all kinds. Yea, I King Salomon made my ſelfe a Palace of the trees of Lebanon; I made the pillars thereof of ſilver, and the pavement thereof of gold; the hangings thereof of purple, whoſe mids was paved with the love of the daughters of Iſrael: Then I looked on all my works that my hands had wrought, (as who is the man that will compare with the King in things which men now have done?) and on the travell that I laboured to doe; and behold, all is vanity, and vexation of ſpirit; and there is no profit under the Sunne.

- certaine end,
- unperfect ſatisfaction,
- remembrance and continuance of darkneſſe.

Not in long life, and plenteous iſſue: for If a man beget an hundred children, and live many yeares, and the dayes of his yeares be multiplyed, and his ſoule bee not ſatisfied with good things, and he be not buried, I ſay, that an untimely fruit is better than he. For he commeth into vanity, and goeth into darkneſſe, and his name ſhall be covered with darkneſſe: Alſo, he hath not ſeene the Sunne, nor known it: therefore this hath more reſt than the other: And if he had lived a thouſand yeares twice to'd, and had ſeene no good; ſhall not all goe to one place? and howſoever, the light ſurely is a pleaſant thing, and it is good for the eyes to ſee the Sun; yet though a man live many yeares, and in them all he rejoyce; if he ſhall remember the dayes of darkneſſe, becauſe they are many, and all that commeth, is Vanity.

§. 5. Knowledge { Though better than folly; / yet rejected, upon { experience, / indifferency of events, / imperfection.

Not in learning, and humane knowledge. I have given my heart to ſearch and find out wiſdome in all things that are done under the heaven, (this ſore travell hath God given the ſonnes of men to humble them thereby) yea, I thought in mine heart and ſaid, Behold, I have amplified and increaſed wiſdome, above all them that have beene before mee, in the Court and Vniverſity of Jeruſalem, and mine heart hath ſeene much wiſdome and knowledge: for when I was at the wildeſt) my wiſdome remained with me: Then I ſaw indeed, that there is profit in wiſdome more than in folly, as the light is more excellent than darkneſſe: For the wiſe-mans eyes are in his head, but the foole walketh in darkneſſe: but yet, I know that the ſame condition falleth to them all. Then I thought in mine heart, It befalleth to me as it befalleth to the foole; why therefore do I labour to be more wiſe? For what hath the wiſe-man more than the foole? There ſhall be no remembrance of the wiſe, nor of the foole for ever: for that that now is, in the the daies to come ſhalbe forgotten; & how dieth the wiſe-man? as doth the foole: Beſides the imperfection of the beſt knowledge; for the eye is not ſatisfied with ſeeing, nor the eare filled with hearing: I thought I would be wiſe, but it went farre from me; it is farre off, what may it be? and it is a profound deepneſſe, who can find it? yea, ſo farre is it from giving contentment, that in the multitude of wiſdome is much griefe, and he that increaſeth knowledge, increaſeth ſorrow.

WHerein then doth it conſiſt? Let us heare the end of all, Feare God, and keep his Commandements; for this is the whole of Man, the whole duty, the whole ſcope, the whole happineſſe; for Life is in the way of righteouſneſſe, and in that path there is no death; and attending thereon, all Bleſſings are upon the head of the righteous. Wouldſt thou have favour? A good man getteth favour of the Lord. Ioy? The righteous ſhall ſing and rejoyce; and ſurely to a man that is good in his ſight, God giveth wiſdome & knowledge and joy; ſo that the light of the righteous rejoyceth, but the candle of the wicked ſhall be put out. Preſervation and deliverance? Loe, the righteous is an everlaſting foundation; for the way of the Lord is ſtrength to the upright man, ſo as the righteous ſhall never be removed: and if he be in trouble; Riches availe not in the day of wrath, but righteouſnes delivereth from death ſo the righteous ſhall come out of adverſity, and eſcape out of trouble, and the wicked ſhall come in his ſtead; thus every way Righteouſneſſe preſerveth the upright in heart. Proſperity and wealth? The houſe of the righteous ſhall have much treaſure, and his tabernacle ſhall flouriſh. Long life? The feare of the Lord increaſeth the daies; and not only himſelfe, but his houſe ſhall ſtand. And though a ſinner doe evill an hundred times, and God prolong his dayes, yet know I that it ſhall be well to them that feare the Lord, and doe reverence before him. And laſtly, whatſoever good? God will grant the deſire of the righteous, and he that keepeth the Law, is bleſſed.

Vertue consists in the meane; vice in extremes. Let thy wayes be ordered aright; Turne not to the right hand, nor to the left, but remove thy foot from evill; The rule whereof is Gods Law: for the commandement is a lanterne, and instruction a light; and every word of God is pure. My sonne, hearken to my words, incline thine eare to my sayings; let them not depart from thine eyes, but keepe them in the midst of thine heart. For they are life unto those that find them, and health unto all their flesh. Keep my commandements, and thou shalt live, and mine instruction as the apple of thine eye: Bind them upon thy fingers, and write them upon the Table of thine heart.

THe prudent man is he, whose eies are in his head to see all things, and to fore see: A and whose heart is at his right hand to doe all dexterously, and with judgement.
Wisdome dwels with Prudence, and findeth forth knowledge; and counsels.
And to describe it: The wisdome of the Prudent is to understand his way; his owne: If thou be wise, thou shalt be wise for thy selfe: A excellent vertue, for Blessed is the man that findeth wisdome, and getteth understanding: The marchandize thereof is better than silver, and the gaine thereof is better than gold: It is more precious than pearles, and all the things that thou canst desire, are not to be compared to her.
Length of dayes is in her right hand; and in her left hand riches and glory: Her waies are wayes of pleasure, and all her paths prosperity: She is a tree of life to them that lay hold on her, and blessed is he that receiveth her. The fruits of it are singular: for first,
A wise heart doth not only seeke, but get knowledge, without which the mind is not good: and the eare of the wise, learning: And not get it only, but lay it up, and not so only, but works by it: and yet more, is crownd with it. Besides knowledge, here is safety. When wisdome entreth into thy heart, and knowledge delighteth thy soule, then shall counsell preserve thee, and understanding shall keep thee: and deliver thee from the evill way, and from the man that speaketh froward things, and from them that leave the wayes of righteousnesse, to walke in the wayes of darknesse: and as from sinne, so from judgement. The way of life is on high, the prudent to avoyd from hell beneath.
Thirdly, good direction. 1. For actions: Wisdome causeth to walke in the way of righte-ousnesse, and in the mids of the paths of judgement. 2. For words, The heart of the wise guideth his mouth wisely, and addeth doctrine to his lips: So that the words of the mouth of a wise man have grace: yea, hee receives grace from others. Either instruct or reprove the Prudent, and hee will understand knowledge. Not to speake of wealth: she causeth them that love her, to inherit substance, and filleth their treasures: C
She giveth not onely honour: for the wisdome of a man doth make his face to shine, and the wise man shall inherit glory; but life: Understanding is a well-spring of life, to him that hath it: and he that findeth me (with wisdome) findeth life, and shall obtaine favour of the Lord. Wherefore get wisdome: get understanding: forget not, neither decline from the words of my mouth. Forsake her not, and she shall keep thee: love her, and shee shall preserve thee. Wisdome is the beginning: get wisdome therefore, and above all possessions get understanding: Exalt her, and she shall exalt thee: She shall bring thee unto honour, if thou embrace her: shee shall give a goodly ornament to thine head: yea, she shall give thee a Crowne of glory.

PRovidence is that whereby the heart of the wise fore-knoweth the time, and judgement; the time when it will be; the judgement how it will be done: both which are appointed to every purpose under heaven: Not that man can fore-see all future things: No, he knoweth not that, that shall be; For who can tell him when it shall be?
not so much as concerning himselfe. Neither doth man know his time, but as the fishes are taken with an evill net, and as the birds which are caught in the snare; so are the children of men snared in the evill time, when it falleth on them suddenly; yea, the steps of a man are ruled by the Lord; how should a man then understand his owne way? But sometimes hee may: The prudent man seeth the plague afarre off, and fleeth: and as for good things, With the Pismire hee provideth his meat in Sum- E mer; working still according to fore-knowledge; yet not too strictly, and fearfully: for hee that observeth the wind, shall not sow; and hee that regardeth the clouds, shall not reap.

§. 4. Of Diſcretion: { What it is. / What it worketh { for our acts, / for our ſpeeches.

Diſcretion is that wherely a man is wiſe in his buſineſſes, and wherely the heart of the wiſe guideth his mouth wiſely, and addeth doctrine to his lips; For actions: The prudent will conſider his ſteps, and make choice of his times: for To all things there is an appointed time; and a time for every purpoſe under heaven; a time to plant, and a time to pluck up that which is planted; a time to ſlay, and a time to heale, &c. a time of warre, and a time of peace: from hence it is that the wiſe man is B ſtrong, and rich; for by knowledge ſhall the chambers be fild with precious things, which he knowes how to employ well: The crowne of the wiſe is their riches; from hence, that his good underſtanding maketh him acceptable to others. For ſpeeches, The tongue of the wiſe uſeth knowledge aright, and in the lips of him that hath underſtanding, wiſdome is found; and his words have grace, both 1. for the ſeaſonableneſſe, A word ſpoken in his place, is like apples of gold with pictures of ſilver: and how good is a word in due ſeaſon! 2. for the worth of them. The lips of knowledge are a precious jewell. Laſtly, for their uſe: The lips of the wiſe ſhall preſerve them, and their tongue is health, and with health, pleaſure: Faire words are as an honey-combe; ſweetneſſe to the ſoule, and health to the bones.

Here are two extremes: On the right hand; Make not thy ſelfe over-wiſe, wherefore ſhouldeſt thou be deſolate? On the left: Neither be fooliſh; why ſhouldeſt thou periſh, not in thy time? The foole, is that man that wandreth out of the way of wiſdome, which hath none heart, that is, is deſtitute of underſtanding, either to conceive, or to doe as he ought: Of which ſort is, 1. The meere foole; That foole, who when he goeth by the way, his heart faileth; whoſe folly is fooliſhneſſe, in whoſe hand D there is a price in vaine to get wiſdome, which is too high for him to attaine, laſtly, in whom are not the lips of knowledge. 2. The raſh foole, that is haſtie in his matters, that powreth out all his mind at once: which the wiſe man keepes in, till afterward; that haſteth with his feet, and therefore ſinneth. There is more hope of the other foole than of him. 3. The wicked foole; That deſpiſeth wiſdome and inſtruction, that maketh a mock of ſinne; to whom it is an abomination to depart from evill; to whom fooliſhneſſe is joy; yea, it is his paſtime to doe wickedly; and his practice to ſpread abroad folly. And this man is obſtinate in his courſes; for though thou bray a foole in a morter among wheat, brayd with a peſtell, yet will not his fooliſhneſſe depart from him: and though it ſeeme to depart, yet as a dog turneth againe to his vomit, ſo returnes hee to his fooliſhneſſe. Spare thy labour therefore, ſpeake not in the eares of a foole; for hee will deſpiſe the wiſedome of thy words. To theſe ſaith Wiſdome, O ye fooliſh, how long E will ye love fooliſhneſſe, and the ſcornefull take pleaſure in ſcorning, and fooles hate knowledge? Turne you at my correction. Loe, I will powre out my mind unto you and make you underſtand my words. ſatiety of the rich will not ſuffer him to ſleepe. To whom is woe? to whom is ſorrow? to whom is murmuring? to whom are wounds without cauſe? and to whom is the redneſſe of the eyes? even to them that tarry long at the Wine: to them that goe and ſeeke mixt Wine. For his ſoule: Looke not on the wine when it is red, and ſheweth his colour in the cup, or goeth downe pleaſantly. In the end thereof, it will bite like a Serpent, and hurt like a Cockatrice: Thine eyes ſhall look upon the ſtrange woman, and thy lips ſhall ſpeake lewd things, and thou ſhalt be as one that ſleepeth in the middeſt of the Sea, and as he that ſleepeth in the top of the maſt: they have ſtriken me (ſhalt thou ſay) but I was not ſick: they have beaten me, but I knew not when I awoke, therefore will I ſeeke it yet ſtill. For his eſtate: He is like a City which is broken downe, and without walls: Keepe not company therefore with drunkards, nor with gluttons: for the glutton and drunkard ſhall be poore, and the ſleeper ſhall be clothed with rags; and in all theſe, Wine is a mocker, and ſtrong drinke is raging, and whoſoever is deceived thereby, is not wiſe.

THe modeſt (for words) is a man of a precious ſpirit, that refraineth his lips, and ſpareth his words. The words of a modeſt man are like deepe waters, and the well-ſpring of wiſdome like a flowing River: but when he doth ſpeake, it is to purpoſe: for The mouth of the juſt ſhall be fruitfull in wiſdome: and the lips of the righteous doe feede many, yea himſelfe: A man ſhall be ſatiate with good things by the fruit of his mouth: and with the fruit of a mans mouth his belly ſhall be ſatisfied: but ſtill he ſpeaketh ſparingly: A wiſe man concealeth knowledge, and a man of underſtanding will keepe ſilence, which as it argues him wiſe, (for even a foole, when he holdeth his peace is counted wiſe; and he that ſtoppeth his lips, as prudent) ſo it gives him much ſafety: He that keepeth his mouth, and his tongue, keepeth his ſoule from affliction; yea he keepeth his life: where contrarily, the mouth of the foole is in the multitude of words, it bableth out fooliſhneſſe; as it is fed with it: neither hath he any delight in underſtanding, but that which his heart diſcovereth; and while he bewrayeth it, the heart of fooles publiſheth his fooliſhneſſe: And as he multiplieth words, ſo in many words there cannot want iniquitie: his mouth (ſtill) bableth evill things, for either he ſpeaketh froward things, or how to lie in wait for bloud, or in the mouth of the fooliſh is the rod of pride; and what is the iſſue of it? He that openeth his mouth deſtruction ſhall be to him. And he that hath a naughty tongue, ſhall fall into evill; for, both it ſhall be cut out, and the frowardneſſe of it, is the breaking of the heart. Laſtly, a fooles mouth is his owne deſtruction, and his lips are a ſnare for his ſoule.

IN all well ordered governments there are degrees, And higher than the highest, and yet an higher than they: and these, of Gods appointment; not onely in the inferiour ranks, The rich and poore meet, and the Lord is the Maker of them all: but in the supreme, By me Kings reigne (saith Wisdome) and Princes decree Justice: and not they onely, but the Nobles and all the Judges of the earth; so it is a just wonder, that the Grashoppers have no King, yet they goe forth by bands. And as no King is a judgement; so many: for, Because of the transgression of the Land, there are many Princes; many, not onely in frequent succession, but in society of regiment.

A King must be high; as in place, so in bloud: Blessed art thou, O Land, when thy King is the son of Nobles; not of any servile condition; for nothing can be more uncomely, than for a servant to have rule over Princes: and it is a monster in State, to see servants ride on horses, and Princes (of bloud) to walke as servants on the ground; neither more monstrous than intolerable. There are three things for which the earth is moved, yea foure which it cannot sustaine: whereof one is, A servant when he reigneth.

AND as his bloud is heroicall, so his disposition; not lascivious, What, O my son of my desires, give not thy strength to women, nor thy wayes: But why, should hee with-hold from his eyes whatsoever they can desire, and withdraw his heart from any joy? why may he not have all the delights of the sons of men: as women taken captive; as Queenes and Concubines, and Damosels without number? This is to destroy Kings; Hee shall find more bitter than death the woman whose heart is as nets and snares. Not riotously excessive; whether in wine: for It is not for Kings to drinke wine, nor for Princes strong drinke: *what not at all? heareth a cause, knowing that He which answereth a matter before he heare it, it is folly and shame to him; and that related on both parts; for He that is first in his owne cause, is just: then commeth his neighbour and maketh inquiry of him; and deeply sifteth it: else he loseth the truth; for The counsell of the heart of a man is like deepe waters: but a man that hath understanding, will draw it out. From hence, is his providence for the common good; not only in seeing the plague, and hiding himselfe, but in delivering the City: and as he foreseeth, so he worketh by knowledge: and not in peace only: as The words of the wise are more heard in quietnesse, than the cry of him that ruleth among fooles; but in warre: A wise man goeth up into the City of the mighty, and casteth downe the strength of the confidence thereof: For wisdome is better than strength, yea, than weapons of warre: I have seene this wisdome under the Sun, and it is great unto me; A little Citie and men in it, and a great King came against it, and compassed it about, and builded forts against it; and there was found in it a poore and wise man, and he delivered the City by his wisdome. Neither can there be true wisdome in any Counsellor, without piety: The wise man feareth, and departs from evill; being well assured, that there is no wisdome, nor understanding, nor counsell against the Lord; and that, Man cannot be established by wickednesse: and indeed how oft doth God so dispose of estates, that the evill shall bow before the good, and the wicked at the gates of the righteous? neither is this more just with God, than acceptable with men: for when the righteous rejoyce, there is great glory, and when they are in authoritie, the people rejoyce; contrarily, when the wicked comes on, and rises up, and beares rule, the man is tried; the good hide themselves, and all the people sigh: and the righteous man falling downe before the wicked, is like a troubled Well, and a corrupt Spring.

Neither is Iustice lesse essentiall than either; for to doe justice and judgement, is more acceptable to the Lord than sacrifice: To know faces, therefore (in a Iudge) is not good; for that man will transgresse for a peece of bread; much lesse to accept the person of the wicked, to cause the righteous to fall in judgement: He that saith to the wicked, Thou art righteous, him shall the people curse, and the multitude shall abhorre him: yea yet higher; Hee that justifieth the wicked, and condemneth the just, both are abomination to the Lord. wherefore, howsoever The wicked man taketh a gift out of the bosome, to wrest the wayes of judgement; and commonly, A mans gift inlargeth him, and leadeth him (with approbation) before great men: yet he knoweth, that the reward destroyeth the heart; that the acceptance of it is but the robbery of the wicked; which shall destroy them, because they have refused to execute judgement: he hateth gifts, then, that he may live, and it is a joy to him to doe judgement. He doth unpartially smite the scorner, yea severely punish him, that the wickedly foolish may beware and become wise. And whereas Every way of a man is right in his owne eyes, and a false record will speake lies, and use deceit: he so maketh inquiry, that a false witnesse shall not be unpunished: and he that speaketh lies shall perish: Lastly, his hand is free from oppression of his inferiours: which as it makes a wise man mad; so the actor of it, miserable: for He that oppresseth the poore, reproveth him that made him: and if the afflicted be oppressed in judgement, the Lord will defend their cause, and spoile the soule that spoileth them; and upon all occasions, he so determineth, that they shall kisse the lips of him that answereth upright words.

Doe this now, my sonne, seeing thou art come into the hand of thy neighbour (not having taken a pledge for thy suretiship) goe and humble thy selfe, and solicite thy friends: Give no sleepe to thine eyes, nor slumber to thine eye-lids. Deliver thy selfe as a Doe from the hand of the Hunter, and as a bird from the hand of the Fowler; and take it for a sure rule, He that hateth suretiship, is sure. B C D

Let the milk of his Goats be sufficient for his food, for the food of his family, and the sustenance of his maids: *and if he have much revenue, let him looke for much expence. PArents and children are the next paire; which doe give much joy to each other: Childrens children are the crowne of the Elders, and the glory of the children are their fathers: To which purpoſe, the Parent oweth to the child, 1. Proviſion. A good man ſhall give inheritance to his childrens children. All the labour, wherein hee hath travelled, he ſhall leave to the man that ſhall be after him. And who knoweth whether he ſhall be wiſe or fooliſh? yet ſhall he rule over all his labour, wherein he hath laboured, and ſhewed himſelfe wiſe under the Sunne. Here are therefore two groſſe vanities which I have ſeene: the one, There is one alone, and there is not a ſecond, which hath neither ſonne nor brother: yet there is none end of his travell, neither can his eye bee ſatisfied with riches; neither doth he think, For whom doe I travell, and defraud my ſoule of pleaſure? The other contrary; riches reſerved to the owner thereof for their evill. And theſe riches periſh in his evill buſineſſe; and he begetteth a ſonne, and in his hand is nothing. 2. Inſtruction and good education: for, He that begetteth a foole (whether naturally, or by ill-breeding) begetteth himſelfe ſorrow, and the father of a foole can have no joy. And therefore, Teach a child in the trade of his way, and when he is old, he ſhall not depart from it. 3. Correction: He that ſpareth his rod, hateth his ſonne: but hee that loveth him, chaſteneth betime; for fooliſhneſſe is bound in the heart of a child: the rod of correction ſhall drive it from him: yea, there is yet great benefit of due chaſtiſment; for, The rod and correction give life: but a child ſet at liberty, makes his mother (who is commonly faulty this way) aſhamed; yea, more than ſhame, death, and hell follow to the child upon indulgence: (onely) If thou ſmite him with the rod, he ſhall not dye: If thou ſmite him with the rod, thou ſhalt deliver his ſoule from hell. Though thy ſonne therefore be tender and deare in thy ſight; Correct him, and he will give thee reſt, and will give pleaſures to thy ſoule: wherefore, Chaſten him while there is hope; and let not thy ſoule ſpare, to his deſtruction. The ſonne that is of a great ſtomacke, ſhall endure puniſhment: and though thou deliver him, yet thou ſhalt take him in hand againe.

UMI

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, MY SINGVLAR GOOD LORD, AND PATRON, EDWARD Lord DENNY, Baron of Waltham, All Grace and Happineſſe.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

When I would have withdrawne my hand from divine Salomon, the Heavenly Elegance of this his beſt Song drew me unto it. and would not ſuffer me to take off mine eyes, or pen. Who can reade it with underſtanding, and not bee tranſported from the world, from himſelfe? and be any otherwhere ſave in Heaven, before his time? I had rather ſpend my time in admiration, than Apology. Surely, here is nothing that ſavours not of extaſie, and ſpirituall raviſhment; neither was there ever ſo high and paſſionate a ſpeculation delivered by the Spirit of God, to mankind: which by how much more divine it is, by ſo much more difficult. It is well, if theſe miſteries can bee found out by ſearching. Two things make the Scripture hard: Prophecies, Allegories; both are met in this: but the latter ſo ſenſibly to the weakeſt eyes, that this whole Paſtorall-marriage-ſong (for ſuch it is) is no other than one Allegory ſweetly continued: where the deepeſt things of God are ſpoken in Riddles, how can

can there be but obſcurity and divers conſtruction? All judgements will not (I know) ſubſcribe to my ſenſes; yet I have beene feareſull and ſpiritually nice, not often diſſenting from all Interpreters; alwaies, from the unlikelieſt. It would bee too tedious to give my account for every line: let the learned ſcan and judge. What-ever others cenſures be, your Honours was favourable; and (as to all mine) full of love and incouragement. That, therefore, which it pleaſed you to allow from my pen, vouchſafe to receive from the Preſſe; more common, not leſſe devoted to you. What is there of mine that doth not joy in your name, and boaſt it ſelfe in ſerving you? To whoſe ſoule and people, I have long agone addicted my ſelfe, and my labours, and ſhall ever continue

Your Lordſhips, in all humble
and unfained dutie,

SALOMONS SONG OF SONGS PARAPHRASED.

CHAP. I.

Dialogue. The Church to CHRIST.

1. Let him kiſſe me with the kiſſes of his mouth; for thy love is better than wine.

OH that he would beſtow upon me the comfortable teſtimonies of his love, and that he would vouchſafe me yet a neerer conjunction with himſelfe; as in glory hereafter, ſo for the meane time in his ſenſible graces! For thy love, O my Saviour, and theſe fruits of it, are more ſweet unto me, than all earthly delicates can be to the bodily taſte.

2. Becauſe of the ſavour of thy good oyntments, thy name is as an oyntment powred out: therefore the Virgins love thee.

Yea, ſo wonderfully pleaſant are the ſavours of thoſe graces that are in thee, wherewith I deſire to bee endued, that all whom thou haſt bleſſed with the ſenſe thereof, make as high and deare account of thy Goſpell, wherby they are wrought, as of ſome precious ointment, or perfume: the delight whereof is ſuch, that (hereupon) the pure and holy ſoules of the faithfull place their whole affection upon thee.

3. Draw me, we will run after thee: the King hath brought me into his chambers, we will rejoyce, and bee glad in thee: wee will remember thy love, more than wine, the righteous doe love thee.

Pull me therefore out from the bondage of my ſinnes: deliver me from the world, and doe thou powerfully incline my will and affections toward thee: and in ſpight of all tentations, give me ſtrength to cleave unto thee; and then both I, and all thoſe faithfull children thou haſt given mee, ſhall all at once with ſpeed and earneſtneſſe walke to thee, and with thee: yea, when once my Royall and glorious Husband hath brought me both into theſe lower rooms of his ſpirituall treaſures on earth, and into his heavenly chambers of glory, then will we rejoyce and be glad in none, but thee, which ſhalt be all in all to us: then will we celebrate and magnifie thy love above all the pleaſures we found upon earth; for all of us thy righteous ones, both Angels and Saints, are inflamed with the love of thee.

4. I am blacke, O daughters of Ieruſalem, but comely: If I be as the tents of Kedar, yet I am as the curtaines of Salomon.

Never upbraid me (O ye forraine congregations) that I ſeeme in outward appearance diſcoloured by my infirmities, and duskiſh with tribulations: for whatſoever I ſeeme to you, I am yet inwardly well-favoured in the eyes of him whom I ſeeke to pleaſe; and though I be to you blacke, like the tents of the Arabian ſhepherds; yet to him, and in him, I am glorious and beautifull, like the Curtaines of Salomon.

5. Regard

5. Regard ye me not, becauſe I am blacke: for the Sunne hath looked upon me; the ſonnes of my mother were angry againſt me: they made me keeper of the vines; but I kept not mine owne vine.

Look not therefore diſdainfully upon me, becauſe I am blackiſh, and dark of hiew: for this colour is not ſo much naturall to me, as cauſed by that continuall heat of afflictions wherewith I have beene uſually ſcorched: neither this, ſo much upon my owne juſt deſert, as upon the rage and envy of my falſe brethren, the world: who would needs force upon me the obſervation of their idolatrous religions, and ſuperſtitious impieties; through whoſe wicked importunitie, and my owne weakneſſe, I have not ſo entirely kept the ſincere truth of God committed to me, as I ought.

6 Shew me, O thou whom my ſoule loveth, where thou feedeſt, where thou lieſt at noone: for why ſhould I be as ſhe that turneth aſide to the flocks of thy companions?

Now therefore that I am ſome little ſtarted aſide from thee, O thou whom my ſoule notwithſtanding dearely loveth, ſhew mee, I beſeech thee, where, and in what wholeſome and divine paſtures thou (like a good ſhepherd) feedeſt and reſteſt thy flocks with comfortable refreſhings, in the extremity of theſe hot perſecutions: for how can it ſtand with thy glory, that I ſhould, through thy neglect, thus ſuſpiciouſly wander up and downe, amongſt the congregations of them that both command and practiſe the worſhip of falſe gods?

CHRIST, to the Church.

7. If thou know not, O thou the faireſt among women, get thee forth by the ſteps of the flock, and feed thy Kids above the tents of the ſhepherds.

IF thou know not, O thou my Church, whom I both eſteeme and have made moſt beautifull by my merits, and thy ſanctification, ſtray not amongſt theſe falſe worſhippers, but follow the holy ſteps of thoſe bleſſed Patriarkes, Prophets, Apoſtles, which have beene my true and ancient flock, who have both knowne my voyce, and followed me; and feed thou my weak and tender ones with this their ſpirituall food of life, farre above the carnall reach of thoſe other falſe teachers.

8. I have compared thee, O my love, to the troups of horſes in the chariots of Pharaoh.

Such is mine eſtimation of thee, O my Love, that ſo farre as the choiſeſt Ægyptian horſes of Pharaoh, for comely ſhape, for honourable ſervice, for ſtrength and ſpeed, exceed all other, ſo farre thou excelleſt all that may be compared with thee.

9. Thy cheekes are comely with rowes of ſtones, and thy necke with chaines.

Thoſe parts of thee, which both are the ſeats of beauty, and moſt conſpicuous to the eye, are glorioufly adorned with the graces of my ſanctification; which are for their worth as ſo many precious borders of the goodlieſt ſtones, or chaines of pearle.

10. We will make thee borders of gold, with ſtuds of ſilver.

And though thou bee already thus ſet forth; yet I and my Father have purpoſed a further ornament unto thee, in the more plentifull effuſion of our Spirit upon thee: which ſhall be to thy former deckings, in ſtead of pure gold curiouſly wrought with ſpecks of ſilver.

The Church.

11. while the King was at his repaſt, my ſpikenard gave the ſmell thereof.

BEhold (O yee daughters) even now, whiles my Lord and King ſeemes farre diſtant from me, and ſits in the Throne of heaven amongſt the companies of Angels (who attend around upon him) yet now doe I find him preſent with me in ſpirit: even now the ſweet influence of his graces, like to ſome precious oyntment, ſpreads it ſelfe over my ſoule, and returnes a pleaſant ſavour into his owne noſthrils.

12. My welbeloved is as a bundle of mirrh unto me, lying betweene my breſts.

And though I be thus delightfull to my Saviour, yet nothing ſo much as he is unto me: for loe, as ſome fragrant pomander of mirrh, laid betweene the breſts, ſends up a moſt

A moſt comfortable ſent; ſo his love, laid cloſe unto my heart, doth ſtill give me continuall and unſpeakable refreſhings.

13. My well-beloved is as a cluſter of Cypers unto me among the vines of Engeddy.

Or if any thing can be of more excellent vertue, ſuch ſmell as the cluſters of Cypers berries, within the fruitfulſt, pleaſantſt, and richeſt Vineyards and gardens of Judæa, yeeld unto the paſſengers; ſuch and more delectable doe I find the favour of his grace to me.

CHRIST.

14. My Love, behold, thou art faire, thine eyes are like the Doves.

B NEither doeſt thou on my part loſe any of thy love, O my deare Church: for behold, in mine eies, thus clothed as thou art with my righteouſneſſe, oh how faire and glorious thou art! how above all compariſon glorious and faire! Thine eyes, which are thy ſeers, (Prophets, Apoſtles, Miniſters) and thoſe inward eyes, whereby thou ſeeſt him that is inviſible, are full of grace, chaſtity, ſimplicity.

The Church.

15. My well-beloved, behold, thou art faire and pleaſant: alſo our bed is greene.

NAy then (O my ſweet Saviour and Spouſe) thou alone art that faire and pleaſant one indeed, from whoſe fulneſſe I confeſſe to have received all this little meaſure of my ſpirituall beauty: and behold, from this our mutuall delight, and heavenly conjunction, there ariſeth a plentifull and flourithing increaſe of thy faithfull ones in all places, and through all times.

C 16. The beames of our houſe are Cedars, our galleries are of Firre.

And behold, the congregations of Saints, the places where we do ſweetly converſe and walk together, are both firme and during (like Cedars amongſt the trees) not ſubject, through thy protecting grace, to utter corruption; and through thy favourable, acceptation and word (like to galleries of ſweet wood) full of pleaſure and contentment.

CHAP. II.

CHRIST.

D 1. I am the Roſe of the field, and the Lilly of the valleyes.

THou haſt not without juſt cauſe magnified me, O my Church: for, as the faireſt and ſweeteſt of all flowers which the earth yeeldeth, the Roſe and Lilly of the valleyes, excell for beauty, for pleaſure, for uſe, the moſt baſe and odious weeds that grow: ſo doth my grace, to all them that have felt the ſweetnes thereof, ſurpaſſe all worldly contentments.

2. Like a Lilly among the thornes, ſo is my Love among the daughters.

Neither is this my dignity alone: but thou, O my Spouſe (that thou maiſt bee a fit match for me) art thus excellent above the world, that no Lilly can be more in goodly ſhew beyond the naked thorne, than thou in thy glory thou receiveſt from mee, overlookeſt all the aſſemblies of aliens and unregenerates.

3. Like the Apple-tree among the trees of the forreſt, ſo is my well-beloved among the ſons of men: under his ſhadow had I delight, and ſate downe; and his fruit was ſweet unto my mouth.

AND (to returne thine owne praiſes) as ſome fruitfull and well-growne Apple-tree, in compariſon of all the barren trees of the wilde forreſt, ſo art thou (O my beloved Saviour) to me, in compariſon of all men, and Angels; under thy comfortable ſhadow alone, have I ever wont to find ſafe ſhelter againſt all mine afflictions, all my tentations and infirmities, againſt all the curſes of the Law, and dangers of judgement, and to coole my ſelfe after all the ſcorching beames of thy Fathers diſpleaſure, and (beſides) to feed and ſatisfie my ſoule with the ſoveraigne fruit of thy holy Word, unto eternall life. A

4. He brought me into the wine-cellar, and love was his banner over me.

Hee hath graciouſly led mee by his Spirit, into the midſt of the myſteries of godlineſſe; and hath plentifully broached unto mee the ſweet wines of his Scriptures and Sacraments. And look how ſouldiers are drawne by their colours from place to place, and cleave faſt to their enſigne: ſo his love, which he ſpred forth in my heart, was my onely banner, whereby I was both drawne to him, directed by him, and faſtened upon him. B

5. Stay me with flagons, and comfort me with apples: for I am ſicke of love.

And now, O yee faithfull Evangeliſts, Apoſtles, Teachers, apply unto me with all care and diligence, all the cordiall promiſes of the Goſpell: theſe are the full Flagons of that ſpirituall wine, which onely can cheere up my ſoule; theſe are the Apples of that Tree of life, in the middeſt of the Garden, which can feed mee to immortality. Oh come and apply theſe unto my heart: for I am even overcome with a longing expectation and deſire of my delayed glory.

6. His left hand be under my head: and let his right hand embrace me.

And whiles I am thus ſpiritually languiſhing in this agony of deſire, let my Saviour imploy both his hands to releeve mine infirmity: let him comfort my head and my heart, my judgement and affections, (which both complaine of weakneſſe) with the lively heat of his gracious embracements: and ſo let us ſweetly reſt together. C

7. I charge you, O daughters of Ieruſalem, by the Roes and by the Hinds of the field, that ye ſtirre not up, nor waken my Love, untill he pleaſe.

In the meane time, I charge you (O all yee that profeſſe any friendſhip or affinity with me) I charge you, by whatſoever is comely, deare and pleaſant unto you, as you will avoid my uttermoſt cenſures, take heed how you vex and diſquiet my mercifull Saviour, and grieve his Spirit, and wrong his name, with your vaine and lewd converſation; and doe not dare, by the leaſt provocation of your ſinne, to interrupt his peace.

8. It is the voyce of my well-beloved: behold, he commeth leaping by the mountaines, and skipping by the hills. D

Loe, I have no ſooner called, but he heares and anſwers me with his loving voyce: neither doth he only ſpeake to me afarre, but hee comes to mee with much willingneſſe and celeritie; ſo willingly, that no humane reſiſtance can hinder him, neither the hillocks of my leſſer infirmities, nor the mountaines of my groſſer ſinnes (once repented of) can ſtay his mercifull paſe towards me.

9. My well-beloved is like a Roe, or a young Hart: loe, he ſtandeth behind our wall, looking forth of the windowes, ſhewing himſelfe thorow the grates.

So ſwiftly, that no Roe or Hind can fully reſemble him in this his ſpeed and nimbleneſſe: and loe, even now, before I can ſpeake it, is he come neere unto me, cloſe to the doore and wall of my heart. And though this wall of my fleſh hinder my full fruition of him, yet loe, I ſee him by the eye of faith, looking upon me; I ſee him as in a glaſſe; I ſee him ſhining glorioufly, thorow the gates and windowes of his Word and Sacraments, upon my ſoule. E

10. My well-beloved ſpake, and ſaid unto mee, Ariſe, my love, my faire one, and come thy way.

And

A And now, mee thinks, I heare him ſpeake to mee in a gracious invitation, and ſay, Ariſe, (O my Church) riſe up, whether from thy ſecurity, or feare: hide not thy head any longer, O my beautifull Spouſe, for danger of thine enemies, neither ſuffer thy ſelfe to be preſſed with the dulneſſe of thy nature, or the careleſſe ſleep of thy ſinnes; but come forth into the comfortable light of my preſence, and ſhew thy ſelfe cheerefull in me.

11. For behold, winter is paſt, the raine is changed and gone away.

For behold, all the cloudy winter of thy afflictions is paſſed, all the tempeſts of tentations are blowne over; the heaven is cleare, and now there is nothing that may not give thee cauſe of delight.

B 12. The flowers appeare in the earth: the time of the ſinging of birds is come, and the voyce of the Turtle is heard in our land.

Every thing now reſembles the face of a ſpirituall Spring; all the ſweet flowers and bloſſomes of holy profeſſion put forth, and ſhew themſelves in their opportunities: now is the time of that heavenly melody, which the cheerefull Saints and Angells make in mine eares, while they ſing ſongs of deliverance, and praiſe me with their Allelujahs, and ſay, Glory to God on high, in earth peace, good will towards men.

13. The Fig-tree hath brought forth her young Figs, and the Vines with their ſmall Grapes have caſt a ſavour: ariſe, my love, my faire one, and come away.

What ſpeake I of bloſſomes? behold, thoſe fruitfull Vines, and Fig-trees of my faithfull ones, whom my husbandry hath carefully tended and dreſſed, yeeld forth
C both pleaſant (though tender) fruits of obedience, and the wholeſome and comfortable ſavours of better deſires: wherefore now, O my deare Church, ſhake off all that dull ſecurity, wherewith thou haſt beene held, and come forth and enjoy me.

14. My Dove, thou art in the holes of the rock, in the ſecret places of the clifts: ſhew me thy ſight, let me heare thy voyce: for thy voyce is ſweet, and thy ſight comely.

O my beautifull, pure, and chaſt Spouſe, which like unto ſome ſolitary Dove, haſt long hid thine head in the ſecret and inacceſſible clifts of the rocks, out of the reach and knowledge of thy perſecutors; how-ever thou art concealed from others, ſhew thy ſelfe in thy works and righteouſneſſe, unto me: and let me be ever plied with thy words of imploration, and thankſgiving: for thy voice (though it be in mourning) and thy face (though it be ſad and blubbered) are exceedingly pleaſing unto me.

D 15. Take us the Foxes, the little Foxes which deſtroy the Vines: for our Vines have ſmall grapes.

And in the meane time (O all ye that wiſh well to my name and Church) doe your utmoſt endevour to deliver her from her ſecret enemies (not ſparing the leaſt) who either by hereticall doctrine, or prophane converſation, hinder the courſe of the Goſpell, & pervert the faith of many, eſpecially of thoſe that have newly given up their names to me, and are but newly entred into the profeſſion of godlineſſe.

16. My wel-beloved is mine, and I am his: he feedeth among the Lillies.

My beloved Saviour is mine, through my faith; and I am his through his love: and E we both are one, by vertue of that bleſſed union on both parts; whereby we mutually enjoy each other with all ſufficient contentment. And how worthily is my love placed upon him, who leadeth me forth into pleaſant paſtures, and at whoſe right hand there is the fulneſſe of joy for evermore?

17. Vntill the day breake, and the ſhadowes flee away, returne, my well-beloved, and be like a Roe or a young Hart upon the mountaines of Bether.

Come therefore (O my Saviour) and untill the day of thy glorious appearance ſhall ſhine forth to the world, wherein our ſpirituall marriage ſhall be conſummate, and untill all these shadowes of ignorance, of infidelity, of troubles of conscience, and of outward tribulations be utterly dispersed, and chased away, come and turne thee to me againe, thou which to the carnall eyes of the world seemest absent, come quickly, and delay not; but for the speed of thy returne, bee like unto some swift Roe, or Hinde, upon those smooth hills of Gilead, which Iordan severs from the other part of Iury.

CHAP. III.

1. In my bed by night I sought him whom my soule loved: I sought him, but I found him not.

MY security told me that my Saviour was neere unto my soule, yea with it, and in it: but when by serious and silent meditation I searched my owne heart, I found that (for ought my owne sense could discerne) he was farre off from me.

2. I will rise therefore now, and goe about in the City by the streets, and by the open places, and will seeke him that my soule loveth: I sought him, but I found him not.

Then thought I with my selfe, Shall I lie still contented with this want? No, I will stirre up my selfe; and the helpe I cannot finde in my selfe, I will seeke in others: Of all that have beene experienced in all kinde of difficulties, of all deepe Philosophers, of the wisest and honestest worldlings, I will diligently enquire for my Saviour: amongst them I sought him, yet could receive no answer to my satisfaction.

3. The watchmen that went about the City, found me: to whom I said, Have you seene him whom my soule loveth?

Missing him there, I ran to those wise and carefull Teachers, whom God hath set as so many watch-men upon the wals of his Ierusalem, who sooner found me than I could aske after them; to whom I said (as thinking no man could be ignorant of my Love) Can you give me no direction where I might find him whom my soule loveth?

4. When I had past a little from them, then I found him whom my soule loveth: I tooke hold on him, and left him not, till I had brought him unto my mothers house, into the chamber of her that conceived me.

Of whom when I had almost left hoping for comfort, that gracious Saviour who would not suffer me tempted above my measure, presented himselfe to my soule: Loe then, by a new act of faith, I laid fast hold upon him, and will not let him any more part from my joyfull embracements, untill both I have brought him home fully into the seat of my conscience, and have wonne him to a perpetuall cohabitation with me, and a full accomplishment of my love, in that Ierusalem which is above, which is the mother of us all.

CHRIST.

5. I charge yee O daughters of Ierusalem, by the Roes, and by the Hinds of the field, that ye stirre not up nor waken my Love untill she please.

NOw that my distressed Church hath beene all the night long of my seeming absence, toiled in seeking me, I charge you, (O all that professe any friendship with me) I charge you by whatsoever is comely, deare and pleasant unto you, that (as you will answer it) you trouble not her peace with any unjust or unseasonable suggestions, with uncharitable contentions, with any novelties of doctrine, but suffer her to rest sweetly in that divine truth, which she hath received, and this true apprehension of me wherein she rejoyceth.

6. Who is she that commeth up out of the wildernesse, like pillars of smoake perfumed with Myrrh and Incense, and with all the chiefe of spices.

Oh who is this? how admirable? how lovely? who but my Church, that ascendeth thus

A thus glorioufly out of the wilderneſſe of the world, wherein ſhe hath thus long wandered into the bleſſed manſions of my Fathers houſe, all perfumed with the graces of perfect ſanctification, mounting right upward into her glory, like ſome ſtraight pillar of ſmoake, that ariſeth from the moſt rich and pleaſant compoſition of odours that can be deviſed.

The Church.

7. Behold his bed better than Salomons: threeſcore ſtrong men are round about it, of the valiant men of Iſrael.

I Am aſcended; and loe how glorious is this place where I ſhall eternally enjoy the preſence and love of my Saviour! how farre doth it exceed the earthly magnificence of Salomon? about his bed doe attend a Guard of threeſcore choiſeſt men B of Iſrael.

8. They all handle the ſword, and are expert in warre: every one hath his ſword upon his thigh, for the feare by night.

All ſtout Warriers, able and expert to handle the ſword; which for more readineſſe each of them weares hanging upon his thigh, ſo as it may be haſtily drawne upon any ſudden danger: but about this heavenly pavilion of my Saviour, attend millions of Angels, ſpirituall Souldiers, mighty in power, ready to bee commanded ſervice by him.

9. King Salomon made himſelfe a bed of the trees of Lebanon.

C The Bride-bed that Salomon made (ſo much admired of the world) was but of the Cedars of Lebanon.

10. He made the pillars thereof of ſilver, and the ſted thereof of gold, the hangings thereof of purple, whoſe midſt was in-laid with the love of the daughters of Ieruſalem.

The Pillars but of ſilver and the Bed-ſted of gold; the Teſter or Canopie, but of purple; the Coverlet wrought with the curious and painfull needle-worke of the maids of Ieruſalem: but this celeſtiall reſting place of my God is not made with hands, nor of any corruptible mettall, but is full of incomprehenſible light, ſhining evermore with the glorious preſence of God.

11. Come forth yee daughters of Sion, and behold the King Salomon with the crowne wherewith his mother crowned him in the day of his mariage, and in the day of the gladneſſe of his heart. D

And as the outward ſtate, ſo the majeſtie of his perſon is above all compariſon. Come forth (O ye daughters of Sion) lay aſide all private and earthly affections, looke upon King Salomon as he ſits ſolemnly crowned in the day of his greateſt royalty and triumph, and compare his higheſt pompe, with the divine magnificence of my Siviour, in that day when his bleſſed marriage ſhall be fully perfected above, to the eternall rejoycing of himſelfe and his Church; and ſee whether there be any portion betwixt them.

Chap. IV.

E

Christ.

1. Behold thou art faire, my Love, behold thou art faire, thine eyes are like the Doves within thy locks: thine haire is like a flocke of Goats which looke downe from the mountaines of Gilead.

OH how faire thou art and comely, my deare Spouſe! how inwardly faire with the gifts of my Spirit! how faire outwardly in thy comely adminiſtration and government! Thy ſpirituall eyes of underſtanding and judgement, are full of puritie, chaſtitie, ſimplicitie; not wantonly caſt forth, but modeſtly ſhining amidſt thy locks: all thy gracious profeſſion, and all thy appendances, and ornaments of expedient ceremonies, are ſo comely to behold, as is to ſee a flocke of well fed Goats grazing upon the fruitfull hills of Gilead. A

2. Thy teeth like a flocke of ſheepe in good order, which gee up from the waſhing: which every one bring out twins, and none is barren among them.

Thoſe that chew and prepare the heavenly food for thy ſoule, are both of gracious ſimplicity, and of ſweet accordance one with another; having all one heart and one tongue: and both themſelves are ſanctified and purged from their uncleanneſſe, and are fruitfull in their holy labours unto others; ſo that their doctrine is never in vaine, but is ſtill anſwered with plentifull increaſe of ſoules added to the Church.

3. Thy lips are like a threed of ſcarlet, and thy talke is comely: thy temples are within thy locks as a peece of Pomegranate. B

Thy ſpeech (eſpecially in the mouth of thy Teachers) is both gracious in it ſelfe, and ſuch as adminiſters grace to the hearers; full of zeale and fervent charity, full of gravity and diſcretion: and that part of thy countenance, which thou wilt have ſeene (though dimly and ſparingly) is full of holy modeſty and baſhfulneſſe; ſo bluſhing, that it ſeemeth like the colour of a broken peece of Pomegranate.

4. Thy necke is as the tower of David built for defence: a thouſand ſhields hang therein, and all the targets of the ſtrong men.

Thoſe who by their holy authority ſuſtaine thy government (which are as ſome ſtraight and ſtrong necke to beare up the head) are like unto Davids high Tower of defence, furniſhed with a rich armorie; which affords infinite wayes of ſafe protection, and infinite monuments of victory. C

5. Thy two breſts are as two young Kids that are twins, feeding among the Lillies.

Thy two Teſtaments (which are thy two full and faire breſts, wherby thou nurſeſt all thy faithfull children) are as two twins of Kids: twins, for their excellent and perfect agreement one with another, in all reſemblances: of Kids, that are daintily fed among the ſweet flowers, for the pleaſant nouriſhment which they yeeld to all that ſucke thereof.

6. Vntill the day break, and the ſhadowes flie away, I will goe into the mountains of Myrrh, and to the Mountaines of Incenſe.

Untill the day of my gracious appearance ſhall ſhine forth, and untill all theſe ſhadowes of ignorance, infidelity, afflictions, be utterly and ſuddenly diſperſed, O my Spouſe, I will retire my ſelfe (in regard of my bodily preſence) into my delightfull and glorious reſt of heaven. D

7. Thou art all faire, my Love, and there is no ſpot in thee.

Thou art exceeding beautifull, O my Church, in all the parts of thee: for all thy ſinnes are done away, and thine iniquitie is covered, and loe, I preſent thee to my Father without ſpot, or wrinkle, or any ſuch deformitie.

8. Come with me from Lebanon, my Spouſe, even with me from Lebanon, and looke from the top of Amanah, from the top of Shenir and Hermon, from the dens of the Lions, and from the mountaines of the Leopards. E

And now (O thou which I profeſſe to have maried to my ſelfe in truth and righteouſneſſe) thou ſhalt be grthered to me from all parts of the world; not onely from the confines of Judea, where I planted and found thee, but from the remoteſt and moſt ſavage places of the Nations; out of the company of Infidels, of cruell and bloudy perſecutors, who like Lions and Leopards have tyrannized over thee, and mercileſly torne thee in peeces.

9. My

9. My ſiſter, my Spouſe, thou haſt wounded my heart with one of thine eyes: and with a chaine of thy necke.

Thou haſt utterly raviſht me from my ſelfe (O my ſiſter, my Spouſe; for ſo thou art, both joyned to me in that ſpirituall union, and coheire with me of the ſame inheritance and glory) thou haſt quite raviſht my heart with thy love: even one caſt of one of thine eyes of faith, and one of the ornaments of thy ſanctification wherewith thou art decked by my Spirit, have thus ſtricken me with love: how much more, when I ſhall have a full ſight of thee, and all thy graces, ſhall I be affected towards thee!

10. My Siſter, my Spouſe, how faire is thy love! how much better is thy love than wine, and the ſavour of thine oyntments than all ſpices?

B

O how excellent, how precious, how delectable are thoſe loves of thine, O my ſiſter, my Spouſe! how farre ſurpaſſing all earthly delicates! and the ſavour of thoſe divine vertues, wherewith thou art endued, more pleaſing to my ſent, than all the perfumes in the world!

11. Thy lips, my Spouſe, drop as Honey-combs: Honey and milke are under thy tongue, and the ſavour of thy garments is as the ſavour of Lebanon.

Thy gracious ſpeeches that proceed from thee, are as ſo many drops of the Hony-combe that drop from thy lips: and whether thou exhort, or confeſſe, or pray, or comfort, thy words are both ſweet and nouriſhing; and the ſavour of thy good works, and outward converſation, is to me as the ſmell of the wood of Lebanon to the ſenſe of man.

12. My ſiſter, my Spouſe, is as a garden incloſed, as a Spring ſhut up, and a fountaine ſealed up.

My ſiſter, my Spouſe, is as a Garden or Orchard full of all variety of the heavenly Trees and flowers of grace; not lying careleſly open, either to the love of ſtrangers, or to the rage of enemies, which like the wilde Boare out of the wood, might root up and deſtroy her choice plants: but ſafely hedged and walled about, by my protection, and reſerved for my delight alone; ſhe is a Spring and Well of wholeſome waters, from whom flow forth the pure ſtreames of my Word; but, both incloſed and ſealed up; partly, that ſhe may the better (by this cloſeneſſe) preſerve her owne naturall taſte and vigour, from the corruptions of the world; and partly, that ſhe may not be defiled and mudded by the prophane feet of the wicked.

13. Thy plants are as an Orchard of Pomegranats with ſweet fruits: as Cypers, Spikenard, even Spikenard and Saffron, Calamus and Cinamon, with all the trees of Incenſe, Myrrh and Aloes, with all the chiefe ſpices.

Thou art an Orchard, yea a Paradiſe, whoſe plants (which are thy faithfull children that grow up in thee) are as Pomegranate Trees; the Apples whereof are eſteemed for the largeneſſe, colour and taſte, above all other: or (if I would feed my other ſenſes) the plentifull fruits of thy holy obedience (which thou yeeldeſt unto me) are for their ſmell, as ſome compoſition of Cypreſſe, Spikenard, Saffron, ſweet Cane, Cinamon, Incenſe, Myrrh, Aloes, and whatſoever elſe may be deviſed, unto the moſt perfect ſent.

14. O fountaine of the gardens, O Well of living waters, and the ſprings of Lebanon.

Thou art ſo a Spring in my Garden, that the ſtreames which are derived from thee, water all the gardens of my particular congregations, all the world over: thou art that Fountaine, from whoſe pure head iſſue all thoſe living waters, which who ſo drinketh ſhall never thirſt againe; even ſuch cleare currents, as flow from the hill of Libanus, which like unto another Jordan, water all the Iſrael of God.

The

The Church.

15. Ariſe, O North, and come, O South, and blow on my garden, that the ſpices thereof may flow out: let my Well-beloved come to his garden, and eat his pleaſant fruit.

IF I be a garden, as thou ſayeſt (O my Saviour) then ariſe, O all yee ſoveraigne winds of the Spirit of God, and breath upon this garden of my ſoule, that the ſweet odours of theſe my plants may both be increaſed, and may alſo be diſperſed afarre, and carried into the noſtrils of my Well-beloved: and ſo let him come into his owne garden (which his owne hand hath digged, planted, watred) and accept of the fruit of that ſervice and praiſe, which he ſhall inable me to bring forth to his Name.

CHAP. V.

CHRIST.

1. I am come into my garden, my ſiſter, my Spouſe: I gathered my Myrrh with my ſpice; I ate my Hony with my Hony-combe, I dranke my wine with my milke: eat, O my friends: drinke, and make you merry, O well-beloved.

BEhold, according to thy deſire, I am come into my garden, O my ſiſter, my Spouſe; I have received thoſe fruits of thine obedience which thou offeredſt unto me, with much joy and pleaſure. I have accepted not only of thy good works, but thy endevours and purpoſes of holineſſe, both which are as pleaſant to me, as the Hony and the Hony-combe. I have allowed of the cheerfulneſſe of thy ſervice, and the wholeſomneſſe of thy doctrine. And ye, O my friends, whether bleſſed Angels, or faithfull men, partake with me in this joy ariſing from the faithfulneſſe of my Church: cheere up and fill your ſelves O my beloved, with the ſame Spirituall dainties wherewith I am refreſhed.

The Church.

2. I ſleepe, but my heart waketh: it is the voyce of my well-beloved that knocketh, ſaying, Open unto me my ſiſter, my Love, my Dove, my undefiled: for mine head is full of dew, and my locks with the drops of the night.

WHen the world had caſt me into a ſecure ſleep, or ſlumber rather (for my heart was not utterly bereaved of a true faith in my Saviour) even in this darkneſſe of my minde, it pleaſed my gracious Redeemer not to neglect me; he came to me, and knocked oft, and called importunately at the doore of my heart, by his word and chaſtiſements, and ſaid, open the doore of thy ſoule, O my ſiſter, my deare, chaſte, comely, unſpotted Church: let me come in, and lodge and dwell with thee, in my graces; ſhut out the world, and receive me with a more lively act, and renovation of thy faith. For loe, I have long waited patiently for this effect of thy love, and have endured all the injuries both of the night, and weather of thy provocations, that I might at laſt enjoy thee.

3. I have put off my coat: how ſhall I put it on? I have waſhed my feet: how ſhall I defile them?

I anſwered him againe, pleading excuſes for my delay; Alas, Lord, I have now, ſince I left my forward profeſſion of thee, avoided a great number of cares and ſorrowes: muſt I take them up againe to follow thee? I have lived cleane from the foile of theſe evils: and ſhall I now thruſt my ſelfe into danger of them?

4. My Well-beloved put his hand from the hole of the doore; and my bowels yearned toward him.

When my Saviour heard this unkind anſwer of delay, he let his hand fall from the key-hole, which he had thus before without ſucceſſe laboured about; and withdrew himſelfe from ſoliciting me any more: wherupon my heart & bowels yearned within me for him, and for the remorſe of my ſo long foreſlowing his admittance unto me.

5. I

5. I roſe up to open to my Well-beloved, and my hands did drop downe Myrrh, and my fingers pure Myrrh upon the handles of the Barres.

And now I rouzed up my drouſie heart (what I could) that I might in ſome cheerfull manner deſire to receive ſo gracious a Saviour: which when I but endeavoured, I found that he had left behinde him ſuch a plentifull bleſſing (as the monument of his late preſence) upon the firſt motions of my heart, as that with the very touch of them I was both exceedingly refreſhed, and moved to further indignation at my ſelfe for delaying him.

6. I opened to my Well-beloved: but my Well-beloved was gone and paſt; mine heart was gone when he did ſpeake: I ſought him, but I could not finde him; I called him, but he anſwered me not.

I opened to my beloved Saviour: but my Saviour had now (in my feeling) withdrawne himſelfe, and hid his countenance from me, holding me ſhort of thoſe gracious offers and meanes which I had refuſed; and now I was almoſt paſt my ſelfe with deſpaire, to remember that ſweet invitation of his, which I neglected: I ſought him therefore in my thoughts, in the outward uſe of his ordinances, and of my earneſt prayes; but he would not as yet be found of me, or let me finde that I was heard of him.

7. The watchmen that went about the City found me, they ſmote me, and wounded mee: the watchmen of the wals took away my vaile from me.

Thoſe which ſhould have regarded me, and by their vigilancie have ſecured mee from danger, proved mine adverſaries: in ſtead of comforting me, they fell upon me and wounded me with their falſe doctrines, drawing me on into further errours, ſpoiling me of that purity and ſincerity of profeſſion, wherewith, as with ſome rich and modeſt vaile, I was formerly adorned, and covered.

8. I charge you, O daughters of Ieruſalem, if you finde my Well-beloved, that you tell him I am ſicke of love.

I adviſe you ſolemnly, O all ye that wiſh well to me (for I care not who knowes the vehemency of my paſſion) if you ſhall finde my Saviours preſence in your ſelves before me, pray for the recovery of his love to me; and bemoaning my eſtate to him, tell him how I languiſh with the impatient deſire of his love and preſence to be reſtored unto me.

9. O the faireſt among women, what is thy well-beloved, more than another Well-beloved? what is thy well-beloved more than another lover, that thou doſt ſo charge us?

O thou which art the moſt happy, moſt gracious, and moſt glorious of all creatures, the choſen of the living God; what is thy Well-beloved whom thou ſeekeſt, above all other the ſonnes of men? what ſuch eminency is there in him above all Saints and Angels, that thou art both ſo farre gone in affection to him? and doſt ſo vehemently adjure us to ſpeake unto him for thee?

10. My Well-beloved is white and ruddy, the Standard-bearer of ten thouſand.

My Well-beloved (if you know not) is of perfect beauty; in whoſe face is an exact mixture of the colours of the pureſt and healthfulleſt complexion of holineſſe: for he hath not received the ſpirit by meaſure; and in him the God-head dwels bodily; he is infinitely fairer than all the ſonnes of men; and for goodlineſſe of perſon may beare the Standard of comelineſſe and grace amongſt ten thouſand.

11. His head is as fine Gold, his locks curled, and blacke as a Raven.

The Deity which dwelleth in him, is moſt pure and glorious: and that fulneſſe of grace which is communicated to his humane nature, is wondrouſly beautifull, and ſo ſets it forth, as the blacke curled locks doe a freſh and well favoured countenance.

12. His

12. His eyes are like Doves upon the rivers of waters, which are washt with Milk, and remaine in their fulnesse.

His judgement of all things, and his respect to his Church (which are as his eyes) are full of love, and full of piety, shining like unto Doves washed in water, yea, in Milk, so as there is no spot or blemish to be found in them: and they are withall so fully placed, as is both most comely and most expedient for the perfect sight of the estate, and necessities of his servants.

13. His cheeks are as a bed of spices, and as sweet Flowers, and his lips like Lillies dropping downe pure Mirrh.

The manifestation of himselfe to us in his Word, is sweet to our spirituall feeling, as an heap of spice, or those flowers that are used to make the best perfuming oyntments, are to the other senses: his heavenly instructions and promises of his Gospell are unspeakably comfortable, and plenteous, in the grace that is wrought by them.

14. His hands as Rings of gold set with the Chrysolite; his belly like white Ivory covered with Saphyres.

His actions and his instruments (which are his hands) are set forth with much port and majesty, as some precious stone beautifies the Ring wherein it is set: the secret counsels of his breast, and the mysteries of his will, are most pure and holy, and full of excellent glory.

15. His legs are as pillars of Marble, set upon sockets of fine gold: his countenance, as Lebanon, excellent as the Cedars.

All his proceedings are firme and stable; and withall, as Pillars of Marble set in sockets of tried gold; so as they are neither subject to wavering, nor to any danger of infirmity and corruption: the shew and carriage of his whole person, whereby hee makes himselfe knowne to his chosen, is exceeding goodly and upright, like to the straight and lofty Cedars of Lebanon.

16. His mouth is as sweet things, and he is wholly delectable: this is my well-beloved, and this is my Lover, O daughters of Ierusalem.

His mouth, out of which proceedeth innumerable blessings & comfortable promises, is to my soule even sweetnesse it selfe; yea (what speak I of any one part?) as you have heard in these particulars; he is all sweets: there is nothing but comfort in him; and there is no comfort but in him; and this (if he would know) is my Well-beloved; of so incomparable glory & worthinesse, that ye may easily discern him from all others.

Forraine Congregations.

17. O thou fairest among women, whither is thy Well-beloved gone? whither is thy well-beloved turned aside, that we might seeke him with thee?

SInce thy Well-beloved is so glorious and amiable, (O thou which art for thy beauty worthy to bee the Spouse of such an husband) tell us (for thou onely knowest it; and to seeke Christ without the Church, wee know is vaine) tell us where this Saviour of thine is to be sought; that we (ravished also with the report of his beauty) may joyne with thee in the same holy study of seeking after him.

CHAP. VI.

1. My Well-beloved is gone downe into his Garden to the beds of spices, to feed in the Gardens, and to gather Lillies.

MY Well-beloved Saviour (if you would know this also) is to bee sought and found in the particular assemblies of his people, which are his Garden of Pleasure, wherein are varieties of all the beds of renued soules; which both he hath planted, and dressed by his continuall care, and wherein hee walketh

A walketh for his delight; feeding and ſolacing himſelfe with thoſe fruits of righteouſneſſe and new obedience, which they are able to bring forth unto him.

2. I am my well-beloveds, and my well-beloved is mine, who feedeth among the Lillies.

And now loe, whatſoever hath happened croſſe to me, in my ſenſible fruition of him; in ſpight of all tentations, my beloved Saviour is mine through faith; and I am his through his love; and both of us are by an inſeparable union knit together; whoſe conjunction and love is moſt ſweet and happy; for all that are his he feedeth continually with heavenly repaſt.

CHRIST.

3. Thou art beautifull, my love, as Tirzah, comely as Ieruſalem, terrible as an Army with B Banners.

NOtwithſtanding this thy late blemiſh of neglecting mee, O my Church: yet ſtill in mine eyes, through my grace, upon this thy repentance, thou art beautifull, like unto that neat and elegant City Tirzah, and that orderly building of Jeruſalem, the glory of the world: and with this thy lovelineſſe, thou art awfull unto thine adverſaries, through the power of thy cenſures, and the majeſty of him that dwelleth in thee.

4. Turne away thine eyes from mee, for they overcome mee: thine haire is like a flocke of Goats which looke downe from Gilead.

Yea, ſuch beauty is in thee, that I am overcome with the vehemency of my affe-
C ction to thee: turne away thine eyes a while from beholding me; for the ſtrength of that faith, whereby they are fixed upon me, raviſheth me from my ſelfe with joy. I do therefore againe renew thy former praiſe; that thy gracious profeſſion, and and all thy appendances and ornaments of expedient ceremonies are ſo comely to behold, as it is to ſee a flock of well-fed Goats grazing upon the fruitfull hils of Gilead.

5. Thy teeth are like a flocke of ſheepe which goe up from the waſhing, which every one bring out twins and none is barren among them.

Thy Teachers, that chew and prepare the heavenly food of thy ſoule, are of ſweet accordance one with another, having all one heart, and one tongue; and both themſelves are ſanctified and purged from their uncleanneſſe, and are fruitful in their holy labours unto others: ſo that their doctrine is never in vaine, but is ſtill anſwered
D with plentifull increaſe of ſoules to the Church.

6. Thy Temples are within thy loks as a peece of a Pomegranate.

That part of thy countenance which thou wilt have ſeene; (though dimly and ſparingly) is full of holy modeſty and baſhfulneſſe: ſo bluſhing that it ſeemeth like the colour of a broken peece of Pomegranate.

7. There are three-ſcore Queenes and foureſcore Concubines, and of the Damſels, without number.

Let there bee never ſo great a number of people and nations, of Churches and aſſemblies, which challenge my Name and Love, and perhaps by their outward proſperity, may ſeeme to plead much intereſt in me, and much worth in themſelves.

E 8. But my Love is alone, and my undefiled, ſhee is the only daughter of her mother, and ſhee is deare to her that bare her: The Daughters have ſeene her and counted her bleſſed, even the Queenes and Concubines, and they have praiſed her.

Yet thou onely art alone my true and chaſte Spouſe, pure and undefiled in the truth of thy doctrine, and the imputation of my holineſſe: thou art ſhee whom that Jeruſalem which is above, (the mother of us all) acknowledgeth for her onely true, and deare daughter. And this is not my commendation alone: but all thoſe forraine aſſemblies,

assemblies, which might seeme to bee Rivals with thee of this praise, doe applaud and blesse thee in this thine estate, and say; Blessed is this people, whose God is the Lord.

9. Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, faire as the Moone, pure as the Sunne, terrible as an army with banners.

And admiring thy goodlinesse, shall say; Who is this that lookes out so freshly as the morning new risen; which from these weak beginnings is growne to such high perfection, that now she is as bright, and glorious, as the Sun in his full strength, and the Moone in a cleare sky; and withall is so dreadfull through the majesty of her countenance, and power of her censures, as some terrible army, with ensignes displayed, is to a weake adversary.

10. I went downe to the dressed Orchard, to see the fruits of the valley, to see if the Vine budded, and if the Pomegranates flourished.

Thou complainedst of my absence, (O my Church:) there was no cause; I meant not to forsake thee; I did but only walk downe into the well dressed Orchard of thine assemblies, to recreate and joy my selfe with the view of their frowardnesse, to see the happy progresse of the humble in spirit, and the gracious beginnings of those tender soules, which are newly converted unto me.

11. I knew nothing, my soule set me as the chariots of my noble people.

So earnestly did I long to revisit thee, and to restore comfort unto thee, that I hasted I knew not which way: and with insensible speed I am come backe, as it were upon the swiftest chariots, or the wings of the wind.

12. Returne, returne, O Shulamite: returne, returne, that I may behold thee: what shall you see in the Shulamite, but as the company of an army?

Now therefore returne (O my Spouse, the true daughter of Jerusalem) returne to me, returne to thy selfe, and to thy former feeling of my grace: returne, that both my selfe and all the companie of Angels, may see and rejoyce in thee: and what shall yee see (O all yee hosts of heaven) what shall ye see in my Church? Even such an awfull grace and majesty, as is in a well-marshalled army, ready to meet with the enemy.

CHAP. VII.

1. How beautifull are thy goings with shooes, O Princes daughter? the compasse of thy hips like jewels: the worke of the hand of a cunning workeman.

HOw beautifull are thy feet, O daughter of the Highest; being shod with the preparation of the Gospell of peace, and readily addressed to run the way of the commandements of thy God! thou art compassed about thy loynes with the girdle of verity; which is both precious for the matter of it, and cunningly framed by the skill of the Spirit of truth.

2. Thy navell is as a round cup, that wanteth not liquor: thy belly is as an heape of wheat compassed about with Lillies.

The navell, whereby all thy spirituall conceptions receive their nourishment, is full of all fruitfull supply, and never wants meanes of sustenance, to feed them in thy wombe: which also is so plenteous in thy blessed increase, that it is as an heape of wheat, consisting of infinite pure graines, which consort together with much sweetnesse and pleasure.

3. Thy two brests are as two young Kids that are twins.

Thy two Testaments (which are thy two full and comely brests, by whose wholesome milke thou nourishest all thy faithfull children, once borne into the light) are for

A their excellent and perfect agreement, and their amiable proportion, like two twins of Kids.

4. Thy necke is like a Tower of Ivory : thine eyes are like artificiall poules in a frequented gate : thy noſe is as the Tower of Lebanon, that looketh toward Damaſcus.

Thoſe, who by their holy authority ſupport thy government (which are as ſome ſtraight and ſtrong neck to beare up thy head) are for their height and defence, like a Tower; for their order, pureneſſe and dignity, like a Tower of Ivory : thy Teachers and Miniſters (which are thine eyes) are like unto ſome cleare and artificiall ponds of water, in a place of greateſt reſort : wherein all commers may ſee the faces of their conſciences; and whence they may plentifully draw the Waters of life. Thy noſe, by which all ſpirituall ſents are conveyed to thee, is perfectly compoſed, and featured
B like ſome curious Turret of that goodly houſe in Lebanon; ſo as thy judgement, and power of diſcerning the ſpirits, is admirable for the order and excellencie thereof.

5. Thine head upon thee is as ſcarlet, and the buſh of thine head like purple : the King is tied in thy beames.

The whole tyre of thine head (which are the ceremonies uſed by thee) are very gracefull, and of high eſtimation and price to all the beholders: and as for me, I am ſo enamoured of thee, that I am even tied by my owne deſire, to a perpetuall preſence in thine holy aſſemblies.

6. How faire art thou, and how pleaſant art thou, O my Love, in pleaſures!

Oh how beautifull and lovely art thou therefore (O my Church) in all thy parts
C and ornaments! how ſweet and pleaſant art thou (O my Love) in whatſoever might give me true contentment!

7. This thy ſtature is like a Palme-tree; and thy breſts like cluſters.

Thy whole frame is, for goodlineſſe and ſtraight growth, like unto ſome tall Palme-tree; which the more it is depreſſed by the violence of perſecutions, riſeth the more; and the two breſts of thy Teſtaments are like two full jucy cluſters, which yeeld comfortable and abundant refreſhing.

8. I ſaid, I will goe up into the Palme-tree; I will take hold of her boughes : thy breſts ſhall now be like the cluſters of the Vines, and the ſavour of thy noſe like Apples.

Seeing then thou art my Palme-tree, I have reſolved in my ſelfe to adjoyne my
D ſelfe to thee; to enjoy thee, to gather thoſe ſweet fruits of thy graces, which thou yeeldeſt; and by my preſence alſo will cauſe thee to bee more plentifull in all good workes, and doctrine; ſo as thou ſhalt affoord abundance of heavenly liquor unto all the thirſty ſoules of thy children; and an acceptable verdure of holineſſe and obedience unto me.

9. And the roofe of thy mouth like good wine, which goeth ſtraight up to my well-beloved, and cauſeth the lips of him that is aſleepe, to ſpeake.

And the delivery of my Word, by the mouthes of my Miniſters, ſhall bee as ſome excellent wine, which ſparkleth right upward : being well accepted of that God in whoſe name it is taught, & looketh moſt pleaſantly in the glaſſe, being no leſſe highly eſteemed of the receivers : which is of ſuch wonderfull power, that it is able to put
E words both of repentance, and praiſe, into the lips of him that lies a ſleepe in his ſins.

The Church.

10. I am my well-beloveds, and his deſire is toward me.

BEhold, ſuch as I am, I am not mine owne; much leſſe am I any others : I am wholly my Saviours: and now I ſee, and feele, whatſoever I had deſerved, that hee is mine alſo in all intire affection; who hath both choſen men, and given himſelfe for me.

11. Come, my well-beloved, let us goe into the fields, let us lodge in the villages. A

Come therefore, O my deare Saviour, let us joyne together in our natu'a'l care: let thy Spirit and my ſervice be intent upon thy Congregations here below on earth: and let us ſtay in the place where our ſpirituall Husbandry lieth.

12. Let us goe up early in the morning to the Vines, and ſee if the Vine flouriſh, whether it hath diſcloſed the firſt Grapes, or whether the Pomegranats bloſſome: there will I give thee my love.

Let us with all haſte and cheerfulneſſe viſit the fruitfull vines of our beleeving children; and to our mutuall comfort, bee witneſſes and partakers of all the ſignes and fruits of grace, of all thoſe good works, and thankſgivings, of thoſe holy endevours and worthy practices, which they yeeld forth unto us: let us judge of their forwardneſſe, and commend it: whereupon it will eaſily appeare, that the conſummation of our happy mariage draweth neare, in which there ſhalbe a perfect union betwixt us.

13. The Mandrakes have given a ſmell, and in our gates, are all ſweet things new and old, my well-beloved, I have kept them for thee.

Behold, thy godly ſervants, which not only beare fruit themſelves, but are powerfull in the provocation of others, preſent their beſt ſervices unto thee; and even at our doores (not farre to ſeeke, not hard to procure) is offer made unto thee; of all variety of fruit; whether from thy young Converts, or thy more ſetled Profeſſors: and all theſe I ſpend not laviſhly; but in my loving care, duly reſerve them for thee, and for the ſolemne day of our full mariage.

CHAP. VIII.

The Iewiſh Church.

1. Oh that thou wereſt as my brother that ſucked the breſt of my mother! I would find thee without; I would kiſſe thee, then they ſhould not deſpiſe me.

OH that I might ſee thee (my Saviour) clothed in fleſh! Oh that thou which art my everlaſting Husband, mighteſt alſo be my Brother, in partaking the ſame humane nature with mee; that ſo I finding thee below upon earth, might familiarly entertaine thee, and converſe with thee, without reproach of the world; yea, might be exalted in thy glory!

2. I will lead thee, and bring thee into my mothers houſe; there thou ſhalt teach me: I will cauſe thee to drink ſpiced wine, and new of the Pomegranats.

Then would I (though I bee now pent up in the limits of Judæa) bring thee forth into the light and knowledge of the univerſall Church, whoſe daughter I am: and then and there, thou ſhouldeſt teach me how perfectly to ſerve and worſhip thee, and I ſhall gladly entertaine thee with a royall feaſt of the beſt graces that are in my holieſt ſervants; which I know thou wilt account better cheere, than all the ſpiced cups, and Pomegranate wines in the world.

3. His left hand ſhall be under my head, and his right hand ſhall embrace me.

Then ſhall I attaine to a nearer communion with him; and both his hands ſhall be employed to ſuſtaine, and releeve me: yea, hee ſhall comfort my head and my heart (my judgement, and affections) with the lively heat of his gracious embracements. E

4. I charge you, O daughters of Ieruſalem, that you ſtirre not up, nor waken my Love, untill he pleaſe.

I charge you (O all yee that profeſſe any friendſhip to me) I charge you deeply, as yee will avoid my uttermoſt cenſures; take heed how yee vex and diſquiet my mercifull Saviour, and grieve his Spirit: and doe not dare, by the leaſt provocation of him, to interrupt his peace.

CHRIST.

A

CHRIST.

5. Who is this that commeth out of the wilderneſſe, leaning upon her well-beloved? I raiſed thee up under an Apple-tree: there thy mother conceived thee: there ſhee conceived that bare thee.

WHo is this, that from the comfortleſſe deſerts of ignorance, of infidelity, of tribulations, aſcendeth thus up into the glorious light and liberty of my choſen? relying her ſelfe wholly upon her Saviour, and ſolacing her ſelfe in him? Is it not my Church? It is ſhe, whom I have loved, and acknowledged of old: for even under the tree of offence, the forbidden fruit which thou taſtedſt to thy deſtruction, I raiſed thee up againe from death; Even there, thy firſt mother conceived thee; while by faith ſhe laid hold on that bleſſed promiſe of the Goſpell, where-
B by ſhe and her beleeving ſeed were reſtored.

The Iewiſh Church.

6. Set me as a ſeale on thy heart, and as a ſignet on thine arme: for love is ſtrong as death; Iealouſie is cruell as the Grave: the coales thereof are fiery coales, and a vehement flame.

AND ſo have thou me ſtill (O my Saviour) in a perpetuall and deare remembrance: keepe me ſure in thine heart, yea in thine armes, as that which thou holdeſt moſt precious: and let me never be removed from thy love; the leaſt ſhew and danger whereof I cannot endure: for this my ſpirituall love is exceeding powerfull, & can no more be reſiſted than death it ſelfe: and the jealous zeale which I have for thee and thy glory, conſumes me, even like the Grave, and burnes mee up
C like unto the coales of ſome moſt vehement and extreme fire.

7. Much water cannot quench love, neither can the flouds drowne it: if a man ſhould give all the ſubſtance of his houſe for love, they would greatly contemne it.

Yea, more than any fire; for any flame yet may be quenched with water: but all the water of afflictions and terrors (yea, whole ſtreames of perſecutions) cannot quench this love: and for all tempting offers of wealth, of pleaſures and honour, how eaſily are they all contemned for the love of my Saviour!

8. We have a little ſiſter, and ſhe hath no breſts: what ſhall wee doe for our ſiſter when ſhee ſhall be ſpoken for?

We have a ſiſter (as thou knoweſt, O Saviour) ordained through thy mercy, to the D ſame grace with mee: the uncalled Church of the Gentiles; ſmall (as yet) of growth through the rareneſſe of her Converts, and deſtitute of the help of any outward miniſtery, whereby ſhee might either beare, or nouriſh children unto thee: when ſhee growes unto her maturity; and the myſtery of calling her univerſally to thee, ſhall be revealed to the world, and her ſelfe: what courſe will it pleaſe thee to take with her?

CHRIST.

9. If ſhe be a wall, we will build upon her a ſilver Palace: and if ſhe be a doore, we will keepe her in with boords of Cedar.

IF ſhe ſhall continue firme and conſtant, in the expectation of her promiſes, and the profeſſion of that truth which ſhall be revealed; we will beautifie and ſtrengthen her with further grace, and make her a pure and coſtly Palace, fit to entertain
E my ſpirit: and if ſhe will give free paſſage and good entrance, to my word and grace, we will make her ſure and ſafe from corruption, and reſerve her to immortality.

The Iewiſh Church.

10. I am a wall, and my breſts are towers: then was I in his eyes as one that findeth peace.

BEhold: that condition which thou requireſt in the Church of the Gentiles, thou findeſt in me; I am thus firme and conſtant in my expectation, in my profeſſion: and that want thou findeſt in her of ability to nouriſh her Children, by the breſt of thy Word, is not in me; who have abundance both of nouriſhment and defence: upon which my confeſſion and plea, I found grace and peace in the eyes of my Saviour; and received from him aſſurance of his everlaſting love to me. A

CHRIST.

11. Salomon had a Vine in Baalhamon: he gave the Vineyard unto keepers: every one bringeth for the fruit thereof a thouſand peeces of ſilver.

MY Church is my Vine, and I am the Owner and Husbandman: our thrift and profit therof farre exceedeth the good Husbandry of Salomon: he hath a rich Vineyard indeed in a moſt fruitfull ſoyle; but he lets it forth to the hands of others, as not being able to keepe and dreſſe it himſelfe: and therefore hee is faine to be content with the greateſt part of the increaſe, not expecting the whole. B

12. But my Vineyard which is mine, is before me: to thee O Salomon appertaineth a thouſand peeces of ſilver, and two hundred to them that keepe the fruit thereof.

But my Vine is ever before me, I am with it to the end of the world, I reſerve it in mine owne hands, and dreſſe it with mine owne labour: and therefore if thou (O Salomon) canſt receive from thine, to the proportion of a thouſand, thy workmen and farmers will look for the fift part to come unto their ſhare; whereas the gaine of my Vineyard ariſeth wholly, and only unto my ſelfe.

13. O thou that dwelleſt in the gardens, the companions harken unto thy voyce, cauſe mee to heare it.

Sith therefore ſuch is my care of thee, and joy in thee (O my Church, which conſiſteſt of the particular aſſemblies of men profeſſing my Name) ſee thou be diligent in declaring my will, and giving holy counſels to all thy fellow-members: ſpeak forth my praiſe in the great congregations (which all attend willingly upon thee) and let me heare the voyce of thy conſtant and faithfull confeſſion of me before the world. C

The Church.

14. Oh my Well beloved, flee away and be like unto the Roe, or to the young Hart upon the Mountaine of ſpices.

I Will moſt gladly do what thou commandeſt, O my Saviour: but that I may performe it accordingly, be thou (which art, according to thy bodily preſence, in the higheſt heavens) ever preſent with mee by thy Spirit, and haſten thy glorious comming, to my full Redemption. D

TO THE HIGH AND MIGHTY PRINCE HENRY, PRINCE OF GREAT BRITAINE, Sonne and Heire Apparant to our Soveraigne Lord, IAMES, King of GREAT BRITAINE, &c.

All glory in either world.

Most Gracious Prince:

IT is not from any conceit of ſuch worth in my labours, that they duſt looke ſo high. A lower patronage would have ſerved an higher worke. It were well if ought of mine could bee worthy of popular eyes; Or if I could wring ought from my ſelfe not unworthy of a judicious Reader. I know your Highneſſe wants neither preſents, nor counſels: preſents from ſtrangers, counſels from your Teachers; neither of them matchable by my weakneſſe: onely duty herein excuſeth mee from preſumption. For, I thought it injuſtice to devote the fruit of my labours to any other hand beſide my Maſters: which alſo I knew to be as gracious, as mine is faithfull. Yet (ſince even good affections cannot warrant too much vileneſſe in gifts to Princes) leſt, while my modeſty diſparages my worke, I ſhould hazard the acceptation; here ſhall your Grace find variety, not without profit. I hate a Divine that would but pleaſe; and withall, thinke it impoßible for a man to profit, that pleaſeth not. And if, while my ſtile fixeth it ſelfe upon others, any ſpirituall profit ſhall reflect upon upon your Highnesse, how happy am I ! who shall ever thinke, I have lived to purpose, (if by the best of my studies) I shall have done any good office to your soule. Further, (which these times account not the least praise) your Grace shall herein perceive a new fashion of discourse, by Epistles; new to our language, usuall to others : and (as Novelty is never without plea of use) more free, more familiar. Thus, we doe but talk with our friends by our pen, and expresse our selves no whit lesse easily, somewhat more digestedly.

Whatsoever it is, as it cannot bee good enough to deserve that countenance; so, the countenance of such Patronage shall make it worthy of respect from others. The God of Princes protect your person, perfect your graces, and give you as much favour in Heaven as you have honour on earth.

Your Graces
humbly-devoted servant,

Epist. I. Expostulating for his departure, and perswading his returne.

HOw unhappily is my stile changed! Alas, that to a friend, to a brother, I must write as to an Apostate, to an adversary! Doth this seeme harsh? You have turned it, by being turned your selfe. Once the same wals held us in one loving Society; the same Diocesse, in one honourable function: Now, not one land, and (which I lament) not one Church. You are gone, we stand and wonder. For a sheep, to stray through simplicity, is both ordinarie and lamentable: but, for a Shepherd is more rare, more scandalous. I dare not presume over-much, upon an appeale to a blinded conscience. Those that are newly come from a bright candle into a darke roome, are so much more blind, as their light was greater; and the purest
C Ivorie turneth with fire into the deepest blacke. Tell us yet by your old ingenuitie, and by those sparkes of good which yet (I hope) lie covered under your cold ashes, tell us, what divided you? Your motives shall once be scanned before an higher barre. Shame not to have the weake eyes of the world see that, which once your undeceivable Judge shall see and censure. What saw you, what heard you anew, that might offer violence to a resolved mind, and make it either to alter, or suspend? If your reasons be invincible, informe us, that we may follow you: but if (as they are) slight and feeble, returne you to us: returne, and think it no shame to have erred, just shame to continue erring. What such goodly beauty saw you in that painted, but ill-favoured Strumpet, that should thus bewitch you, so to forget your selfe and contemne the chaste love of the Spouse of your Saviour? I saw her at the same time in her gayest
D dresse: Let my soule never prosper, if I could see any thing worthie to command affection. I saw, and scorned: you saw, and adored. Would God your adoration were as farre from superstition, as my scorne from impietie. That God judge betwixt us, whether herein erred: yea, let men judge, that are not drunk with those Babylonish dregs! How long might an indifferent eye looke upon the comicall and mimick actions in those your misteries that should be sacred, (your magicall exorcismes, your clericall shavings, your uncleanly unctions, your crossings, creepings, censings, sprinklings, your coozning miracles, garish processions, burning of noone-day, christning of bels, marting of pardons, tossing of beads, your superstitious hallowing of candles, wax, ashes, palmes, chrisme, garments, roses, swords, water, salt, the Pontificall Solemnities of your great Master, and whatever your new mother hath, besides, plausible) before he should see ought, in all these, worthie of any other entertainment, than E contempt! Who can but disdaine, that these things should procure any wise proselite? Cannot your owne memorie recount those truly religious spirits, which having sought Rome as resolved Papists, have left the world as holy Martyrs, dying for the detestation of that which they came to adore? Whence this? They heard and magnified that, which they now saw and abhorred. Their fire of zeale brought them to the flames of Martyrdome. Their innocent hopes promised them Religion: they found nothing but a pretence; promised devotion, and behold, idolatry, they saw, hated, suffered, and now reigne; whiles you wilfully and unbidden, will lose your soule, where others meant to lose, and have found it. Your zeale dies, where theirs began to live:

you

you like to live, where they would but die. They ſhall comfort us, for you: they ſhall once ſtand up againſt you: While they would rather die in the heat of that fire, than live in the darkneſſe of their errors; you rather die in the Egyptian darkneſſe of errors than live in the pleaſant light of Truth: yea, I feare, rather in another fire, than this Light. A

Alas! what ſhall we looke for of you? Too late repentance, or obſtinate error? Both miſerable. A Spira, or a Staphylus? Your friends, your ſelfe ſhall wiſh you rather unborne, than either.

O thou, which art the great Shepherd, great in power, great in mercie, which leaveſt the ninetie and nine to reduce one, fetch home (if thy will be) this thy forlorne charge: fetch him home, drive him home to thy Fold, though by ſhame, though by death. Let him once recover thy Church, thou him, it is enough. Our common Mother I know not whether more pities your loſſe, or diſdains thus to be robb'd of a ſon: not for the need of you; but her owne pietie, her own love. For, how many troops of better informed ſoules hath ſhe every day returning into her lap; now breathing from their late Antichriſtianiſme, and embracing her knees upon their owne? She laments you, not for that ſhe feares ſhe ſhall miſſe you, but for that ſhe knowes you ſhall want her. See you her teares, and doe but pitie your ſelfe, as much as ſhe you. And from your Mother, to deſcend to your Nurſe: Is this the fruit of ſuch education? Was not your youth ſpent in a ſocietie of comely order, ſtrict government, wiſe lawes, religious care (it was ours; yet let me praiſe it, to your ſhame) as may juſtly challenge (after all brags) either Rhemes or Doway, or if your Jeſuits have any other den more cleanly, and more worthie of oſtentation? And could you come out, freſh and unſeaſoned, from the middeſt of thoſe ſalt waves? Could all thoſe heavenly ſhowers fall beſides you; while you, like a Gedeons fleece, want moiſture? Shall none of thoſe divine principles, which your youth ſeemed to drink in, check you in your new errors? Alas! how unlike are you to your ſelfe, to your name? Iacob wreſtled with an Angell, and prevailed: you grapple but with a Jeſuit, and yeeld. Iacob ſupplanted his brother: and Eſau hath ſupplanted you. Iacob changed his name for a better by a valiant reſiſtance: you by your cowardly yeelding, have loſt your owne. Iacob ſtrove with God, for a bleſſing: I feare to ſay it, you againſt him, for a curſe; for, no common meaſure of hatred or ordinarie oppoſition, can ſerve a revolter. Either you muſt be deſperatly violent, or ſuſpected. The mighty One of Iſrael (for he can doe it) raiſe you fallen, returne you wandred, and give you grace at laſt to ſhame the Devill, to forſake your ſtepmother, to acknowledge your true Parent, to ſatisfie the world, to ſave your owne ſoule. If otherwiſe, I will ſay of you, as Ieremy of his Iſraelites (if not rather with more indignation) My ſoule ſhall weepe in ſecret for your revolt, and mine eyes ſhall drop downe teares, becauſe one of the Lords flock is carried away captive. B C D

EPIST. II. Of the contempt of the world.

MY Lord: my tongue, my pen, and my heart, are all your ſervants: when you cannot heare me through diſtance, you muſt ſee me in my Letters. You are now in the Senate of the Kingdome, or in the concourſe of the citie, or perhaps (though more rarely) in the royall face of the Court. All of them, places fit for your place. From all theſe, let me call off your mind to her home above; and in the middeſt of buſineſſe, ſhew you reſt: If I may not rather commend, than admoniſh, and before-hand confeſſe my counſell ſuperfluous, becauſe your holy forwardneſſe hath prevented it. You can afford theſe, but halfe of your ſelfe: The better part is better beſtowed: Your ſoule is ſtill retired, and reſerved. You have learned to vouch-

ſafe

A safe these worldly things, use, without affection; and know to distinguish wisely, betwixt a Stoicall dulnesse, and a Christian contempt: and have long made the world, not your God, but your slave. And in truth (that I may loose my selfe into a bold and free discourse) what other respect is it worthy of? I would adore it on my face, if I could see any Majestie that might command veneration. Perhaps it loves me not so much, as to shew me his best. I have sought it enough: and have seene what others have doated on, and wondered at their madnesse. So may I looke to see better things above, as I never could see ought here, but vanitie and vilenesse.

What is fame, but smoak? and metall, but drosse? and pleasure, but a pill in sugar? Let some Gallants condemne this, as the voice of a Melancholike Scholler: I speake that which they shall feele, and shall confesse. Though I never was so, I have seene some as happy as the world could make them: and yet I never saw any more discon-
B tented. Their life hath bin neither longer, nor sweeter, nor their heart lighter, nor their meales heartier, nor their nights quieter, nor their cares fewer, nor their complaints. Yea, we have knowne some that have lost their mirth when they have found wealth; and at once have ceased to be merry and poore. All these earthly delights, if they were sound, yet how short they are! and if they could be long, yet how unsound! If they were sound, they are but as a good day between two agues, or a sune-shine betwixt two tempests. And if they were long, their honie is exceeded by their gall. This ground beares none but maples, hollow and fruitlesse; or, like the banks of the dead Sea, a faire apple, which under a red side containes nothing but dust. Every flower in this garden either pricks or smels ill. If it be sweet, it hath thornes: and if it have no thornes, it annoyes us with an ill sent. Goe then, ye wise idolatrous Parasites, and erect shrines, and offer sacrifices to your God, the world, and seek to please him
C with your base and servile devotions: it shall be long enough ere such religion shall make you happy. You shal at last forsake those alters, emptie and sorrowfull. How easy is it for us Christians, thus to insult over the worldling, that thinks himselfe worthy of envie? How easie to turne off the world with a scornfull repulse; and when it makes us the Devils profer, All these will I give thee, to returne Peters answer, Thy silver and thy gold perish with thee? How easie to account none so miserable, as those that are rich with injurie, and grow great by being conscious of secret evils? Wealth and honour, when it comes upon the best tearmes, is but vaine; but, when upon ill conditions, burdensome. When they are at the best, they are scarce friends: but, when at the worst, tormentors. Alas, how ill agrees a gay coat, and a festered heart? What availes, an high title, with an hell in the soule? I admire the faith of Moses: but, presupposing his faith, I wonder not at his choyce. He preferred the afflictions of Israel, to the plea-
D sures of Ægypt; and chose rather to eat the Lamb, with sowre herbs, than all their flesh-pots: for how much better is it to be miserable than guiltie? and what comparison is there betwixt sorrow and sinne? If it were possible, let me rather be in hell without sinne, than on earth wickedly glorious. But how much are we bound to God, that allowes us earthly favours without this opposition! That God hath made you at once honourable and just, and your life pleasant and holy, and hath given you an high estate with a good heart; are favours, that look for thanks. These must be acknowledged, not rested in: They are yet higher thoughts that must perfect your contentment.

What God hath given you, is nothing to that he meanes to give: He hath bin liberall; but he wil be munificent. This is not so much as the taste of a full cup. Fasten your eyes upon your future glory, and see how meanly you shall esteeme these earthly graces. Here, you command but a little pittance of mould (great indeed, to us; little, to E the whole:) there, whole heaven shall be yours. Here you command, but as a subject: there you shall reigne as a King. Here, you are observed; but sometimes with your just distaste: there, shall you reigne with peace, and joy. Here, you are noble among men; there, glorious amongst Angels. Here, you want not honour; but you want not crosses: there, is nothing but felicitie. Here, you have some short joyes: there, is nothing but eternitie. You are a stranger, here; there, at home. Here, Satan tempts you, and men vex you: there, Saints and Angels shall applaud you; and God shall fill you with himselfe. In a word, you are onely blessed here, for that you shall be.

These are thoughts worthie of greatnesse: which if we suffer either imployments or pleasures to thrust out of our doores, wee doe wilfully make our selves comfortlesse. Let these still season your mirth, and sweeten your sorrowes, and ever interpose themselves betwixt you and the world. These onely can make your life happie, and your death welcome.

To my Lord HAY, H. and P.

EPIST. III. Of true Honour.

MY Lord, it is safe to complaine of Nature where Grace is; and to magnifie Grace, where it is at once had, and affected. It is a fault of Nature, and not the least, that as she hath dimme eyes, so they are mis-placed. She lookes still, either forward or downeward; forward to the object she desires, or downeward to the meanes: never turnes her eyes either backward, to see what she was; or upward, to the cause of her good: whence, it is just with God to with-hold what he would give, or to curse that which he bestowes; and to besot carnall minds with outward things, in their value, in their desire, in their use: whereas true wisdome hath cleare eyes, and right set; and therefore sees an invisible hand in all sensible events, effecting all things, directing all things to their due end; sees on whom to depend, whom to thank. Earth is too low and too base, to give bounds unto a spirituall sight. No man then can truly know what belongs to wealth, or honour, but the gracious; either how to compasse them, or how to prize them, or how to use them. I care not how many thousand waies there are to seeming honour, besides this of vertue: they all (if more) still lead to shame: or what plots are devised to improve it; if they were as deepe as hell, yet their end is losse. As there is no counsell against God, so there is no honour without him. He inclines the hearts of Princes to favour; the hearts of inferiours to applause. Without him, the hand cannot move, to succesſe; nor the tongue, to praise: And what is honour without these? In vaine doth the world frowne upon the man, whom hee meanes to honour; or smile, where he would disgrace. Let me then tell your Lordship, who are favourites in the Court of heaven; even whiles they wander on earth: yea, let the great King himselfe tell you, Those that honour me, I will honour. That men have the grace to give honour to God, is an high favour: but because men give honour to God (as their dutie) that therefore God should give honour to men, is to give, because he hath given. It is a favour of God, that man is honoured of man like himselfe: but that God alloweth of our endevours as honour to himselfe, is a greater favour than that wherewith he requites it.

This is the goodnesse of our God; The man that serves him, honours him: and whosoever honours him with his service, is crowned with honour. I challenge all times, places, persons: Who ever honoured God, and was neglected? Who hath wilfully dishonoured him, and prospered? Turne over all Records, and see how successe ever blessed the just, after many dangers, after many stormes of resistance, & left their conclusion glorious; how all godlesse plots, in their loose, have at once deceived, shamed, punished their Author. I goe no further: Your owne brest knowes, that your happie experience can herein justifie God. The world hath noted you, for a follower of vertue; and hath seene how fast Honour followed you: Whiles you sought favour with the God of heaven, he hath given you favour with his Deputie on earth.

Gods former actions are patterns of his future: He teacheth you what he will doe, by what hee hath done. Vnlesse your hand be weary of offering service, he cannot either pull in his hand from rewarding, or hold it out empty. Honour him still, and God pawnes his honour, on not failing you. You cannot distrust him, whom your proofe hath found faithfull. And, whiles you settle your heart in his right course of true glory, laugh, in secret scorne, at the idle endevours of those men, whose policies would out-reach God, and seize upon honour without his leave. (God laughes at them in heaven, it is a safe and holy laughter that followes his.) And pittie the

A prepoſterous courſes of them, which make religion but a foot-ſtoole to the ſeat of advancement; which care for all things but heaven; which make the world their ſtanding marke, and doe not ſo much as rove at God. Many had ſped well, if they had begun well, and proceeded orderly.

A falſe method is the bane of many hopefull endevours. God bids us ſeeke firſt his Kingdome; and earthly things ſhall find us unſought. Fooliſh nature firſt ſeekes the world: and if ſhe light on God by the way, it is more than ſhe expects, deſires, cares for; and therefore failes of both, becauſe ſhee ſeekes neither aright. Many had been great, if they had cared to be good; which now are croſſed in what they would, becauſe they willed not what they ought. If Salomon had made wealth his firſt ſuit, I doubt he had beene both poore and fooliſh: now, hee asked wiſdome, and gained greatneſſe: Becauſe he choſe well, he received what hee asked not. O the bountie
B and fidelitie of our God! becauſe we would have the beſt, he gives us all: Earth ſhall wait upon us, becauſe we attend upon heaven.

Goe on, my Lord, goe on happily, to love religion, to practiſe it: let God alone with the reſt. Bee you a patterne of vertue; he ſhall make you a Precedent of glory. Never man loſt ought by giving it to God: that liberall hand returnes our gifts, with advantage. Let men, let God ſee that you honour him; and they ſhall heare him proclaime before you, Thus ſhall it be done to the man whom the King will honour.

To M. Newton, Tutor to the Prince.

C EPIST. IV. Of Gratulation, for the hopes of our Prince; with an adviſing apprecation.

SIR, God hath called you to a great and happy charge: You have the cuſtody of our common Treaſure: Neither is there any ſervice comparable to this of yours; whether we regard God, or the world. Our labours oft-times beſtowed upon many, ſcarce profit one: yours, beſtowed upon one, redounds to the profit of many millions. This is a ſummarie way of obliging all the world to you. I encourage you not in your care: you have more comfort in the ſucceſſe of it, than all worlds can give you. The very ſubject of your pains would give an heart to him that hath none. I rather congratulate with you our common happineſſe, and the hopes of poſteritie, in that royall and bleſſed iſſue. You have beſt cauſe to be the witneſſe of the rare forwardneſſe of our gracious Maſter: and I have ſeen enough, to make me think I can never be D enough thankfull to God for him. That Princes are fruitfull is a great bleſſing: but, that their children are fruitfull in grace, & not more eminent in place than vertue, is the greateſt favor God can do to a State. The goodneſſe of a private man is his own; of a Prince, the whole worlds. Their words are Maximes, their actions examples, their examples rules. When I compare them with their royall Father, (as I do oft & chearfully) I cannot ſay whether he be more happy in himſelfe, or in them. I ſee both in him, and them; I ſee & wonder, that God diſtributes to naturall Princes gifts proportionable to their greatneſſe. The wiſe Moderator of the world knowes what uſe is of their parts: he knowes that the head muſt have all the ſenſes that pertaine to the whole body: & how neceſſarie it is, that inferiours ſhould admire them no leſſe for the excellency of their graces, than for the ſway of their authoritie. Whereupon it is, that he gives heroicall qualities to Princes; and as he hath beſtowed upon them his owne
E name, ſo alſo he gives them ſpeciall ſtamps of his owne glorious Image. Amongſt all other vertues, what a comfort is it to ſee thoſe yeares, and thoſe ſpirits ſtoope ſo willingly to devotion? Religion is growne too ſevere a Miſtreſſe for young & high courages to attend. Very rare is that Nobilitie of bloud, that doth not challenge libertie; and that libertie, that ends not in looſeneſſe. Loe, this example teacheth our Gallants, how well even Majeſty can ſtand with homage; Majeſty to men, with homage to God.

Farre be it from me, to do that which my next clauſe ſhall condemne: but I think it ſafe to ſay, that ſeldome ever thoſe yeares have promiſſed, ſeldom have performed ſo much. Only God keep two miſchiefes ever from within the ſmoak of his Court: Flattery and Treachery. The iniquitie of times may make us feare theſe; not his inclination.

For, whether as Engliſh, or as men, it hath been ever familiar to us, to fawne upon Princes: Though, what do I beſtow two names upon one vice, but attired in two ſundry ſuits of evill? For, Flattery is no other than gilded treaſon; nothing elſe but poiſon in gold: This evill is more tame; not leſſe dangerous. It had beene better for many great ones not to have been, than to have been in their conceits more than men. This, Flattery hath done; and what can it not? That other, Treachery, ſpils the bloud; this, the vertues of Princes. That takes them from others: this bereaves them of themſelves. That, in ſpight of the actors, doth but change their Crowne: this ſteales it from them for ever. Who can but wonder, that reads of ſome not unwiſe Princes, ſo bewitched with the inchantments of their Paraſites, that they have thought themſelves Gods immortall, and have ſuffered themſelves ſo ſtiled, ſo adored? Neither Temples nor Statues, nor Sacrifices have ſeemed too much glory to the greatneſſe of their ſelf-love. Now none of all their actions could be either evill, or unbeſeeming; nothing could proceed from them worthy of cenſure, unworthy of admiration: Their very ſpots have been beauty, their humours juſtice, their errours witty, their Paradoxes divine, their exceſſes heroicall. O the damnable ſervilitie of falſe minds! which perſwade others of that which themſelves laugh to ſee beleeved. O the dangerous credulitie of ſelfe-love! which entertaines all advantages if never ſo evill, never ſo impoſſible. How happy a ſervice ſhall you doe to this whole world of ours, if you ſhall ſtill ſettle in that Princely mind a true apprehenſion of himſelfe; and ſhall teach him to take his owne height aright; and even from his childhood to hate a Paraſite, as the worſt Traitor: To breake thoſe falſe glaſſes, that would preſent him a face, not his owne: To applaud plaine truth, and bend his browes upon exceſſive praiſes. Thus affected, he may bid vice doe her worſt. Thus ſhall he ſtrive with vertue, whether ſhall more honour each other. Thus ſincere and ſolid glory ſhall every where follow, and crowne him. Thus, when he hath but his due, he ſhall have ſo much, that he ſhall ſcorne to borrow the falſe colours of adulation. Goe on happily in this worthy & noble employment. The work cannot but ſucceed, that is furthered with ſo many praiers.

To Sir THOMAS CHALLONER.

EPIST. V. A report of ſome Obſervations in my Travell.

SIR, beſides my hopes, not my deſires, I travelled of late; for knowledge partly, and partly for health. There was nothing that made not my journey pleaſant, ſave the labour of the way: which yet was ſo ſweetly deceived, by the ſocietie of Sir Edmund Bacon, (a Gentleman truly honourable, beyond all titles) that I found ſmall cauſe to complaine. The Sea brookt not me, nor I it; an unquiet element, made onely for wonder and uſe, not for pleaſure. Alighted once from that woodden conveyance, and uneven way, I bethought my ſelfe how fondly our life is committed to an unſteadie and reeling peece of wood, fickle winds, reſtleſſe waters; while we may ſet foot on ſtedfaſt and conſtant earth. Loe, then every thing taught me, every thing delighted me; ſo ready are we to be affected with thoſe forraine pleaſures, which at home we ſhould over-look. I ſaw much, as one might in ſuch a ſpan of earth, in ſo few moneths. The time favoured me: for, now newly had the key of peace opened thoſe parts which warre had before cloſed; cloſed (I ſay) to all Engliſh, ſave either fugitives or captives. All civill occurrences (as what faire Cities, what ſtrange faſhions, entertainments, dangers, delights we found) are fit for other eares, & winter evenings. What I noted, as a Divine within the ſphere of my profeſſion, my paper ſhall not ſpare in ſome part to report; and that to your ſelfe, which have paſſed a longer way, with more happy fruit of obſervation. Even littleſt reames empty themſelves into great Rivers, and they againe into the Sea. Neither do I deſire to tell you what you know not: it ſhall be ſufficient that I relate ought which others ſhall think memorable.

A long

A long our way, how many Churches ſaw we demoliſhed! Nothing left, but rude heapes, to tell the paſſenger, there hath been both devotion and hoſtilitie. O the miſerable foot-ſteps of warre, beſides bloudſhed, ruine, and deſolation! Fury hath done that there, which Covetouſneſſe would do with us; would doe, but ſhall not: The truth within, ſhall ſave the walls without. And, to ſpeak truly (what-ever the vulgar exclaime) Idolitry pull'd downe thoſe walls; not rage. If there had beene no Hollander to raze them, they ſhould have fallen alone, rather than hide ſo much impietie under their guiltie roofe. Theſe are ſpectacles, not ſo much of crueltie, as juſtice. Crueltie of man, Juſtice of God. But (which I wondred at) Churches fall, and Jeſuits Colleges riſe, every where. There is no Citie, where thoſe are not either rearing or built. Whence commeth this? Is it, for that devotion is not ſo neceſſary as policy? Thoſe men (as we ſay of the Fox) fare beſt, when they are moſt curſed. None ſo much ſpighted of their owne; none ſo hated of all; none ſo oppoſed by ours: and yet theſe ill weeds grow. Whoſoever lives long, ſhall ſee them feared of their owne, which now hate them; ſhall ſee theſe ſeaven leane kine devoure all the fat beaſts that feed on the medowes of Tyber. I prophecie as Pharaoh dreamed: The event ſhall juſtifie my confidence.

At Bruxelles I ſay ſome Engliſh-women profeſſe themſelves Veſtals; with a thouſand rites, I know not whether more ridiculous, or magicall. Poore ſoules! they could not be fooles enough at home. It would have made you to pity, laugh, diſdaine (I know not which more) to ſee by what cunning ſleights and faire pretences that weake ſex was fetcht into a wilfull bondage; and (if thoſe two can agree) willingly conſtrained to ſerve a maſter whom they muſt and cannot obey: whom they neither may forſake for their vow, nor can pleaſe for their frailty. What followes hence? Late ſorrow, ſecret miſchiefe, miſery irremediable. Their forwardneſſe, for will-worſhip, ſhall condemne our coldneſſe for truth.

I talked there (in more boldneſſe perhaps than wiſdome) with Coſterus a famous Jeſuit; an old man, more teaſty than ſubtile, and more able to wrangle than ſatisfie. Our diſcourſe was longe and roaving, and on his part full both of words and vehemencie. He ſpake as at home; I as a ſtranger: yet ſo, as he ſaw me modeſtly peremptory. The particulars would ſwell my Letter too much: It is enough, that the Truth loſt leſſe than I gained. At Gaunt (a Citie that commands reverence for age, and wonder for the greatneſſe) we fell upon a Cappucine novice, which wept bitterly, becauſe he was not allowed to be miſerable. His head had now felt the razor, his back the rod: all that Laconicall diſcipline pleaſed him well; which another, being condemned to, would juſtly account a torment. What hindred then? Piety to his mother, would not permit this which he thought piety to God: He could not be a willing begger, unleſſe his mother muſt beg unwillingly. Hee was the only heire of his father, the only ſtay of his mother: the comfort of her widowhood depended on this her orphane; who now naked muſt enter into the world of the Cappucines, as he came firſt into this; leaving his goods to the diviſion of the fraternitie: the leaſt part whereof ſhould have been hers; whoſe he wiſhed all: Hence thoſe tears, that repulſe. I pitied his ill beſtowed zeale; & rather wiſhed, than durſt teach him more wiſdome. Theſe men for devout, the Jeſuits for learned and pragmaticall, have ingroſſed all opinion from other Orders. O hypocriſie! No Cappucine may take or touch ſilver: for theſe are (you know) the quinteſſence of Franciſcan ſpirits. This metall is as very an Anathema to theſe, as the wedge of gold to Achan; at the offer whereof he ſtarts back, as Moſes from the Serpent: yet he carries a boy with him, that takes & caries it; & never complaines of either metall or meaſure. I ſaw and laughed at it; & by this open trick of hypocriſie ſuſpected more, more cloſe. How could I chuſe? while commonly the leaſt appears of that which is; eſpecially of that which is loathſome in appearance, much more in nature. At Namurs, on a pleaſant & ſteep hill-top, we found one that was termed a maried Hermite; approving his wiſdome above his fellows, that could make choice of ſo chearefull and ſociable a ſolitarineſſe. Whence, after a delightfull paſſage up the ſweet River Moſa, we viſited the populous & rich Clergie of Leodium. That great Citie might well be dichotomized into Cloyſters and Hoſpitals. If I might adventure, I could here play the Critick, after all the ruins of my neglected Philologie. Old monuments, and after them our Lipsius, call this people Eburones: I doubt whether it should not rather be written Ebriones; yet without search of any other records, save my owne eyes: while yet I would those streets were more moist with wine, than with bloud; wherein no day, no night is not dismall to some. No law, no Magistrate, layes hold on the knowne murderer, if himselfe list: for three dayes after his fact, the gates are open, and justice shut: private violence may pursue him, publike justice cannot: whence, some of more hot temper carve themselves of revenge; others take up with a small pecuniary satisfaction. O England, thought I, happie for justice, happie for securitie! There you shall find in every corner a Maumet; at every doore a begger; in every dish a Priest. From thence we passed to the Spa, a village famous for her medicinall and minerall waters, compounded of Iron and Copperice; the vertue whereof yet the simple inhabitant ascribes to their beneficiall Saint, whose heavy foot hath made an ill-shaped impression in a stone of his Savenir*: A water more wholesome than pleasant, and yet more famous than wholesome. The wilde deserts (on which it borders) are haunted with three kinds of ill cattell; Free-booters, Wolves, Witches: although these two last are oft-times one. For that savage Ardenna is reputed to yeeld many of those monsters, whom the Greekes call λυκανθρώπους; they, Lougarous; we (if you will) Witch-wolves; Witches that have put on the shape of those cruell beasts. We saw a boy there, whose halfe-face was devoured by one of them neere the village: yet so, as that the eare was rather cut than bitten off. Not many dayes before our comming, at Limburgh was executed one of those miscreants, who confessed on the wheele to have devoured two and fortie children in that forme. It would aske a large volume, to scan this probleme of Lycanthropy. The reasons, wherewith ther relation furnisht me on both parts, would make an Epistle tedious. This in short I resolved; a substantiall change, is above the reach of all infernall powers, proper to the same hand that created the substance of both: Herein the Devill playes the double Sophister; yea, the Sorcerer with Sorcerers. Hee both deludes the Witches conceit, and the beholders eyes.

* The name of the vpper well of the Spa.

One thing I may not omit, without sinful over-sight; A short, but memorable Story, which the Grephier of that towne (though of different religion) reported to more eares than ours. When the last Inquisition tyrannized in those parts, and helpt to spend the Faggots of Ardenna; one of te rest, a confident Confessour, being led farre to his stake, sung Psalms along the way, in a heavenly courage and victorious triumph: the cruell Officer envying his last mirth, and grieving to see him merrier than his tormentors, commanded him silence: He sings still, as desirous to improve his last breath to the best. The view of his approaching glory, bred his joy; his joy breaks forth into a chearefull confession: The enraged Sheriffe causes his tongue, drawne forth to the length, to be cut off neer the roots. Bloudy wretch! It had been good musicke to have heard his shrecks: but, to heare his musicke was torment. The poore Martyr dies in silence, rests in peace. Not many moneths after, our butcherly Officer hath a sonne borne with his tongue hanging downe upon his chinne, like a Deer after long chase; which never could be gathered up within the bounds of his lips. O the divine hand, full of justice, full of revenge! Goe now, Lipsius, and write the new miracles of thy Goddesse; and confirme superstition by strange events. Judge you that have seene, if ever the Chappell of Halle or Zichem have yeelded ought more notable. Wee meete every where Pilgrims to those his Ladies: two Ladies shall I call them, or one Lady in two shrines? If two, why doe they worship but one? If but one, why doth she that cure at Zichem, which at Halle she could not? O what pitie it is, that so high a wit should in the last act be subject to dotage! All the masculine brood of that braine we cherished, and (if need were) admired: but these his silly Vergins, the feeble issue of distempered age, who can abide? One of his darlings, at Louan, told me from his owne mouth, that the elder of these two daughters was by him in ten dayes got, conceived, borne, christned. I beleeved, and wondred not. These acts of superstition have an invisible father, and mid-wife: besides that it is not for an Elephant to goe three yeares with a Mouse. It was told me in the shop of his Moretus, not without some indignation, that our King, when hee had well viewed the booke, and read some passages, threw it to the ground, with this censure; Damnation to him that made it, and to him that beleeves it.

A Whether a true ſtory, or one of their Legends, I enquire not: I am ſure, that ſentence did not ſo much diſcontent them, as it joyed me. Let me tell you yet, ere I take off my pen, two wonders more, which I ſaw in that wonder of Cities, Antwerp; one, a ſolemne Maſſe in a ſhambles, and that on Gods day; while the houſe was full of meat, of butchers, of buyars; ſome kneeling, others bargaining, moſt talking, all buſie. It was ſtrange to ſee one houſe ſacred to god, and the belly; and how thoſe two ſervices agreed: The Prieſt did eat fleſh, the butchers ſold fleſh, in one roofe, at one inſtant. The butcher killed, and ſold it by peeces; the Prieſt did ſacrifice, and orally devoure it whole: whether was the more butcher? The like we might have ſeene at Malines. The other, an Engliſh-man, ſo madly devout, that he had wilfully mur'd up himſelfe as an Anachoret; the worſt of all priſoners. There ſate he pent up, for his further merit, halfe hunger-ſtarved for the charitie of the citizens. It was worth ſee- Mechlinia.

tance. I cannot commend his mortification, if he wiſh to be in heaven, yea in purgatory, to be delivered from thence: I durſt not pittie him; becauſe his durance was willing, and (as he hoped) meritorious: but, ſuch incouragement as he had from me, ſuch thanke ſhall he have from God; who in ſtead of an Euge, which he lookes for, ſhall angerly challenge him, with Who required this? I leave him now, in his owne fetters; you, to your worthy and honourable employments.

Pardon me this length. Loquacitie is the naturall fault of Travellers: while I profit any, I may well be forgiven.

To Sir David Murray.

Epist. VI. Concerning the Miracles of our time.

D INdeed the world abounds with miracles. Theſe, while they fill the mouthes of many ſway the faith of ſome, and make all men wonder. Our nature is greedy of newes; which it will rather faine than want. Certainly, ere long, miracles will be no wonders, for their frequence. I had thought, our age had had too many gray haires, and with time experience, and with experience craft, to have deſcried a Juggler: but now I ſee by the ſimplicitie, it declines to its ſecond childhood. The two Lipſian Ladies, the charmes of Bluntſtones boy, and Garnets ſtraw, what a noiſe have they made! I only wonder how Faux and Catesby eſcaped the honour of Saints, and privilege of miracles. Herein you aske my ſentence; more ſeaſonably than you hoped. For I meant to have wrote a juſt volume of this ſubject, and furniſht my ſelfe accordingly in that Region of wonders; but that I feared to ſurcharge the nice ſto- A ſort of make of our time, with too much. Neither would my length have ought availed you; miracles:
whoſe thoughts are ſo taken up with ſo high and ſerviceable cares, that they can give no leiſure to an over-long diſcourſe. May it pleaſe you therefore to receive in ſhort, what I have deliberately reſolved in my ſelfe, and think I can make good to others.

I have noted foure ranks of commonly-named miracles: from which, if you make a juſt ſubduction, how few of our wonders ſhall remaine either to beleefe or admiration? The firſt meerly reported, not ſeen to be done; the next ſeeming to be done, but counterfeited; the third, truly done, but not true miracles; the laſt, truly miraculous, but by Satan. The firſt of theſe are bred of lies, and nouriſhed by credulity: The E mouth of fame is full of ſuch blaſts. For theſe, if I liſted a while to rake in the Legends and book of Conformities, an ingennous Papiſt could not but bluſh, an indifferent Reader could not but lay his hand on his ſpleen, and wonder as much that any man could be ſo impudent to broach ſuch reports, or any ſo ſimple to beleeve them; as the credulous multitude wonders that any ſhould be ſo powerfull to effect them. But I ſeek neither their ſhame, nor others laughter. I dare ſay, not the Talmud, not the Alcoran, hath more impoſſible tales, more ridiculous lies. Yea, to this head, Canus himſelfe (a famous Papiſt) dares referre many of thoſe ancient miracles reported and (by all likelihood) beleeved of Bede and Gregory. The next are bred of fraud and cozenage, nouriſhed by ſuperſtition. Who knows not, how the famous Kentiſh Idoll moved her eyes, and hands, by thoſe ſecret gimmers, which now every Puppet-play can imitate? How Saint Wilfreds needle opened to the penitent, and cloſed it ſelfe to the guiltie? How our Lady ſheds the teares of a bleeding Vine? and doth many of her daily feats, as Bel did of old eat up his banquet, or as Pivens the Eremite faſted fortie daies. But theſe two every honeſt Papiſt will confeſſe, with voluntary ſhame and griefe; and grant that it may grow a diſputable queſtion whether Mountebanks or Prieſts are the greater cozeners. Vives, beyond his wont, vehemently, termes them execrable and Satanicall impoſtors. The third are true works of God under a falſe title: God gives them their being, men their name: unjuſt, becauſe above their nature; wherein the Philoſopher and the ſuperſtitiouſly-ignorant, are contrarily extreme, while the one ſeeks out naturall cauſes of Gods imediate and metaphyſicall works; the other aſcribes ordinary effects to ſupernaturall cauſes. If the violence of a diſeaſe ceaſe, after a vow made to our Lady; if a ſouldier, armed with this vow ſcape gun-ſhot; a captive priſon; a woeman travelling, death; the vulgar (and I would they alone) cry out, A miracle. One Load-ſtone hath more wonder in it, than a thouſand ſuch events. Every thing draws a baſe mind to admiration. Franciſco del Campo (one of the Arch-Dukes Quiryes) told us not without importunate devotion, that in that fatall field of Newport, his vow to their Vergin helpt him to ſwim over a large water, when the oars of his arms had never before tried any waves. A dogge hath done more, without acknowledgement of any Saint. Feare gives ſudden inſtincts of skill, even without precept. Their owne Coſterus durſt ſay, that the cure of a diſeaſe is no miracle: His reaſon, becauſe it may be done by the power of Nature, albe in a longer time. *Yeeld this, and what have Lipſius his two Ladies done? wherefore ſerves all this clamor, from the two hils? I aſſented not; neither will be herein thus much their enemie: For, as well the manner of doing, as the matter, makes a miracle. If Peters handkerchiefe, or ſhadow, heale a diſeaſe, it is miraculous, though it might have been done by a potion. Many of their recoveries (doubtleſſe) have been wrought through the ſtrength of Nature in the Patient, not of vertue in the Saint. How many ſick men have mended, with their phyſicke in their pocket? Though many other alſo (I doubt not) of thoſe cures have fallen into the fourth head; which indeed is more knotty, and require a deeper diſcourſe. Wherein, if I ſhall evince theſe two things, I ſhall (I hope) ſatisfie my Reader, and cleare the Truth: One, that miracles are wrought by Satan; the other, that thoſe which the Romiſh Church boaſteth, are of this nature, of this author. I contend not of words: we take miracles in Auguſtines large ſenſe; wherein is little difference betwixt a thing marvellous and miraculous; ſuch as the Spirit of God in either inſtrument cals δυνάμεις and נבורות. Perhaps it would be more proper to ſay, that God works theſe miracles by Satan; for, as in the naturall and voluntary motions of wicked men; ſo in the ſupernaturall acts of evill ſpirits (as they are acts) there is more than a meer permiſſion. Satan, by his tempeſt, bereaves Iob of his children; yet Iob, looking higher, ſaith, The Lord hath taken. No ſophiſtry can elude this proofe of Moſes; that a Prophet or dreamer may give a true ſigne or wonder, and yet ſay, Let us goe after ſtrange gods: nor that of our Saviour, who foretels of falſe Chriſts, falſe prophets that ſhall give σημεῖα μεγάλα καὶ τέρατα, ſignes and wonders, and thoſe great. There are ſome too great, I grant, for the hand of all infernall powers: by which, our Saviour invincibly prooves the truth of his Deity: Theſe never graced falſehood, neither admit any precedent from our times. As to the reſt ſo frequent and common; for me, I could not beleeve the Church of Rome were Antichriſtian, if it had not boaſted of theſe wonders. All the knot lies then in the application of this to Rome, and our imaginary Lady: how ſhall it appeare, that their miracles are of this kind? Ludovicus Vives gives ſix notes to diſtinguiſh Gods miracles from Satans: Lipſius three: Both of them too many, as might eaſily be diſcovered by diſcuſſing of particulars. It is not ſo much the greatneſſe of the work, nor the beleefe of witneſſes, nor the quality nor manner of the action, nor truth of eſſence, that can diſcry the immediate hand which worketh in our miracles. That alone is the true and golden rule, which Iuſtin Martyr (if at leaſt that booke be his) preſcribes in his Queſtions and Anſwers; How ſhall it be knowne that our or { אות / מופת }

Deut. 13. 1.

A our miracles are better than the Heathens, although the event countenance both alike? Resp. Ex fide & cultu veri Dei: Miracles must be judged by the doctrine which they confirme; not the doctrine by the miracles. The Dreamer, or Prophet must be esteemed, not by the event of his wonder, but by the substance and scope of his teaching. The Romanists argue preposterously, while they would prove the truth of their Church by miracles; whereas they should prove their miracles by the truth. To say nothing of the fashion of their cures, that one is prescribed to come to our Lady rather on a Friday, as* Henry Loyez; another, to wash nine dayes in the water of Montagu, as Leonard Stocqueau; another to eat a peece of the Oake where the image stood, as * Magdaleine the widow of Bruxelles. All which, if they savour not strong of magicall receits, let the indifferent judge. Surely, either there is no sorcery, or this is it. All shall be plaine, if the doctine confirmed by their miracles be once
B discussed: for, if that be divine truth, we doe unjustly impugne these works as diabolicall; if falshood, they doe blasphemously proclaime them for divine. These works tend all chiefly to this double doctrine; that the blessed Virgin is to be invoked, for her mediation; That God and Saints are to be adored in and by images; Positions that would require a vollume, and such as are liberally disputed by others: whereof one is against scripture; the other (which in these cases values no lesse) besides it. One deifies the Virgin; the other a stock or stone. It matters not what subtile distinctions their learned Doctors make betwixt mediation of Redemption, and Intercession, Δουλεία and Λατρεία the Saint, and the Image: We know, their common people, whose devotion enriches those shrines (by confession of their owne Writers) climbe the hill of Zichem with this conceit, that Mary is their Savioresse; that
C the stocke is their Goddesse: which unlesse it be true, how doe their wonders teach them lies! and therefore how from God? But, to take the first at best (for the second is so grosse, that were not the second Commandement by Papists purposely razed out of their Primiers, children and carters would condemne it) it cannot be denyed, that all the substance of prayer is in the heart; the vocall sound is but a complement, and as an outward case wherein our thoughts are sheathed. That power cannot know the prayer, which knowes not the heart: either then the Virgin is God, for that she knowes the heart; or to know the heart is not proper to God: or to know the heart, and so our prayers, is falsely ascribed to the Virgin: and therefore these wonders, which teach men thus to honour her, are Doctors of lies; so, not of God. There cannot be any discourse wherein it is more easie to be tedious. To end; if prayers were but in words, and Saints did meddle with all particularities of earthly things, yet blessed Mary should be a God, if shee could at once attend all her suters.
D One sollicites her at Halle, another at Scherpenheuvel, another at Luca, at our Walsingham another; one in Europe, another in Asia: or perhaps another is one of her new Clients in America. Ten thousand devout Suppliants are at once prostrate before her severall shrines. If she cannot heare all, why pray they? If she can, what can God doe more? Certainly (as the matter is used) there cannot be greater wrong offered to those heavenly Spirits, than by our importunate superstitions to be thrust into Gods Throne; and to have forced upon them the honours of their Maker. There is no contradiction in heaven: a Saint cannot allow that an Angell forbids, See thou doe it not, was the voyce of an Angell: if all the miraculous blocks in the world shall speak contrary, we know whom to beleeve. The old rule was, Μαείαν μηδεὶς προσκυνείτω: Either that rule is Devilish, or this practice. And if this practice be ill, God deliver me from the immediate author of these miracles. Change but one Idoll for another, and what
E differ the wonders of Apollos Temples, from those of these Chappels? We reverence (as we ought) the memory of that holy and happy Virgin: We hate those that dishonour her, we hate those that defie her. Cursed be all honour that is stolne from God.

This short satisfaction I give, in a long question; such as I dare rest in; and resolve that all popish miracles are either falsly reported, or falsly done, or falsly miraculous, or falsly ascribed to heaven.

To Mr. VVILLIAM BEDELL. at Venice.

EP. VII. Lamenting the death of our late Divines, and exciting to their imitation.

VVE have heard, how full of trouble, and danger, the Alps were to you; and did at once both pity your difficulties, and rejoyce in your ſafety. Since your departure from us, Reynolds is departed from the world. Alas, how many worthy Lights have our eyes ſeene ſhining and extinguiſht? How many loſſes have we lived to ſee the Church ſuſtaine, and lament; of her children, of her pillars; our owne, and forraine; I ſpeak not of thoſe, which (being excellent) would needs be obſcure: whom nothing but their owne ſecrecy deprived of the honour of our tears. There are, beſides, too many whom the world noted and admired; even ſince the time that our common mother acknowledged us for her ſonnes. Our Fulke led the way; that profound, ready, and reſolute Doctor, the hammer of hereticks, The champion of truth; whom your younger times have heard oft diſputing acutely and powerfully. Next him, followed that honour of our Schooles, and Angell of our Church, learned Whitakers; than whom our age ſaw nothing more memorable: what clearneſſe of judgement, what ſweetneſſe of ſtyle, what gravitie of perſon, what grace of cariage was in that man? Who ever ſaw him without reverence? or heard him without wonder? Soone after, left the world that famous and illuminate Doctor, Francis Iunius, the glory of Leiden, the other hope of the Church, the Oracle of Textuall and Schoole-Divinitie, rich in languages, ſubtile in diſtinguiſhing, and in argument invincible: and his companion in labours, Lu. Trelcatius, would needs be his companion in joyes: who had doubled our ſorrow and loſſe, but that he recompenced it with a ſonne like himſelfe. Soone after, fell old reverend Beza; a long fixed ſtarre in this firmament of the Church: who, after many excellent monuments of learning and fidelity, lived to prove upon his adveſaries, that he was not dead at their day. Neither may I without injury, omit that worthy payre of our late Divines, Greenham and Perkins: whereof the one excelled in experimentall divinitie, and knew well how to ſtay a weak conſcience, how to raiſe a fallen, how to ſtrike a remorſleſſe: The other, in a diſtinct judgement, and rare dexteritie in clearing the obſcure ſubtilties of the Schoole and eaſie explication of the moſt perplex diſcourſes. Doctor Reynolds is the laſt not in worth, but in the time of his loſſe. He alone was a well furniſht librarie, full of all faculties, of all ſtudies, of all learning: the memory, the reading of that man were neere to a miracle. Theſe are gon, amongſt many more, whom the Church mourns for in ſecret: would God her loſſe could be as eaſily ſupplied, as lamented. Her ſorrow is for thoſe that are paſt; her remainder of joy is in thoſe that remaine; her hope in the next age. I pray God the cauſes of her hope, & joy, may be equivalent to thoſe of her grief.

What ſhould this work in us, but an imitation, yea (that word is not too bigge for you) an emulation of their worthineſſe? It is no pride, for a man to wiſh himſelfe ſpiritually better than he dare hope to reach: nay, I am deceiued, if it be not true humility. For what doth this argue him, but low in his conceit, high in his deſires only? Or if ſo; happy is the ambition of grace, and power of ſincere ſerviceableneſſe to God. Let us wiſh and affect this, while the world layes plots for greatneſſe: Let me not proſper, if I beſtow envy on them. He is great, that is good: and no man, me thinks, is happy on earth, to him that hath grace for ſubſtance, and learning for ornament. If you know it not, the Church (our mother) lookes for much at your hands: ſhe knowes how rich our common father hath left you: ſhe notes your graces, your opportunities, your imployments: ſhe thinks you are gone ſo farre, like a good Marchant, for no ſmall gaine; and lookes you ſhall come home well laded. And for vent of your preſent commodities (tho our cheife hope of ſucceſſe be cut off with that unhoped peace) yet what can hinder your private trafficke for God? I hope (and who doth not?) that this this blow will leave in your noble Venetians a perpetuall ſcarre, and that their late irreſolution ſhall make them ever capable of all better counſell; and have his worke (like ſome great Eclipſe) many yeares after. How happy were it for Venice, if as ſhe is every yeare married to the Sea, ſo ſhe were once throughly eſpouſed to Chriſt! In the meane time, let me perſwade you to gratifie us at home with the publication of that your exquiſite Polemicall diſcourſe; whereto our conference with M. Alablaſter gave ſo happy an occaſion: You ſhall hereby cleare many truths, and ſatisfie all Readers: yea, I doubt not, but an adverſary (not too perverſe) ſhall acknowledge the Truths victory and yours. It was wholeſome counſell of a father, that in the time of an hereſie every man ſhould write. Perhaps, you complaine of the inundations of Francford how many have been diſcouraged from benefiting the world, be this conceit of multitude! Indeed we all write; and while we write, crie out of number. How well might many be ſpared, even of thoſe that complaine of too many? whoſe importunate babling cloyes the world, without uſe.

To my Lord, the Earle of Eſſex.

EPIST. VIII. Advice for his Travels.

MY Lord, both my dutie and promiſſe make my Letters your debt; and, if neither of theſe, my thirſt of your good. You ſhall never but need good counſell; moſt in travell: Then are both our dangers greater, and our hopes.

I need not to tell you the eyes of the world are much upon you, for your owne ſake, for your fathers: only let your eyes be upon it againe, to obſerve it, to ſatisfie it, and in ſome caſes to contemne it. As your graces, ſo your weakneſſes, will be the ſooner ſpied, by how much you are more noted. The higher any building is, the more it requires exquiſite proportion: which in ſome low and rude piles, is needleſſe. If your vertues ſhall be eminent like your fathers, you cannot ſo hide your ſelfe, but the world will ſee you, and force upon you applauſe & admiration, in ſpight of modeſty: but if you ſhall come ſhort in theſe, your fathers perfection ſhall be your blemiſh. Think, now, that more eyes are upon you, than at home: of forrainers, of your owne; theirs to obſerve, ours to expect. For, now we account you in the Schoole of wiſdome: whence if you returne not better, you ſhall worſe; with the loſſe of your time, of our hopes. For, I know not how naturall it is to us to look for alteration in travell; and, with the change of aire and land, to preſuppoſe a change in the perſon. Now you are (through both your yeeres and travell) in the forge of your hopes. We all look (not without deſire and apprecation) in what ſhape you will come forth. Think it not enough, that you ſee, or can ſay you have ſeene ſtrange things of nature, or event: it is a vaine and dead travell, that reſts in the eye, or the tongue. All is but loſt, unleſſe your buſie mind ſhall from the body that it ſees, draw forth ſome quinteſſence of obſervation, wherewith to informe, & inrich it ſelfe. There is nothing can quite the coſt and labour of travell, but the gaine of wiſdome. How many have we ſeene & pitied, which have brought nothing from forrain countries, but miſhapen clothes, or exoticall geſtures, or new games, or affected liſpings, or the diſeaſes of the place, or (which is worſt) the vices? Theſe men have at once wandered from their countrie, & from themſelves: and ſome of them (too eaſie to inſtance) have left God behind them; or perhaps, in ſtead of him, have after a looſe and filthy life, brought home ſome idle Puppet in a box, whereon to ſpend their devotion. Let their wrack warne you: and let their follies be entertained by you, with more deteſtation than pitie. I know your honour too well to feare you: your young yeares have been ſo graciouſly prevented with ſoveraigne antidotes of truth & holy inſtruction, that this infection diſpaires of prevailing. Your very blood gives you argument of ſafety: yet good counſell is not unſeaſonable, even where danger is not ſuſpected. For Gods ſake, my Lord, whatſoever you gaine, loſe nothing of the truth; remit nothing of your love and piety to God; of your favour and zeale to religion. As ſure as there is a God, you were trained up in the true knowledge of him. If either Angell, or Devill, or Jeſuit ſhould ſuggeſt the contrary, contrary, ſend him away with defiance. There you ſee and heare every day, the true mother and the fained, ſtriving and pleading for the living child. The true Prince of peace hath paſt ſentence from heaven, on our ſide. Do not you ſtoop ſo much as to a doubt, or motion of irreſolution. Abandon thoſe from your table and ſalt, whom your owne and others experience ſhall deſcry dangerous: Thoſe Serpents are full of inſinuations: But, of all, thoſe of your owne country; which are ſo much the more pernicious, by how much they have more colour of privilege of intireneſſe. Religion is the greateſt care: advices for cariage, and improvement of travell, challenge the next place. I need not counſell you to keepe your ſtate with affability; and ſo to menage your ſelfe, as that your curteſie may be more viſible than your greatneſſe. Nature hath taught you this; and hath ſecretly propagated it from your father: who by his ſweetneſſe of diſpoſition, wonne as many hearts, as by his valour and munificence. I rather tell you, that a good nature hath betrayed many; who looking for that in others, which they found in themſelves, have at laſt complained of their owne credulity, and others deceit. Truſt not ſtrangers too much, with your counſell, with your perſon: & in your greateſt familiarities, have an eye to their common diſpoſition, & infirmities. Thoſe natures wherewith you converſe, are ſubject to diſpleaſure, and violent in purſuit of ſmall indignities. Yeſterday heard I named, from no unfaithfull report, a French Courtier, that in ſingle combat hath ſent eighteene ſoules from the field to their place: yet he ever as the patient in the quarrell; and for this mentioned with more than excuſe: I cenſure not how juſtly. This is others care: Only hence I argue the rifeneſſe of unkindneſſe taken, & purſued. You ſhall ſee, that the ſoile is not ſo divers, as the inclination of perſons; who in all Climates, though they differ in particulars, yet ſtill agree too well in common faults. The Italian deep, cloſe, and craftie; the French raſh; the German dull. One not forward to offer wrongs, but apprehenſive of a ſmall wrong offered: another, prone either to take, or give them; but not uneaſie to remit: another, long in conceiving, long in retaining. What do I exemplifie? There are long Catalogues of peculiar vices, that haunt ſpeciall places; which, if they were not notoriouſly infamous, my charity would ſerve me to particularize. It were pity there ſhould be fewer vertues, locall & proper. There are good uſes to be made of others enormities; if no more, by them to correct our owne: who loaths vice in another is in good forwardneſſe to leave it in himſelfe. The view of the publike calamities, & diſorders of other Churches, ſhall beſt teach you thankfulneſſe for the better ſtate of ours: But better uſe of their vertues; by how much it is more excellent to know what we ſhould doe, than what ſhould not. You muſt now look upon all things, not with the eye of a ſtranger only, but of a Philoſopher, but of a Chriſtian; which accounts all loſſe, that is not reduced to practice. It is a great praiſe, that you are wiſer by the contemplation of forraigne things; but much greater, that you are better.

That you have ſeene Cities, and Courts, and Alpes, and Rivers, can never yeeld you ſo ſound comfort, as that you have lookt ſeriouſly into your ſelfe. In vaine doe we affect all forraine knowledge, if we be not throughly acquainted at home. Think much, and ſay little, eſpecially in occaſions of diſpraiſe: wherein, both a little is enough, and oft-times any thing is too much. You cannot inquire too much: that which in us inferiours would be cenſured for dangerous curioſitie, in your Greatneſſe ſhall be conſtrued as a commendable deſire of knowledge. Aske ſtill after men of greateſt parts and reputation: and where you find Fame no lyer, note and reſpect them. Make choice of thoſe for converſation, which either in preſent, or in hope are eminent: and when you meet with excellencies in any facultie, leave not without ſome gaine of knowledge. What are others graces to you, if you onely admire them; not imitate, not appropriate them? Loe, your equals in time grow up happily in the College (ſo I may terme it) of our young and hopefull Court, which you have left; and above all, that gracious preſident of worthineſſe and perfection: whom while in all other things you ſerve, you may without reproofe emulate for learning, vertue, pietie. My ſelfe am witneſſe of their progreſſe; which I doe joyfully gratulate to the ſucceeding age. Beware, leſt their diligence ſhall out-ſtrip you, and upbrade you with that ancient checke of going farre and faring worſe.

I am

I am bold and buſie in counſelling: you abound with better monitors; and the beſt you cary about, I hope, in your owne boſome. Though theſe ſhould be needleſſe, yet they argue my humble affection, and diſcharge my duty. My prayers are better than my counſells; both of them hearty and unfained for your good. God guide and returne you ſafe, from a journey not more happie and proſperous than I wiſh it.

To Sir ROBERT DRVRY, and his LADY.

EPIST. IX. Concerning my removall from them.

WIth how unwilling a heart I leave you, he knowes that ſearches the heart: Neither durſt I goe, but that I ſenſibly ſee his hand pulling me from you. Indeed, deſire of competencie betrayed me, at firſt; and drew mine eyes to looke aſide: but, when I bent them upon the place, and ſaw the number and the need of the people, together with their hunger & applauſe, meeting with the circumſtances of Gods ſtrange conveyance of this offer to me; I ſaw, that was but as the Fowlers feather, to make me ſtoope: and, contemning that reſpect of my ſelfe, I ſincerely acknowledged higher motives of my yeelding; and reſolved I might not reſiſt. You are deare to me, as a charge to a Paſtor; If my paines to you have not proved it, ſuſpect me: Yet I leave you. God calls me to a greater worke: I muſt follow him. It were more eaſe to me, to live ſecretly hidden in that quiet obſcurity, as Saul amongſt the ſtuffe, than to be drawne out to the eye of the world, to act ſo high a part before a thouſand witneſſes. In this point, if I ſeeme to neglect you, blame me not; I muſt neglect and forget my ſelfe. I can but labour, whereſoever I am. God knowes how willingly I doe that, whether there or here. I ſhall digge, and delve, and plant, in what ground ſoever my Maſter ſets me. If he take me to a larger field, complaine you not of loſſe, while the Church may gaine. But, you are mine owne Charge; No wiſe father neglects his owne, in compaſſion of the greater need of others: yet conſider, that even carefull Parents, when the Prince commands, leave their families, and goe to warfare. What if God hath called me to heaven; would you have grudged my departure? Imagine I am there, where I ſhall be; although the caſe be not to you altogether ſo hopeleſſe: for, now I may heare of you, viſit you, renue my holy counſels, and be mutually comforted from you; there, none of theſe. He, that will once tranſpoſe me from earth to heaven, hath now choſen to tranſpoſe me from one peece of earth to another: what is here worthy of your ſorrow, worthy of complaint? That ſhould be for my owne good: this ſhall be for the good of many. If your experience have taught you that my labours doe promiſe profit; obtaine of your ſelfe to deny your ſelfe ſo much, as to rejoyce that the loſſe of a few ſhould be the advantage of many ſoules. Tho, why doe I ſpeake of loſſe? I ſpeake that as your feare, not my owne: and your affection cauſeth that feare, rather than the occaſion.

The God of the Harueſt ſhall ſend you a Labourer, more able, as carefull: That is my prayer, and hope, and ſhall be my joy. I dare not leave but in this expectation, this aſſurance. What-ever become of me, it ſhall be my greateſt comfort to heare you commend your change; and to ſe your happie progreſſe in thoſe wayes I have both ſhewed you, and beaten. So ſhall we meet in the end, and never part.

Written to Mr. I.B. and Dedicated to my Father, Mr. I. Hall.

Epist. X. Against the feare of death.

YOu complaine, that you feare death: He is no man that doth not. Besides the paine, Nature shrinkes at the thought of parting. If you would learne the remedie, know the cause; for that she is ignorant and faithlesse. Shee would not be cowardly, if she were not fooliſh. Our feare is from doubt, and our doubt is from unbeleefe: and whence is our unbeleefe, but chiefly from ignorance? She knowes not what good is elsewhere: she beleeves not her part in it. Get once true knowledge and true faith, your feare shall vanish alone. Assurance of heavenly things, makes us willing to part with earthly. He cannot contemne this life, that knowes not the other. If you would despise earth therefore, think of heaven. If you would have death easie, think of that glorious life that followes it. Certainly, if we can endure paine, for health; much more should we abid a few pangs for glory.

Think how fondly we feare a vanquisht enemie. Loe, Christ hath triumpht over Death: he bleedeth and gaspeth under us: and yet we tremble. It is enough to us, that Christ died: neither would he have died, but that we might die with safetie and pleasure.

Think that death is necessarily annexed to nature: We are for a time, on condition that we shall not be; we receiue life, but upon the termes of re-delivery. Necessitie makes some things easie; as it usually makes easie things difficult. It is a fond injustice to embrace the covenant, and shrink at the condition.

Think, there is but one common rode to all flesh: There are no by-paths of any fairer or nearer way; no, not for Princes. Even company abateth miseries: and the commonnesse of an evill makes it lesse fearefull. What worlds of men are gone before us; yea, how many thousands out of one field? How many Crownes and Scepters lie piled up at the gates of Death, which their owners have left there, as spoiles to the conquerour? Have we beene at so many graves, and so oft seene our selves die in our friends; and doe we shrink when our course commeth? Imagine you alone were exempted from the common law of mankind, or were condemned to Methusalahs age; assure your selfe, death is not now so fearefull, as your life would then be wearisome.

Think not so much what Death is, as from whom he comes, and for what. We receive even homely messengers from great persons; not without respect to their masters: And what matters it who he be, so he bring us good newes? What newes can be better than this, That God sends for you, to take possession of a Kingdome? Let them feare Death, which know him but as a pursuivant sent from hell; whom their conscience accuseth of a life wilfully filthy; and bindes-over secretly to condemnation: We know whither we are going, and whom we have beleeved: Let vs passe on cheerefully, thorow these blacke gates unto our glory.

Lastly know that our improvidence only addes terrour unto death. Think of death, and you shall not feare it: Doe you not se, that even Beares and Tygres seeme not terrible to those that live with them? How have we seene their Keepers sport with them, when the beholders durst scarce trust their chaine? Be acquainted with Death: though he looke grimme upon you at first, you shall find him (yea you shall make him) a good companion. Familiaritie cannot stand with feare. These are receits enow. Too much store doth rather over-whelme than satisfie. Take but these, and I dare promise you securitie.

THE SECOND DECAD.

To Sir Robert Darcy.

Ep. I. The eſtate of a true, but weake Chriſtian.

B IF you aske how I fare: Sometimes, no man better; and, if the fault were not mine owne, Alwayes. Not that I can command health, and bid the world ſmile when I liſt. How poſſible is it for a man to be happy without theſe; yea, in ſpight of them? Theſe things can neither augment, nor impaire thoſe comforts that come from above. What uſe, what ſight is there of the ſtarres, when the Sunne ſhines? then onely can I find my ſelfe happy, when (over-looking theſe earthly things) I can fetch my joy from heaven. I tell him that knowes it, the contentments that earth can afford her beſt favourites are weake, imperfect, changeable, momentany; and ſuch, as ever end in complaint. We ſorrow that we had them; and, while we have them, we dare not truſt them: Thoſe from above are full, and conſtant. What an heaven doe I feele in my ſelfe, C when (after many traverſes of meditation) I find in my heart a feeling poſſeſſion of my God! When I can walke, and converſe with the God of heaven, not without an openneſſe of heart and familiaritie: When my ſoule hath caught faſt, and ſenſible hold of my Saviour; and either pulls him down to it ſelfe, or rather lifts up it ſelfe to him; and can and dare ſecretly avouch, I know whom I have beleeved: When I can looke upon all this inferiour creation, with the eyes of a ſtranger, and am tranſported to my home in my thoughts; ſolacing my ſelfe in the view and meditation of my future glory, and that preſent of the Saints: When I ſee wherefore I was made, and my conſcience tells me I have done that for which I came; done it, not ſo as I can boaſt, but ſo as it is accepted; while my weakneſſes are pardoned, and my acts meaſured by my deſires, and my deſires by their ſinceritie: Laſtly, when I can D find my ſelfe (upon holy reſolution) made firme and ſquare, fit to entertaine all events; the good with moderate regard, the evill with courage and patience, both with thankes; ſtrongly ſetled to good purpoſes, conſtant and cheerfull in devotion; and, in a word, ready for God, yea, full of God. Somtimes I can be thus, and pity the poore and miſerable proſperitie of the godleſſe; and laugh at their moneths of vanitie, and ſorrow at my owne: But then againe (for why ſhould I ſhame to confeſſe it?) the world thruſts it ſelfe betwixt me and heaven; and, by his darke and indigeſted parts, eclipſeth that light which ſhined to my ſoule. Now, a ſenſeleſſe dulneſſe overtakes me, and beſots me; my luſt to devotion is little, my joy none at all: Gods face is hid, and I am troubled. Then I begin to compare my ſelfe with others, and thinke, Are all men thus blockiſh and earthen? or am I alone worſe than the reſt, and ſingular in my wretchedneſſe? Now I carry my carcaſſe up and downe E careleſly, and (as dead bodies are rubbed, without heat) I doe in vaine force upon my ſelfe delights, which others laugh at: I endevour my wonted worke, but without an heart; there is nothing is not tedious to me, no not my ſelfe.

Thus I am, till I ſingle my ſelfe out alone, to him that alone can revive me: I reaſon with my ſelfe, and conferre with him; I chide my ſelfe, and intreat him: and after ſome ſpirituall ſpeeches interchanged, I renue my familiarity with him; and hee the tokens of his love to me. Loe, then I live againe, and applaud my ſelfe in this happineſſe, and wiſh it might ever continue, and thinke baſely of the world in compariſon of it. Thus I hold on, riſing and falling; neither know, whether I ſhould more praiſe God for thus much fruition of him, or blame my ſelfe for my inconſtancy in good; more rejoyce, that ſomtimes I am well, or grieve that I am not ſo alwaies. I ſtrive, and wiſh, rather than hope, for better. This is our warfare; wee may not looke to triumph alwaies; we muſt ſmart ſomtimes, and complaine; and then againe rejoyce that we can complaine; and grieve that we can rejoyce no more, and that we can grieve no more. Our hope is, if we be patient, we ſhall once be conſtant.

To Sir EDMUND BACON.

EPIST. II. Of the benefit of retiredneſſe and ſecrecy.

SVſpect (if you can) that, becauſe now many cold winds blow betwixt us, my affection can be cooler to you. True love is like a ſtrong ſtreame, which the further it is from the head, runs with more violence. The thoughts of thoſe pleaſures I was wont to find in your preſence, were never ſo delightfull, as now when I am barred from renuing them. I wiſh me with you; yea (if I could or might wiſh to change) I ſhould wiſh me your ſelfe. To live hidden, was never but ſafe, and pleaſant; but now, ſo much better, as the world is worſe. It is a happineſſe, not to be a witneſſe of the miſchiefe of the time; which it is hard to ſee, and be guiltleſſe. Your philoſophicall Cell is a ſafe ſhelter from tumults, from vices, from diſcontentments.

Beſides that lively, honeſt, and manly pleaſure, which ariſes from the gaine of knowledge in the deepe myſteries of Nature; how eaſie is it in that place to live free from the common cares, from the infection of common evils! Whether the Spaniard gaine or ſave by his peace, and how he keepes it; and whether it were ſafer for the States to lay downe armes, and be at once ſtill and free; Whether the Emperors truce with the Turke were honourable and ſeaſonable; and whether Venice have won or loſt by her late jarres; are thoughts that dare not looke in at thoſe doores.

Who is envied, and who pitied at Court; Who buies hopes and kindneſſe deareſt; who laies ſecret mines to blow vp another, that himſelfe may ſucceed, can never trouble you: Theſe cares dare not enter into that Sanctuary of peace. Thence you can ſee how all that live publike are toſſed in theſe waves, and pity them. For, great places have ſeldome ſafe and eaſie entrances: and (which is worſt) great charges can hardly be plauſibly weilded, without ſome indirect policies. Alas! their privileges cannot countervaile their toile. Weary dayes, and reſtleſſe nights, ſhort lifes and long cares, weake bodyes and unquiet mindes, attend lightly on greatneſſe. Either Clients breake their ſleepe in the morning, or the intention of their mind drives it off from the firſt watch. Either ſuits or complaints thruſt themſelves into their recreations; and packets of Letters interrupt their meales. It is ever Terme with them, without Vacation. Their buſineſſes admit no night no holiday: Loe, your privacy frees you from all this, and what ever other glorious miſery. There you may ſleepe, and eat, and honeſtly diſport, and enjoy your ſelfe, and command both your praiſes and others. And whiles you are happy, you live out of the reach of envie; unleſſe my ſelfe ſend that gueſt thither: which I ſhould juſtly condemne as the fault of my love.

No man offers to undermine you, none to diſgrace you: you could not want theſe inconveniences abroad. Yea, let a man live in the open world, but as a looker on, he ſhall be ſure not to want abundance of vexations. An ill mind holds it an eaſie torment, to live in continuall ſight of evill; if not rather a pleaſure: but, to the well diſpoſed, it is next to Hell. Certainly, to live among Toads and Serpents, is a Paradiſe to this. One jeſts pleaſantly with his Maker: another makes himſelfe ſport with Scripture. One fills his mouth with oathes of ſound; another ſcoffes at the religious. One ſpeakes villany; another laughes at it; a third defends it. One makes himſelfe a Swine, another a Devill: Who (that is not all earth) can endure this? who cannot wiſh himſelfe rather a deſolate Hermite, or a cloſe priſoner? Every evill we ſee, doth either vex, or infect vs. Your retiredneſſe avoids this; yet ſo, as it equally

A ly eſcapes all the evills of ſolitarineſſe. You are full of friends; whoſe ſociety, intermixed with your cloſeneſſe, makes you to want little of publike. The Deſert is to wilde, the Citie to populous: the Country is only fit for reſt. I know, there want not ſome obſcure corners, ſo haunted with dulneſſe, that as they yeeld no outward vnquietneſſe, ſo no inward contentment. Yours is none of thoſe; but ſuch as ſtrives rather with the pleaſure of it, to requite the ſolitarineſſe. The Court is for honour, the Citie for gaine, the Country for quietneſſe; a bleſſing that need not (in the judgement of the wiſeſt) yeeld to the other two. Yea, how many have we knowne, that having nothing but a coat of thatch to hide them from heaven, yet have pitied the carefull pompe of the mighty? how much more may thoſe which have full hands and quiet hearts, pitie them both? I doe not ſo much praiſe you in this, as wonder at you. I know many vpon whom the conſcience of their wants forces a neceſſary B obſcuritie; who if they can ſteale a vertue out of neceſſitie, it is well, but, I no where know ſo excellent parts ſhrouded in ſuch willing ſecrecie. The world knowes you, and wants you; and yet you are voluntarily hid. Love your ſelfe ſtill; and make much of this ſhadow, untill our common mother call you forth to her neceſſary ſeruice, and charge you to neglect your ſelfe, to pleaſure her. Which once done, you know where to find peace. Whether others applaud you, I am ſure, you ſhall your ſelfe: and I ſhall ſtill magnifie you, and (what I can) imitate you.

I Know not whether this quarell be worthy of an anſwer, or rather of a ſilent ſcorne; or if an anſwer, whether merry or ſerious. I doe not willingly ſuffer my pen to wade into queſtions: yet this argument ſeemes ſhallow enough for an Epiſtle. If I free not this truth, let me be puniſhed with a diuorce. Some idle table-talke cals vs to plead for our wives. Perhaps ſome Gallants grudge vs one, who can be content to allow themſelves more. If they thought wives curſes, they would afford them vs. Our mariage is cenſured (I ſpeake boldly) of none but them which never knew to live chaſtly in mariage; who never knew that * Canoniſts true diſtinction of Virginity. What care we for their cenſure, where God approves? But ſome D perhaps maintaine it out of judgement: Bid them make much of that which Paul tels them, is a doctrine of dewils. Were it not for this opinion, the Church of Rome would want one evident brand of her Antichriſtianiſme. Let their ſhavelings ſpeake for themſelves; vpon whom their unlawfull Vow hath forced a wilfull and impoſſible neceſſitie. I leave them to ſcanne the old rule of In turpi voto muta decretum; if they had not rather, Caute ſi non caſtè. Even moderate Papiſts will grant vs free, becauſe not bound by Vow; no, not ſo farre as thoſe old Germans, pro poſſe & noſſe. Or what care we, if they grant it not? while we hold vs firme to that ſure rule of Baſil the great; * He that forbids what God injoynes, or injoynes what God forbids, let him be accurſed. I paſſe not what I heare men, or Angells ſay, while I heare God ſay, Let him be the husband of one wife. That one word ſhall confirme me againſt E the barking of all impure mouthes. He that made mariage, ſayes, it is honourable: what care we for the diſhonour of thoſe that corrupt it? yea, that which nature noteth with ſhame, God mentions with honour, [a] πως ου νοιν; [b] Gregory with the title of opus caſtum; Paphnutius, of σωφροσυνη, chaſtitie. But if God ſhould be Judge of this controverſie, it were ſoone at an end; who in the time even of that legall ſtrictneſſe, allowed wedlock to the Miniſters of his Sanctuary. God never impoſed this law of Continence: who then? [e] The Church. As if a good ſpouſe would gain-ſay what her husband willeth. But how well? heare O ye Papiſts, the judgement of your owne Cardinall; and confeſſe your mouthes ſtopped. [f] But I believe (ſaith he) it were for the good and ſafety of many ſoules, and would be an wholeſome law, that thoſe which would, might marry; for that, as experience teacheth us, a contrary effect followes upon that law of Continency; ſince at this day they live not ſpiritually, neither are cleane, but are defiled with unlawfull copulation, to their great ſinne: whereas with their owne wife it might be chaſtitie. Is this a Cardinall, thinke you, or a Huguenot? upon great reaſon was taken from the Clergie; but upon greater reaſon is to be reſtored. What need we other Judge? How juſt this law is, you ſee; ſee now how ancient: For ſome doctrines have nothing to plead for them, but Time. Age hath been an old refuge for falſhood. Tertullians rule is true; That which is firſt, is trueſt. What the ancient Jewiſh Prelates did, Moſes is cleare. What did the Apoſtles? Doth not [h] Paul tell us, that both the reſt of the Apoſtles, and the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas, had wives, and (which is more) carried them ſtill along in their travels? For that childiſh eluſion of [i] ἀδελφὴν γυναῖκα who can abide, but to laugh at? Doth not [k] Clemens of Alexandria (a Father not of more antiquitie, than credit) tell us, that Peter, Philip, and Paul himſelfe, were married? And this laſt (though unlikeſt) how is it confirmed by Ignatius, in his Epiſtle to the Philadelphians? Yea, their owne Cardinall, learned [l] Cajetane, doth both avouch and evince it. This was their practiſe: what was their Conſtitution? Looke in theſe Canons which the Romiſh Church fathers upon the Apoſtles, and Franciſcus Turrian their Jeſuit ſweats to defend it in a whole Volumne: There you find, Canon, 5. enacted, that [m] no Biſhop, Presbyter, Deacon, ſhall forſake his wife (προφάσει εὐλαβείας) in pretenſe of Religion, upon paine of depoſition. It would move laughter, to ſee how the Jeſuits gnaw upon this bone, and ſucke in nothing but the bloud of their owne jawes; [n] while the ſixt generall Councell averres and proclaimes this ſenſe truly Apoſtolicall, in ſpight of all contradiction.

Follow the times now, and deſcend lower; What did the Ages ſucceeding? Search Records: What-ever ſome palpably-foiſted Epiſtles of Popes inſinuate, they married without ſcruple of any contrary injunction. Many of thoſe Ancients admired Virginitie, but impoſed it not. Amongſt the reſt, [o] Origen (though himſelfe a wilfull Eunuch) is faine to perſwade the ſonnes of Clergy men, not to be proud of D their parentage. After this, when the Fathers of the Nicene Councell went about to enact a law of Continency, Socrates the Hiſtorian expreſſes it thus: [p] It ſeemeth good (ſaith he) to the Biſhops to bring in a new law into the Church. It was then new, and they but would have brought it in; therfore before, it was not: where we know how Paphnutius, himſelfe a Virgin, famous for holineſſe, famous for miracles, riſing (ἐξαναστὰς) cryed aloud, that they ought not to lay this (βαρὺζυγον) heavie yoke, upon men of the Church. His arguments wanne aſſent. He ſpake and prevailed. So this liberty was ſtill continued and affirmed. If this be not plaine enough, [q] holy Athanaſius, a witneſſe paſt exception, ſhall ſerve for a thouſand hiſtories till his Age.

you have [f] Numidicus the Martyr, a married Presbyter; [t] Cheremon of Nilus, a married Bishop; [u] Demetrianus Bishop of Antioch, whose sonne Domnus succeeded Paulus Samosatenus; Philoromus and Phileas BB. of the Thimnites; Gabinius brother of Eutichianus BB. of Rome; the father of Nazianzene, Basil, and the other [x] Gregory, Hillarius, and that good Spiridion Bishop of Cyprus, of whom Sozomen gives so direct testimony. To omit others, what should I speake of many Bishops of Rome, whose sonnes not spurious, as now-adayes, but (as Pope Vrban himselfe witnesses) [z] lawfully begot in wedlocke, followed their fathers in the Pontificiall chaire. [a] The reason whereof, that Pope himselfe ingenuously rendreth; for that marriage was every where lawfull to the Clergy before the prohibition (which must needs be late) and in the Easterne Church to this day is allowed. What need we more testimonies, or more examples? What ever [b] Heliodorus, B. of Trica (a man fitter for a wanton love-story, than a Church Controversie) brought into the Church of Thessalia, Socrates thus flatly writes of those Bishops of his time: [c] For many of them in the place and function of Bishops, beget children of their lawfull wives. This was practised: See what was decreed in that sixt generall [d] Councell of Constantinople, to this purpose, to the confusion of all replyers. If any Protestant Church in Christendome can make a more peremptory, more full and absolute, more cautelous decree, for the marriage of Ecclesiasticall persons, let me be condemned as faithlesse: A place, I grant, miserably handled by our Adversaries; and because they cannot blemish it enough, indignly torne out of the Councels. What dare not impudency doe? *Against all evidences of Greeke Copies, against their owne Gratian, against pleas of antiquitie. This is the readiest way; Whom they cannot answer, to burne; what they cannot shift off, to blot out; and to cut the knot which they cannot untie. The Romanists of the next Age were somewhat more equall: who, seeing themselves pressed with so flat a Decree, confirmed by authoritie of Emperours, as would abide no denyall, began to distinguish upon the point; limiting this libertie onely to the Easterne Church, and granting that all the Clergie of the East might marry, not theirs. So Pope Steven the second, freely confesses: [e] The tradition (saith he) of the Easterne Churches is otherwise than that of the Romane Church. For, their Priests, Deacons, or Subdeacons are married; but in this Church or the Westerne, no one of the Clergie, from the Subdeacon to the Bishop, have leave to marry.

Liberally; but not enough: and if he yeeld this, why not more? Shall that be lawfull in the East, which in the West is not? Doe the Gospels, or lawes of equity alter according to the foure corners of the world? Doth God make difference betwixt Greece and England? If it be lawfull, why not every where? If unlawfull, why is it done any where? So then you see, we differ not from the Church in this; but from the Romish Church: But this sacred Councell doth not onely universally approve this practice (with pain of deposition to the gain-sayers) but avouches it for a Decree Apostolicall. Judge now whether this one authoritie be not enough to weigh downe an hundred petty conventicles, and many legions (if there had beene many) of private contradictions. Thus, for seven hundred yeares, you find nothing but open freedome: All the scuffling arose in the eight Age; wherein yet this violent imposition found many and learned Adversaries, and durst not be obtruded at once. Loe, even then, Gregory the third, writing to the Bishops of Bavaria, gives this disjunct charge; [f] Let none keepe an harlot or a concubine: but either let him live chastely, or marry a wife, whom it shall not be lawfull for him to forsake: According to that rule of Clerkes, cited from [g] Isidore, and renewed in the [h] Councell of Mentz, to the perpetuall shame of our jugling Adversaries. Nothing can argue guiltinesse so much, as unjuſt expurgations. [i] Iſidore ſaith, Let them containe, or let them marry but one: They cite him, Let them containe; and leave out the reſt: ſomewhat worſe than the Devill cited Scripture. But, I might have ſpared all this labour of writing, could I perſwade whoſoever either doubts, or denies this, to read over that one Epiſtle which [k] Huldericus BB. of Auſpurge wrote learnedly, and vehemently, to Pope Nicholas the firſt, in this ſubject: which if it doe not anſwer all cavils, and ſatisfie all Readers, and convince all (not wilfull) adverſaries, let me be caſt, in ſo juſt a cauſe. There you ſhall ſee, how juſt, how expedient, how ancient this liberty is; together with the feeble and injurious grounds of forced Continency: Read it, and ſee whether you can deſire a better Advocate. After him (ſo ſtrongly did he plead, and ſo happily) for two hundred yeares more, this freedome ſtill bleſſed thoſe parts; yet, not without extreme oppoſition. Hiſtories are witneſſes of the buſie, and not unlearned combats of thoſe times, in this Argument. But now, when the body of Antichriſtianiſme began to be compleat, and to ſtand up in his abſolute ſhape, after a thouſand yeares from Chriſt; this liberty which before wavered under Nicholas 1. now by the hands of Leo 9. Nicholas 2. and that brand of hell, Gregory 7. was utterly ruined, wives debarred, ſingle life urged: [l] A good turne for whoremaſters (ſaith Aventine) who now for one wife might have ſix hundred Bed-fellowes.

But, how approved of the better ſort appeares (beſides that the Churches did ring of him each where for Antichriſt) in that at the [m] Councell of Wormes the French and German Biſhops depoſed this Gregory, in this name (amongſt other quarrels) for [n] ſeparating man and wife. Violence did this; not reaſon: neither was Gods will here queſtioned, but the Popes wilfulneſſe. What broiles hereon enſued, let [o] Aventine witneſſe.

The bickerings of our Engliſh Clergie, with their Dunſtanes, about this time, are memorable in our owne Hiſtories, which teach us how late, how repiningly, how unjuſtly, they ſtooped under this yoake. I had rather ſend my Reader to Bale and Fox, than abridge their Monuments, to enlarge mine owne.

I have (I hope) fetcht this truth farre enough; and deduced it low enough through many Ages, to the midſt of the rage of Antichriſtian tyranny. There left our liberty; there began their bondage. Our liberty is happily renewed with the Goſpell: what God, what his Church hath ever allowed, we doe enjoy. Wherein we are not alone: The Greeke Church, as large for extent as the Roman (and, in ſome parts of it, better for their ſoundneſſe) doe thus; and thus have ever done.

Let Papiſts and Atheiſts ſay what they will: it is ſafe erring with God and his purer Church.

EPIST. IV. Of the ſorrow not to be repented of.

IT is ſeldome ſeene, that a ſilent griefe ſpeeds well: for either a man muſt have ſtrong hands of reſolution to ſtrangle it in his boſome; or elſe it drives him to ſome ſecret miſchiefe: whereas ſorrow revealed is halfe remedied, and ever abates in the uttering. Your griefe was wiſely diſcloſed; and ſhall be as ſtrangely anſwered. I am glad of your ſorrow; and ſhould weepe for you, if you did not thus mourne. Your ſorrow is, that you cannot enough grieve for your ſinnes. Let mee tell you, that the Angels themſelves ſing as this lamentation; neither doth the earth afford any ſo ſweet muſicke in the eares of God. This heavineſſe is the way to joy. Worldly ſorrow is worthy of pitie, becauſe it leadeth to death: but this deſerves nothing but envie and gratulation. If thoſe teares were common, hell would not ſo enlarge enlarge it ſelfe. Never ſin, repented of, was puniſhed: and never any thus mourned, and repented not. Loe you have done that, which you grieve you have not done. That good God, whoſe act is his will, accounts of our will, as our deed. If he required ſorrow proportionable to the hainouſneſſe of our ſins, there were no end of mourning. Now his mercy regards not ſo much the meaſure, as the truth of it; and accounts us to have that which we complaine to want. I never knew any truly penitent, which in the depth of his remorſe, was afraid of ſorrowing too much; nor any unrepentant, which wiſht to ſorrow more. Yea, let me tell you, that this ſorrow is better and more than that deepe heavineſſe for ſin, which you deſire. Many have been vexed with an extreme remorſe for ſome ſin, from the gripes of a galled conſcience, which yet never came where true repentance grew; in whom the conſcience plaies at once the accuſer, witneſſe, Judge, tormentor: but an earneſt griefe, for the want of griefe, was never found in any but a gracious heart. You are happie, and complaine. Tell me, I beſeech you; This ſorrow which you mourne to want, is it a grace of the Spirit of God; or not? If not, why doe you ſorrow to want it? If it be, oh how happie is it to grieve for want of grace! The God of all truth and bleſſedneſſe hath ſaid, Bleſſed are thoſe that hunger and thirſt after righteouſneſſe; and with the ſame breath, Bleſſed are they that mourne: for, they ſhall be comforted. You ſay, you mourne; Chriſt ſaith, you are bleſſed: you ſay, you mourne; Chriſt ſaith, you ſhall be comforted. Either now diſtruſt your Saviour, or elſe confeſſe your happineſſe, and with patience expect his promiſed conſolation. What doe you feare? you ſee others ſtand like ſtrong Oakes, unſhaken, unremoved: you are but a reed, a feeble plant, toſſed and bowed with every wind, and with much agitation bruiſed; Loe, you are in tender and favourable hands, that never brake any, whom their ſins bruiſed; never bruiſed any, whom temptations have bowed. You are but flax; and your beſt is not a flame, but an obſcure ſmoake of grace: Lo, here his ſpirit is as a ſoft wind, not as cold water; he wil kindle, will never quench you. The ſorrow you want, is his gift: take heed leſt while you vex your ſelfe with diſlike of the meaſure, you grudge at the giver. Beggers may not chuſe. This portion he hath vouchſafed to give you; if you have any, it is more than he was bound to beſtow: yet you ſay, What, no more? as if you tooke it unkindly, that he is no more liberall. Even theſe holy diſcontentments are dangerous. Deſire more (ſo much as you can) but repine not, when you doe not attaine. Deſire, but ſo as you be free from impatience, free from unthankfulneſſe. Thoſe that have tried, can ſay how difficult it is to complaine, with due reſervation of thanks. Neither know I whether is worſe, To long for good things impatiently, or not at all to deſire them. The fault of your ſorrow is rather in your conceit, than in it ſelfe. And, if indeed you mourne not enough, ſtay but Gods leiſure, & your eyes ſhall run over with teares. How many doe you ſee ſport with their ſins, yea, brag of thē? how many that ſhould die for want of paſtime, if they might not ſin freely, and more freely talke of it? What a Saint are you to theſe, that can droop under the memory of the frailty of youth, and never think you have ſpent enow teares! Yet ſo I encourage you in what you have, as one that perſwades you not to deſiſt from ſuing for more. It is good to be covetous of grace, and to have our deſires herein enlarged with our receits. Weepe ſtill, and ſtill deſire to weepe: but let your teares be as the raine in a ſun-ſhine; comfortable and hopefull: and let not your longing ſavour of murmur, or diſtruſt. Theſe teares are reſerved; this hunger ſhall be ſatisfied; this ſorrow ſhall be comforted: There is nothing betwixt God and you, but time. Preſcribe not to his wiſedome: haſten not his mercy. His grace is enough for you: his glory ſhall be more than enough.

To M. Hugh Cholmley.

Ep. V. Concerning the Metaphraſe of the Pſalmes.

FEare not my immoderate ſtudies. I have a body that controls me enough in theſe courſes; my friends need not. There is nothing whereof I could ſooner ſurfet, if I durſt neglect my body to ſatisfie my mind: but whiles I affect knowledge, ledge, my weakneſſe checks me, and ſayes, Better a little learning than no health. I yeeld, and patiently abide my ſelfe debarred of my choſen felicity. The little I can get, I am no niggard of: neither am I more deſirous to gather, than willing to impart. The full handed are commonly moſt ſparing. We veſſels, that have any empty roome, anſwer the leaſt knock, with a hollow noyſe: you, that are full, ſound not. If we pardon your cloſeneſſe, you may well beare with our profuſion. If there be any wrong, it is to our ſelves, that we utter what we ſhould lay up. It is a pardonable fault, to doe leſſe good to our ſelves, that we may doe more to others. Amongſt other endevours, I have boldly undertaken the holy Metres of David; how happily, judge you by what you ſee. There is none of all my labours ſo open to all cenſures: none whereof I would ſo willingly heare the verdit of the wiſe and judicious. Perhaps ſome think the verſe harſh; whoſe nice eare regards roundneſſe more than ſenſe. I embrace ſmoothneſſe, but affect it not. This is the leaſt good qualitie of a verſe; that intends any thing but muſicall delight. Others may blame the difficulty of the tunes: whoſe humour cannot be pleaſed without a greater offence. For, to ſay truth; I never could ſee good verſe written in the wonted meaſures. I ever thought them moſt eaſie, and leaſt Poeticall. This fault (if any) will light upon the negligence of our people; which endure not to take paines for any fit varietie. The French and Dutch have given us worthie examples of diligence, and exquiſitneſſe in this kind. Neither our eares nor voices are leſſe tunable. Here is nothing wanting, but will to learne. What is this, but to eat the corne out of the eare, becauſe we will not abide the labour to grind, and knead it? If the queſtion be, whether our verſe muſt deſcend to them; or they aſcend to it; wiſe moderation I think would determine it moſt equall, that each part ſhould remit ſomewhat, and both meet in the midſt. Thus I have endevoured to doe, with ſincere intent of their good, rather than my owne applauſe. For it had been eaſie to have reached to an higher ſtraine: but I durſt not; whether for the grave Majeſtie of the ſubject, or benefit of the ſimpleſt Reader. You ſhall ſtill note, that I have laboured to keepe Davids entire ſenſe, with numbers neither loftie nor ſlubbered: which meane is ſo much more difficult to find, as the buſineſſe is more ſacred, and the libertie leſſe. Many great wits have undertaken this taske; which yet have either not effected it, or have ſmothered it in their private desks, and denied it the common light. Amongſt the reſt, were thoſe to rare ſpirits of the Sidneyes; to whom, Poeſie was as naturall as it is affected of others: and our worthy friend M. Sylveſter, hath ſhewed me, how happily he hath ſometimes turned from his Bartas, to the ſweet ſinger of Iſrael. It could not be, that in ſuch abundant plentie of Poeſie, this worke ſhould have paſt unattempted: would God I might live to ſee it perfected; either by my owne hand, or a better. In the meane time, let me expect your impartiall ſentence, both concerning the forme and ſenſe. Lay aſide your love, for a while; which too oft blinds judgment. And as it uſes to be done in moſt equall proceedings of juſtice, ſhut me out of dores while my verſe is diſcuſſed: yea, let me receive not your cenſure onely, but others by you: this once (as you love me) play both the Informer and the Judge. Whether you allow it, you ſhall incourage me; or correct, you ſhall amend me. Either your ſtarres, or your ſpits, (that I may uſe Origens notes) ſhall be welcome to my margent. It ſhall be happy for us, if God ſhall make our poore labours any way ſerviceable to his Name and Church.

EPIST. VI. A Preface to his Relation of the Ruſſian affaires.

TRavell perfiteth wiſedome; and obſervation gives perfection to travell: without which a man may pleaſe his eyes, not feed his brain; and after much earth meaſured, ſhall returne with a weary body, and an emptie mind. Home is more ſafe, more pleaſant, but leſſe fruitfull of experience: But to a mind not working & diſcurſive, all heavens, all earths are alike. And, as the end of travell is obſervation, so the end of observation is the informing of others: for, what is our knowledge if smothered in our selves, so as it is not known to more? Such secret delight can content none but an envious nature. You have breathed many and cold ayres, gone farre, seene much, heard more, observed all. These two yeares you have spent in imitation of Nabuchadnezzars seven; conversing with such creatures as Paul fought with at Ephesus. Alas! what a face, yea what a back of a Church have you seene? what manners? what people? Amongst whom ignorant superstition strives with close Atheisme, treachery with crueltie, one Devill with another; while Truth and Vertue doe not so much as give any challenge of resistance. Returning once to our England after this experience, I imagine you doubted whether you were on earth, or in heaven. Now then (if you will heare me, whom you were wont) as you have observed what you have seene, and written what you have observed; so, publish what you have written: It shall be a gratefull labour, to us, to posterity. I am deceived, if the fickleness of the Russian state, have not yeelded more memorable matter of history than any other in our age, or perhaps many centuries of our predecessors. How shall I thinke, but that God sent you thither before these broiles, to be the witnesse, the register of so famous mutations? He loves to have those just evills which he doth in one part of the world, knowne to the whole, and those evills, which men doe in the night of their secrecy, brought forth into the Theater of the World; that the evill of mens sinne being compared with the evill of his punishment; may justifie his proceedings; and condemne theirs. Your work shall thus honor him, besides your second service, in the benefit of the Church. For, whiles you discourse of the open tyranny of that Russian Nero Iohn Basilius; the more secret, no lesse bloody plots of Boris; the ill successe of a stolne Crowne, tho set upon the head of an harmelesse Sonne; the bold attempts and miserable end of a false, yet aspiring challenge; the perfidiousnesse of a servile people, unworthy of better governors; the miscariage of wicked governors, unworthy of better subjects; the unjust usurpations of men, just (tho late) revenges of God, cruelty rewarded with blood, wrong claimes with overthrow, treacherie with bondage; the Reader, with some secret horror, shall draw-in delight, and with delight instruction: Neither know I any Relation whence he shall take out a more easie lesson of justice, of loyalty, of thankfullnesse.

But above all, let the world see and commiserate the hard estate of that worthy and noble Secretary, Buchinski. Poore gentleman! his distresse recals ever to my thoughts Æsops Storke, taken amongst the Cranes: He now nourishes his haire, under the displeasure of a forraine Prince; At once in durance and banishment. He served an ill master; but, with an honest heart, with cleane hands. The matters injustice doth no more infect a good servant, than the truth of the servant can justifie his ill master. A bad worke-man may use a good instrument: and oft-times a cleane napkin wipeth a foule mouth. It joyes me yet to think, that his piety, as it ever held friendship in heaven, so now it wins him friends in this our other world: Lo, even from our Iland unexpected deliverance takes a long flight, and blesseth him beyond hope: yea rather, from heaven, by vs. That God, whom he serves, will be knowne to those rude and scarce humane Christians, for a protector of innocence, a favourer of truth a rewarder of piety: The mercy of our gratious King, the compassion of an honourable Councellor, the love of a true friend, and (which wrought all, and set all on work) the grace of our good God, shall now loose those bonds, and give a glad welcome to his liberty, and a willing farwell to his distresse. He shall (I hope) live to acknowledge this; in the meane time, I doe for him. Those Russian affaires are not more worthy of your records, than your love to this friend is worthy of mine. For neither could this large sea drowne or quench it, nor time and absence (which are wont to breed a lingring consumption of friendship) abate the heat of that affection which his kindnesse breed, religion nourished. Both rareness, and worth shall commend this true-love; which (to say true) hath been now long out of fashion. Never times yeelded more love; but, not more subtle. For, every man loves himselfe in another, loves the estate in the person: Hope of advantage is the load stone that drawes the iron hearts of men; not vertue, not desert. No age afforded more parasites, fewer friends: The moſt are friendly in ſight, ſerviceable in expectation, hollow in love, truſtleſſe in experience. Yet now, Buchinski, ſee and confeſſe thou haſt found one friend; which hath made thee many: on whom while thou beſtowedſt much favour, thou haſt loſt none. I cannot but think how welcome, Liberty (which tho late, yet now at laſt hath lookt back upon him) ſhall be to the Cell of his affliction; when ſmiling upon him, ſhe ſhall lead him by the hand, and (like another Angell) open the iron gates of his miſerable captivitie, and (from thoſe hard Preſtaves and ſavage Chriſtians) carry him by the haire of the head, into this paradiſe of God. In the meane time, I have written to him as I could, in a known language, with an unknown hand; that my poore Letters of gratulation might ſerve as humble attendants to greater.

For your work, I wiſh it but ſuch glad entertainment, as the profit, yea the delight of it deſerves; and feare nothing, but that this long delay of publication will make it ſcarce newes. We are all growne Athenians, and account a ſtrange report like to a fiſh and a gueſt. Thoſe eyes and hands ſtaid it, which might doe it beſt. I cannot blame you, if you think it more honoured by the ſtay of his gracious peruſall, than it could be by the earthly acceptation of the world. Even the caſt garments of Princes are precious. Others have in part prevented you; whoſe labours, to yours, are but as an Echo to a long period: by whom, we heare the laſt ſound of theſe ſtirres, ignorant of the beginning. They give us but a taſte in their hand: you lead us to the open fountaine. Let the Reader give you but as much thank, as you give him ſatisfaction; you ſhall deſire no more.

Finally, God give vs much good uſe, as knowledge of his judgements; the world, helpe of your labours; your ſelfe, incouragement; Buchinski, libertie.

To Staniſlaus Buchinski, late Secretary to Demetrius Emp. of Ruſſia.

EPIST. VII. Of the comfort of Impriſonment.

THe knowledge, that the eye gives of the face alone, is ſhallow, uncertaine, imperfect. For what is it, to ſee the utmoſt skin, or favour of the viſage; changeable with diſeaſe, changeable with paſſion? The eare (me thinks) doth both moſt clearly diſcloſe the minds of others, and knit them faſter to ours: which, as it is the ſenſe of diſcipline, ſo of friendſhip, commanding it even to the abſent, and in the preſent cheriſhing it. This thing we have lately proved in your ſelfe, moſt noble Staniſlaus: neerer examples we might have had; better we could not. How many, how excellent things have we heard of you, from our common friend, though moſt yours, which have eaſily won our beleefe, our affections! How oft, how honourable mention hath he made of your name! How frequently, how fervently have we wiſht you, both ſafetie and libertie! And now, loe where ſhe comes, as the Greeks ſay, ἀπὸ μηχανῆς, and viſits her forlorne Client. Although I would not doubt to ſay, that this outward durance of the body, hath ſeemed more harſh to the beholders, than to your ſelfe, a wiſe man, (which is more) a Chriſtian; whoſe free ſoule, in the greateſt ſtraits of the outward man, flies over Seas and Lands whither it liſteth; neither can, by any diſtance of place, nor ſwelling of waves, nor height of mountaines, nor violence of enemies, nor ſtrong barres, nor walls, nor guards, be reſtrained from what place it ſelfe hath choſen. Loe, that enjoyes God, enjoyes it ſelfe and his friends; and ſo feeds it ſelf with the pleaſure of enjoying thē, that it eaſily either forgets or contemnes all other things. It is no Paradox, to ſay, that A wiſe Chriſtian cannot be impriſoned, cānot be baniſhed: He is ever at home, ever free. For, both his liberty is within him, and his home is univerſall. And what is it, I beſeech you (for you have tryed) that makes a priſon? Is it ſtraitneſſe of walls? Then you have as many fellowes, as there are men. For, how is the ſoule of every man pent within theſe clay walls of the body, more cloſe, more obſcure! whence ſhee may looke oft, thorow the grates of her buſie thoughts; but, but, is never releaſed in ſubſtance, till that God, who gave us our Mittimus into this Gaole, give us our Delivery, with Returne ye ſonnes of Adam: Thus either all men are priſoners, or you are none. Is it reſtraint? How many (eſpecially of that other ſex in thoſe your Eaſterne parts) chamber up themſelves, for ſtate; ſo as they neither ſee the Sunne, nor others them? How many ſuperſtitious men, for devotion; how many obſcure Aglai, for eaſe and careleſneſſe, keepe themſelves in their owne cottage, in their owne village; and never walke forth ſo much as to the neighbour townes? And what is your Ruſſia to all her inhabitants, but a large priſon, a wide Galley? yea, what other is the world to us? How can he complaine of ſtraitneſſe, or reſtraint, that roves over all the world, and beyond it? Tyrannie may part the ſoule from the body; cannot confine it to the body. That which others doe for eaſe, devotion, ſtate, you doe for neceſſitie: why not as willingly, ſince you muſt doe it? Doe but imagine the other cauſe; and your caſe is the ſame with theirs which both have choſen, and delight to keepe cloſe; yet hating the name of priſoners, while they embrace the condition. But, why doe I perſwade you, not to miſlike that, which I pray you may forſake? I had rather you ſhould be no priſoner at all, than to be a cheerefull priſoner upon neceſſitie. If the doores be open, my perſwaſion ſhall not hold you in. Rather our prayes ſhall open thoſe doores, and fetch you forth into this common libertie of men; which alſo hath not a little (though an inferiour) contentment. For, how pleaſant is it to theſe ſenſes, by which we men are wont to be led, to ſee and be ſeene, to ſpeake to our friends, and heare them ſpeake to us; to touch and Kiſſe the deare hands of our Parents, and with them at laſt to have our eyes cloſed? Either this ſhall befall you; or what hopes, what paines (I adde no more) hath this your carefull friend loſt? and we, what wiſhes, what conſultations? It ſhall be; I dare hope, yea beleeve it: Onely thou our good God give ſuch end, as thou haſt done entrance into this buſineſſe; and ſo diſpoſe of theſe likely endevours, that whom we love and honour abſent, we may at laſt in preſent ſee and embrace.

To my father in Law, M. G. Wenyſſe.

EPIST. VIII. Exciting to Chriſtian cheerefulneſſe.

YOu complaine of dulneſſe; a common diſeaſe, and incident to the beſt minds, and ſuch as can moſt contemne vanities. For, the true Worldling hunts after nothing but mirth; neither cares how lawleſſe his ſport be, ſo it be pleaſant: he faines to himſelfe falſe delights, when he wants: and if he can paſſe the time, and chaſe away Melancholie, he thinks his day ſpent happily. And thus it muſt needs be; while the world is his god, his devotion can be but his pleaſure: whereas the mortified ſoule, hath learned to ſcorne theſe frivolous and ſinfull joyes; and affects either ſolid delights, or none; and had rather be dull for want of mirth, than tranſported with wanton pleaſures. When the world, like an important Minſtrell, thruſts it ſelfe into his chamber, and offers him muſicke, unſought; if he vouchſafe it the hearing, it is the higheſt favour he dare, or can yeeld: He rewards it not, he commends it not: Yea, he ſecretly lothes thoſe harſh and jarring notes, and rejects them. For, he finds a better conſort within, betwixt God and himſelfe, when he hath a little tuned his heart with meditation. To ſpeake fully, the World is like an ill foole in a Play: the Chriſtian is a judicious ſpectator, which thinks thoſe jeſts to groſſe to be laught at; and therefore entertaines that with ſcorne, which others with applauſe. Yet in truth, we ſinne, if we rejoyce not: there is not more error in falſe mirth, than in unjuſt heavineſſe. If worldlings offend, that they laugh, when they ſhould mourne; we ſhall offend no leſſe, if we droope in cauſe of cheerefulneſſe. Shall we envie, or ſcorne, to ſee one joy in red and white droſſe, another in a vaine title; one in a daintie diſh, another in a jeſt; one in a booke, another in a friend; one in a Kite, another in a Dogge; whiles we enjoy the God of Heaven, and are ſorrowfull? What dull metall is this we are made of? We have the fountaine of joy, and yet complaine of heavineſſe. Is there any joy, without God? Certainly, if joy be good, and all goodneſſe be from him; whence ſhould joy ariſe, but from him? And if he be the author of joy; how are we Chriſtians, and rejoyce not? What? do we freeze in the fire, and ſtarve at a feaſt? Have we a good conſcience, and yet pine and hang downe the head? When God hath made us happy, doe we make our ſelves miſerable? When I aske my heart Davids queſtion, I know not whether I be more angry or aſhamed at the anſwer; why art thou ſad my ſoule? My body, my purſe, my fame, my friends; or perhaps none of theſe onely I am ſad, becauſe I am. And what if all theſe? what if more? when I come to my better wits, Have I a father, an advocate, a comforter, a manſion in heaven? If both earth and hell conſpired to afflict me, my ſorrow cannot countervaile the cauſes of my joy. Now I can challenge all adverſaries; and either defie all miſeries, or bid all croſſes, yea death it ſelfe, welcome. Yet God doth not abridge us of theſe earthly ſolaces, which dare weigh with our diſcontentments, and ſometime depreſſe the balance. His greater light doth not extinguiſh the leſſe. If God had not thought them bleſſings, he had not beſtowed them: and how are they bleſſings, if they delight us not? Bookes, friends, wine, oyle, health, reputation, competencie, may give occaſions, but not bounds, to our rejoycings. We may not make them Gods rivalls, but his ſpokes-men. In themſelves they are nothing; but in God worth our joy. Theſe may be vſed; yet ſo as they may be abſent without diſtraction. Let theſe goe; ſo God alone be preſent with us, it is enough. He were not God, if he were not All-ſufficient. We have him, I ſpeak boldly; We have him in feeling, in faith, in pledges, and earneſt; yea, in poſſeſſion. Why doe we not enjoy him? why doe we not ſhake-off that ſenſeleſſe drowſineſſe, which makes our lives unpleaſant; and leave over all heavineſſe to thoſe that want God; to thoſe that either know him not, or know him diſpleaſed?

To M. W. R. Dedic. to M. Thomas Burlz.

EPIST. IX. Conſolations of immoderate griefe for the death of friends.

WHile the ſtream of ſorrow runs ful, I know how vaine it is to oppoſe counſell. Paſſions muſt have leaſure to digeſt. VViſdome doth not more moderate them, than time. At firſt, it was beſt to mourne with you, and to mitigate your ſorrow, by bearing part; wherein, wou'd God my burden could be your eaſe. Every thing elſe is leſſe, when it is divided; And then is beſt, after teares, to give counſell: yet, in theſe thoughts I am not a little ſtraited. Before you have digeſted griefe, advice comes too early; too late, when you have digeſted it. Before, it was unſeaſonable; after, would be ſuperfluous: Before, it could not benefit you: after, it may hurt you, by rubbing up a skinned ſore a freſh. It is as hard to chooſe the ſeaſon for counſell, os to give it: and that ſeaſon is, after the firſt digeſtion of ſorrow; before the laſt. If my Letters then meet with the beſt opportunitie, they ſhall pleaſe me, and profit you: If not, yet I deſerve pardon, that I wiſhed ſo. You had but two Jewels, which you held precious; a VVife, and a Sonne: One was your ſelfe divided; the other, your ſelfe multiplied: You have loſt both, and well-neere at once. The loſſe of one cauſed the other, and both of them your juſt griefe. Such loſſes, when they come ſingle, afflict us; but, when double, aſtoniſh us; and tho they give advantage of reſpite, would almoſt over-whelme the beſt patient. Lo, now is the tryall of our man-hood, yea, of our Chriſtianitie: You are now in the liſts, ſet upon by two of Gods fierce afflictions; ſhew now what patience you have, what fortitude. Wherefore have you gathered, and laid up all this time, but for this brunt? Now bring forth all your holy ſtore to light, and to vſe; and approve to us in this difficultie, that you have all this while beene a Chriſtian inearneſt. I know, theſe events have not ſurpriſed yon on a ſudden: you have ſuſpected they might come; you have put-caſes if they ſhould come. Things that are hazardous, may be doubted: but certaine things are, and muſt be expected. Providence abates griefe, and diſcountenances a croſſe. Or, if your affection were ſo ſtrong, that you durſt not fore-thinke your loſſe; take it equally but as it falls. A wiſe man and a Chriſtian knowes death ſo fatall to Nature,

ſo

A so ordinary in event, so gainfull in the issue, that I wonder he can for this either feare or grieve. Doth God onely lend us one another, and doe we grudge when he calls for his owne? So I have seene ill debtors that borrow with prayers, keepe with thanks, repay with enmitie. We mistake our tenure: we take that for gift, which God intends for loane; We are tenants at will, and thinke our selves owners. Your wife and child are dead: Well, they have done that for which they came.

If they could not have dyed, it had beene worthy of wonder; not at all, that they are dead. If this condition were proper onely to our families, and friends, or yet to our climate alone; how unhappy should we seeme to our neighbours, to our selves!
B Now it is common, let us mourne that we are men. Loe, all Princes and Monarchs daunce with us in the same ring: yea, what speak I of earth? The God of Nature, the Saviour of men, hath trod the same steps of death; And doe we think much to follow him? How many servants have we knowne, that have thrust themselves betwixt their Master and death; which have dyed, that their Master might not dye: and shall we repine to die with ours? How truly may we say of this our David, Thou art worth ten thousand of us; yea, worth a world of Angels: yet he dyed, and dyed for us. Who would live, that knowes his Saviour died? who can be a Christian, and would not be like him? Who can be like him, that would not die after him? Thinke of this, and iudge whether all the world can hire us not to die. I need not aske you whether you loved those whom you have lost: Could you love them, and not wish they might be happy? Could they be happy, and not dye? In truth, nature knowes what she would have; We can neither abid our friends miserable in their stay, nor happie in their departure: We love our selves so well, that we cannot be content they
C should gaine by our losse. The excuse of your sorrow is, that you mourne for your selfe. True: but compare these two, and see whether your losse or their gaine be greater. For if their advantage exceed your losse; take heed, lest while you bewray your love in mourning for them, it appeare that you love but your selfe in them. They are gone to their preferment, and you lament: your love is iniurious. If they were vanished to nothing, I could not blame you, tho you tooke up Rachels lamentation: But now, you know they are in surer hands than your owne: you know, that he hath taken them, which hath undertaken to keepe them, to bring them againe: You know it is but a sleepe, which is miscalled Death, and that they shall, they must awake, as sure as they lie downe; and wake more fresh, more glorious, than when you shut their eyes. What doe we with Christianitie, if we beleeve not this? and if we doe beleeve it, why doe we mourne as the hopelesse? But the matter, perhaps, is not so heavy as D the circumstance: Your crosses came sudden, and thicke; You could not breathe from your first losse, ere you felt a worse. As if he knew not this, that sent both: As if he did it not on purpose. His proceedings seeme harsh; are most wise, most just. It is our fault, that they seeme otherwise than they are. Doe we thinke, we could carve better for our selves? O the mad insolence of Nature, that dares controll, where she should wonder! Presumptuous clay! that will be checking the Potter. Is his wisdome, himselfe? Is he, in himselfe, infinite? Is his Decree out of his wisdome; and doe we murmur? Doe we, foolish wormes, turne againe when he treads upon us? What? doe you repine at that which was good for you, yea best? That is best for us which God seeth best: and that he seeth best, which he doth. This is Gods doing. Kisse his rod in silence, and give glory to the hand that rules it. His will is the rule of his actions; and his goodnesse, of his will. Things are good to us, because he wils them:
E He wils them, because they are good to himselfe. It is your glory that he intends, in your so great affliction. It is no praise to wade over a shallow Ford, but to cut the swelling waves of the Deepe, commends both our strength and skill. It is no victory, to conquer an easie and weake crosse. These maine evils have crownes answerable to their difficultie: Wrestle once and goe away with a blessing. Be patient in this losse, and you shall once triumph in your gaine. Let God have them with cheerefulnesse, and you shall enjoy God with them in glory.

To Mr. J. A. Merchant.

EPIST. X. Against ſorrow for worldly loſſes.

IT is fitter for me to beginne with chiding, than with advice: what meanes this weake diſtruſt? Goe on, and I ſhall doubt whether I write to a Chriſtian. You have loſt your heart, together with your wealth; How can I but feare, leſt this Mammon was your God? Hence was Gods jealouſie in removing it; and hence your immoderate teares for loſing it. If thus; God had not loved you, if he had not made you poore. To ſome, it is an advantage to leeſe: you could not have been at once thus rich, and good. Now, heaven is open to you, which was ſhut before, and could never have given you entrance, with that load of iniquity. If you be wiſe in menaging your affliction, you have changed the world for God, a little droſſe for heaven. Let me ever loſe thus, and ſmart when I complaine.

But you might have at once retained both. The ſtomach, that is purged, muſt be content to part with ſome good nouriſhment, that it may deliver it ſelfe of more evill humors. God ſaw (that knowes it) you could not hold him ſo ſtrongly, while one of your hands was ſo faſtned vpon the world. You ſee, many make themſelves wilfully poore: why cannot you be content God ſhould impoveriſh you? If God had willed their povertie, he would have commanded it: if hee had not willed yours, he would not have effected it. It is a ſhame for a Chriſtian, to ſee an Heathen Philoſopher laugh at his owne ſhipwracke; while himſelfe howles out, as if all his felicitie were imbarked with his ſubſtance. How ſhould wee ſcorne, to think that an heathen man ſhould laugh either at our ignorance, or impotence? ignorance, if we thought too highly of earthly things; impotence if we over-loved them. The feare of ſome evils is worſe than the ſenſe. To ſpeake ingenuouſly; I could never ſee, wherein povertie deſerved ſo hard a conceit. It takes away the delicacie of fare, ſoftneſſe of lodging, gayneſſe of attire, and perhaps brings with it contempt: this is the worſt, and all. View it now on the better ſide: Loe, their quiet ſecurity, ſound ſleeps, ſharp appetite, free meriment; no feares, no cares, no ſuſpition, no diſtempers of exceſſe, no diſcontentment. If I were Judge, my tongue ſhould be unjuſt, if povertie went away weeping. I cannot ſee, how the evills it brings, can compare with thoſe which it removes; how the diſcommodities ſhould match the bleſſings of a meane eſtate. What are thoſe you have loſt, but falſe friends, miſerable comforters? Elſe they had not left you. Oh ſlight and fickle ſtay, that winds could bereaue you of! If your care could goe with them, here were no damage: and, if it goe not with them, it is your fault. Grieve more for your fault, than for your loſſe. If your negligence, your riotous miſ-ſpence had empaired your eſtate, then Satan had impoveriſht you; now would I have added to your griefe, for your ſinne, not for your affliction: But now, ſince winds and waters have done it as the officers of their Maker; why ſhould you not ſay with me, as I with Iob, The Lord hath taken: Vſe your loſſe well, and you ſhall find that God hath croſſed you with a bleſſing. And if it were worſe than the world eſteemes it, yet think not what you feele, but what you deſerve: You are a ſtranger to your ſelfe, if you confeſſe not that God favours you in this whip. If he had ſtripped you of better things, and ſcourged you with worſe, you ſhould ſtill have acknowledged a mercifull juſtice: If you now repine at an eaſie correction, you are worthy of ſeverity. Beware the next, if you grudge and ſwell at this. It is next to nothing which you ſuffer: what can be further from us, than theſe goods of outward eſtate? You need not abate either health, or mirth for their ſakes. If you doe now draw the affliction neerer than he which ſent it, and make a forren evill domeſticall; if while God viſits your eſtate, you fetch it home, to your body, to your mind; thanke your ſelfe that you will needs be miſerable: But if you loue not to fare ill; take croſſes as they are ſent, and goe lightly away with an eaſie burden.

1. To Mr. WALTER FITZWILLIAMS. Of the true and lawfull use of pleasure, &c.
2. To Mr. W. E. DD. to Mr. ROB. IERMIN. Of the bloody and sinfull use of single combats: and the unjust pretences for this unchristian and false manhood.
3. To Mr. MAT. MYLWARD. Of the pleasure of study and contemplation, &c.
4. To M. I. P. Of the increase of Popery; of the Oath of Allegeance; and the just sufferings of those that have refused it.
5. To my brother Mr. SA. HALL. Of the charge and weight of the Ministeriall function: with directions for due preparation to it, and answerable carriage in it.

EP.

6. To M. A. P. Of the signes and proofes of a true faith.
7. To Mr. EDWARD ALLEYNE. A direction how to conceive of God in our devotions and meditations.
8. To Mr. THOMAS IAMES. Of the reason of the Papists confidence in appealing to the Fathers: applauding his worthy offers, and endevours of discovering the falsifications of Antiquity.
9. To M. E. A. Of fleeing or stay in the time of Pestilence; whether lawfull for Minister or people.
10. To M. R. B. A complaint the of iniquity of the Times; with a prescription of remedy.

THE THIRD DECAD.

To M. Smith, and M. Rob. Ring-leaders of the late Separation at Amſterdam.

EPIST. 1. Setting forth their injurie done to the Church, the injuſtice of their cauſe, and fearefulneſſe of their offence: Cenſuring and adviſing them.

WE heare of your ſeparation, and mourne; yet not ſo much for you, as for your wrong: you could not doe a greater injurie to your mother, than to flie from her. Say ſhee were poore, ragged, weake; ſay ſhe were deformed; yet ſhee is not infectious: Or if ſhe were, yet ſhe is yours. This were cauſe enough for you, to lament her, to pray for her, to labour for her redreſſe, not to avoid her: This unnaturalneſſe is ſhamefull; and more hainous in you, who are reported not parties in this evill, but authors. Your flight is not ſo much, as your miſ-guidance. Plead not: this fault is paſt excuſe. If we all ſhould follow you, this were the way, of a Church (as you plead) imperfect, to make no Church; and of a remedie, to make a diſeaſe. Still the fruit of our charitie to you, is, beſides our griefe, pitie. Your zeale of truth hath miſ-led you, and you others: A zeale, if honeſt, yet blind-folded, and led by ſelfe-will. O that you loved Peace, but halfe ſo well as Truth: then, this breach had never beene: and you that are yet brethren, had been ſtill companions. Goe out of Babylon, you ſay; The voice not of Shiſme, but of holineſſe. Know you where you are? Looke about you, I beſeech you, looke behind you; and ſee if we have not left it upon our backs. Shee her ſelfe feels, and ſees that ſhe is abandoned: and complaines to all the world, that we have not onely forſaken, but ſpoiled her; and yet you ſay, Come out of Babylon. And except you will be willingly blind, you may ſee the heapes of her Altars, the aſhes of her Idols, the ruines of her monuments, the condemnation of her errours, the revenge of her abominations. And are we yet in Babylon? Is Babylon yet amongſt us? Where are the maine buildings of that accurſed Citie; thoſe high and proud Towers of their univerſall Hierarchie, infallible judgement, diſpenſation with the Lawes of God, and ſinnes of men; diſpoſition of Kingdomes, depoſition of Princes, parting ſtakes with God in our converſion, through freedome of will; in our ſalvation, through the merit of our works? Where are thoſe rotten heaps (rotten, not through age, but corruption) of tranſubſtantiating of bread, adoring of Images, multitude of Sacraments, power of Indulgences, neceſſitie of Confeſſions, profit of Pilgrimages, conſtrained and approved Ignorance, unknowne Devotions? Where are thoſe deepe vaults (if not mynes) of Penances and Purgatories, and whatſoever hath been deviſed by thoſe Popelings, whether profitable or glorious, againſt the Lord and his Chriſt? Are they not all raced, and buried in the duſt? Hath not the Majeſtie of her Gods, like as was done to Mithra, and Serapis, been long agone offered to the publique laughter of the vulgar? What is this but to goe, yea to run (if not to flie) out of Babylon? But (as every man is an hearty Patron of his owne actions, and it is a desperate cause that hath no plea) you alledge our conforting in Ceremonies, and say still we tarry in the suburbs. Grant that these were as ill, as an enemie can make them, or can pretend them: You are deceived, if you think the wals of Babylon stand upon Ceremonies. Substantiall errours are both her foundation, and frame. These rituall observations are not so much as Tile and Reed, rather like to some Fane upon the roofe; for ornament, more than use: Not parts of the building, but not necessary appendances. If you take them otherwise, you wrong the Church; if thus, and yet depart, you wrong it and your selfe: As if you would have perswaded righteous Lot not to stay in Zoar, because it was so neere Sodome. I feare, if you had seene the money-changers in the Temple, how ever you would have prayed, or taught there: Christ did it, not forsaking the place, but scourging the offenders: And this is the valour of Christian teachers: To oppose abuses, not to runne away from them: Where shall you not thus find Babylon? Would you have run away from Geneva, because of her wafers? Or from Corinth, for her disordered love-feasts? Either run out of the world, or your flight is in vaine. If experience of change teach you not, that you shall find your Babylon every where, returne not. Compare the place you have left, with that you have chosen; let not feare of seeming to repent oversoone, make you partiall. Loe, there a common harbour of all opinions, of all heresies; if not a mixture. Here you drew in the free and cleare aire of the Gospell, without that odious composition of Iudaisme, Arianisme, Anabaptisme: There you live in the stench of these and more. You are unworthy of pitie, if you will approve your misery. Say if you can, that the Church of England (if she were not yours) is not an heaven to Amster dam. How is it then, that our gnats are harder to swallow, than their camels? and that whiles all Christendome magnifies our happinesse, and applands it; your handfull alone, so detests our enormities, that you despise our graces? See whether in this you make not God a loser. The thank of all his favours is lost, because you want more: and in the meane time, who gaines by this sequestration, but Rome and Hell? How doe they insult in this advantage, that our mothers owne children condemne her for uncleane, that we are daily weakned by our divisions, that the rude multitude hath so palpable a motive to distrust us? Sure, you intended it not: but, if you had been their hired Agent, you could not have done our enemies greater service. The God of heaven open your eyes, that you may see the unjustice of that zeale which hath transported you; and turne your heart to an endevour of all Christian satisfaction: otherwise, your soules shall find too late, that it had been a thousand times better to swallow a Ceremonie, than to rend a Church: yea, that even whoredomes and murders shall abide an easier answer than separation. I have done, if onely I have advised you of that fearefull threatning of the Wiseman: The eye that mocketh his father, and despiseth the government of his mother, the Ravens of the valley shall picke it out, and the young Eagles eat it.

To Sir Andrevv Asteley.

Ep. II. A discourse of our due preparation for death, and the meanes to sweeten it to us.

Since I saw you, I saw my father die: How boldly and merrily did he passe thorow the gates of death, as if they had had no terror, but much pleasure! Oh that I could as easily imitate, as not forget him! Wee know we must tread the same way; how happy, if with the same mind? Our life, as it gives way to death, so must make way for it: it will be, though we will not: it will not be happie, without our will, without our preparation. It is the best and longest lesson, to learne how to die; and of surest use: which alone if we take not out, it were better not to have lived. Oh vaine studies of men, how to walke thorow Rome streets all day in the shade, how

to

A to ſquare circles, how to ſalve up the celeſtiall motions, how to correct miſ-written copies, to fetch up old words from forgetfulneſſe, and a thouſand other like points of idle skill; whiles the maine care of life and death is neglected! There is an Art of this, infallible, eternall both in truth, and uſe: for though the meanes be divers, yet the laſt act is ſtill the ſame, and the diſpoſition of the ſoule need not be other: it is all one whether a fever bring it, or a ſword; wherein yet, after long profeſſion of other ſciences, I am ſtill (why ſhould I ſhame to confeſſe?) a learner; and ſhall be (I hope) whileſt I am: yet it ſhall not repent us, as diligent Schollers repeat their parts unto each other, to be more perfect; ſo mutually to recall ſome of our rules of well-dying: The firſt whereof is a conſcionable life: The next a right apprehenſion of life, and death: I tread in the beaten path; doe you follow me. To live holily, is the way to die ſafely, happily. If death be terrible, yet innocence is bold, and will neither feare
B it ſelfe, nor let us feare; where contrariwiſe wickedneſſe is cowardly, and cannot abide either any glimpſe of light, or ſhew of danger. Hope doth not more draw our eies forward, than conſcience turnes them backward, and forces us to look behind us; affrighting us even with our paſt evils. Beſides the paine of death, every ſin is a new Fury to torment the ſoule, and to make it loth to part. How can it chuſe, when it ſees on the one ſide, what evill it hath done; on the other, what evill it muſt ſuffer? It was a cleare heart (what elſe could doe it?) that gave ſo bold a forehead to that holy Biſhop, who durſt on his death-bed profeſſe, I have ſo lived, as I neither feare to die, nor ſhame to live. What care we when we be found, if well-doing? What care we how ſuddenly, when our preparation is perpetuall? What care we how violently, when ſo many inward friends (ſuch are our good actions) give us ſecret comfort? There is
C no good Steward, but is glad of his Audit; his ſtraight accounts deſire nothing more than a diſcharge: only the doubtfull and untruſty feares of his reckoning. Neither only doth the want of integritie make us timorous, but of wiſdome, in that our ignorance cannot equally value, either the life which we leave, or the death we expect. We have long converſed with this life, and yet are unacquainted: how ſhould wee then know that death we never ſaw? or that life which followes that death?

Theſe cottages have beene ruinous, and we have not thought of their fall: our way hath beene deepe, and we have not looked for our reſt. Shew me ever any man that knew what life was, and was loth to leave it. I will ſhew you a priſoner that would dwell in his Goale, a ſlave that likes to be chained to his Galley. What is there here, but darkneſſe of ignorance, diſcomfort of events, impotency of body, vexation of conſcience, diſtemper of paſſions, complaint of eſtate, feares and ſenſe of evill, hopes and doubts of good, ambitious rackings, covetous toyles, envious underminings,
D irkſome diſappointments, weary ſacieties, reſtleſſe deſires, and many worlds of diſcontentments in this one? What wonder is it that we would live? We laugh at their choyce that are in love with the deformed; and what a face is this wee dote upon? See if ſinnes, and cares, and croſſes, have not (like a filthy Morphew) overſpread it, and made it loathſome to all judicious eyes. I marvell then, that any wiſemen could be other but Stoicks, and could have any conceit of life, but contemptuous; not more for the miſery of it, while it laſteth, than for the not laſting: wee may love it, wee cannot hold it. What a ſhadow of a ſmoake, what a dreame of a ſhadow is this, wee affect? Wiſe Salomon ſayes, there is a time to be borne, and a time to die: you doe not heare him ſay, a time to live. What is more flitting than time? Yet life is not long enough to be worthy of the title of time. Death borders upon our birth, and our cradle ſtands in our grave. Wee lament the loſſe of our pa-
E rents: how ſoone ſhall our ſonnes bewaile ours? Loe, I that write this, and you that reade it, how long are wee here? It were well, if the world were as our tent, yea as our Inne; if not to lodge, yet to bait in: but now it is onely our thorowfare, one generation paſſeth, another commeth; none ſtayeth. If this earth were a Paradiſe, and this which wee call our life were ſweet as the joyes above, yet how ſhould this fickleneſſe of it coole our delight? Grant it abſolute, who can eſteeme a vaniſhing pleaſure? How much more now, when the drammes of our honey are loſt in pounds of gall; when our contentments are as far from ſincerity as continuance? Yet the true apprehenſion of life (though joyned with contempt) is not enough to ſettle us, if either we be ignorant of death, or ill perſwaded: for if life have not worth enough to allure us, yet death hath horror enough to affright us. He that would die chearfully, muſt know death his friend: what is he but the faithfull officer of our Maker, who ever ſmiles or frownes with his Maſter: neither can either ſhew or nouriſh enmitie, where God favours: when hee comes fiercely, and puls a man by the throat, and ſummons him to Hell, who can but tremble? The meſſenger is terrible; but the meſſage worſe: hence have riſen the miſerable deſpaires, and furious raving of the ill conſcience, that finds no peace within, leſſe without. But when he comes ſweetly, not as an executioner, but as a guide to glory, and profers his ſervice, and ſhewes our happineſſe, and opens the doore to our heaven; how worthy is he of entertainment? how worthy of gratulation? But his ſalutation is painfull, if courteous, what then? The Phyſitian heales us, not without paine; and yet we reward him. It is unthankfulneſſe to complaine, where the anſwer of profit is exceſſive. Death paineth: how long? how much? with what proportion to the ſequell of joy? O Death, if thy pangs be grievous; yet thy reſt is ſweet. The conſtant expectation that hath poſſeſſed that reſt, hath already ſwallowed thoſe pangs, and makes the Chriſtian at once wholly dead to his paine, wholly alive to his glory. The ſoule hath not leiſure to care for her ſuffering, that beholds her crowne; which if ſhe were conjoyned to fetch thorow the flames of Hell, her faith would not ſtick at the condition. Thus in briefe, he that lives Chriſtianly, ſhall die boldly; he that finds his life ſhort and miſerable, ſhall die willingly; hee that knowes death, and fore-ſees glory, ſhall die cheerfully and deſirouſly.

To Mr. Samuel Burton, Arch-deacon of Gloceſter.

Ep. III. A diſcourſe of the tryall and choice of the true Religion.

Sir: This diſcourſe injoyned by you, I ſend to your cenſure, to your diſpoſing; but to the uſe of others. Vpon your charge I have written it for the wavering. If it ſeeme worthy, communicate it; elſe it is but a daſh of your pen. I feare onely the brevity: a Volume were too little for this Subject. It is not more yours, than the Author. Farewell.

WE doe not more affect varietie in all other things, than we abhorre it in Religion. Even thoſe which have held the greateſt falſhoods, hold that there is but one truth. I never read of more than one Heretick, that held all Hereſies true; neither did his opinion ſeeme more incredible, than the relation of it. God can neither be multiplied, nor Chriſt divided: if his coat might be parted, his body was intire. For that then all ſides challenge truth, and but one can poſſeſſe it; let us ſee who have found it, who enjoy it.

There are not many Religions that ſtrive for it, tho many opinions. Every Hereſie, albeit fundamentall, makes not a Religion. We ſay not, The Religion of Arrians, Neſtorians, Sabellians, Macedonians, but the ſect or hereſie. No opinion challenges this name in our uſuall ſpeech, (for I diſcuſſe not the proprietie) but that which, ariſing from many differences, hath ſetled it ſelfe in the world, upon her owne principles, not without an univerſall diviſion. Such may ſoon be counted: Though it is true, there are by ſo much too many, as there are more than one. Five religions then there are by this rule, upon earth; which ſtand in competition for truth, Iewiſh, Turkiſh, Greekiſh, Popiſh, Reformed; whereof each pleads for it ſelfe, with diſgrace of the other. The plaine Reader doubts, how he may ſit Judge in ſo high a plea: God hath put this perſon upon him; while he chargeth him to trie the Spirits; to retaine the good, reject the evill: If ſtill he plead with Moſes, inſufficiency; let him but attend, God ſhall decide the caſe in his ſilence, without difficulty. The Jew hath little to ſay for himſelfe, but impudent denyals of our Chriſt, of their Prophecies: whoſe very refuſall of him, more

ſtrongly

A ſtrongly proves him the true Meſſias; neither could he be juſtified to be that Saviour, if they rejected him not; ſince the Prophets fore-ſaw and fore-told, not their repelling of him only, but their reviling. If there were no more arguments, God hath ſo mightily confuted them from heaven, by the voice of his judgement, that all the world hiſſeth at their conviction. Loe their very ſinne is capitally written in their deſolation, and contempt. One of their owne late Doctors ſeriouſly expoſtulates in a relenting Letter to another of his fellow Rabbins, what might bee the cauſe of ſo long and deſperate a ruine of their Iſrael; and comparing their former captivities with their former ſins, argues (and yet feares to conclude) that this continuing puniſhment, muſt needs be ſent for ſome ſinne ſo much greater than Idolitry, Oppreſſion, Sabbath-breaking; by how much this plague is more grievous than all the other: Which, his feare tels him (and he may beleeve it) can be no other, but the
B murder, and refuſall of their true Meſſias. Let now all the Doctors of thoſe obſtinate Synagogues, anſwer this doubt of their owne objecting: But how, paſt all contradiction, is the ancient witneſſe of all the holy Prophets, anſwered and confirmed by their events? whoſe foreſayings verified in all particular iſſues, are more than demonſtrative. No art can deſcribe a thing paſt, with more exactneſſe, than they did this Chriſt to come. What circumſtance is there, that hath not his prediction? Have they not forewritten who ſhould be his mother, A Virgin: Of what Tribe, of Iuda: Of what houſe, of David: What place, Bethleem: What time, when the ſcepter ſhould be taken from Iudah: Or after ſixtie nine weeks: What name, Ieſus, Immanuel: What habitation, Nazareth: What harbinger, Iohn, the ſecond Elias: What his buſineſſe; to preach, ſave, deliver: What entertainment, rejection: What death, the Croſſe: What manner, piercing the body, not breaking the bones: What company, amidſt two wicked ones:
C Where, at Ieruſalem: Where abouts, without the Gates: With what words, of imploration: what draught, of Vinegar and Gall: Who was his Traitor, and with what ſucceſſe? If all the Synagogues of the Circumciſion, all the Gates of Hell, can obſcure theſe evidences, let me be a Proſelyte. My labour herein is ſo much leſſe, as there is leſſe danger of Judaiſme. Our Church is well rid of that accurſed Nation, whom yet Rome harbours, and, in a faſhion, graces: whiles in ſtead of ſpitting at, or that their Neapolitan correction whereof Gratian ſpeakes, the Pope ſolemnly receives at their hands, that Bible, which they at once approve, and overthrow. But would God there were no more Iewes than appeare. Even in this ſenſe alſo he is a Iew, that is one within: plainly, whoſe heart doth not ſincerely confeſſe his Redeemer. Tho a Chriſtan Iew is no other than an Atheiſt; and therefore muſt be ſcourged elſe-where. The Iew
D thus anſwered: The Turke ſtands out for his Mahomet, that couzening Arabian, whoſe Religion (if it deſerve that name) ſtands upon nothing but rude ignorance and palpable Impoſture. Yet loe here a ſubtill Devill in a groſſe religion: For when hee ſaw that he could not by ſingle twiſts of hereſie pull downe the well built walls of the Church; hee windes them all up in one Cable, to ſee if his cord of ſo many folds might happily prevaile: raiſing up wicked Mahomet, to deny with Sabellius the diſtinction of perſons, with Arrius Chriſts divinity, with Macedonius the Deitie of the Holy Ghoſt, with Sergius two wills in Chriſt, with Marcion Chriſts ſuffering: And theſe policies ſeconded with violence, how have they waſted Chriſtendome? O damnable mixture, miſerably ſucceſſefull! which yet could not have beene, but that it meets with ſottiſh Clients, and ſoothes up nature, and debarrs both all knowledge, and contraction. What is their Alcoran, but a fardle of fooliſh impoſſibilities? Whoſoever ſhall heare mee relate the ſtories of Angell Adriels
E death, Seraphuels trumpet, Gabriels bridge, Horroth and Marroths hanging, the Moones deſcending into Mahomets ſleeve, the Litter wherein hee ſaw God carried by eight Angels, their ridiculous and ſwiniſh Paradiſe, and thouſands of the ſame bran; would ſay, that Mahomet hoped to meet either with beaſts, or mad-men. Beſide theſe barbarous fictions, behold their lawes, full of licence, full of impietie: in which, revenge is encouraged, multitude of wives allowed, theft tollerated; and the frame of their opinions ſuch, as well bewrayes their whole religion to bee but the mungrell iſſue of an Arrian, Iew, Neſtorian, and Arabian: A monſter of many seeds, and all accurſed; In both which regards, Nature her ſelfe, in whoſe breſt God hath witten his royall Law (though in part, by her defaced) hath light enough to condemne a Turke, as the worſt Pagan. Let no man look for further diſproofe. Theſe follies, a wiſe Chriſtian will ſcorne to confute, and ſcarce vouchſafe to laugh at. A

3 The Greekiſh Church (ſo the Ruſſes tearme themſelves) put in the next claime, but with no better ſucceſſe; whoſe infinite Clergie affords not a man that can give either reaſon or account of their owne Doctrine. Theſe are the baſeſt dregs of all Chriſtians, ſo we favourably tearme them; tho they perhaps in more ſimplicity than wilfulneſſe, would admit none of all the other Chriſtian world to their font, but thoſe, who in a ſolemne renunciation, ſpit at, & abjure their former God, Religion, Baptiſme; yet peradventure we might more juſtly tearme them Nicholaitans, for that obſcure Saint (if a Saint, if honeſt) by an unequall diviſion, finds more homage from them than his maſter. Theſe are as ignorant as Turks, as idolatrous as Heathens, as obſtinate as Jewes, and more ſuperſtitious than Papiſts. To ſpeak ingenuouſly from that I have heard & read; if the worſt of the Romiſh religion, and the beſt of the Muſcovitiſh be compared, the choice will be hard whether ſhould be leſſe ill. I labour the leſſe in all theſe, whoſe remoteneſſe and abſurditie ſecure us from infection, and whoſe only name is their confutation. I deſcend to that maine rivall of Truth, which creeps into her boſome, and is not leſſe neere than ſubtle, the religion (if not rather the faction) of Papiſme, whoſe plea is importunate, and ſo much more dangerous, as it caries fairer probabitity. Since then of all religions the Chriſtian obtaineth, let us ſee of thoſe that are called Chriſtians, which ſhould command aſſent and profeſſion, Every religion bears in her lineaments the image of her parent: the true Religion therefore is ſpirituall, and looks like God in her puritie: all falſe religions are carnall, and carie the face of Nature, their mother, and of him whoſe illuſion begot them, Satan. In ſumme, Nature never conceived any which did not favour her, nor the Spirit any which did not oppugne her. Let this then be the Lydian ſtone of this triall; we need no more. Whether religion ſoever doth more plauſibly content Nature, is falſe, whether gives more ſincere glory to God, is his Truth. Lay aſide prejudice: Whither I beſeech you tendeth all popery, but to make Nature either vainly proud, or careleſly wanton? What can more advance her pride, than to tell her, that ſhe hath in her own hands freedome enough of will (with a little prevention) to prepare her ſelfe to her juſtification; that ſhe hath (whereof to rejoyce) ſomewhat, which ſhe hath not received; that if God pleaſe but to unfetter her, ſhe can walk alone? She is inſolent enough of her ſelf; this flattery is enough to make her mad of conceit. After this; That if God will but beare halfe the charges by his cooperation, ſhee may undetake to merit her owne glory, and brave God in the proofe of his moſt accurate judgement; to fulfill the whole royall Law; and that from the ſuperfluity of her owne ſatisfactions, ſhe may be abundantly beneficiall to her neighbours; that naturally without faith a man may doe ſome good workes; that we may repoſe confidene in our merits. Neither is our good onely by this flatterie extolled, but our ill alſo diminiſhed; our evills are our ſinnes; ſome of them (they ſay) are in their nature veniall, and not worthy of death: more, that our originall ſinne is but the want of our firſt juſtice; no guilt of our firſt fathers offence; no inherent ill diſpoſition; and that by Baptiſmall water is taken away what ever hath the nature of ſinne; that a meere man (let mee not wrong Saint Peters ſucceſſor, in ſo tearming him) hath power to remit both puniſhment and ſinne, paſt and future; that many have ſuffered more than their ſinnes have required: that the ſufferings of the Saints added to Chriſts paſſions, make up the treaſure of the Church, that ſpirituall Exchequer; whereof their Biſhop muſt keepe the key, and make his friends. In all theſe the gaine of Nature (who ſees not?) is Gods loſſe: all her braverie is ſtolne from above: beſides thoſe other direct derogations from him; that his Scriptures are not ſufficient; that their originall fountaines are corrupted, and the ſtreames runne clearer; that there is a multitude (if a finite number) of Mediators. Turne your eyes now to us, and ſee contrarily how we abaſe Nature, how we knead her in the duſt; ſpoiling her of her proud rags, loading her with reproches; and giving glory to him, that ſayes, he will not give it to another; whiles we teach, that we neither B C D E have

A have good, nor can do good of our ſelves; that we are not ſick or fettered, but dead in our ſin; that we cannot move to good, more than we are moved; that our beſt actions are faulty; our ſatisfactions debts; our deſerts damnation; that all our merit is his mercy that ſaves us; that every of our ſinnes is deadly; every of our natures originally depraved, and corrupted; that no water can entirely waſh away the filthineſſe of our concupiſcence; that none but the blood of him that was God, can cleanſe us; that all our poſſible ſufferings are below our offences; that Gods written word is all-ſufficient to informe us, to make us both wiſe and perfect; that Chriſts mediation is more than ſufficient to ſave us, his ſufferings to redeeme us, his obedience to inrich us. You have ſeen how Papiſtry makes Nature proud; now ſee how it makes her lawleſſe and wanton: while it teacheth (yet this one, not ſo univerſally) that Chriſt died effectually for all; that in true contrition an expreſſe purpoſe of new life is not ne-
B ceſſary; that wicked men are true members of the Church; that a lewd-miſcreant or infidell in the buſineſſe of the Altar partakes of the true body and bloud of Chriſt, yea (which I ſhame to tell) a brute creature; that men may ſave the labour of ſearching, for that it is both eaſie and ſafe (with that Catholike Collier) to beleeve with the Church, at a venture: more than ſo, that devotion is the ſeed of ignorance; that there is infallibilitie annexed to a particular place and perſon; that the bare act of the Sacraments confers grace without faith; that the meer ſigne of the Croſſe made by a Jew or Infidell, is of force to drive away Devils; that the ſacrifice of the Maſſe in the very work wrought, availes to obtaine pardon of our ſinnes, not in our life onely, but when we lye frying in purgatory; that we need not pray in faith to be heard, or in underſtanding; that almes given, merit heaven, diſpoſe to juſtification, ſatisfie God for ſinne; that abſtinence from ſome meats and drinks is meritorious; that Indul-
C gences may be granted to diſpence with all the penance of ſins afterward to be commited; that theſe by a living man may be applied to the dead; that one man may deliver anothers ſoule out of his purging torments: and therefore, that he who wants not either money or friends, need not feare the ſmart of his ſinnes. O religion, ſweet to the wealthy, to the needy deſperate! who will now care henceforth how ſound his devotions be, how lewd his life, how hainous his ſins, that knowes theſe refuges? On the contrary, we curbe Nature, we reſtraine, we diſcourage, we threaten her, teaching her not to reſt in implicit faiths, or general intentions, or external actions of piety, or preſumptuous diſpenſations of men: but to ſtrive unto ſincere faith, without which we have no part in Chriſt, in his Church, no benefit by Sacraments, prayers, faſtings, beneficences: to ſet the heart on work in all our devotions, whithout which the hand and tongue are but hypocrites: to ſet the hands on work in good actions,
D without which the preſuming heart is but an hypocrite: to expect no pardon for ſin before we commit it, and from Chriſt alone when we have comitted it, and to repent before we expect it: to hope for no chaffering, no ranſome of our ſoules from below, no contrary change of eſtate after diſſolution: that life is the time of mercy, death of retribution. Now let me appeale to your ſoule, and to the judgement of all the world, whether of theſe two religions is framed to the humour of Nature: yea let mee but know what action Popery requires of any of her followers, which a meer Naturaliſt hath not done, cannot do? See how I have choſen to beat them with that rod where-with they think we have ſo often ſmarted: for what cavill hath been more ordinary againſt us, than this of eaſe and liberty, yea licence given and taken by our religion? together with the upbraidings of their owne ſtrict and rigorous auſtereneſſe? Where E are our penall works, our faſtings, ſcourges, haire-cloth, weary pilgrimages, bluſhing confeſſions, ſolemne vowes of willing beggery and perpetuall continencie? To doe them right, we yeeld, in all the hard works of will-worſhip they goe beyond us; but (leſt they ſhould inſult in the victory) not ſo much as the Prieſts of Baal went beyond them. I ſee their whips: ſhew me their knives. Where did ever zealous Romaniſt lance and carve his fleſh in devotion? The Baalites did it, and yet never the wiſer, never the holier. Either therefore this zeale, in works of their owne deviſing, makes them not better than we, or it makes the Baalites better than they: let them take their choyce. Alas, theſe difficulties are but a colour to avoid greater: No, no, to work our ſtubborne wils to ſubjection, to draw this untoward fleſh to a ſincere cheerfulneſſe in Gods ſervice: to reach unto a ſound beleefe in the Lord Jeſus, to pray with a true heart, without diſtraction, without diſtruſt, without miſ-conceit: to keepe the heart in continuall awe of God: Theſe are the hard tasks of a Chriſtian, worthy of our ſweat, worthy of our rejoycing: all which that Babyloniſh religion ſhifteth off with a careleſſe faſhionableneſſe, as if it had not to doe with the ſoule. Give us obedience: let them take ſacrifice. Doe you yet look for more evidence? look into particulars, and ſatisfie your ſelfe in Gods deciſion, as Optatus adviſed of old. Since the goods of our father are in queſtion, whither ſhould we goe but to his will and Teſtament? My ſoule beare the danger of this bold aſſertion. If we erre, we erre with Chriſt and his Apoſtles. In a word, againſt all ſtaggering, our Saviours rule is ſure and eternall: If any man will doe my Fathers will, he ſhall know of the doctrine whether it be of God.

To M. Edmvnd Sleigh.

Ep. IV. A diſcourſe of the hardneſſe of Chriſtianitie, and the abundant recompence of the pleaſures and commodities of that profeſſion.

How hard a thing it is (deare Uncle) to be a Chriſtian! perhaps others are leſſe dull and more quiet; more waxen to the impreſſions of grace, & leſſe troubleſome to themſelves; I accuſe none, but whom I dare, my ſelfe. Even eaſie buſineſſes are hard to the weak: let others boaſt, I muſt complaine. To keep our ſtation is hard; harder to move forward. One while I ſcarce reſtrain my unruly deſires, from evill: ofter, can find no luſt to good. My heart will either be vaine, or ſullen: when I am wrought with much ſweat to deteſt ſin, & diſtaſte the world, yet who ſhall raiſe up this droſſe to a ſpirituall joy? Sometimes I purpoſe well; and if thoſe thoughts (not mine) begin to lift me from my earth; loe, he that rules in the aire, ſtoops upon me with powerfull tentations, or the world puls me downe with a ſweet violence; ſo as I know not whether I be forced, or perſwaded to yeeld; I find much weakneſſe in my ſelfe, but more treachery. How willing am I to be deceived! How loth to be altered! Good duties ſeem harſh, and can hardly eſcape the repulſe, or delay of excuſes; and not without much ſtrife grow to any relliſh of pleaſure; and when they are at beſt, cannot avoid the mixture of many infirmities: which do at once diſquiet, and diſcourage the mind, not ſuffering it to reſt in what it would have done, and could not. And if after many ſighs and teares, I have attained to doe well, and reſolve better; yet this good eſtate is far from conſtant, & eaſily inclining to change. And whiles I ſtrive, in ſpight of my naturall fickleneſſe; to hold my owne with ſome progreſſe & gaine; what difficulty doe I find, what oppoſition? O God, what adverſaries haſt thou provided for us weak men! what incounters! Malicious and ſubtill ſpirits, an alluring world, a ſerpentine and ſtubborne nature: Force & fraud doe their worſt to us; ſometimes becauſe they are ſpirituall enemies, I ſee them not, and complain to feele them too late: Other-whiles my ſpirituall eies ſee them with amazement, and I (like a cowardly Iſraelite) am ready to flee, and plead their meaſure, for my feare: Who is able to ſtand before the ſonnes of Anak? Some other times I ſtand ſtill, and (as I can) weakly reſiſt; but am foiled with indignation, and ſhame. Then againe I riſe up, not without baſhfulneſſe and ſcorne: and with more heartie reſiſtance prevaile, & triumph, when ere long, ſurprized with a ſudden and unwarned aſſault, I am caried away captive, whither I would not: and mourning for my diſcomfiture, ſtudy for a feeble revenge: My quarrell is good, but my ſtrength maintains it not; It is now long ere I can recover this overthrow, and find my ſelfe whole of theſe wounds. Beſides ſuggeſtions, croſſes fall heavy, and work no ſmall diſtemper in a mind faint and unſetled, whoſe law is ſuch, that the more I grow, the more I beare; and not ſeldome, when God gives me reſpite, I afflict my ſelfe: either my feare faineth evils, or my unruly paſſions raiſe tumults within me, which breed much trouble, whether in ſatisfying or ſuppreſſing: not to ſpeak, that ſinne is attended, beſides vnquietneſſe, with terror.

Now

Now you say; Alas! Christianitie is hard: I grant it; but gainefull and happy. I contemne the difficulty, when I respect the advantage. The greatest labours that have answerable requitals, are lesse than the least that have no regard. Beleeve me, when I looke to the reward, I would not have the worke easier. It is a good Master whom we serve, who not only paies, but gives; not after the proportion of our earnings, but of his owne mercy. If every paine that we suffer were a death, and every crosse an hell, we have amends enough. It were injurious to complain of the measure, when we acknowledge the recompence. Away with these weak dislikes: though I should buy it dearer, I would be a Christian. Any thing may make me out of loue with my selfe, nothing with my profession: I were unworthy of this favour if I could repent to have endured: herein alone I am safe, herein I am blessed. I may be all other things, and yet with that dying Emperour complain, with my last breath, That I am nowhit the better: let me be a Christian, I am priviledged from miseries; hell cannot touch me, death cannot hurt me. No evill can arrest me while I am under the protection of him, which over-rules all good and evill: yea so soone as it touches me, it turns good, and being sent and suborned by my spirituall adversaries to betray me, now in an happy change it fights for me, & is driven rather to rebell, than wrong me. It is a bold and strange word: No price could buy of me the gaine of my sinnes: That, which while I repented, I would have expiated with bloud; now after my repentance I forgoe not for a world; the fruit of having sinned (if not rather of having repented.) Besides my freedome, how large is my possession? All good things are mine, to challenge, to enjoy. I cannot look beyond my owne, nor besides it; and the things that I connot see, I dare claime no lesse. The heaven that rowles so gloriously above my head is mine, by this right: yea, those celestiall spirits, the better part of that high creation, watch me in my bed, guard me in my wayes, shelter me in my dangers, comfort me in my troubles, and are ready to receive that soule which they have kept.

What speak I of creatures? The God of spirits is mine: and by a sweet and secret union, I am become an heire of his glory, yea (as it were) a limbe of himselfe. O blessednesse! worthy of difficulty, worthy of paine. What thou wilt, Lord, so I may be thine, what thou wilt. When I have done all, when I have suffered all, thou exceedest more than I want. Follow me then, deare Uncle: or (if you will) lead me rather (as you have done) in these steps; and from the rough way, look to the end: Over-looke these trifling grievances, and fasten your eyes upon the happy recompence; and see if you cannot scorne to complaine. Pitie those that take not your paines; and persist with courage till you feele the weight of your Crowne.

To Mr. W. L. With Laud.

Ep. V. Expostulating the cause of his unsetledness in religion, which is pleaded to be our dissensions: shewing the insufficiencie of that Motive, and comparing the state of our Church herein, with the Romish.

I would I knew where to find you: then I could tell how to take a direct aime; whereas now I must rove and conjecture. To day you are in the tents of the Romanists; to morrow in ours; the next day between both, against both. Our adversaries think you ours, we theirs, your conscience finds you with both, and neither. I flatter you not: this of yours is the worst of all tempers: heat and cold have their uses; luke-warmnesse is good for nothing, but to trouble the stomack. Those that are spiritually hot, find acceptation; those that are stark cold, have a lesser reckoning; the mean between both, is so much worse, as it comes neerer to good, and attaines it not. How long will you halt in this indifferency? Resolve one way, and know at last what you doe hould; what you should. Cast off either your wings or your teeth; and loathing this Bat-like nature, be either a Bird or a beast. To die wavering and uncertaine, your selfe will grant fearfull. If I must settle, when begin you? If you must beginne, why not now? It is dangerous deferring that, whose want is deadly; and whose opportunity opportunitie is doubtfull. God cryeth with Iehu, Who is on my ſide, who? Look at laſt out of your window to him, and in a reſolute courage caſt down this Iezabel that hath bewitched you. Is there any impediment, which delay will abate? is there any which a juſt anſwer cannot remove? If you had rather waver, who can ſettle you? But if you love not inconſtancy, tell us why you ſtagger. Be plaine, or elſe you will never be firme: What hinders you? Is it our diviſions: I ſee you ſhake your head at this, and by your ſilent geſture bewray this the cauſe of your diſtaſte: Would God I could either deny this with truth, or amend it with teares: But I grant it, with no leſſe ſorrow, than you with offence. This earth hath nothing more lamentable, than the civill jarres of one faith. What then? Muſt you defie your mother, becauſe you ſee your brethren fighting? Their diſſenſion is her griefe: Muſt ſhe loſe ſome ſonnes, becauſe ſome others quarrell? Doe not ſo wrong your ſelfe in afflicting her. Will you love Chriſt the leſſe, becauſe his coat is divided? Yea, let me boldly ſay; The hemme is torne a little, the garment is whole; or rather it is fretted a little, nor torn; or rather the fringe, not the hemme. Behold, here is one Chriſt, one Creed, one Baptiſme, one heaven, one way to it; in ſumme, one religion, one foundation, and (take away the tumultuous ſpirits of ſome rigorous Lutherans) one heart: our differences are thoſe of Paul and Barnabas; not thoſe of Peter and Magus: if they be ſome, it is well they are no more; if many, that they are not capitall. Shew mee that Church, that hath not complained of diſtraction: yea that familie, yea that fraternitie, yea that man, that alwaies agrees with himſelfe. See if the Spouſe of Chriſt, in that heavenly mariage ſong, doe not call him, a young Hart in the mountaines of diviſion. Tell me then, whither will you goe for truth, if you will allow no truth, but where there is no diviſion? To Rome perhaps, famous for unitie, famous for peace. See now how happily you have choſen, how well you have ſped: Loe, there Cardinall Bellarmine himſelfe, a witneſſe above exception, under his owne hand acknowledgeth to the world, & recons up 237 contrarieties of doctrine among the Romiſh Divines. What need we more evidence? O the perfect accordance of Peters See! worthy to be recorded for a badge of truth. Let now all our adverſaries ſcrape together ſo many contradictions of opinions amongſt us, as they confeſſe amongſt themſelves, and be you theirs. No, they are not more peaceable, but more ſubtle; they have not leſſe diſſenſion, but more ſmoothered. They fight cloſely within doors, without noiſe; all our fraies are in the field: would God we had as much of their cunning, as they want of our peace; & no more of their policie, than they want of our truth. Our ſtrife is in ceremonies, theirs ſubſtance; ours in one or two points, theirs in all. Take it boldly from him that dares avouch it, there is not one point in all Divinity (except thoſe wherein we accord with them) wherein they all ſpeake the ſame. If our Church diſpleaſe you for differences, theirs much more; unleſſe you will be either wilfully incredulous, or wilfully partiall: unleſſe you diſlike a miſchiefe the leſſe for the ſecrecie. What will you doe then? Will you be a Church alone? Alas, how full are you of contradictions to your ſelfe! how full of contrarie purpoſes! how oft doe you chide with your ſelfe! how oft do you fight with you ſelfe! I appeale to that boſome which is privie to thoſe ſecret combats: beleeve me not, if ever you find perfect unitie any where but above: either goe thither and ſeek it amongſt thoſe that triumph, or be content with what eſtate you find in this warfaring number. Truth is in differences, as gold in droſſe, wheat in chaffe; will you caſt away the beſt metall, the beſt graine, becauſe it is mingled with this Offall? Will you rather be poore and hungrie, than beſtow labour on the fanne, or the furnace? Is there nothing worth your reſpect, but peace? I have heard that the interlacing of diſcords graces the beſt muſick; & I know not whether the very evil ſpirits agree not with themſelves. If the body be ſound, what though the coat be torne? or if the garment be whole, what if the lace be unript? Take you peace: let me have truth, I cannot have both. To conclude: Embrace thoſe truths that we all hold; and it greatly matters not what you hold in thoſe wherein we differ: and if you love your ſafetie, ſeek rather grounds whereon to reſt, than excuſes for your unreſt. If ever you look to gaine by the truth, you muſt both chuſe it, and cleave to it: Meere reſolution is not enough; except you will rather loſe your ſelfe than it.

To Sir EDMUND LUCY.

EPIST. VI. Discourſing of the different degrees of heavenly glory; and of our mutuall knowledge of each other above.

AS thoſe which never were at home, now after much here-ſay travelling toward it, aske in the way, What manner of houſe it is. what ſeat, what frame, what ſoile; ſo do we in the paſſage to our glory: we are all pilgrims thither; yet ſo as that ſome have lookt into it afar thorow the open windows of the Scripture. Go to then: whiles others are inquiring about worldly dignities, & earthly pleaſures, let us two ſweetly conſult of the eſtate of our future happineſſe; yet without preſumption, without curioſitie. Amongſt this infinite choice of thoughts, it hath pleaſed you to limit our diſcourſe to two heads. You aske firſt, if the joyes of the glorified Saints ſhall differ in degrees. I feare not to affirme it. There is one life of all, one felicity; but divers meaſures. Our heaven begins here, and here varies in degrees. One Chriſtian enjoyes God above another, according as his grace, as his faith is more: and heaven is ſtill like it ſelfe, not other above from that beneath. As our grace begins our glory, ſo it proportions it: Bleſſednеſſe ſtands in the perfect operation of the beſt faculties, about the perfecteſt object; that is, in the viſion, in the fruition of God. All his Saints ſee him, but ſome more cleerly; as the ſame Sunne is ſeen of all eyes, not with equall ſtrength. Such as the eye of our faith was to ſee him that is inviſible, ſuch is the eye of our preſent apprehenſion to ſee as we are ſeen. Who ſees not, that our rewards are according to our works? not for them, as on merit (woe be to that ſoule which hath but what it earneth) but after them, as their rule of proportion: and theſe, how ſenſibly unequall? One gives but a cup of cold water to a diſciple, another gives his blood for the Maſter. Different works have different wages, not of deſert, but of mercy. Five talents well imployed, carry away more recompence than two; yet both approved, both rewarded with their Maſters joy. Who can ſtick at this, that knows thoſe heavenly ſpirits (to whom we ſhall be like) are marſhalled by their Maker into ſeverall ranks? He that was rapt into their element, and ſaw their bleſſed orders, as from his owne knowledge, hath ſtiled them, Thrones, Principalities, Powers, Dominions. If in one part of this Celeſtiall Family, the great Houſholder hath thus ordered it, why not in the other? yea even in this he hath inſtanced; You ſhall ſit on twelve Thrones, and judge the twelve Tribes of Iſrael. If he mean not ſome preheminence to his Apoſtles, how doth he anſwer, how doth he ſatisfie them? Yet more: Lazarus is in Abrahams boſome: therefore Abraham is more honoured than Lazarus. I ſhall need no more proofes, if from heaven you ſhall look downe into the great Gulfe, and there ſee diverſity of torments according to the value of ſinnes. Equality of offences, you acknowledge an idle Paradox of the Stoicks: to hold unequall ſins equally puniſhed, were more abſurd, and more injurious to Gods juſtice: There is but one fire, which yet otherwiſe burns the ſtraw, otherwiſe wood and yron. He that made and commands this dungeon, theſe tortures, tells us that the wilfully diſobedient ſhall ſmart with moe ſtripes; the ignorant with fewer. Yet ſo conceive of theſe heavenly degrees, that the leaſt is glorious. So doe theſe veſſels differ, that all are full: there is no want in any, no envy. Let us ſtrive for a place, not ſtrive for the order: how can we wiſh to be more than happy?

Your other queſtion is of our mutuall knowledge above; the hope whereof (you think) would give much contentment to the neceſſity of our parture: for both we are loth not to know thoſe whom we love, and we are glad to think we ſhall know them happy: whereof (if it may comfort you) I am no leſſe confident. If I may not goe ſo farre, as with the beſt of the Fathers, to ſay we ſhall know one anothers thoughts, I dare ſay, our perſons we ſhall; our knowledge, our memory, are not there loſt, but perfected: yea, I feare not to ſay we ſhall know both our miſeries paſt, and the preſent ſufferings of the damned. It makes our happineſſe not a little the ſweeter, to know that we were miſerable, to know that others are and muſt be miſerable: wee ſhall know them; not feele them. Take heed, that you clearly diſtinguiſh betwixt ſpeculation and experience. We are then farre out of the reach of evils. We may ſee them to comfort us, not to afflict us. Who doubts that theſe eyes ſhall ſee, and know the glorious manhood of our bleſſed Saviour, advanced above all the powers of heaven? And if one body, why not more? And if our elder brother, why no more of our ſpirituall fraternity? Yea if the twelve thrones of thoſe Judges of Iſrael ſhall be conſpicuous; how ſhall we not acknowledge them? And if theſe, who ſhall reſtraine us from more? You will eaſily grant, that our love can never faile: Faith and hope give place to ſight, to preſent fruition; for theſe are of things not ſeen: but love is perpetuall, not of God only, but his Saints: For nothing ceaſes, but our earthly parts, nothing but what ſavours of corruption. Chriſtian love is a grace, and may well challenge a place in heaven: and what love is there, of what we know not? More plainly; If the three Diſciples in Tabor knew Moſes and Elias, how much more ſhall wee know them in Gods Sion? Laſtly, (for it is a letter, not a volume, that I intended in this not neceſſary, but likely diſcourſe) that famous parable can tell you, that thoſe which are in hell, may know ſingular and ſeverall perſons, though diſtant in place. The rich Glutton knows Lazarus and Abraham. I heare what you ſay; It is but a parable: neither will I preſſe you with the contrary authoritie of Ambroſe, Tertullian, Gregory, Hierome, or any Father; nor with that univerſall rule of Chryſoſtome, that thoſe onely are parables, where examples are expreſſed, and names concealed: I yeeld it; yet all holy parables have their truths, at leaſt their probabilities. Deny this, and you diſable their uſe, wrong their Author. Our Saviour never ſaid ought was done, that cannot be: and ſhall then the damned retaine ought, which the glorified loſe? No man ever held that the ſoule was advantaged by torment. Comfort you therefore in this; you ſhall know and be knowne. But farre be from hence all carnall and earthly thoughts; as if your affections ſhould be (as below) doubled to your wife or childe. Nature hath no place in glory: here is no reſpect of bloud, none of mariage. This groſſer acquaintance and pleaſure is for the Paradiſe of Turkes, not the Heaven of Chriſtians. Here is, as no mariage, (ſave betwixt the Lambe and his Spouſe the Church) ſo no matrimoniall affections. You ſhall rejoyce in your glorified childe; not as your childe, but as glorified. In briefe, let us ſo enquire of our company, that above all things we ſtrive to be there our ſelves, where wee are ſure, if wee have not what we imagined, we ſhall have more than we could imagine.

To Mr. T. L.

EPIST. VII. Concerning the matter of Divorce in caſe of apparant adultery, adviſing the innocent partie of the fitteſt courſe in that behalfe.

ALL intermedling is attended with danger; and ever ſo much more, as the band of the parties contending, is nearer and ſtraiter: how can it then want peril, to judge betwixt thoſe which are, or ſhould be one fleſh? yet great neceſſities require hazard. My profeſſion would juſtly check me, if I preferred not your conſcience to my owne love. I pity and lament, that your owne boſome is falſe to you; that your ſelfe with ſhame, and with ſinne, are pulled from your ſelfe, and given to whom you would not: An injury that cannot be parallelled upon earth; and ſuch as may without our wonder, diſtract you: ſleight croſſes are digeſted with ſtudy, and reſolution; greater with time; the greateſt, not without ſtudy, time, councell. There is no extreme evil, whoſe evaſions are not perplexed. I ſee here miſcheife on either hand: I ſee you beſet, not with griefes only, but dangers. No man ever more truly held a Wolfe by the eare; which he can neither ſtay, nor let goe with ſafely. Gods ancient Law would have made a quick diſpatch, and have determined the caſe, by the death of the offender, and the liberty of the innocent; and not it alone. How many heathen Law-givers have ſubſcribed to Moſes? Arabians, Grecians, Romans, yea very Gothes, the dregs of Barbariſme, have thought this wrong not expiable, but by bloud. With us, the

A the easinesse of revenge, as it yeelds frequence of offences, so multitude of doubts: Whether the wronged husband should conceale, or complaine: complaining, whether he should retaine or dismisse: dismissing, whether he may marry, or must continue single: not continuing single, whether he may receive his owne, or chuse another: but your inquiries shall be my bounds. The fact (you say) is too evident. Let me aske you; To your selfe, or to the world. This point alone must vary our proceedings. Publike notice requires publike discharge. Private wrongs are in our owne power: publike, in the hands of authoritie. The thoughts of our owne brests, while they smother themselves within us, are at our command, whether for suppressing, or expressing; but if they once have vented themselves by words, unto otherseares, now (as common strayes) they must stand to the hazard of censure: such are our actions. Neither the sword, nor the Keyes meddle within doors, and what but they without?
B If fame have laid hold on the wrong, prosecute it, cleer your name, cleer your house, yea Gods. Else you shall be reputed a Pandar to your owne bed: and the second shame shall surpasse the first, so much as your own fault can more blemish you, than another. If there were no more; he is cruelly mercifull, that neglects his owne fame. But what if the sin were shrouded in secrecy? The loathsomnes of vice consists not in common knowledge. It is no lesse hainous, if lesse talked of. Report gives but shame. God & the good soule detest close evils. Yet then I aske not of the offence, but of the offender; not of her crime, but her repentance. She hath sinned against heaven & you. But hath she washed your polluted bed with her teares? Hath her true sorrow beene no lesse apparant than her sin? Hath she peeced her old vow with new protestations of fidelity? Doe you find her at once humbled and changed? Why should that eare be deaf to her praiers, that was open to her accusation? why is there not yet place for mer-
C cy? Why doe we Christians live as under Martiall law, wherein we sin but once? Plead not authority: Civilians have been too rigorous: the mercifull sentence of Divinity, shal sweetly temper humane severenesse. How many have we known the better for their sinne? That Magdalene (her predecessour in filthinesse) had never loved so much, if she had not so much sinned. How oft hath Gods Spouse deserved a divorce? which yet still her confessions, her teares have reversed. How oft hath that scroll been written, and signed; and yet againe cancelled, and torne, upon submission? His actions, not his words onely, are our precepts: Why is man cruell, where God relents? The wrong is ours onely, for his sake; without whose law, were no sinne. If the Creditor please to remit the debt, doe standers-by complaine? But if shee be at once filthy, and obstinate, flie from her bed, as contagious. Now your benevolence is adultery; you impart your body to her, shee her sinne to you: A dangerous ex-
D change; An honest body for an harlots sinne: Herein you are in cause that she hath more than one adulterer. I applaud the rigour of those ancient Canons, which have still roughly censured even this cloak of vice: As there is necessity of charity in the former, so of justice in this. If you can so love your wife, that you detest not her sinne, you are a better husband than a Christian, a better bawd than an husband. I dare say no more upon so generall a relation; good Physitians in dangerous diseases dare not prescribe on bare sight of urine, or uncertaine report, but will feele the pulse & see the symptomes, ere they resolve on the receit. You see how no niggard I am of my counsels: would God I could as easily asswage your griefe, as satisfie your doubts.

To Mr. Robert Hay.

E EPIST. VIII. A discourse of the continuall exercise of a Christian, how he may keepe his heart from hardnesse, and his wayes from error.

TO keep the heart in ure with God, is the highest task of a Christian. Good motions are not frequent: but the constancy of good disposition is rare and hard. This work must be continuall, or else speedeth not: like as the body from a setled and habituall distemper must be recovered by long diets; and so much the rather for that we cannot intermit here without relapses. If this field be not tilled every day, it wil run out into thistles. The evening is fittest for this work: when retired into our selves, ſelves, we muſt cheerefully, and conſtantly, both look up to God, and into our hearts; as we have to doe with both: to God in thankſgiving firſt, then in requeſt. It ſhall be therefore expedient for the ſoule, duly to recount to it ſelfe all the ſpecialties of Gods favours: a confuſed thanks ſavours of careleſneſſe, and neither doth affect us, nor win acceptance above. Bethink your ſelfe then of all theſe externall, inferiour, earthly graces: that your being, breathing, life, motion, reaſon, is from him; that hee hath given you a more noble nature, than the reſt of the creatures, excellent faculties of the mind, perfection of ſenſes, ſoundneſſe of body, competency of eſtate, ſeemelineſſe of condition, fitneſſe of calling, preſervation from dangers, reſcue out of miſeries, kindneſſe of friends, carefulneſſe of education, honeſty of reputation, libertie of recreations, quietneſſe of life, opportunitie of well-doing, protection of Angels. Then riſe higher to his ſpirituall favours, though here on earth, and ſtrive to raiſe your affections with your thoughts: Bleſſe God that you were borne in the light of the Goſpell, for your profeſſion of the truth, for the honour of your vocation, for your incorporating into the Church, for the privilege of the Sacraments, the free uſe of the Scriptures, the communion of Saints, the benefit of their prayers, the aid of their counſels, the pleaſure of their converſation; for the beginnings of regeneration, any foot-ſteps of faith, hope, love, zeale, patience, peace, joy, conſcionableneſſe, for any deſire of more. Then let your ſoule mount higheſt of all, into her heaven, and acknowledge thoſe celeſtiall graces of her election to glory, redemption from ſhame and death, of the interceſſion of her Saviour, of the preparation of her place; and there let her ſtay a while upon the meditation of her future joyes. This done, the way is made for your requeſt; Sue now to your God; as for grace to anſwer theſe mercies, ſo to ſee wherein you have not anſwered them: From him therefore caſt your eyes downe upon your ſelfe: and as ſome carefull Juſticer doth a ſuſpected felon, ſo doe you ſtrictly examine your heart, of what you have done that day; of what you ſhould have done, enquire whether your thoughts have beene ſequeſtred to God, ſtrangers from the world, fixed on heaven; whether juſt, charitable, lowly, pure, Chriſtian; whether your ſenſes have beene holily guided, neither to let in temptations, nor to let out ſinnes; whether your ſpeeches have not beene offenſive, vaine, raſh, indiſcreet, unſavoury, unedifying; whether your actions have beene warrantable, expedient, comely, profitable. Thence, ſee if you have beene negligent in watching your heart, expence of your time, exerciſes of devotion, performance of good workes, reſiſtance of temptations, good uſe of good examples: and compare your preſent eſtate with the former: looke jealouſly, whether your ſoule hath gained or loſt; loſt ought of the heat of her love, tenderneſſe of conſcience, feare to offend; ſtrength of vertue; gained, more increaſe of grace, more aſſurance of glory. And when you find (alas! who can but find?) either holineſſe decayed, or evill done, or good omitted, caſt downe your eyes, ſtrike your breſt, humble your ſoule, and ſigh to him whom you have offended; ſue for pardon as for life, heartily, yearningly: injoyne your ſelfe carefull amendment, redouble your holy reſolutions, ſtrike hands with God in a new covenant: my ſoule for your ſafety. Much of this good counſell I confeſſe to have learned from the Table of an unknowne Author, at Antwerp. It contented me: and therfore I have thus made it (by many alterations) my owne for forme, and yours for the uſe: Our practice ſhall both commend it, and make us happy.

EPIST. IX. Diſcourſing of the lawfulneſſe of converſation and trade with Infidels and Hereticks, and ſhewing how farre and wherein it is allowable.

IN matter of ſin I dare not diſcommend much feare. Looſeneſſe is both a more ordinary fault, and more dangerous, than exceſſe of care: yet herein the mind may be unjuſtly tortured, and ſuffer without gaine. It is good to know our bounds, and keepe them; that ſo we may neither be carelеſly offenſive, nor needleſly afflicted.

How

How farre wee may travell to, and converſe with Infidels, with Heretikes, is a long demand, and cannot be anſwered at once. I ſee extremes on both hands, and a path of truth betwixt both, of no ſmall latitude. Firſt, I commend not this courſe to you; it is well, if I allow it. The earth is large, and truth hath ample Dominions; and thoſe not incommodious, not unpleaſant. To neglect the maine bleſſings with competency of the inferiour; for abundance of the inferiour, without the maine, were a choice unwiſe and unequall. While we are free, who would take ought but the beſt? Whither goe you? Have wee not as temperate a Sunne, as faire an Heaven, as fertile an Earth, as rich a Sea, as ſweet Companions? What ſtand I on equality? a firmer peace, a freer Goſpell, an happier government than the world can ſhew you? yet you muſt goe: I give you allowance; but limited, and full of cautions: like an inquiſitive Officer, you muſt let me aske, who, how, when, whither, why, how long, and accordingly determine. To communicate with them in their falſe ſervices, who will not ſpit at, as impious? We ſpeake of converſing with men, not with idolatries: civilly, not in Religion: not in works of darkneſſe, but buſineſſe of commerce and common indifferencies. Fie on thoſe Rimmonites, that plead an upright ſoule in a proſtrate body: Hypocrites, that pretend a Nathanael in the skin of a Nicodemus. God hates their ſecret halting, & will revenge it. Let goe their vices, & ſpeak of their perſons: Thoſe may be converſed with; not with familiarity, not with intireneſſe; as men qualified, not as friends. Traffique is here allowed, not amity, not friendſhip, but peace. Paul will allow you to feaſt at their table, not to frequent it: yet not this to all. Chriſtianity hath all ſtatures in it, all ſtrengths: children, and men, weaklings, Giants. For a feeble ungrounded Chriſtian, this very company is dangerous: ſafe for the ſtrong and inſtructed. Turne a child looſe into an Apothecaries ſhop, or an Idiot, that gally-pot which looks faireſt, ſhall have his firſt hand, tho full of poyſonous drugs: where the judicious would chuſe the wholeſomeſt, led not by ſenſe, but skill. Setledneſſe in the truth will cauſe us to hate & ſcorne ridiculous impiety: & that hate will ſettle us the more; where the unſtayed may grow to leſſe diſlike, and indanger his own infection. He had need be a reſolute Caleb that ſhould go to ſee the land of Canaan; yet not ſuch a one, upon every occaſion: meere pleaſure or curioſity I dare not allow in this adventure. The command of authority, or neceſſity of traffique, I cannot reject: Or if after ſufficient prevention, deſire to informe our ſelves thorowly in a forain Religion, or ſtate (eſpecially for publike uſe) carry us abroad, I cenſure not. In all matter of danger, a calling is a good warrant; and it cannot want perill to goe unſent: Neither is there ſmall weight in the quality of the place, and continuance of the time. It is one caſe where the profeſſion of our Religion is free, another where reſtrained; perhaps not without conſtraint to idolatry: where wee have meanes for our ſoules, and allowed Miniſtery, the cauſe muſt needs differ from a place of neceſſary blindneſſe of peeviſh ſuperſtition. To paſſe thorow an infected place is one thing, to dwell in it another: Each of theſe give a new ſtate to the cauſe, and looke for a divers anſwer. But as in all theſe outward actions, ſo here, moſt force (I confeſſe) lies in the intention; which is able to give not toleration only, to our travell, but praiſe. To converſe with them without, but in a purpoſe of their converſion, and with endevour to fetch them in, can be no other than an holy courſe: wherin that the Jeſuits have been (by their owne ſaying) more ſerviceable in their Indies & China; let them thank (after their number and leiſure) their ſhelter of Spaine: the opportunity of whoſe patronage hath preferred them to us; not their more forward deſires. In ſhort, companying with infidels may not be ſimply condemned; who can hold ſo, that ſees Lot in Sodom, Iſrael with the Ægyptians, Abrahaham and Iſaac with their Abimelechs; Roſes among thornes, and pearles among much mud; and, for all, Chriſt among Publicans & Sinners? ſo we neither bee infected by them, nor they further infected by our confirmation; nor the weake Chriſtian by us infected with offence; nor the Goſpell infected with reproch, what danger can there be? If neither we, nor they, nor the weak, nor (which is higheſt) the name of God be wronged, who can complaine? You have mine opinion; diſpoſe now of your ſelfe as you dare: The earth is the Lords, and you are his; whereſoever he ſhall find you, be ſure you ſhall find him every where.

To the Gentlemen of his Highneſſe Court.

EP. X. A deſcription of a good and faithfull Courtier.

WHiles I adventured other Characters into the light, I reſerved one for you; whom I account no ſmall part of my joy; The Character of what you are, of what you ſhould be: Not that I arrogate to my ſelfe, more than ordinary skill in theſe high points: I deſire not to deſcribe a Courtier; How ſhould I, that have but ſeene and ſaluted the ſeat of Princes? Or why ſhould I, whoſe thoughts are ſequeſtred to the Court of heaven? But if I would decypher a good Courtier, who can herein controll my endevour? Goodneſſe in all formes is but the juſt ſubject of our profeſſion: what my obſervation could not, no leſſe certaine rule ſhall afford me. Our diſcourſe hath this freedome, that it may reach beyond our eyes with beleefe. If your experience agree not with my ſpeculation, diſtruſt me. I care not for their barking, which condemne me, at firſt, of incongruity: as if theſe two tearmes were ſo diſſonant, that one ſentence could not hold them. The Poet ſlanders, that abandons all good men from Courts. Who knowes not that the Ægyptian Court had a Moſes; the Court of Samaria, an Obadiah; of Ieruſalem an Ebed-melech; of Damaſcus a Naaman; of Babylon a Daniel, of Æthiopia a good Treaſurer; and very Nero's Court in Pauls time, his Saints? That I may not tell, how the Courts of Chriſtian Princes have been likened by our eccleſiaſticall Hiſtorians, to ſome royall Colleges for their order, gravity, goodneſſe mixed with their Majeſty; and that I may willingly forbeare to compare (as, but for envy, I durſt) yours with theirs; I ſpeake boldly, the Court is as nigh to heaven as the Cell, and doth no leſſe require and admit ſtrict holineſſe. I baniſh therefore hence all impiety, and dare preſage his ruine, whoſe foundation is not laid in goodneſſe. Our Courtier is no other than vertuous, and ſerves the God of heaven as his firſt Maker, and from him derives his duty to theſe earthen gods; as one that knowes the thrones of heaven and earth are not contrary, but ſubordinate, and that beſt obedience ſprings from devotion: his ability and will have both conſpired to make him perfectly ſerviceable, and his diligence waits but for an opportunity. In the factions of ſome great rivals of honour, hee holds himſelfe in a free neutrality, accounting it ſafer in unjuſt frayes to looke on, than to ſtrike; and if neceſſity of occaſion will needs winde him into the quarrell, hee chuſes not the ſtronger part, but the better; reſolving rather to fall with innocence and truth, than to ſtand with powerfull injuſtice. In the changes of favours and frownes hee changeth not; his ſincere honeſty beares him thorow all alterations, with wiſe boldneſſe, if not with ſucceſſe: and when he ſpies clouds in the eyes of his Prince, (which of long hee will not ſeeme to ſee) his cleere heart gives him a cleere face; and if hee may be admitted, his loyall breath ſhall ſoone diſpell thoſe vapors of ill ſuggeſtion: but if after all attempts of wind and Sun he ſees them ſetled, and the might of his accuſers will not let him ſeeme as he is; he gives way in ſilence, without ſtomach, and waits upon time. Hee is not over-haſtily intent upon his owne promotion; as one that ſeeks his Prince, not himſelfe; and ſtudies more to deſerve than riſe, ſcorning either to grow great by his owne bribes, or rich by the bribes of others. His officious ſilence craves more than others words; and if that language bee not heard, nor underſtood, hee opens his mouth, yet late and ſparingly; without baſhfulneſſe, without importunity; caring onely to motion, not caring to plead. He is affable and courteous; not vainly popular, abaſing his Princes favour to wooe the worthleſſe applauſe of the vulgar; approving by his actions that hee ſeekes one, not many; if not rather one in many. His Alphabet is his Princes diſpoſition; which once learned, he plies with diligent ſervice, not with flattery; not commending every action as good, nor the beſt too much, and in preſence. When he finds an apparant growth of favour, hee dares not glory in it to others, leſt hee ſhould ſolicite their envy, and hazard the ſhame of his owne owne fall; but enjoyes it in quiet thankfulneſſe: not neglecting it, nor drawing it on too faſt: Over-much forwardneſſe argues no perpetuity. How oft have we known the weake beginnings of a likely fire ſcattered with over-ſtrong a blaſt? And if another riſe higher, he envieth not; only emulating that mans merit, and ſuſpecting his owne. Neither the name of the Court, nor the grace of a Prince, nor applauſe of his inferiors, can lift him above himſelfe, or lead him to affect any other than a wiſe mediocrity. His owne ſincerity cannot make him over-credulous. They are few and well tried, whom he dares uſe; or perhaps obliged by his owne favours: ſo in all employments of friendſhip he is wary without ſuſpition, and without credulity charitable. Hee is free as of heart, ſo of tongue, to ſpeake what he ought, not what he might: never but (what Princes eares are not alwayes inured to) meere Truth: yet that, tempered for the meaſure, and time, with honeſt diſcretion. But if he meet with ought that might be beneficiall to his Maſter, or the State, or whoſe concealment might prove prejudiciall to either, neither feare nor gaine can ſtop his mouth. He is not baſely querulous, not forward to ſpend his complaints on the diſgraced, not abiding to build his owne favours upon the unjuſt ruines of an oppreſſed fortune. The errors of his fellowes he reports with favour; their vertues with advantage. He is a good husband of his houres; equally deteſting idleneſſe and baſe diſports; and placing all his free time upon ingenuous ſtudies, or generous delights; ſuch as may make either his body or mind, more fit for noble ſervice. He liſteth not to come to councell uncalled, nor unbidden to intermeddle with ſecrets, whether of perſon, or ſtate; which yet once impoſed, he manageth, with ſuch fidelity and wiſdome, as well argue him to have refrained, not out of feare, but judgement. He knowes how to repay an injury with thanks, & a benefit with uſury; the one out of a wiſe patience without malicious cloſeneſſe; the other out of a bounteous thankfulneſſe. His life is his owne willing ſervant, and his Princes free vaſſall; which he accounts lent to him, that he may give it for his Maſter: the intercepting of whoſe harmes, he holds both his duty, and honour: and whether he be uſed as his ſword, or his ſhield, he doth both with cheerefulneſſe. He can ſo demeane himſelfe in his officious attendance, that he equally avoids ſatiety and oblivion; not needleſſly laviſh of himſelfe, to ſet out and ſhew his parts alwaies at the higheſt; nor wilfully concealed in great occaſions. He loves to deſerve and to have friends, but to truſt rather to his owne vertue. Reaſon and honeſty (next under religion) are his Councellers: which he followes without care of the event, not without foreſight. In a judgement of unkindneſſe and envy, he never caſts the firſt ſtone, and hates to pick thanks by detraction. He undertakes none but worthie ſutes, ſuch as are free from baſeneſſe and injuſtice; ſuch as is neither ſhame to aske, nor diſhonour to grant; not ſuffering private affections to over-weigh publike equitie or convenience; and better brooking a friends want, than an ill preſident; and thoſe which he yeeldeth to accept, hee loves not to linger in an afflicting hope: a preſent anſwer ſhall diſpatch the feares or deſires of his expecting client. His breſt is not a ciſterne to retaine, but as a conduit-pipe, to vent the reaſonable and honeſt petitions of his friend. Finally, he ſo lives, as one that accounts not Princes favours hereditary; as one that will deſerve their perpetuity, but doubt their change; as one that knowes there is a wide world beſide the Court, and above this world an Heaven.

THE FOVRTH DECAD.

To Mr. VValter Fitzwilliams.

Ep. I. A diſcourſe of the true and lawfull uſe of pleaſures; how we may moderate them, how we may enjoy them with ſafety.

INdeed; wherein ſtands the uſe of wiſdome, if not in tempering our pleaſures and ſorrowes? and ſo diſpoſing our ſelves in ſpight of all occurrents, that the world may not blow upon us with an unequall gale, neither tearing our ſailes, nor ſlackning them. Events will varie; If we continue the ſame, it matters not: nothing can overturne him, that hath power over himſelfe. Of theſe two, I confeſſe it harder to manage proſperity, & to avoid hurt from good: ſtrong and cold winds doe but make us gather up our cloake more round, more cloſe: but to keep it about us in a hot Sun-ſhine, to run and not ſweat; to ſweat and not faint; how difficult it is! I ſee ſome that avoid pleaſures for their danger, and which dare not but abandon lawfull delights for feare of ſinne; who ſeeme to me like ſome ignorant Metalliſts, which caſt away the precious Ore, becauſe they cannot ſeparate the gold from the droſſe; or ſome ſimple Jew, that condemnes the pure ſtreames of Iordan, becauſe it fals into the dead Sea. Why doe not theſe men refuſe to eat, becauſe meat hath made many gluttons? Or how dare they cover themſelves, that know there is pride in rags? Theſe hard Tutors, if not Tyrants, to themſelves, whiles they pretend a mortified ſtrictneſſe, are injurious to their owne liberty, to the liberality of their Maker: wherefore hath he created and given the choice commodities of this earth, if not for uſe? or why placed he Man in a Paradiſe, not in a Deſart? How can we more diſpleaſe a liberall friend, than to depart from his delicate feaſt wilfully hungry? They are deceived that call this holineſſe; it is the diſeaſe of a minde ſullen, diſtruſtfull, impotent: There is nothing but euill, which is not from heaven; and he is none of Gods friends, that rejects his gifts for his owne abuſe. Heare me therefore, and true Philoſophy; There is a nearer way than this, and a fairer; if you will be a wiſe Chriſtian, tread in it. Learne firſt by a juſt ſurvey, to know the due and lawfull bounds of pleaſure; and then beware, either to goe beyond a known Mere, or in the licence of your owne deſires to remove it. That God, that hath curb'd in the fury of that unquiet and foaming element, and ſaid of old, Here ſhalt thou ſtay thy proud waves, hath done no leſſe for the rage of our appetite. Behold our limits are not obſcure; which if we once paſſe, our inundation is perillous and ſinfull. No juſt delight wanteth either his warrant, or his tearmes. More plainly be acquainted both with the quality of pleaſures, and the meaſure: Many a ſoule hath loſt it ſelfe in a lawfull delight, through exceſſe: and not fewer have periſhed in thoſe, whoſe nature is vicious, without reſpect of immoderation. Your care muſt avoid both. The taſte of the one is deadly; of the other, a full carouſe:

carouse: and in truth, it is easier for a Christian, not to taste of that, than not to be drunke with this: The ill is more easily avoided, than the indifferent moderated. Pleasure is of a winding and serpentine nature; admit the head, the body will aske no leave: and sooner may you stop the entrance, than stay the proceeding. Withall, her insinuations are so cunning, that you shall not perceive your excesse, till you be sicke of a surfet. A little honey is sweet; much, fulsome. For the attaining of this temper then, settle in your selfe a right estimation of that wherein you delight: resolve every thing into his first matter, and there will be more danger of contempt, than over-joying. What are the goodly sumptuous buildings we admire, but a little burnt and hardned earth? What is the stately and wondrous building of this humane body, whose beauty we doat upon, but the same earth we tread on, better tempered; but worse, when it wants his guest? What are those precious metals whom we worship, but veines of earth better coloured? What are costly robes, but such as are given of wormes, and consumed of moths? Then, from their beginning, looke to their end, and see laughter conclude in teares; see death in this sweet pot. Thy conscience scourges thee with a long smart for a short liberty; and for an imperfect delight, gives thee perfect torment: Alas, what an hard peny-worth; so little pleasure for so much repentance! Enjoy it, if thou canst: but if while the sword hangs over thee in an horses haire, still threatning his fall and thine, thou canst be securely jocund; I wonder, but envie not. Now I heare you recall me, and after all my discourse (as no whit yet wiser) inquire by what rule our pleasures shall be judged immoderate? We are all friends to our selves, and our indulgence will hardly call any favour too much. I send you not (tho I might) to your body, to your calling, for this triall; while your delights exclude not the presence, the fruition of God, you are safe: the love of the medicine is no hinderance to the love of health; let all your pleasures have reference to the highest good, and you cannot exceed. You see the Angels sent about Gods messages to this earth; yet never out of their heaven, never without the vision of their Maker. These earthly things cause not distraction, if we rest not in them, if we can looke thorow them, to their giver. The mind that desires them for their owne sakes, and suffers it selfe taken up with their sweetnesse as his maine end, is already drunken. It is not the use of pleasure that offends, but the affectation. How many great Kings have beene Saints? they could not have beene Kings without choice of earthly delights; they could not have beene Saints, with earthly affections. If God have mixed you a sweet cup, drinke it cheerefully; commend the taste, and be thankfull; but rejoyce in it as his. Use pleasures without dotage; as in God, from God, to God; you are all as free from errour, as misery.

EP. II. A discourse of the bloudy use of single combats; the injustice of all pretences of their lawfulnesse; setting forth the danger and sinfulnesse of this false and unchristian manhood.

YOu have received a proud challenge, and now hold your selfe bound upon termes of honour, to accept it. Heare first the answer of a friend, before you give an answer to your enemie; receive the counsell of love, ere you enter those courses of revenge: Thinke not you may reject me, because my profession is peace; I speake from him, which is not onely the Prince of Peace, but the God of Hosts; of whom if you will not learne to manage your hand and your sword, I shall grieve to see, that courage hath made you rebellious. Grant once that you are a Christian, and this victory is mine, I overcome, and you fight not? would God the fury of mens passions could be as easily conquered, as their judgements convinced; how many thousands had beene free from bloud! This conceit of false fortitude hath cost well-neere as many lives as lawfull warre, or as opinion of heresie. Let me tell you with

A you with confidence, that all duels or ſingle combats are murderous : blanch them over(how you liſt)with names of honour,and honeſt pretences ; their uſe is ſinfull, and their nature devilliſh.

Let us two, if you pleaſe, (before hand) enter into theſe liſts of words. Let reaſon (which is a more harmeleſſe fight) conflict with reaſon : Take whom you will with you into this field;of all the Philoſophers,Civilians,Canoniſts;for Divines(I hope) you ſhall find none;and let the right of this truth be tried upon a juſt induction.

I only premiſe this caution, (leſt we quarrell about the cauſe of this quarrell) that neceſſity muſt be excluded from theſe unlawfull fights;which ever alters their quality, and removes their evill : The defence of our life, the injunction of a Magiſtrate, are ever excepted:voluntarie combats are only queſtioned;or whoſe neceſſity we do not find, but make. There are not many cauſes that can draw us forth ſingle into the B field,with colour of equitie. Let the firſt be the triall of ſome hidden right; whether of innocence upon a falſe accuſation, or of title to inheritance, not determinable by courſe of Lawes ; A proceeding not tolerable among Chriſtians, becauſe it wants both warrant and certaintie. Where ever did God bid thee hazzard thy life for thy name ? Where did he promiſe to ſecond thee?When thou art without thy commandement, without his promiſe, thou art without thy protection. Hee takes charge of thee,but when thou art in thy wayes ; yea in his. If this be Gods way,where did hee chalke it out ? If thou want his Word, looke not for his aid. Miſerable is that man, which in dangerous actions is left to his owne keeping ; yea how plainly doth the event ſhew Gods diſlike ? How oft hath innocence lien bleeding in theſe combats, and guiltineſſe inſulted in the conqueſt? Thoſe very decretals(whom we oft cite not, often truſt not)report the inequality of this iſſue. Two men are brought to the barre, C oneaccuſes the other of theft,without further evidence,either to cleare or convince: The ſword is called for,both witneſſe,and Judge : They meet and combat : The innocent partie is ſlaine : The ſtollen goods are found after in other hands, and confeſſed. O the injuſtice of humane ſentences ! O wretched eſtate of the partie miſcarried ! his good name is loſt with his life, which hee would have redeemed with his valour: he both dies and ſinnes,while he ſtrives to ſeeme cleere of a ſinne. Therefore men ſay he is guilty, becauſe hee is dead, while the others wickedneſſe is rewarded with glorie. I am deceived,if in this caſe there were not three murderers; the Judge, the adverſary,himſelfe. Let no man challenge God for neglect of innocence,but rather magnifie him for revenge of preſumption. What he enjoynes, that he undertakes,he maintaines: Who art thou, O vaine man, that dareſt expect him a party in thine owne brawles? But there is no other way of triall. Better none than this. Inno- D cency or land is queſtioned ; and now we ſend two men into the liſts,to try whether is the better Fencer: what is the ſtrength or skill of the Champions, to the juſtice of the cauſe ? Wherefore ſerve our owne oathes? whereto witneſſe, records, lotteries, and other purgations? Or why put we not men as well to the old Saxon,or Livonian, Ordalian trials of hot irons,or ſcalding liquors ? It is farre better ſome truths ſhould be unknown,than unlawfully ſearched. Another cauſe ſeemingly warrantable may be the determining of warre, prevention of common bloudſhed : Two armies are ready to joyne battell, the field is ſure to bee bloudy on both ſides ; either part chuſes a champion ; they two fight for all : the life of one ſhall ranſome a thouſand. Our Philoſophers,our Lawyers ſhout for applauſe of this Monomachy,as a way neere,eaſie, ſafe : I dare not. Either the warre is juſt, or unjuſt : if unjuſt, the hazzard of one is too much;if juſt,too little. The cauſe of a juſt warre muſt be,beſides true,important; E the title common,wherein ſtill a whole ſtate is intereſſed;therfore may not,without raſhneſſe and tentation of God,be caſt upon two hands. The holy ſtory never records any,but a barbarous Philiſtine,to make this offer,and that in the preſumption of his unmatchableneſſe. Profane monuments report many,and ſome on this ground wiſely rejected. Tullus challenged Albanus,that the right of the two Hoſts might be decided by the two Captaines ; he returned a grave reply, (which I never read noted of cowardize) That this honour ſtood not in them two, but in the two Cities of Alba and Rome.

All

All causes of publike right are Gods: when we put to our hand in Gods cause, then we may look for his. In vaine we hope for successe, if we doe not our utmost; wherefore either warre must be determined without swords, or with many: why should all the heads of the Common-wealth stand upon the neck and shoulders of one champion? If he miscarry, it is injury to lose her; if he prevaile, yet it is injury to hazard her: yet respecting the parties themselves, I cannot but grant it neerest to equity, and the best of combats, that some bloud should be hazarded, that more might be out of hazard. I descend to your case, which is yet further from likelihood of approofe; for what can you plead but your credit? others opinion? You fight, not so much against anothers life, as your own reproach: you are wronged, and now if you challenge not; or you are challenged, and if you accept not, the world condemnes you for a coward: who would not rather hazard his life, than blemish his reputation? It were well, if this resolution were as wise as gallant. If I speake to a Christian, this courage must be rectified. Tell me, what world is this, whose censure you feare? Is it not that which God hath branded long agoe with Positus in maligno? Is it not that which hath ever misconstrued, discouraged, disgraced, persecuted goodnesse? that which reproached, condemned your Saviour? What doe you under these colours, if you regard the favour of that, whose amity is enmity with God? What care you for the censure of him, whom you should both scorne and vanquish? Did ever wise Christians, did ever your Master, allow either this manhood, or this feare? Was there ever any thing more strictly, more fearefully forbidden of him, than revenge in the challenge; than in the answer, paiment of evill; and murder in both? It is pity, that ever the water of Baptisme was spilt upon his face, that cares more to discontent the world, than to wrong God: He saith, Vengeance is mine; and you steale it from him in a glorious theft, hazarding your soule more than your body. You are weary of your selfe, while you thrust one part upon the sword of an enemy; the other, on Gods. Yet perhaps I have yeelded too much. Let goe Christians; The wiser world of men (and who else are worth respect) will not passe this odious verdict upon your refusall: valiant men have rejected challenges, with their honours untainted. Augustus, when he received a defiance, and brave appointment of combat from Antony, could answer him, That if Antony were weary of living, there were wayes enow besides to death. And that Scythian King returned no other reply to Iohn the Emperour of Constantinople. And Metellus challenged by Sertorius, durst answer scornfully, with his pen, not with his sword; That it was not for a Captaine to die a Souldiers death. Was it not dishonourable for these wise and noble Heathens to turne off these desperate offers. What law hath made it so with us? Shall I seriously tell you? Nothing but the meere opinion of some humorous Gallants, that have more heart than braine; confirmed by a more idle custome: Worthy grounds, whereon to spend both life and soule; whereon to neglect God, himselfe, posterity. Goe now and take up that sword, of whose sharpnesse you have boasted, and hasten to the field; whether you dye or kill, you have murdered. If you survive, you are haunted with the conscience of bloud; if you dye, with the torments; and if neither of these, yet it is murder, that you would have killed. See whether the fame of a brave fight can yeeld you a countervaileable redresse of these mischiefes: how much more happily valiant had it beene to Master your selfe, to feare sinne more than shame, to contemne the world, to pardon wrong, to preferre true Christianity before idle man-hood, to live and doe well.

To M. Mat. Milward.

Ep. III. A discourse of the pleasure of study and contemplation, with the varieties of scholarlike imployments, not without incitation of others thereunto; and a censure of their neglect.

I Can wonder at nothing more, than how a man can be idle; but of all other, a Scholar; in so many improvements of reason, in such sweetnesse of knowledge, in such variety of studies, in such importunity of thoughts. Other Artizans doe but practise,

A we ſtill learne; others run ſtill in the ſame gyre, to wearineſſe, to ſatiety; our choyce is infinite: other labours require recreations, our very labour recreates our ſports: we can never want, either ſomewhat to do, or ſomewhat that we would doe. How numberleſſe are thoſe volumes which men have written of Arts, of Tongues! How endleſſe is that volume which God hath written of the world! wherein every creature is a Letter, every day a new page: who can be weary of either of theſe? To find wit in Poetry, in Philoſophy Profoundneſſe, in Mathematicks acuteneſſe, in Hiſtory wonder of events, in Oratory ſweet eloquence, in Divinity ſupernaturall light and holy devotion; as ſo many rich metals in their proper mynes, whom would it not raviſh with delight? After all theſe, let us but open our eyes, we cannot look beſide a leſſon, in this univerſall Book of our Maker worth our ſtudy, worth taking out. What creature hath not his miracle? what event doth not challenge his obſervation? And if
B weary of foraine imployment, we liſt to look home into our ſelves, there we find a more private world of thoughts, which ſet us on worke a new, more buſily, not leſſe profitably; now, our ſilence is vocall, our ſolitarineſſe popular, and wee are ſhut up to doe good unto many. And if once we be cloyed with our owne company, the doore of conference is open; here interchange of diſcourſe (beſides pleaſure) benefits us: and he is a weake companion, from whom we returne not wiſer. I could envy, if I could beleeve that Anachoret, who ſecluded from the world, and pent up in his voluntary priſon-wals, denied that he thought the day long, whiles yet he wanted learning to vary his thoughts. Not to be cloyed with the ſame conceit, is difficult above humane ſtrength; but to a man ſo furniſhed with all ſorts of knowledge, that according to his diſpoſitions he can change his ſtudies, I ſhould wonder, that ever the Sun ſhould ſeeme to paſe ſlowly. How many buſie tongues chaſe away good houres in
C pleaſant chat, and complaine of the haſte of night! What ingenuous mind can be ſooner weary of talking with learned Authors, the moſt harmeleſſe and ſweeteſt of companions? What an heaven lives a Scholar in, that at once in one cloſe roome can dayly converſe with all the glorious Martyrs and Fathers? that can ſingle out, at pleaſure, either ſententious Tertullian, or grave Cyprian, or reſolute Hierome, or flowing Chryſoſtome, or divine Ambroſe, or devout Bernard, or (who alone is all theſe) heavenly Auguſtine, and talk with them, and heare their wiſe and holy counſels, verdicts, reſolutions: yea (to riſe higher) with courtly Eſay, with learned Paul, with all their fellow-Prophets, Apoſtles: yet more, like another Moſes, with God himſelfe, in D them both? Let the world contemne us: while wee have theſe delights, wee cannot envy them; we cannot wiſh our ſelves other than we are. Beſides, the way to all other contentments is troubleſome; the onely recompence is in the end. To delve in the mynes, to ſcorch in the fire for the getting, for the fining of gold, is a ſlaviſh toyle; the comfort is in the wedge; to the owner, not the labourers; where our very ſearch of knowledge is delightſome. Study it ſelfe, is our life; from which wee would not be barred for a world. How much ſweeter then is the fruit of ſtudy, the conſcience of knowledge? In compariſon whereof, the ſoule that hath once taſted it, eaſily contemnes all humane comforts. Goe now yee worldlings, and inſult over our paleneſſe, our needineſſe, our neglect. Yee could not be ſo jocund, if you were not ignorant: if E you did not want knowledge, you could not over-looke him that hath it: For me, I am ſo farre from emulating you, that I profeſſe, I had as leive be a bruit beaſt, as an ignorant rich man. How is it then that thoſe Gallants which have privilege of bloud and birth, and better education, doe ſo ſcornfully turne off theſe moſt manly, reaſonable, noble exereiſes of ſcholarſhip? An hawke becomes their fiſt better than a booke: No dog but is a better companion: Any thing, or nothing, rather than what we ought. O minds brutiſhly ſenſuall! Doe they think that God made them for diſport? who even in his Paradiſe would not allow pleaſure, without worke. And if for buſineſſe; either of body, or mind: Thoſe of the body are commonly ſervile, like it ſelfe. The mind therefore, the mind onely, that honourable and divine part, is fitteſt to be imployed of thoſe which would reach to the higheſt perfection of men, and would be more than the moſt. And what worke is there of the mind, but the trade of a ſcholar, ſtudy? Let mee therefore faſten this probleme on our Schoole-gates, and challenge all commers, in the defence of it; that, No Scholar cannot bee truly noble. And if I make it not good, let mee never bee admitted further than to the ſubject of our queſtion. Thus we doe well to congratulate, to our ſelves, our owne happineſſe: if others will come to us, it ſhall be our comfort, but more theirs; if not, it is enough that we can joy in our ſelves, and in him, in whom we are that we are.

To Mr. I. P.

Ep. IV. A diſcourſe of the increaſe of Popery; of the Oath of Allegeance; and the juſt ſufferings of thoſe which have refuſed it.

YOu ſay, your religion daily winneth. Brag not of your gaine: you neither need, nor can, if you conſider how it gets, and whom: How, but by cunning ſleights, falſe ſuggeſtions, impudent untruths? Who cannot thus prevaile againſt a quiet and innocent adverſary? Whom, but ſilly women, or men notoriouſly debauched? A ſpoyle fit for ſuch a conqueſt, for ſuch Victors. We are the fewer, not the worſe: if all our licentious hypocrites were yours, we ſhould not complaine: and you might be the prouder, not the better. Glory you in this triumph, free from our envy; who know we have loſt none, but (by whom you ſave nothing) either looſe or ſimple. It were pity that you ſhould not forgoe ſome in a better exchange. The ſea never incroacheth upon our ſhore, but it loſeth elſewhere: ſome we have happily fetcht into the fold of our Church, out of your waſts; ſome others (though few, and ſcarce a number) we have ſent into their heaven. Among theſe, your late ſecond Garnet liv'd to proclaime himſelfe a Martyr; and by dying, perſwaded. Poore man, how happy were he, if hee might be his owne Judge. That which gave him confidence, would give him glory: you beleeve, and well-neere adore him. That fatall cord of his was too little for reliques, though divided into Mathematick quantities. Whither cannot conceit lead us? whether for his reſolution, or your credulity? His death was feareleſſe: I commend his ſtomack, not his mind. How many malefactors have we knowne that have laughed upon their executioner, and jeſted away their laſt wind? You might know. It is not long ſince our Norfolke Arrian leapt at his ſtake. How oft have you learned in martyrdome to regard not the death, but the cauſe? Elſe there ſhould be no difference in guilt and innocence, error and truth. What then? Died he for Religion? This had beene but your owne meaſure: wee endured your flames which theſe gibbets could not acquit. But dare impudency it ſelfe affirme it? Not for meere ſhame, againſt the evidence of ſo many tongues, eares, records. Your Proſperity, your numbers argue enough, that a man may be a Papiſt in Britaine, and live. If treaſon bee your Religion, who will wonder that it is capitall? Defie that Devill which hath mockt you with this mad opinion, that treachery is holineſſe, devotion cruelty and diſobedience. I fore-ſee your evaſion: Alas, it is eaſie for a ſpightfull conſtruction to fetch Religion within this compaſſe; and to ſay the ſwelling of the Foxes fore-head is a horne. Nay then, let us fetch ſome honeſt Heathen to be Judge betwixt us: Meere nature in him ſhall ſpeake unpartially of both. To hold and perſwade, that a Chriſtian King may, yea muſt at the Popes will bee dethroaned, and murdered; is it the voyce of treaſon, or Religion? And if traiterous, whether flatly, or by miſ-inferring? Beſides his practiſes, for this hee died; witneſſe your owne Catholikes. O God, if this bee religion, what can be villany? Who ever died a Malefactor, if this be martyrdome? If this poſition be meritorious of heaven, hell is feared in vaine. O holy Scillæ, Marij, Catilines, Cades, Lopezes, Gowries, Vawxes, and who ever have conſpired againſt lawfull Majeſty! All Martyrs of Rome, all Saints of Beckets heaven. How well doe thoſe palmes of celeſtiall triumph become hands red with the ſacred bloud of Gods annointed? I am aſhamed to thinke, that humanity ſhould nouriſh ſuch Monſters, whether of men, or opinions. But you defie this ſavage factiouſneſſe, this devotion of Devils; and honeſtly wiſh both God and Cæſar his owne. I praiſe your moderation: but if you be true, let me yet ſearch you: Can a man be a perfect Papist, without this opinion against it? If he may, then your Garnet and Drury died not for religion: if hee may not, then Popery is treason. Chuse now whether you will leave your Martyrs, or your Religion. What you hold of merit, free-will, transubstantiation, invocation of Saints, false adoration, supremacy of Rome, no man presses, no man inquires: your present inquisition, your former examples would teach us; mercy will not let us learne. The only question is, Whether our King may live and rule; whether you may refraine from his bloud, and not sinne: Would you have a man denie this and not die? Would you have a man thus dying honoured Dare you approve that religion, which defends the fact, canonizes the person? I heare your answer, from that your great Champion, which not many daies since, with one blow hath driven out three (not slight) wedges: That not Civill obedience is stood upon, but Positive doctrine: That you are ready to sweare for the Kings safety, not against the Popes authoritie: King Iames must live and reigne; but Paulus Quintus must rule and be obeyed: and better were it for you to die, than your sworne allegeance should prejudice the Sea Apostolike. An elusion fit for children. What is to dally, if not this? As if he said, The King shal live, unlesse the Pope will not; That he shall not bee discrowned, deposed, massacred by your hands, unlesse your holy Father should command. But (I aske, as who should not?) What if he doe command? What if your Paulus Quintus should breath out (like his predecessors) not threatnings, but strong bellowings of Excommunications, of deposition of Gods annointed? What if he shall command (after that French fashion) the throats of all Heretikes to bleed in a night? Pardon you in this: Now it is growne a point of doctrinall Divinitie, to determine how far the power of Peters successor may extend: You may neither sweare, nor say your hands shall not be steep't in the bloud of your true Soveraigne; and to die rather than sweare it, is martyrdome. But what if heaven fall, say you? His Holinesse (as you hope) will take none such courses. Woe were us; if our safetie depended upon your hopes, or his mercies. Blessed be that God, which malgre hath made and kept us happie, and hath lift us above our enemies. But what hope is there; that hee who chargeth subjects not to sweare allegeance will never discharge them from allegeance; that those who clamorously and shamelesly complaine to the world of our cruelty, will forbeare to solicite others cruelty to us? Your hopes to you; to us our securities. Is this the Religion you father upon those Christian Patriarkes of the Primitive Age? O blessed Ireney, Clemens, Cyprian, Basil, Chrysostome, Augustine, Ierome, and thou the severest exactor of just censures, holy Ambrose! how would you have spet at such a rebellious assertion! What speake I of Fathers? whose very mention in such a cause were injury, were impiety. Which of those cursed heresies of ancient times (for to them I hold it fitter to appeale) have ever beene so desperately shameless, as to breed to maintaine a conceit so palpably unnaturall; unlesse perhaps those old Antitactæ may upon generall termes be compelled to patronize it, while they held it pietie to break, the lawes of their Maker? For you, if you professe not to love willing errors, by this suspect, and judge the rest: you see this defended with equall resolution, and with no lesse cheerefull expence of bloud. In the bodie, where you see one monstrous deformitie, you cannot affect; if you can doe so in your religion, yet how dare you? since the greater halfe of it stands on no other ground. Onely God make you wise, and honest, you shall shake hands with this faction of Poperie; and I with you, to give you a cheerefull welcome into the bosome of the Church.

The judgement of a Catholike English-man banished, &c. concerning the Apology of the Oath of Allegeance, intituled Triplici nodo, &c.

To my brother M. Sa. Hall.

Ep. V. A discourse of the great charge of the ministeriall function; together with particular directions for due preparation thereunto, and carriage therein.

IT is a great & holy purpose (deare Brother) that you have entertained, of serving God in his Church: for what higher, or more worthie imploiment can there be, than to doe these divine duties, to such a master, and such a mother? wherein yet

I ſhould little rejoice, if any neceſſity had caſt you upon this refuge: for I hate and grieve to think that any deſperate mind ſhould make Divinity but a ſhift, and diſhonour this Miſtreſſe by being forſaken of the world. This hath beene the drift of your education: to this you were borne, and dedicated in a direct courſe. I doe willingly incourage you, but not without many cautions. Enter not into ſo great a ſervice, without much fore-ſight. When your hand is at the plough, it is too late to looke back. Bethink your ſelfe ſeriouſly of the weight of this charge: and let your holy deſire bee allayed with ſome trembling. It is a fooliſh raſhneſſe of young heads, when they are in Gods chaire, to wonder how they came thither, and to forget the awfulneſſe of that place, in the confidence of their owne ſtrength; which is ever ſo much leſſe, as it is more eſteemed. I commend not the way-ward excuſes of Moſes, nor the peremptory unwillingneſſe of Ammonius, and Frier Thomas, who maimed themſelves that they might be wilfully uncapable. Betwixt both theſe there is humble modeſty, & religious fearfulnes, eaſily to be noted in thoſe whom the Church honors with the name of her Fathers, worthy your imitation: wherin yet you ſhal need no preſidents if you well conſider what worth of parts, what ſtrictneſſe of carriage, what weight of offices, God expects in this vocation. Know firſt, that in this place there will be more holineſſe required of you, than in the ordinary ſtation of a Chriſtian: for whereas before you were but as a common line, now God ſets you for a coppy of a ſanctification unto others, wherein every fault is both notable, and dangerous. Here is looked for a ſetled acquaintance with God, and experience both of the proceedings of grace and of the offers and repulſes of tentations; which in vaine we ſhall hope to menage in other hearts, if wee have not found in our owne. To ſpeake by aime, or rote of repentance, of contrition, of the degrees of regeneration, and faith, is both harſh and ſeldome when, not unprofitable. We truſt thoſe Phyſitians beſt, which have tried the vertue of their drugs, eſteeming not of thoſe which have only borrowed of their bookes. Here will be expected a free and abſolute government of affections, that you can ſo ſtere your owne veſſell, as not to bee tranſported with fury, with ſelfe-love, with immoderation of pleaſures, of cares, of deſires, with exceſſe of paſſions; in all which, ſo muſt you demeane your ſelfe, as one that thinks he is no man of the world but of God; as one too good (by his double calling) for that, which is either the felicity, or impotency of beaſts. Here muſt be continuall and inward exerciſe of mortification, and ſevere Chriſtianity, whereby the heart is held in due awe, and the weake flames of the ſpirit quickned, the aſhes of our dulneſſe blowne off; a practice neceſſary in him, whoſe devotion muſt ſet many hearts on fire: Here muſt bee wiſdome, and inoffenſiveneſſe of carriage, as of one that goes ever under monitors, and that knowes other mens indifferencies are his evils. No man had ſuch need to keep a ſtrict meane. Setting aſide contempt, even in obſervation, behold, wee are made a gazing ſtocke to the world, to Angels, to men. The very ſaile of your eſtate muſt bee moderated; which if it beare too high (as ſeldome) it incurres the cenſure of profuſion and Epicuriſme; if too low, of a baſe and unbeſeeming earthlineſſe; your hand may not be too cloſe for others need, nor too open for your owne; your converſation may not be rough and ſullen, nor over-familiar and fawning; whereof the one breeds a conceit of pride, and ſtrangeneſſe; the other, contempt; not looſely merry, nor Cynically unſociable; not contentious in ſmall injuries; in great, not hurtfully patient to the Church: your attire (for whither doe not cenſures reach?) not youthfully wanton; not, in theſe yeares affectedly ancient, but grave and comely, like the mind, like the behaviour of the wearer; your geſture like your habit, neither ſavoring of giddie lightneſſe, nor overly inſolence, nor wantonneſſe, nor dull neglect of your ſelfe; but ſuch as may beſeeme a mortified mind, full of worthy ſpirits: your ſpeech like your geſture, not ſcurrilous, not detracting, not idle, not boaſting, not rotten, not peremptorie; but honeſt, milde, fruitfull, ſavourie, and ſuch as may both argue and worke grace: your deliberations mature; your reſolutions well grounded; your devices ſage and holy. Wherein let me adviſe you, to walk ever in the beaten road of the Church; not to run out into ſingle paradoxes. And if you meet at any time with private conceits that ſeeme more probable, ſuſpect them and your ſelfe; and if they can win you to assent, yet smother them in your breſt, and do not dare to vent them out, either by your hand or tongue, to trouble the common peace. It is a miserable praise, to bee a witty disturber. Neither will it serve you to be thus good alone; but if God shall give you the honour of this estate, the world will look, you should be the grave guide of a well-ordered family: for this is proper to us, that the vices of our charge reflect upon us; the sinnes of others are our reproach. If another mans children miscarry, the Parent is pittied; if a Ministers, censured; yea, not our servant is faulty without our blemish. In all these occasions (a misery incident to us alone) our griefe is our shame. To descend neerer unto the sacred affaires of this heavenly trade; in a Minister Gods Church is accounted both his house to dwell in, and his field to worke in; wherein (upon the penalty of a curse) he faithfully, wisely, diligently, devoutly, deales with God for his people, with his people, for and from God. Whether he instruct, he must doe it with evidence of the spirit; or whether he reprove, with courage and zeale; or whether he exhort, with meeknesse, and yet with power; or whether he confute, with demonstration of truth, not with rage and personall maliciousnesse, not with a wilfull heat of contradiction; or whether he admonish, with long suffering, and love without prejudice, and partiality: in a word, all these he so doth, as he that desires nothing but to honour God, and save men. His wisdome must discerne betwixt his sheepe and wolves; in his sheepe, betwixt the wholesome and unsound; in the unsound, betwixt the weak and tainted; in the tainted, betwixt the natures, qualities, degrees of the disease and infection; and to all these he must know to administer a word in season. Hee hath Antidotes for all tentations, counsels for all doubts, evictions for all errors, for all languishings incouragements. No occasion from any altered estate of the soule may find him unfurnished; he must ascend to Gods Altar with much awe, with sincere and cheerefull devotion; so taking, celebrating, distributing his Saviour, as thinking himselfe at table in heaven with the blessed Angels. In the meane time, as hee wants not a thankfull regard to the Master of the feast, so not care of the guests. The greatnesse of an offender may not make him sacrilegiously partiall, nor the obscurity negligent. I have said little of any of our duties; and of some, nothing: yet enough, I think, to make you (if not timorous) carefull. Neither would I have you hereupon to hide your selfe from this calling, but to prepare your selfe for it. These times call for them that are faithfull: and if they may spare some learning; conscience they cannot. Goe on happily: it argues a mind Christianly noble, to be incouraged with the need of his labours, with the difficulties.

To Mrs. A. P.

EPIST. VI. A discourse of the signes and proofes of a true faith.

THere is no comfort in a secret felicity. To be happy, and not know it, is little above miserable. Such is your state: only herein better than the common case of the most; that the well of life lies open before you: but your eyes (like Agars) are not open to see it; whiles they have neither water, nor eyes. We doe not much more want that which we have not, than that which we do not know we have. Let mee sell you some of that spirituall eye-salve which the Spirit commends to his Laodiceans; that you may cleerely see how well you are. There is nothing but those scales betwixt you and happinesse. Thinke not much that I espy in you what your selfe sees not. Too much neerenesse oft-times hindreth sight: and if for the spots of our owne faces we trust others eyes, why not for our perfections? You are in heaven, and know it not: He that beleeves, is already passed from death to life: You beleeve, whiles you complaine of unbeleefe. If you complained not, I should misdoubt you more, than you doe your selfe, because you complaine. Secure and insolent presumption hath killed many, that breathes nothing but confidence and safety; and abandons all doubts, and condemnes them. That man never beleeved, that never doubted. This liquor of faith is never pure in these vessels of clay, without these lees of distrust.

What then? Think not that I incourage you to doubt more; but perſwade you not to be diſcouraged with doubting. All uncertainty is comfortleſſe: thoſe that teach men to conjecture and forbid to reſolve, read lectures of miſery. Thoſe doubts are but to make way for aſſurance; as the oft ſhaking of the tree, faſtens it more at the root. You are ſure of God, but you are afraid of your ſelfe. The doubt is not in his promiſe, but your application. Looke into your owne heart. How know you that you know any thing, that you beleeve, that you will, that you approve, that you affect any thing? If a man, like your ſelfe, promiſe you ought, you know whether you truſt him, whether you relye your ſelfe on his fidelity. Why can you not know it in him that is God and man? The difference is not in the act, but the object. But if theſe habits (becauſe of their inward and ambiguous nature) ſeeme hard to be deſcried; turne your eyes to thoſe open marks that cannot beguile you. How many have bragged of their Faith, when they have embraced nothing but a vaine cloud of preſumption? Every man repeats his Creed, few feele it, few practiſe it. Take two boughs in the dead of winter; how like is one wood to another? how hardly diſcerned? Afterwards, By their fruit you ſhall know them. That faith, whoſe nature was obſcure, is evident in his effects. What is faith, but the hand of the ſoule? What is the duty of the hand, but either to hold or worke? This hand then holds Chriſt, works obedience and holineſſe: and if this act of apprehenſion bee as ſecret, as the cauſe; ſince the cloſed hand hideth ſtill what it holdeth; ſee the hand of faith open; ſee what it worketh, and compare it with your own proofe. Deny if you can (yet I had rather appeale to any Judge, than your prejudiced ſelfe) that in all your needs you can ſtep boldly to the Throne of Heaven; and freely powre out your enlarged heart to your God, and crave of him, whether to receive what you want, or that you may want what you have, and would not. Be aſſured from God, this can be done by no power, but (that you feare to miſſe) of faith. God, as he is not, ſo he is not called a father without this. In vaine doth he pray, that cannot call God Father: No father without the ſpirit of adoption; no ſpirit, without faith: without this you may babble, you cannot pray. Aſſume you that you can pray, I dare conclude upon my ſoule, You beleeve. As little as you love your ſelfe, deny if you can, that you love God. Say that your Saviour from heaven ſhould aske you Peters queſtion, could your ſoule returne any other anſwer, than Lord thou knoweſt I love thee? Why are you elſe in ſuch awe to offend, that a world cannot bribe you to ſin? Why in ſuch deep griefe when you have ſinned, that no mirth can refreſh you? Why in ſuch fervent deſire of enjoying his preſence? Why in ſuch agony when you enjoy it not? neither doth God love you, neither can you love God without faith. Yet more: doe you willingly nouriſh any one ſin in your breſt; doe you not repent of all? Doe you not hate all, though you cannot leave all? Doe you not complaine that you hate them no more? Doe you not, as for life, wiſh for holineſſe, and endevour it? Nothing but faith can thus cleanſe the heart; that like a good houſ-wife, ſweeps all the foule corners of the ſoule, & will not leave ſo much as one web in this roomy houſe. Truſt to it, you cannot hate ſin for it owne ſake, and forſake it for Gods ſake, without faith; the faithleſſe hath had ſome remorſe and feares, never repentance. Laſtly, doe you not love a good man for goodneſſe, and delight in Gods Saints? Doth not your love lead you to compaſſion; your compaſſion to releeſe? An heart truly faithfull cannot but have an hand chriſtianly bountifull: Charity and faith make up one perfect paire of Compaſſes, that can take the true latitude of a Chriſtian heart: Faith is the one foot, pitcht in the centre unmoveably, while Charity walks about in a perfect circle of beneficence: theſe two never did, neither can goe aſunder: Warrant you your love, I dare warrant your faith: What need I ſay more? This heat of our affections, and this light of your workes, will evince againſt all the gates of hell, that you have the fire of Faith: let your ſoule then warme it ſelfe with theſe ſweet and cordiall flames, againſt all thoſe cold deſpaires, whereto you are tempted: ſay, Lord, I beleeve; and I will give you leave ſtill to adde, Helpe my unbeleefe.

To

To Mr. Ed. Alleyne,

Ep. VII. A direction how to conceive of God in our devotions and meditations.

YOu have choſen and judged well: How to conceive of the Deity in our prayers, in our meditations, is both the deepeſt point of all Chriſtianity, and the moſt neceſſary: ſo deepe, that if we wade into it, wee may eaſily drowne, never find the bottome: ſo neceſſary, that without it, our ſelves, our ſervices, are profane, irreligious: we are all borne Idolaters, naturally prone to faſhion God to ſome forme of our owne, whether of an humane body, or of an admirable light; or if our mind have any other more likely, and pleaſing image. Firſt then, away with all theſe wicked thoughts, theſe groſſe devotions; and with Iacob bury all your ſtrange gods under the oake of Shechem, ere you offer to ſet up Gods Alter at Bethel: and without all mentall repreſentations, conceive of your God purely, ſimply, ſpiritually; as of an abſolute being, without forme, without matter, without compoſition; yea, an infinite, without all limit of thoughts. Let your heart adore a ſpirituall Majeſty, which it cannot comprehend, yet knowes to be; and as it were, loſe it ſelfe in his infiniteneſſe. Thinke of him, as not to be thought of; as one, whoſe wiſdome is his juſtice, whoſe juſtice is his power, whoſe power is his mercy; and whoſe wiſdome, juſtice, power, mercy, is himſelfe; as without quality good, great without quantity, everlaſting without time, preſent every where without place, containing all things without extent: and when your thoughts are come to the higheſt, ſtay there, and be content to wonder, in ſilence: and if you cannot reach to conceive of him as he is, yet take heed you conceive not of him as he is not. Neither will it ſuffice your Chriſtian mind, to have this awfull and confuſed apprehenſion of the Deity, without a more ſpeciall and inward conceit of three in this one; three perſons in this one eſſence, not divided, but diſtinguiſhed; and not more mingled than divided. There is nothing, wherein the want of words can wrong and grieve us, but in this: Here alone, as wee can adore, and not conceive, ſo we can conceive, and not utter; yea, utter our ſelves, and not be conceived; yet as we may, Thinke here of one ſubſtance in three ſubſiſtences; one eſſence in three relations; one Jehovah begetting, begotten, proceeding; Father, Son, Spirit: yet ſo, as the Son is no other thing from the Father, but another perſon; or the Spirit, from the Son. Let your thoughts here walke warily; the path is narrow: the conceit either of three ſubſtances or but one ſubſiſtence, is damnable. Let me lead you yet higher, and further, in this intricate way, towards the Throne of grace: All this will not availe you, if you take not your Mediator with you: if you apprehend not a true manhood, glorioully united to the God-head, without change of either nature, without mixture of both; whoſe preſence, whoſe merits muſt give paſſage, acceptance, vigour to your prayers.

Here muſt be therefore (as you ſee) thoughts holily mixed: of a Godhead and humanity: one perſon in two natures: of the ſame Deity, in divers perſons, and one nature: wherein (if ever) heavenly wiſdome muſt beſtir it ſelfe, in directing us, ſo to ſever theſe apprehenſions, that none bee neglected; ſo to conjoyne them, that they be not confounded. O the depth of divine myſteries, more than can be wondred at! O the neceſſity of this high knowledge, which who attaines not, may babble, but prayeth not. Still you doubt, and aske if you may not direct your praiers to one perſon of three. Why not? Safely, and with comfort. What need we feare, while we have our Saviour for our patterne: O my Father (if poſſible) let this Cup paſſe: and Paul every where both in thanks and requeſts: but with due care of worſhipping all in one. Exclude the other, while you fix your heart upon one, your prayer is ſin; retaine all, and mention one, you offend not. None of them doth ought for us, without all. It is a true rule of Divines: All their externall works are common: To ſollicit one therefore, and not all, were injurious. And if you ſtay your thoughts upon the ſacred humanity of Chriſt, with inſeparable adoration of the God-head united, and thence climb up to the holy conceit of that bleſſed and dreadfull Trinity, I dare not cenſure, I dare not but commend your divine method. Thus ſhould Chriſtians aſcend from earth to heaven, from one heaven to another. If I have given your devotions any light, it is well: the leaſt glimpſe of this knowledge is worth all the full gleames of humane & earthly skill. But I miſtake, if your own heart wrought upon with ſerious meditations (under that ſpirit of illumination) will not prove your beſt Maſter. After this weake direction, ſtudy to conceive aright, that you may pray aright; and pray that you may conceive; and meditate that you may doe both: and the God of heaven direct you, inable you, that you may doe all.

To M. Thomas Iames of Oxford.

Ep. VIII. A diſcourſe of the grounds of the Papiſts confidence in appealing to the Fathers: applauding his worthy offers and endevours of diſcovering the falſifications and depravations of antiquity.

SIR, I know no man ſo like as you to make poſterity his debtor. I doe heartily congratulate unto you ſo worthy labours, ſo noble a project. Our adverſaries knowing of themſelves (that which Tertullian ſaith of all hereſies) that if appeale be made to the ſacred bench of Prophets and Apoſtles, they cannot ſtand; remove the ſuit of Religion craftily, into the Court of the Fathers: A reverend triall as any under heaven; where it cannot be ſpoken, how confidently they triumph ere the conflict. Give us the Fathers for our Judges (ſay Campian and Poſſevine) the day is ours. And whence is this courage? Is antiquity our enemy, their advocat? Certainly it cannot be truth that is new: We would renounce our Religion, if it could be over-lookt for time. Let goe equity, the older take both. There be two things then, that give them heart in this provocation: One, the baſtardy of falſe Fathers; the other, the corruption of the true. What a flouriſh doe they make with uſurped names? Whom would it not amaze to ſee the frequent citations of the Apoſtles owne Canons, Conſtitutions, Liturgies, Maſſes: of Clemens, Dennys the Areopagite, Linus, Hippolitus, Martiall of Burdeaux, Egeſippus: Donations of Conſtantine the great, and Lewis the godly: Of 50. Canons of Nice: of Dorotheus, Damaſus his Pontificall: Epiſtles decretall of Clemens, Evariſtus, Teleſphorus, and an hundred other Biſhops holy and ancient; of Evodius, Anaſtaſius, Simeon Metaphraſtes, and moe yet than a number moe; moſt whereof have crept out of the Vatican or Cloyſters; and all carry in them manifeſt brands of falſhood, and ſuppoſition: that I may ſay nothing of thoſe infinite writings, which either ignorance, or wilfulnes, hath fathered upon every of the Fathers, not without ſhameleſſe importunity, and groſſe impoſſibilities: all which (as ſhe ſaid of Peter) their ſpeech bewrayeth; or (as Auſten ſaid of Cyprians ſtile) their face. This fraud is more eaſily avoyded: For as in notorious burglaries, oft-times there is either an hat, or a glove, or a weapon left behind, which deſcrieth the authors; ſo the God of truth hath beſotted theſe impoſtors to let fall ſome palpable error, (though but of falſe calculation) whereby, if not their names, yet their ages might appeare, to their conviction. Moſt danger is in the ſecret corruption of the true and acknowledged iſſue of thoſe gracious parents; whom through cloſe and crafty handling, they have induced to belye thoſe that begot them; and to betray their Fathers, either with ſilence, or falſe evidence. Plainly, how are the honoured Volumes of faithfull antiquity, blurred, interlined, altered, depraved by ſubtile treachery; and made to ſpeak what they meant not? Fie on this, not ſo much injuſtice, as impiety, to raze the awfull monuments of the dead, and partially to blot and change the originall Will of the deceaſed, inſert our owne Legacies. This is done by our guilty adverſaries, to the injurie not more of theſe Authors, than of the preſent and ſucceeding times. Hence thoſe Fathers are ſome-where not ours: What wonder? while they are not themſelves. Your induſtry hath offered (and that motion is lively and heroicall) to challenge all their learned and elegant pages, from injury of corruption; to reſtore them to themſelves, and to us: that which all the learned of our times have but deſired to ſee done, you profferto effect:

effect: your assay in Cyprian and Augustine is happy and justly applauded. All our Libraries, whom your diligent hand hath ransackt, offer their aid, in such abundance of manuscripts, as all Europe would envy to see met in one Iland. After all this, for that the most spightfull imputation to our Truth is novelty, you offer to deduce her pedegree from those primitive times, through the successions of all ages; & to bring into the light of the world, many (as yet obscure) but no lesse certaine and authenticall Patrons, in a continued line of defence. You have given proofe enough, that these are no glorious vaunts, but the zealous challenges of an able Champion. What wanteth then? Let me say for you: Not an heart, not an head, not an hand; but (which I almost scorn to name in such a cause) a purse. If this continue your hinderance, it will not be more our losse than shame. Heare me a little, ye great and wealthy: Hath God loaded you with so much substance; and will you not lend him a little of his owne? Shall your riot be fed with excesse; while Gods cause shall starve for want? Shall our adversaries so insultingly out-bid us; and in the zeale of our profusion laugh at our heartlesse and cold niggardlinesse? Shall heavenly truth lie in the dust for want of a little stamped earth to raise her? How can you so much any way honour God, yea your selves, deserve of posterity, pleasure the Church, & make you so good friends of your Mammon? Let not the next Age say, that she had so unkind predecessors. Fetch forth of your superfluous store, and cast in your rich gifts into this treasury of the Temple. The Lord and his Church have need. For you, it angers me to see how that flattering Possevinus smoothly intices you from us with golden offers, upon the advantage of our neglect; as if he (measuring your mind by his owne) thought an Omnia dabo would bring you with himselfe on your knees to worship the devill, the beast, the image of both: as if we were not as able to encourage, to reward desert. Hath Vertue no Patrons on this side the Alpes? Are those hils only the thresholds of honour? I plead not, because I cannot feare you: But who sees not how munificently our Church scattereth her bountifull favours upon lesse merit. If your day bee not yet come, expect it; God and the Church owe you a benefit; if their payment be long, it is sure. Only goe you on with courage, in those your high endevours; and in the meane time, think it great recompence to have deserved.

To Mr. E. A.

EP. IX. A discourse of fleeing or stay in the time of pestilence; whether lawfull for Minister or people.

HOw many hath a seduced conscience led untimely to the grave? I speake of this sad occasion of Pestilence. The Angell of God followes you, and you doubt whether you should flye. If a Lion out of the forest should pursue you, you would make no question: yet could he not doe it unsent. What is the difference? Both instruments of divine revenge; both threaten death; one by spilling the bloud, the other by infecting it. Who knowes whether hee hath not appointed your Zoar out of the lists of this destruction? You say it is Gods visitation. What evill is not? If war have wasted the confines of your Country, you save your throats by flight: Why are you more favourable to Gods immediat sword of pestilence? Very leprosie, by Gods law, requires a separation; yet no mortall sicknesse. When you see a noted Leper proclaime his uncleannesse in the street, will you embrace him for his sake that hath stricken him, or avoyd him for his sake that hath forbidden you? If you honour his rod, much more will you regard his precept. If you mislike not the affliction because he sends it, then love the life which you have of his sending; feare the judgement which he will send, if you love it not. He that bids us flee when we are persecuted, hath neither excepted Angell nor man; whether-soever, I feare our guiltinesse, if wilfully we flee not. But whither shall we flee from God? say you: where shall he not both find and lead us? whither shall not our destiny follow us? Vaine men, we may run from our home, not from our grave; Death is subtle, our time is set; we cannot, God will will not alter it. Alas, how wiſe wee are to wrong our ſelves! Becauſe Death will over-take us, ſhall we run and meet him? Becauſe Gods decree is ſure, ſhall we be deſperate? Shall we preſume, becauſe God changeth not? Why doe we not try every knife and cord, ſince our time is neither capable of prevention nor delay: our end is ſet, not without our meanes. In matter of danger where the end is not knowne, the meanes muſt be ſuſpected; in matter of hope where the end is not knowne, meanes muſt bee uſed. Uſe then freely the meanes of your flight, ſuſpect the danger of your ſtay; and ſince there is no particular neceſſity of your preſence, know that God bids you depart and live. You urge the inſtance of your Miniſter: How unequally? There is not more lawfulneſſe in your flight, than ſinne in ours: you are your owne; we our peoples: you are charged with a body which you may not willingly leeſe, not hazard by ſtaying; we with all their ſoules: which to hazard by abſence, is to loſe our owne: we muſt love our lives; but not when they are rivals with our ſoules, or with others. How much better is it to be dead, than negligent, than faithleſſe! If ſome bodies be contagiouſly ſick, ſhall all ſoules be wilfully neglected? There can be no time wherin good counſell is ſo ſeaſonable, ſo needfull. Every threatning finds impreſſion, where the mind is prepared by ſenſible judgements. When will the iron hearts of men bow, if not when they are heat in the flame of Gods affliction? now then to run away from a neceſſary and publike good, to avoyd a doubtfull and private evill is to run into a worſe evill than we would avoyd. He that will thus run from Ninive to Tharſis, ſhall find a tempeſt, and a whale in his way. Not that I dare be an author to any, of the private viſitation of infected beds: I dare not without better warrant. Who ever ſaid we were bound to cloſe up the dying eies of every departing Chriſtian? and upon whatever conditions, to heare their laſt grones; If wee had a word, I would not debate of the ſucceſſe. Then that were cowardlineſſe, which now is wiſdome. Is it no ſervice, that wee publikely teach and exhort? that wee privately prepare men for death, and arme them againſt it? that our comfortable letters and meſſages ſtir up their fainting hearts? that our loud voyces pierce their eares afarre; unleſſe we feele their pulſes, and leane upon their pillowes, and whiſper in their eares? Daniel is in the lions den; Is it nothing that Darius ſpeakes comfort to him thorow the grate, unleſſe he goe in to ſalute him among thoſe fierce companions? A good Miniſter is the Common goods: hee cannot make his life peculiar to one, without injury to many. In the common cauſe of the Church, he muſt be no niggard of his life; in the private cauſe of a neighbours bodily ſickneſſe, hee may ſoone be prodigall. A good father may not ſpend his ſubſtance on one child, and leave the reſt beggers. If any man be reſolute in the contrary, I had rather praiſe his courage, than imitate his practice. I confeſſe, I feare; not ſo much death, as want of warrant for death.

To M. R. B.

EP. X. A complaint of the iniquity of the Times; with a preſcription of the meanes to redreſſe it.

WHiles I accuſed the Times, you undertook their patronage. I commend your charity, not your cauſe. It is true: There was never any Age not complained of; never any that was not cenſured, as worſt. What is, wee ſee; what was, we neither enquire nor care. That which is out of ſight and uſe, is ſoone out of mind, and ere long out of memory. Yet the iniquity of others, cannot excuſe ours. And if you will bee but as juſt as charitable, you ſhall confeſſe, that both ſome times exceed others in evill; and theſe, all. This earthly Moone the Church hath her fuls and wainings, and ſometimes her eclipſes; whiles the ſhadow of this ſinfull maſſe hides her beauty from the world. So long as ſhee wadeth in this planetary world, it ſhould be vaine to expect better: it is enough when ſhe is fixed above, to be free from all change. This you yeeld: but nothing can perſwade you, that ſhe is not now in the full of her glory. True: or elſe ſhe were not ſubject to this darkning. There was never more more light of knowledge; never more darkneſſe of impiety: and there could not be ſuch darkneſſe, if there were not ſuch light. Goodneſſe repulſed, gives height to ſin: therefore are we worſe than our predeceſſors, becauſe we might be better. By how much our meanes are greater, by ſo much are our defects. Turne over all records; and parallel ſuch helps, ſuch care, ſuch coſt, ſuch expectation, with ſuch fruit, I yeeld: We ſee but our owne times: There was never but one Noah (whom the Heathen celebrate under another name) that with two faces ſaw both before and behind him: But loe, that Ancient of dayes, to whom all times are preſent, hath told us, that theſe laſt ſhall be worſt: Our experience juſtifies him, with all but the wilfull. This cenſure (leſt you ſhould condemne my rigour, as unnaturally partiall) is not confined to our ſeas; but, free and common, hath the ſame bounds with the earth. I joy not in this large ſociety. Would God we were evill alone. How few are thoſe, whoſe cariage doth not ſay, that profeſſion of any conſcience is puſillanimity? How few that care ſo much, as to ſhew well. And yet of thoſe few, how many care only to ſeeme? whoſe words diſagree from their actions, and their hearts from their words? Where ſhall a man mew up himſelfe, that he may not be a witneſſe of what he would not? What can he ſee, or heare, and not be either ſad or guilty? Oathes ſtrive for number with words; ſcoffes with oathes, vaine ſpeeches with both. They are rare hands, that are free either from aſperſions of bloud, or ſpots of filthineſſe. Let me be at once (as I uſe) bold and plaine: Wanton exceſſe, exceſſive pride, cloſe Atheiſme, impudent profaneneſſe, unmercifull oppreſſion, over-mercifull connivence, greedy covetouſneſſe, looſe prodigality, ſimoniacall ſacrilege, unbridled luxury, beaſtly drunkenneſſe, bloudy treachery, cunning fraud, ſlanderous detraction, envious underminings, ſecret idolatry, hypocriticall faſhionableneſſe, have ſpred themſelves all over the world. The Sunne of peace looking upon our uncleane heaps, hath bred theſe monſters, and hath given light to this brood of darkneſſe. Looke about you, and ſee if three great Idols, Honour, Pleaſure, Gaine, have not ſhared the earth amongſt them, and left him leaſt, whoſe all is. Your deniall drives mee to particulars. I urge no further. If any adverſary inſult in my confeſſion, tell him, that I account them the greateſt part of this evill; neither could thus complaine, if they were not. Who knowes not, that as the earth is the dregs of the world, ſo Italy is the dregs of the earth, Rome of Italy? It is no wonder to find Satan in his Hell; but to find him in Paradiſe, is uncouth and grievous. Let them alone that will dye and hate to be cured. For us: O that remedies were as eaſie as complaints! That we could be as ſoone cleered, as convinced! That the taking of the medicine were but ſo difficult as the preſcription! And yet nothing hinders us from health, but our will: neither Goſpell, nor Grace, nor Glory, are ſhut up; only our hearts are not open. Let me turne my ſtile from you, to the ſecure, to the perverſe, though why doe I hope they will heare mee, that are deafe to God? they will regard words, that care not for judgements? Let mee tell them yet (if in vaine) they muſt breake, if they bow not: That if mercy may be refuſed, yet vengeance cannot be reſiſted: that God can ſerve himſelfe of them perforce, neither to their thank nor eaſe: that the preſent plagues doe but threaten worſe. Laſtly, that if they relent not, hell was not made for nothing. What ſhould bee done then? Except wee would faine ſmart, each man amend one, & we all live. How commonly do men complaine, and yet adde to this heape? Redreſſe ſtands not in words. Let every man pull but one brand out of this fire, and the flame will goe out alone. What is a multitude, but an heap of unities? The more we deduce, the fewer we leave. O how happy were it then, if every man would begin at home, and take his own heart to task, & at once be his owne Accuſer, and Judge; to condemne his private errors, yea to mulct them with death! Till then alas, what availes it to talke? While every man cenſures, and no man amends, what is it but buſie trifling? But though our care muſt begin at our ſelves, it may not end there. Who but a Caine is not his brothers keeper? Publike perſons are not ſo much their owne, as others are theirs. Who ſits at the common ſtern, cannot diſtinguiſh betwixt the care of his owne ſafety, and his veſſels: both drown at once, or at once ſalute the haven. Ye magiſtrates (for in you ſtand all our lower hopes) whom God hath on purpoſe, in a wiſe ſurrogation, ſet upon earth to correct her diſorders, diſorders, take to your ſelves firme fore-heads, couragious hearts, hands buſie, and not partiall; to diſcountenance ſhameleſſe wickedneſſe, to reſiſt the violent ſway of evils, to execute wholeſome lawes, with ſtrictneſſe, with reſolution. The ſword of the ſpirit meets with ſuch iron hearts, that it both enters not, and is rebated. Loe, it appeales to your arme, to your aid. An earthen edge can beſt pierce this hardned earth: If iniquity dye not by your hands, we periſh. And ye ſonnes of Levi gather to your Moſes in the gate of the Campe; conſecrate your hands to God in this holy ſlaughter of vice: Let your voyce bee both a trumpet to incite, and a two-edged ſword to wound and kill. Cry downe ſinne in earneſt, and thunder out of that ſacred chaire of Moſes: and let your lives ſpeak yet louder. Neither may the common Chriſtian ſit ſtill and look on in ſilence: I am deceived, if in this cauſe God allow any man for private. Here muſt be all actors, no witneſſes. His diſcreet admonitions, ſeaſonable reproofes, and prayers never unſeaſonable, beſides the power of honeſt example, are expected as his due tribute to the common health: What if we cannot turne the ſtreame? Yet wee muſt ſwim againſt it: even without conqueſt, it is glorious to have reſiſted: in this alone they are enemies, that doe nothing. Thus, as one that delights more in amendment, than excuſe, I have both cenſured and directed. The favour of your ſentence proceeds (I know) from your owne innocent uprightneſſe: So judge of my ſevere taxation. It ſhall be happy for us, if we can at once excuſe and diminiſh; accuſe and redreſſe iniquity. Let but the endevour bee ours, the ſucceſſe to God.

TO THE MOST HIGH AND EXCELLENT PRINCE, HENRY, PRINCE of WALES, All happinesse.

Most Gracious Prince:

LEt me not (whiles I desire to be dutifull) seeme importunate, in my dedications. I now bring to your Highnesse these my last, and perhaps most materiall Letters: wherein, if I mistake not, (as, how easily are we deceived in our owne?) the pleasure of the varietie shall strive with the importance of matter. There is no worldly thing, I confesse, whereof I am more ambitious, than of your Highnesses contentment; which that you place in goodnesse, is not more your glory, than our joy. Doe so still, and heaven and earth shall agree to blesse you, and us in you. For me, after this my officious boldnesse, I shall betake my selfe in silence, to some greater worke, wherein I may approve my service to the Church, and to your Highnesse, as her second joy and care. My heart shall be alwayes, and upon all opportunities, my tongue and pen shall no lesse gladly be devoted to my gracious Master, as one

Who rejoyce to be your Highnesses (though unworthy, yet) faithfull and obsequious servant,

 Ios. HALL.

THE

THE FIFT DECAD.

To my Lord Bishop of BATHE and WELLS.

EPIST. I. Discoursing of the causes and meanes of the increase of Popery.

BY what meanes the Romish Religion hath in these latter times prevailed so much over the world, (Right Reverend and Honourable) is a consideration both weighty and usefull; for hence may we frame our selves either to prevent, or imitate them: to imitate them in what we may; or prevent them in what they should not. I meddle not with the meanes of their first risings: the munificence of Christian Princes, the honest devotions of well-meaning Contributers, the division of the Christian world, the busie endevours of forward Princes, for the recovery of the Holy-land, with neglect of their owne, the ambitious insinuations of that Sea, the fame and large dominion of those seven hils; the compacted indulgence and connivence of some treacherous, of other timorous Rulers; the shamelesse flattery of Parasites; the rude ignorance of Times; or if there be any other of this kind: My thoughts and words shall be spent upon the present, and latest Age. All the world knowes, how that pretended Chaire of Peter tottered, and cracked, some threescore yeares agoe, threatning a speedy ruine to her fearfull usurper: How is it that still it stands, and seemes now to boast of some setledness? Certainly, if Hell had not contrived a new support, the Angell had long since said, It is fallen, it is fallen; and the Merchants, Alas, alas, the great Citie. The brood of that lame Loyola shall have this miserable honour, without our envie; that if they had not beene, Rome had not beene. By what meanes, it rests now to enquire.

It is not so much their zeale for falshood; which yet we acknowledge, and admire not. If Satan were not more busie than they, we had lost nothing. Their desperate attempts, bold intrusions, importunate sollicitations, have not returned empty; yet their policie hath done more than their force. That Popish world was then soule, and debauched, as in doctrine, so in life; and now began to be ashamed of it selfe; When these holy Fathers, as some Saints dropt out of heaven, suddenly professed an unusuall strictnesse, sad pietie, resolved mortification; and so drew the eyes and hearts of men after them, that poore soules began to thinke, it could not be other than divine, which they taught; other than holy, which they touched. The very times (not seldome) give as great advantage, as our owne best strength: and the vices of others give glory to those which either are, or appeare vertuous. They saw how ready the world was to bite at the bait; and now followed their successe, with new helps. Plenty of pretended miracles must blesse, on all sides, the endevours of this new Sect; and cals for both approbation, and wonder. Those things by the report of their own pens (other witnesses I see none) have beene done by the ten Patriarks of the Iesuitish Religion, both alive and dead, which can hardly be matched of him, whose name they have usurped. And now the vulgar can say, If these men were not of God, they could doe nothing: How can a man that is a sinner doe such miracles? not distrusting either the fame, or the worke; but applauding the Authors, for what was said to be done. But now lest the envie of the fact should surpasse the wonder, they have learned to cast this glory upon their woodden Ladies, & to communicate the gaine unto the whole Religion: Two blocks at Hale and Scherpen heuvell, have said and done more for Poperie, than all Friers, ever since Francis wore his breeches on his head. But becauſe that praiſe is ſweet, which ariſes from the diſgrace of a rivall; therefore this holy ſocietie hath, beſides, ever wont to honour it ſelfe by the brokage of ſhameleſſe untruths againſt the adverſe part; not caring how probable any report is, but how odious. A juſt volume would not containe thoſe willing lies, wherewith they have purpoſely loaded Religion, and us; that the multitude might firſt hate us, and then inquire: and theſe courſes are held not tollerable, but meritorious. So the end may be attained, all meanes are juſt; all wayes ſtrait. Whom we may, we ſatisfie: but wounds once given are hardly healed without ſome ſcarres: and commonly accuſations are vocall, Apologies dumbe. How eaſie is it to make any cauſe good, if we may take libertie of tongue and conſcience? Yet leſt ſome glimpſe of our truth and innocence ſhould perhaps lighten the eyes of ſome more inquiſitive Reader, they have by ſtrict prohibitions, whether of books, or conference, reſtrained all poſſibilitie of true informations: Yea their owne writings, wherein our opinions are reported with confutation, are not allowed to the common view; leſt if it ſhould appeare what wee hold, our meer opinion ſhould prevaile more than their ſubtileſt anſwer. But above all, the reſtraint of Gods booke hath gained them moſt: If that might be in the hands of men, their religion could not be in their hearts; now, the concealment of Scriptures breeds ignorance, and ignorance ſuperſtition. But becauſe forbiddance doth but whet deſire, and worke a conceit of ſome ſecret excellence in things denyed; therefore have they deviſed to affright this dangerous curioſitie, with that cruell, butcherly, helliſh Inquiſion; wherein yet there is not leſſe craft than violence. For ſince they have perceived the blood of Martyrs to be but the ſeed of the Church, and that theſe perfumes are more diſperſed with beating; they have now learned to murder without noiſe, and to bring forth (if at leaſt they liſt ſometimes to make the people privy to ſome examples of terrour) not men, but carcaſſes. Behold, the conſtant confeſſions of the dying Saints, have made them weary of publike executions: none but bare wals ſhall now teſtifie the courage and faith of our happy Martyrs. A diſguiſed corpſe is onely brought forth to the multitude, either for laughter, or feare. Yet becauſe the very dead ſpeake for truth in a loud ſilence, theſe ſpectacles are rare; and the graves of heretikes are become as cloſe as their death.

Yet leſt (ſince neither living mouthes, nor faithfull pens may be ſuffered to inſinuate any truth) thoſe ſpeeches ſhould perhaps be received from the Ancients, which in us were hereticall; the monuments of unpartiall antiquitie muſt be depraved; all witneſſes that might ſpeake againſt them muſt be corupted, with a fraudulent violence; and ſome of them purged to the death. So whiles are debarred, and the Ancients altered, poſterity ſhall acknowledge no adverſary.

What ſhould I ſpeak of thoſe plauſible devices, which they have invented, to make ſuperſtitious and fooliſh Proſelytes? Their proud vaunts of antiquitie, univerſalitie, ſucceſſion, and the name of their fore-fathers, do not onely perſwade, but amaze and beſot an ignorant heart. The glorious ſhewes of their proceſſions, the gaudy ornaments of their Altars, the pompe & magnificence of the places, and manner of their Services, the triumphs of their great Feſtivals, are enough to bewitch any childiſh, ſimple, or vaine beholders. Who knowes not that nature is moſt led by ſenſe? Sure, children and fooles (ſuch as are all naturall men) cannot be of any other Religion.

Beſides all theſe, their perſonall underſtandings, what for cunning, what for boldneſſe, could promiſe nothing but ſucceſſe, they can transforme themſelves into all ſhapes, and in theſe falſe formes thruſt themſelves into all Courts, and companies; not oftner changing their habit, than their name. They can take the beſt opportunities to worke upon thoſe which are either moſt unable to reſiſt, or moſt like to beſtead them. That I may not ſpeake of the wrongs of unſeaſonable travell; wherein many unſetled heads have met dangers, and ſollicited errors, who like fond and idle Dinahs, going abroad to gaze, have been raviſhed ere their returne. Never was any bird ſo laid for by the nets and cals of the fowler, as the great heire of ſome noble family, or ſome fiery wit, is by theſe impoſtors. They know that greatneſſe is both lawleſſe and commanding; if not by precept, yet by example: their very ſilence is perſwaſory, and imperious. But alas for that other ſex: Still the Devill begins with

Eue;

A Eve; ſtill his aſſault is ſtrongeſt where is weakeſt reſiſtance. Simon Magus had his Helena, Nicholas the Deacon had his choros fœmineos, (as Hierome cals them) Marcion had his Factoreſſe at Rome; Appelles his Philumena, Montanus his Priſca and Maximilla; Arrius his Conſtantines ſiſter, Donatus his Lucilla, Elpidius his Agape, Priſcillianus his Galla: and our Jeſuites have their painted Ladies (not dead, but living) both for objects, and inſtruments. When they ſaw they cold not blow up religion with French powder into Heaven, they now try by this Moabitiſh plot to ſinke it downe to Hell. Thoſe ſilly women, which are laden with ſins, and divers luſts, muſt now be the ſtales of their ſpirituall fornications: But for that theſe enterpriſes want not danger, that both parts may ſecurely ſucceed, behold publique libertie of diſpenſations, whether for diſſembled religion, or not unprofitable filthineſſe. Theſe meanes are (like the Authors) diſhoneſt, and godleſſe. Adde (if you pleaſe) hereto, thoſe which pretend
B more innocent policie: their common dependances upon one Commander, their intelligences given, their charges received, their rewards and honours (perhaps of the Calender, perhaps of a red Hat) duly conferred. Neither may the leaſt helpe be aſcribed to the conference of ſtudies; (the conjoyned labours of whole Societies directed to one end, and ſhrowded under the title of one Author) to large maintenances, raiſed from the death-beds of ſome guilty benefactors: from whence flow both infinite numbers, and incomparable helps, of Students. Under which head, for the time paſt, not a few are moved by the remembrance of the bounteous hoſpitality of the religious; who having ingroſſed the world to themſelves, ſeemed liberall in giving ſome thing; like unto ſome vain-glorious theeves, which having robbed wealthy Merchants, beſtow ſome pence upon beggers. Further, the ſmothering, if not compoſing of their frequent ſtrifes, and confining of brawles within their own thre-
C ſholds; with the nice menaging of their knowne oppoſitions, hath won many ignorant friends. Laſtly, the excellent correſpondence of their doctrines unto nature, hath been their beſt ſollicitor. We have examined particulars in a former Epiſtle: wherein we have made it evident, that Popery affects nothing but to make Nature either proud, or wanton: it offers difficulties, but carnall; and ſuch as the greateſt lover of himſelfe would eaſily embrace for an advantage. That we may therefore ſumme up all; I need not accuſe our careleſnes, indifferency, idleneſſe, looſe carriage; in all which, would God we had not aided them, and wronged our ſelves; nor yet their zeale and forwardnes, worſe meanes are guilty of their gaine. In ſhort, the faire outſide which they ſet upon Religion, which ſure is the beſt they have, if not all; their pretended miracles, wilfull untruths, ſtrait prohibitions, bloudy and ſecret inquiſitions, depravations of ancient witneſſes, expurgation of their owne, gay and gariſh ſights, glorious
D titles, crafty changes of names, ſhapes, habits, conditions; inſinuations to the great, oppugnation of the weaker ſex; falſhood of anſwers, and oathes, diſpenſations for ſinnes, uniting of forces, concealing of differences, largeneſſe of contributions, multitude of actors, and meanes, accordances to mens naturall diſpoſitions: Where we on the contrary care not to ſeeme, but to be, diſclaime miracles, dare not ſave the life of Religion with a lie; give free ſcope to all pens, to all tongues, to all eyes: ſhed no bloud for Religion: ſuffer all Writers to ſpeake like themſelves; ſhew nothing but poore ſimplicitie in our devotions; goe ever, and looke, as wee are; teach the truth right-downe in an honeſt plainneſſe, take no vantage of imbecillitie: ſweare true, though wee die; give no hope of indulgence for evill; ſtudy each retired to himſelfe, and the Muſes; publiſh our quarrels, and aggravate them; anger nature, and conquer it. Such gaine ſhall be gravell in their throats: ſuch loſſes to us (in E our not daring to ſinne) ſhall be happie and victorious; in all other regards are both blame-worthy, and recoverable. What dulneſſe is this? Have we ſuch a King, as in theſe liſts of Controverſy, may dare to grapple with that great infallible Vicar, for his triple Crowne; ſuch Biſhops, as may juſtly challenge the whole Conſiſtory of Rome; ſo many learned Doctors, and Divines, as no Nation under heaven, more; ſo flouriſhing Univerſities, as Chriſtendome hath none; ſuch bleſſed opportunities, ſuch incouragements; and now when we want nothing elſe, ſhall we be wanting to our ſelves? Yea, above all theſe, the God of heaven favours us; and doe we languiſh? The cauſe is his, and in ſpight of the gates of hell ſhall ſucceed, though we were not: our neglect may ſlacken the paſe of truth, cannot ſtay the paſſage. VVhy are we not as buſie, as ſubtile, more reſolute? Such ſpirits, and ſuch hands as yours (Reverend Lord) muſt put life into the cold breaſts of this frozen generation, and raiſe them up to ſuch thoughts and endevours, as may make the emulation of our adverſaries equall to their enmitie.

To my Lord Biſhop of Worceſter.

EP. II. Shewing the differences of the preſent Church from the Apoſtolicall; and needleſneſſe of our conformitie thereto in all things.

I Feare not to ſay, thoſe men are but ſuperſtitiouſly curious (Right Reverend, and Honourable) which would call backe all circumſtances to their firſt patterns. The Spouſe of Chriſt hath been ever clothed with her owne rites: and as apparell, ſo Religion hath her faſhions, variable according to ages and places. To reduce us to the ſame obſervations which were in Apoſtolicall uſe, were no better than to tie us to the ſandals of the Diſciples, or ſeameleſſe coat of our Saviour. In theſe caſes, they did what we need not; and we may, what they did not: God meant us no bondage in their example: their Canons bind us, whether for manners, or doctrine, not their Ceremonies. Neither Chriſt, nor his Apoſtles, did all things for imitation: I ſpeake not of miraculous acts. We need not be ſilent before a Judge, as Chriſt was; we need not take a towel, and gird our ſelves, & waſh our ſervants feet, as Chriſt did; we need not make tents for our living, as Paul; nor goe armed as Peter; nor carry about our wives, as he, and the other Apoſtles. I acknowledge the ground, not onely of ſeparation, but Anabaptiſme, and wonder that theſe conceits doe not anſwer themſelves. Who can chuſe but ſee a manifeſt difference betwixt thoſe Lawes, which Chriſt and his great Ambaſſadors made for eternall uſe, and thoſe rituall matters, which were confined to place and time? Every Nation, every perſon ſinnes that obſerves not thoſe; Theſe for the moſt part, are not kept of the moſt; and are as well left without ſinne by us, as uſed without preſcription or neceſſitie by the Authors. Some of them we cannot doe: others we need not: VVhich of us can caſt out divels by command? VVho can cure the ſicke by ointment, and impoſition of hands? The Diſciples did it. All thoſe acts which proceeded from ſupernaturall priviledge, ceaſed with their cauſe: who now dare undertake to continue them? Unleſſe perhaps ſome bold Papiſts, who have brought in groſſe Magicke, in ſtead of miraculous authoritie; and dawbe very carcaſes in ſtead of healing diſeaſes. There be more yet which we need not doe. VVhat need we to chuſe Miniſters by lot? what need we to diſclaime all peculiaritie in goods? VVhat need wee to Chriſten in rivers; or to meet upon their banks? VVhat need we to receive Gods Supper after our owne? VVhat to leane in each others boſome while we receive it? What to abhorre leaven in that holy Bread? What to celebrate love-feaſts upon the receit? What to abſtaine from all ſtrangled and bloud? What to depend upon a maintenance arbitrarie, and uncertaine? VVhat to ſpend our dayes in a perpetuall pererration, as not onely the Apoſtles, but the Prophets and Evangeliſts ſome ages after Chriſt? VVhoſoever would impoſe all theſe on us, hee ſhould ſurely make us, not the ſonnes, but the ſlaves of the Apoſtles. Gods Church never her ſelfe in ſuch ſervile tearmes; yea Chriſt himſelfe gave at firſt ſome precepts of this nature, which he reverſed ere long: when he ſent the Diſciples to preach, he charges: Take not gold, nor ſilver, nor money in your girdles; afterwards Iudas carried the bagge. He charges, not to take ſo much as a ſtaffe; yet after behold two ſwords: ſhould the Diſciples have held their Maſter to his owne rule? Is it neceſſary, that what he once commanded, ſhould be obſerved alwayes? The very next Age to theſe Chriſtian Patriarks, neither would nor durſt have ſo much varied her rites, or augmented them; if it had found it ſelfe tied either to number, or kind: As yet it was pure, chaſte, and (which was ground of all) perſecuted.

ted. The Church of Rome distributed the sacramentall Bread: the Church of Alexandria permitted the people to take it: the Churches of Affricke and Rome, mixed their holy Wine with water; other colder Regions dranke it pure. Some kneeled in their praiers, others fell prostrate; and some lifted up eyes, hands, feet towards heaven: some kept their Easter according to the Jewish use, the fourteenth of March; the French (as Nicephorus) the eight of the Calends of Aprill, in a set solemnitie: the Church of Rome the Sunday after the fourteenth Moone; which yet (as Socrates truly writes) was never restrained by any Gospell, by any Apostle. That Romish Victor overcame the other world in this point, with too much rigour; whose censure therefore of the Asian Churches was justly censured by Irenæus. What should I speake of their difference of fasts? There can scarce be more varietie in dayes, or meats. It hath ever beene thus seene, according to our Anselmes rule, that the multitude of different ceremonies in all Churches, hath justly commended their unitie in faith. The French Divines preach covered, (upon the same rule which required the Corinthians to be uncovered) we bare: The Dutch sit at the Sacrament, we kneele; Genua useth wafers, we leavened bread; they common vestures in Divine Service, we peculiar: each is free: no one doth either blame, or over-rule others. I cannot but commend those very Novatian Bishops (though it is a wonder any precedent of peace should fall from Schismaticks) who meeting in Councell together, enacted that Canon of indifferencie, when the Church was distracted with the differences of her Paschall solemnities; concluding, how insufficient this cause was to disquiet the Church of Christ. Their owne issue (our Separatists) will needs be unlike them in good; and strive to a further distance from peace: whiles in a conceit not lesse idle, than scrupulous, they presse us to an uniforme conformitie in our fashions to the Apostles. Their owne practice condemnes them: they call for some, and yet keepe not all: yet the same reason inforces all, that pleads for some: and that which warrants the forbearance of some, holds for all. Those tooles which serve for the foundation, are not of use for the roofe. Yea the great master-builder chose those workmen for the first stones, which he meant not to imploy in the walls. Doe we not see all Christs first agents extraordinary; Apostles, Evangelists, Prophets, Propheteſſes? See we not fiery and cloven tongues descending? What Church ever since boasted of such founders, of such meanes? Why would God begin with those which he meant not to continue; but to shew us we may not alwayes looke for one face of things? The nurse feeds and tends her child at first; afterward he is undertaken by the discipline of a Tutor: must he be alwayes under the spoone, and ferule, because he began so? If he have good breeding, it matters not by whose hands. Who can denie, that we have the substance of all those royall lawes, which Christ and his Apostles left to his Church; What doe we now thus importunately catching at shadowes? If there had beene a necessitie of having what we want, or wanting what we have, let us not so farre wrong the wisdome and perfection of the Law-giver, as to thinke he would not have injoyned that, and forbidden this. His silence in both argues his indifferencie, and calls for ours; which while it is not peaceably entertained, there is clamour without profit, malice without cause, and strife without end.

To my Lady MARY DENNY.

EP. III. Containing the description of a Christian, and his differences from the worldling.

MADAM:

IT is true, that worldly eyes can see no difference betwixt a Christian and another man; the out-side of both is made of one clay, and cast in one mould; both are inspired with one common breath: Outward events distinguish them not; those God never made for evidences of love or hatred. So the senses can perceive no difference betwixt the reasonable soule, and that which informes the beast: yet the soule knowes there is much more, than betwixt their bodies. The same holds in this: Faith sees more inward difference, than the eye sees outward resemblance. This point is not not more high than materiall: which that it may appeare, let me ſhew what it is to be a Chriſtian: You that have felt it, can ſecond me with your experience; and ſupply the defects of my diſcourſe. He is the living temple of the living God; where the Deitie is both reſident and worſhipped. The higheſt thing in a man is his owne ſpirit: but in a Chriſtian the Spirit of God, which is the God of ſpirits. No grace is wanting in him; and thoſe which there are, want not ſtirring up. Both his heart and his hands are cleane: All his outward purity flowes from within; neither doth he frame his ſoule to counterfet good actions; but out of his holy diſpoſition commands and produces them, in the light of God. Let us begin with his beginning, & fetch the Chriſtian out of this nature, as another Abraham from his Chaldea; whiles the worldling lives and dies, in nature, out of God. The true convert therefore, after his wilde and ſecure courſes, puts himſelfe (through the motions of Gods Spirit) to ſchoole unto the Law; there he learnes what he ſhould have done, what he could not do, what he hath done, what he hath deſerved. Theſe leſſons coſt him many a ſtripe, and many a teare, and not more griefe than terror: for this ſharp maſter makes him feele what ſin is, and what Hell is, and in regard of both, what himſelfe is. When he hath well ſmarted under the whip of this ſevere Uſher, and is made vile enough in himſelfe, than is he led up into the higher ſchoole of Chriſt, and there taught the comfortable leſſons of grace; there he learnes what belongs to a Saviour, what one he is, what he hath done, and for whom, how he became ours, we his: and now finding himſelfe in a true ſtate of danger, of humility, of need, of deſire, of fitneſſe for Chriſt, he brings home to himſelfe all that he learnes, and what he knowes, he applies. His former Tutor he feared, this he loveth; that ſhewed him his wounds, yea, made them; this binds and heales them: that killed him; this ſhewes him life, and leads him to it. Now at once he hates himſelfe, defies Satan, truſts to Chriſt, makes account both of pardon and glory. This is his moſt precious faith, whereby he appropriates, yea ingroſſes Chriſt Jeſus to himſelfe: whence he is juſtified from his ſinnes, purified from his corruptions, eſtabliſhed in his reſolutions, comforted in his doubts, defended againſt temptations, overcomes all his enemies. Which vertue, as it is moſt imployed, and moſt oppoſed, ſo carries the moſt care from the Chriſtian heart, that it be ſound, lively, growing: ſound, not rotten, not hollow, not preſumptuous: ſound in the act; not a ſuperficiall conceit, but a true, deepe, and ſenſible apprehenſion: an apprehenſion, not of the braine, but of the heart; and of the heart not approving, or aſſenting, but truſting and repoſing. Sound in the object, none but Chriſt: he knowes, that no friendſhip in heaven can doe him good, without this; The Angels cannot; God will not: Ye beleeve in the Father, beleeve alſo in me.

Lively; for it cannot give life, unleſſe it have life; the faith that is not fruitfull, is dead: the fruits of faith are good works; whether inward, within the roofe of the heart, as love, awe, ſorrow, pietie, zeale, joy, and the reſt; or outward towards God, or our brethren: obedience and ſervice to the one; to the other reliefe and beneficence: Theſe he beares in his time; ſometimes all, but alwayes ſome.

Growing: true faith cannot ſtand ſtill; but as it is fruitfull in works, ſo it increaſeth in degrees: from a little ſeed it proves a large plant, reaching from earth to heaven, and from one heaven to another: every ſhower and every Sun addes ſomething to it. Neither is this grace ever ſolitarie, but alwayes attended royally: for he that beleeves what a Saviour he hath, cannot but love him; and he that loves him, cannot but hate whatſoever may diſpleaſe him; cannot but rejoyce in him, and hope to enjoy him, and deſire to enjoy his hope, and contemne all thoſe vanities which he once defired and enjoyed. His mind now ſcorneth to grovell upon earth, but ſoareth up to the things aboue, where Chriſt ſits at the right hand of God; and after it hath ſeene what is done in heaven, lookes ſtrangely upon all worldly things. He dare truſt his faith aboue his reaſon, and ſenſe: and hath learned to weane his appetite from craving much. He ſtands in awe of his owne conſcience, and dare no more offend it, than not diſpleaſe himſelfe. He feares not his enemies, yet neglects them not; equally avoiding ſecurity, and timorouſneſſe. He ſees him that is inviſible; and walks with him awfully, familiarly. He knowes what he is borne to, and therefore digeſts the miſeries of his wardſhip, wardſhip, with patience: he findes more comfort in his afflictions, than any worldling in pleaſures. And as he hath theſe graces to comfort him within, ſo hath he the Angels to attend him without; ſpirits better than his owne; more powerfull, more glorious: Theſe beare him in their armes, wake by his bed, keepe his ſoule while he hath it, and receive it when it leaves him. Theſe are ſome preſent differences: the greateſt are future; which could not be ſo great, if themſelves were not witneſſe; no leſſe than betwixt heaven and hell, torment and glory, an incorruptible crowne, and fire unquenchable. Whether Infidels beleeve theſe things or no, we know them: ſo ſhall they, but too late. What remaines but that we applaud our ſelves in this happineſſe, and walke on cheerily in this heavenly profeſſion? acknowledging that God could not doe more for us; and that we cannot doe enough for him. Let others boaſt (as your Ladiſhip might with others) of ancient and Noble Houſes, large patrimonies, or dowries, honorable commands; others of famous names, high and envied honours, or the favours of the greateſt; others of valour or beauty, or ſome perhaps of eminent learning and wit; it ſhall be our pride that we are Chriſtians.

To my Lady HONORIA HAY.

EP. IV. Diſcourſing of the neceſſity of Baptiſme; and the eſtate of thoſe which neceſſarily want it.

MADAM:

ME thinks children are like teeth, troubleſome both in the breeding, and loſing, and oftentimes painfull while they ſtand: yet ſuch, as we neither would, nor can well be without. I goe not about to comfort you thus late, for your loſſe, I rather congratulate your wiſe moderation and Chriſtian care of theſe firſt ſpirituall privileges; deſiring onely to ſatisfie you in what you heard as a witneſſe; not in what you needed as a mother. Children are the bleſſings of Parents, and Baptiſme is the bleſſing of children, and parents: wherein there is not onely uſe, but neceſſitie; neceſſitie, not in reſpect ſo much of the end, as of the precept: God hath enjoyned it, to the comfort of parents, and behoofe of children: which therefore, as it may not be ſuperſtitiouſly haſtened, ſo not negligently deferred. That the contempt of baptiſme damneth, is paſt all doubt; but that the conſtrained abſence thereof, ſhould ſend infants to hell, is a cruell raſhneſſe. It is not their ſinne to die early: death is a puniſhment, not an offence; an effect of ſinne, not a cauſe of torment; they want nothing but time; which they could not command. Becauſe they could not live a while longer, that therefore they ſhould die everlaſtingly, is the hard ſentence of a bloody religion. I am onely ſorie, that ſo harſh an opinion ſhould be graced with the name of a Father, ſo reverend, ſo divine: whoſe ſentence yet let no man plead by halves. He who held it unpoſſible for a child to be ſaved unleſſe the baptiſmall water were powred on his face, held it alſo as unpoſſible, for the ſame Infant, unleſſe the ſacramentall bread were received into his mouth. There is the ſame ground for both, the ſame error in both, a weakneſſe fit for forgetfulneſſe; ſee yet how ignorant, or ill-meaning poſterity, could ſingle out one halfe of the opinion for truth, and condemne the other of falſhood. In ſpight of whom, one part ſhall eaſily convince the other; yea, without all force: ſince both cannot ſtand, both will fall together, for company. The ſame mouth, which ſaid, Unleſſe ye be borne againe of water, and the Holy Ghoſt, ſaid alſo, Except ye eat the fleſh of the Sonne of Man, and drinke his blood: an equall neceſſitie of both. And leſt any ſhould plead different interpretations, the ſame S. Auſtin averres this later opinion alſo, concerning the neceſſary communicating of children, to have beene once the common judgement of the Church of Rome; A ſentence ſo diſpleaſing, that you ſhall find the memory of it noted with a blacke coale, and wip't out in that infamous bill of Expurgations. Had the ancient Church held this deſperate ſequele, what ſtrange, and yet wilfull cruelty had it beene in them, to deferre baptiſme a whole yeare long: till Eaſter, or that Sunday, which hath his name (I thinke) from the white robes of the baptiſed?

Yea

Yea what an adventure was it in ſome, to adjourne it till their age (with Conſtantine) if being unſure of their life, they had beene ſure the prevention of death would have inferred damnation? Looke unto that legall Sacrament of circumciſion, which (contrary to the fancies of our Anabaptiſts) directly anſwers this Evangelicall. Before the eighth day, they could not be circumciſed: before the eighth day they might die. If dying the ſeventh day, they were neceſſarily condemned: either the want of a day is a ſinne, or God ſometimes condemneth not for ſinne: Neither of them poſſible, neither according with the juſtice of the Law-giver. Or if from this parallel, you pleaſe to looke either to reaſon or example, the caſe is cleere Reaſon; no man that hath faith, can be condemned, for Chriſt dwels in our hearts by faith: and he in whom Chriſt dwels, cannot be a reprobate. Now it is poſſible a man may have a ſaving faith, before baptiſme: Abraham firſt beleeved to juſtification: then after received the ſigne of circumciſion, as a ſeale of the righteouſneſſe of that faith, which he had when he was uncircumciſed: Therefore ſome dying before their baptiſme, may, yea muſt be ſaved. Neither was Abrahams caſe ſingular; he was the Father of all them alſo, which beleeve, not being circumciſed: theſe, as they are his Sonnes in faith, ſo in righteouſneſſe, ſo in ſalvation: uncircumciſion cannot hinder, where faith admitteth; Theſe following his ſteps of beleefe before the Sacrament, ſhall doubtleſſe reſt in his boſome, without the Sacrament; without it, as fatally abſent, not as willingly neglected. It is not the water, but the faith: not the putting away the filth of the fleſh, (ſaith S. Peter) but the ſtipulation of a good conſcience; for who takes Baptiſme without a full faith (ſaith Hierom) takes the water, takes not the ſpirit; Whence is this ſo great vertue of the water, that it ſhould touch the body, and cleanſe the heart, (ſaith Auſtin) unleſſe by the power of the word, not ſpoken but beleeved? Thou ſeeſt water (ſaith Ambroſe,) every water heales not, that water onely heales which hath the grace of God annexed; And if there be any grace in the water (ſaith Baſil) it is not of the nature of the water, but of the preſence of the Spirit. Baptiſme is indeed, as Saint Ambroſe ſtiles it, the pawne and image of our reſurrection; yea (as Baſil) the power of God to reſurrection: but (as Ignatius expounds this phraſe aright) beleeving in his death, we are by baptiſme made partakers of his reſurrection. Baptiſme therefore without faith cannot ſave a man, and by faith doth ſave him: and faith without baptiſme (where it cannot be had; not where it may be had, and is contemned) may ſave him: That ſpirit which works by meanes, will not be tyed to meanes.

Examples. Caſt your eyes upon that good theefe; good in his death, though in his life abominable: he was never waſhed in Jordan, yet is received into Paradiſe; his ſoule was foule with rapines, and injuſtice, yea bloody with murders: and yet being ſcoured only with the blood of his Saviour, not with water of baptiſme, it is preſented glorious to God. I ſay nothing of the ſoules of Traian, and Falconella, meere heathens, living and dying without Chriſt, without baptiſme: which yet their honeſt Legend reports to be delivered from hell, tranſported to heaven, not ſo much as ſcorched in Purgatory: The one by the prayers of Gregory, the other of Tecla. What partiality is this, to deny that to the children of Chriſtians, which they grant to knowne Infidels? The promiſe is made to us, and our ſeed: not to thoſe that are without the pale of the Church. Thoſe innocents which were maſſacred for Chriſt, are by them canonized for Saints, and make one day in their Kalendar (each yeare) both holy, and diſmall; whereof yet ſcarce any lived to know water, none to know baptiſme. Yea, all Martyrs are here privileged; who are Chriſtened in their owne blood, in ſtead of water: but where hath God ſaid, All that die without baptiſme, ſhall die for ever, except martyrs; why not, except beleevers? It is faith that gives life to Martyrs; which if they ſhould want, their firſt death could not avoid the ſecond. Ambroſe doubted not to ſay, his Valentinian was baptiſed becauſe he deſired it; not becauſe he had it: he knew the mind of God; who accounts us to have what we unfainedly wiſh. Children cannot live to deſire baptiſme: if their Parents deſire it for them, why may not the deſire of others be theirs, as well as (according to Auſtins opinion) the faith of others beleeving, and the mouth of others confeſſing? In theſe caſes therefore, of any ſoules but our owne, it is ſafe to ſuſpend, and dangerous to paſſe judgement. Secret things to God: He that made all ſoules,

A soules, knowes what to doe with them, neither will make us of counsell: But if we define either way, the errors of charitie are inoffensive. We must honor good means, and use them, and in their necessary want depend upon him, who can work, beyond, without, against meanes.

Thus have I endevoured your Ladiships satisfaction in what you heard, not without some scruple. If any man shall blame my choyce in troubling you with a thorny and scholasticall discourse, let him know that I have learned this fashion of Saint Hierome the Oracle of Antiquity, who was wont to entertaine his Paula and Eustochium, Marcella, Principia, Hedibia, and other devout Ladies, with learned canvases of the deepe points of Divinitie. This is not so perplexed, that it need to offend: nor so unnecessary, that it may be unknowne.

To Sir RICHARD LEA, since deceased.

EPIST. V. Discoursing of the comfortable remedies of all afflictions.

WIse men seek remedies before their disease: sensible patients, when they begin to complaine: fools, too late. Afflictions are the common maladies of Christians: These you feel, and upon the first groanes seeke for ease. Wherefore serves the tongue of the learned, but to speake words in season? I am a Schollar of those that can comfort you: If you shall, with me, take out my lessons, neither of us shall repent it. You smart and complaine: take heed lest too much. There is no affliction not grievous: the bone that was dis-joynted, cannot be set right without paine. No potion can cure us, if it worke not: it works not, except it make us sicke: we are contented
C with that sickness, which is the way to health. There is a vexation without hurt: such is this: We are afflicted, not over-pressed; needy, not desparate; persecuted, not forsaken; cast downe, but perish not. How should we, when all the evill in a Citie comes from the providence of a good God; which can neither be impotent, nor unmercifull? It is the Lord: let him doe what he will. Woe were us if evils could come by chance; or were let loose to alight where they list: now they are over-ruled; we are safe. The destiny of our sorrowes is written in heaven by a wise and eternall decree: Behold, he that hath ordained, moderates them. A faithfull God, that gives an issue with the tentation: An issue, both of their end, and their successe. He chides not alwayes, much lesse striketh. Our light afflictions are but for a moment: not so long, in respect of our vacancy, and rest. If we weepe sometimes, our teares are precious; As D they shall never be dry in his bottle, so they shall soone be dry upon our cheekes. He that wrings them from us, shall wipe them off: how sweetly doth he interchange our sorrowes, and joyes, that we may neither be vaine, nor miserable? It is true; To be strooke, once in anger, is fearefull: his displeasure is more than his blow: In both, our God is a consuming fire. Feare not, these stripes are the tokens of his love: he is no Son, that is not beaten; yea till he smart, and cry; if not till he bleed: no Parent corrects anothers child; and he is no good Parent that corrects not his owne. Oh rod worthy to be kissed, that assures us of his love, of our adoption! What speake I of no hurt? short praises doe but discommend; I say more, these evils are good: looke to their effects. What is good, if not patience? affliction is the mother of it; tribulation bringeth forth patience. What can earth or heaven yeeld, better than the assurance of Gods Spirit: Afflictions argue, yea seale this to us. Wherein stands perfect
E happinesse, if not in our neere resemblance of Christ? Why was man created happy, but because in Gods image? The glory of Paradice, the beauty of his body, the duty of the creatures, could not give him felicity, without the likenesse to his Creator. Behold, what we lost in our height, we recover in our miserie; a conformitie to the image of the Son of God: he that is not like his elder brother, shall never be coheire with him. Loe, his side, temples, hands, feet, all bleeding: his face blubbred, ghastly, and spitted on: his skin all pearled with a bloody sweat; his head drouping, his soule heavie to the death: see you the worldling merry, soft, delicate, perfumed, never wrinkled with sorrow, never humbled with afflictions? What resemblance is here, yea what what contrariety? Eaſe ſlayeth the foole; it hath made him reſty, and leaves him miſerable. Be not deceived; no man can follow Chriſt without his Croſſe, much leſſe reach him; and if none ſhall reigne with Chriſt, but thoſe that ſuffer with him, what ſhall become of theſe jolly ones? Goe now thou dainty worldling, and pleaſe thy ſelfe in thy happineſſe, laugh alwayes, and be ever applauded; it is a wofull felicitie that thou ſhalt find in oppoſition to thy Redeemer: He hath ſaid, Woe to them that laugh; Beleeveſt thou, & doſt not weep at thy laughter? and with Salomon, condemne it of madneſſe? And againe, with the ſame breath, Bleſſed are ye that weep: who can beleeve this, and not rejoyce in his owne teares, and not pitie the faint ſmiles of the godleſſe? Why bleſſed? for ye ſhall laugh: Behold, we that weepe on earth, ſhall laugh in heaven: we that now weepe with men, ſhall laugh with Angels; while the fleering worldling ſhall be gnaſhing, and howling with Devils: wee that weepe for a time, ſhall laugh for ever: who would not be content to deferre his joy a little, that it may be perpetuall, and infinite? What madman would purchaſe this crackling of thornes (ſuch is the worldlings joy) with eternall ſhrieking and torment? He that is the doore and the way, hath taught us, that through many afflictions we muſt enter into heaven. There is but one paſſage, and that a ſtraight one: If with much preſſure we can get through, and leave but our ſuperfluous rags as torne from us in the crowd, we are happy. He that made heaven, hath on purpoſe thus framed it; wide when we are entred, & glorious: narrow and hard in the entrance: that after our pain, our glory might be ſweeter. And if before-hand you can climb up thither in your thoughts; looke about you, you ſhall ſee no more Palmes, than croſſes: you ſhall ſee none crowned, but thoſe that have wreſtled with croſſes and ſorrowes, to ſweat, yea to blood; and have overcome. All runnes here to the over-commer: and overcomming implies both fighting and ſucceſſe. Gird up your loynes therefore, and ſtrengthen your weak knees: reſolve to fight for heaven, to ſuffer fighting, to perſiſt in ſuffering; ſo perſiſting you ſhall overcome, and overcomming, you ſhall be crowned. Oh reward truly great, above deſert, yea above conceit! A crowne for a few groans. An eternall crown of life and glory, for a ſhort and momentany ſuffering: How juſt is S. Pauls account, that the afflictions of this preſent life are not worthy of the glory which ſhall be ſhewed unto us? O Lord let me ſmart that I may reigne; uphold thou me in ſmarting, that thou mayeſt hold me worthy of reigning. It is no matter how vile I be, ſo I may be glorious. What ſay you? would you not be afflicted? Whether had you rather mourne for a while, or for ever? One muſt be choſen: the election is eaſie: Whether had you rather rejoyce for one fit, or alwayes? You would doe both. Pardon me, it is a fond covetouſneſſe, and idle ſingularitie to affect it. What? that you alone may fare better than all Gods Saints? That God ſhould ſtrew Carpets for your nice feet only, to walke into your heaven, and make that way ſmooth for you, which all Patriarkes, Prophets, Evangeliſts, Confeſſors, Chriſt himſelfe, have found rugged and bloudy? Away with this ſelfe-love; and come downe you ambitious ſons of Zebedee: and ere you think of ſitting neere the Throne, be content to be called unto the Cup. Now is your triall: Let your Saviour ſee how much of his bitter potion you can pledge; then ſhall you ſee how much of his glory he can afford you. Be content to drinke of his vinegar and gall, and you ſhall drinke new wine with him in his kingdome.

To M^r. Peter Moulin, Preacher of the Church at Paris.

Epist. VI. Diſcourſing of the late French occurrents, and what uſe God expects to be made of them.

SInce your travels here with us, we have not forgotten you; but ſince that, your witty and learned travels in the common affaires of Religion, have made your memory both freſh, & bleſſed. Behold, whiles your hand was happily buſie in the defence of our King, the heads and hands of traitors were buſie in the maſſacring of your your owne. God doth no memorable and publike act, which hee would not have talked of, read, construed of all the world. How much more of neighbors, whom scarce a sea severeth from each other? how much yet more of brethren, whom neither land, nor sea, can sever? Your dangers, and feares, and griefes have beene ours: All the salt water that runs betwixt us, cannot wash off our interest in all your common causes: The deadly blow of that miscreant, (whose name is justly sentenced to forgetfulnesse) pierced even our sides. Who hath not bled within himselfe, to think that he, which had so victoriously out-lived the swords of enemies, should fall by the knife of a villaine? and that he should die in the peaceable streets, whom no fields could kill? that all those honourable and happy triumphs should end in so base a violence? But oh our idlenesse and impiety, if we see not a divine hand from above, striking with this hand of disloyalty. Sparrowes fall not to the ground without him, much lesse Kings. One dies by a tile-sheard, another by the splinters of a Launce, one by lice, another by a Fly, one by poyson, another by a knife; What are all these but the executioners of that great God, which hath said, Yee are Gods, but yee shall die like men? Perhaps God saw (that we may guesse modestly at the reasons of his acts) you reposed too much in this arme of flesh; or perhaps he saw this scourge would have beene too early, to those enemies, whose sin, though great, yet was not full: or perhaps he saw, that if that great spirit had beene deliberately yeelded in his bed, you should not have slept in yours: Or perhaps the ancient connivence at those streames of blood, from your too common Duels, was now called to reckoning; or, it may be, that weak revolt from the truth. He whose the rod was, knowes why he strooke: yet may it not passe without a note, that he fell by that religion, to which he fell. How many Ages might that great Monarch have lived (whatsoever the ripe head of your more than mellow Cotten could imagine) ere his least finger should have bled, by the hand of an Huguenot? All religions may have some monsters: but blessed be the God of heaven, ours shall never yeeld that good Jesuit, either a Mariana to teach treason, or a Ravillac to act it. But what is that we heare? it is no marvell: that holy society is a fit Gardian for the hearts of Kings: I dare say, none more loves to see them: none takes more care to purchase them. How happy were that Chappell (think they) if it were full of such shrines? I hope all Christian Princes have long, and well learned (so great is the courtesie of these good Fathers) that they shall never (by their wils) need be troubled with the charge of their owne hearts. An heart of a King in a Jesuites hand, is as proper, as a wafer in a Priests. Justly was it written of old, under the picture of Ignatius Loyola, Cavete vobis Principes; Be wise O ye Princes, and learne to be the keepers of your owne hearts. Yea rather, O thou keeper of Israel, that neither slumbrest nor sleepest, keep thou the hearts of all Christian Kings, whether alive or dead, from the keeping of this traiterous generation; whose very religion is holy rebellion, & whose merits bloody. Doubtlesse, that murderer hoped to have stabbed thousands with that blow, and to have let out the life of religion, at the side of her collapsed Patron: God did at once laugh and frowne at his project; and suffered him to live to see himselfe no lesse a foole than a villaine. O the infinite goodnesse of the wise and holy governour of the world! Who could have looked for such a calme in the middest of a tempest? who would have thought that violence could beget peace? Who durst have conceived that King Henry should die alone? and that Religion should lose nothing but his person? This is the Lords doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes. You have now parallel'd us: Out of both our feares God hath fetched security: Oh that out of our security we could as easily fetch feare: not so much of evill, as of the Author of good; and yet trust him in our feare; and in both magnifie him. Yea, you have by this act gained some converts, against the hope of the agents: neither can I without many joyfull congratulations, think of the estate of your Church; which every day honours with the accesse of new clyents; whose teares and sad confessions make the Angels to rejoyce in heaven, and the Saints on earth. We should give you example, if our peace were as plentifull of goodnesse as of pleasure. But how seldome hath the Church gained by ease? or lost by restraint? Blesse you God for our prosperity; and we shall praise him for your progresse.

To M. Thomas Sutton.

Ep. VII. Exciting him, and (in him) all others to early and cheerefull beneficence: ſhewing the neceſsity and benefit of good works.

SIR, I trouble you not with reaſons of my writing, or with excuſes: If I doe ill, no plea can warrant me; If well, I cannot be diſcouraged with any cenſures. I crave not your pardon, but your acceptation. It is no preſumption to give good counſell; & preſents of love feare not to be ill taken of ſtrangers. My pen & your ſubſtance are both given us for one end, to doe good: Theſe are our talents; how happy are we, if we can improve them well! ſuffer me to doe you good with the one, that with the other you may doe good to many, and moſt to your ſelfe. You cannot but know, that your full hand and worthy purpoſes, have poſſeſſed the world with much expectation: what ſpeake I of the world? whoſe honeſt and reaſonable claimes yet, cannot be contemned with honour, nor diſappointed with diſhonour. The God of heaven, which hath lent you this abundance, and given you theſe gracious thoughts of charity, of pietie, looks long for the iſſue of both; and will eaſily complaine either of too little, or too late. Your wealth and your will are both good: but the firſt is onely made good by the ſecond. For if your hand were full, and your heart empty, we who now applaud you, ſhould juſtly pity you; you might have riches, not goods, not bleſſings: your burthen ſhould be greater than your eſtate; and you ſhould be richer in ſorrowes, than in metalls. For (if we look to no other world) what gaine is it to be the keeper of the beſt earth? That which is the common cofer of all the rich mines, we do but tread upon; and account it vile, becauſe it doth but hold, & hide thoſe treaſures: Whereas the skilfull metalliſt, that findeth, and refineth thoſe precious veines, for publike uſe, is rewarded, is honoured. The very baſeſt Element yeelds gold; the ſavage Indian gets it, the ſervile prentiſe works it, the very Midianitiſh Camell may weare it, the miſerable worldling admires it, the covetous Jew ſwallowes it, the unthriftie Ruffian ſpends it: what are all theſe the better for it? Only good uſe gives praiſe to earthly poſſeſſions. Herein therefore you owe more to God, that he hath given you an heart to doe good; a will to be as rich in good works, as great in riches. To be a friend to this Mammon, is to be an enemie to God: but to make friends with it, is royall, and Chriſtian. His enemies may be wealthy: none but his friends, can either be good, or do good. Da & accipe, ſaith the Wiſe-man. The Chriſtian, which muſt imitate the high patterne of his Creator, knowes his beſt riches to be bounty; God that hath all, gives all; reſerves nothing. And for himſelfe; he well conſiders, that God hath not made him an owner, but a ſervant: and of ſervants, a ſervant not of his goods, but of the Giver; not a Treaſurer, but a Steward: whoſe praiſe is more to lay out well, than to have received much. The greateſt gaine therefore that he affects, is an even reckoning, a cleare diſcharge: which ſince it is obtained by diſpoſing, not by keeping, he counts reſervation loſſe, & juſt expence his trade, & joy; he knowes, that Well done faithfull ſervant is a thouſand times more ſweet a note, than Soule take thine eaſe; for that is the voice of the maſter recompencing, this of the carnall heart preſuming: & what followes to the one, but his maſters joy? what to the other, but the loſſe of his ſoule? Bleſſed be that God which hath given you an heart to fore-thinke this; and in this dry and dead Age, a will to honour him with his owne; and to credit his Goſpell, with your beneficence; Loe, we are upbraided with barrenneſſe; your name hath beene publikely oppoſed to theſe challenges; as in whom it ſhall be ſeene, that the truth hath friends that can give. I neither diſtruſt, nor perſwade you; whoſe reſolutions are happily fixed on purpoſes of good: onely give me leave to haſten your paſe a little, and to excite your Chriſtian forwardneſſe, to begin ſpeedily, what you have long & conſtantly vowed. You would not but doe good; why not now? I ſpeake boldly, The more ſpeed, the more comfort: Neither the times are in our diſpoſing, nor our ſelves: if God had ſet us a day, and made our wealth unſeparable, there were no danger in delaying; now our uncertainty either muſt quicken quicken us, or may deceive us. How many have meant well, and done nothing, and loſt their crowne with lingring? whoſe deſtinies have prevented their deſires, and have made their good motions the wards of their executors, not without miſerable ſucceſſe to whom, that they would have done good, is not ſo great a praiſe, as it is diſhonour that they might have done it: their wracks are our warnings, we are equally mortall, equally fickle. Why have you this reſpite of living, but to prevent the imperious neceſſity of death? it is a wofull and remedileſſe complaint that the end of our dayes hath over-run the beginning of our good works. Early beneficence hath no danger many joyes: for the conſcience of good done, the prayers and bleſſings of the releeved, the gratulations of the Saints, are as ſo many perpetuall comforters, which can make our life pleaſant, and our death happy, our evill daies good, and our good better. All theſe are loſt with delay: few and cold are the prayers for him that may give: and in lieu, our good purpoſes fore-ſlowed are become our tormentors upon our death-bed. Little difference is betwixt good deferred, and evill done: Good was meant; who hindred it, will our conſcience ſay? there was time enough, meanes enough, need enough, what hindred? Did feare of envy, diſtruſt of want? Alas, what bugs are theſe to fright men from heaven? As if the envy of keeping, were leſſe than of beſtowing: As if God were not as good a debtor, as a giver: he that gives to the poore, lends to God, ſaith wiſe Salomon. If he freely give us what we may lend, & grace to give; will he not much more pay us what we have lent; and give us becauſe we have given? That is his bounty, this his juſtice. O happy is that man that may be a creditor to his Maker: Heaven and earth ſhall be empty before he ſhall want a royall payment. If we dare not truſt God whiles we live, how dare we truſt men when we are dead? men that are ſtill deceitfull, & light upon the balance, light of truth, heavy of ſelf-love. How many Executors have proved the executioners of honeſt Wils? how many have our eies ſeene, that after moſt carefull choice of truſty guardians, have had their children and goods ſo diſpoſed, as if the Parents ſoule could returne to ſee it, I doubt whether it could be happy. How rare is that man that prefers not himſelfe to his dead friend? profit to truth? that will take no vantage of the impoſſibility of account? What-ever therefore men either ſhew, or promiſe, happy is that man that may be his owne auditor, ſupervisor, executor. As you love God and your ſelfe, be not afraid of being happy too ſoone. I am not worthy to give ſo bold advice; let the wiſe man of Syrach ſpeake for me: Doe good before thou die, and according to thine ability ſtretch out thine hands, and give: Defraud not thy ſelfe of thy good day; and let not the portion of thy good deſires over-paſſe thee: ſhalt thou not leave thy travels to another, and thy labours to them that will divide thine heritage? Or let a wiſer than he, Salomon: Say not, to morrow I will give, if now thou have it: for thou knoweſt not what a day will bring forth. It hath beene an old rule of liberality, He gives twice that gives quickly; whereas ſlow benefits argue uncheerefulneſſe, & loſe their worth. Who lingers his receits, is condemned as unthriftie: he that knoweth both, ſaith, It is better to give than to receive. If we be of the ſame ſpirit, why are we haſty in the worſe, and ſlack in the better? Suffer you your ſelfe therfore, good Sir, for Gods ſake, for the Goſpels ſake, for the Churches ſake, for your ſoules ſake, to be ſtirred up by theſe poore lines, to a reſolute & ſpeedy performing of your worthy intentions: & take this as a loving invitation ſent from heaven, by an unworthy meſſenger. You cannot deliberate long of fit objects for your beneficence, except it be more for multitude, than want: the ſtreets, yea the world is full; How doth Lazarus lie at every doore? how many ſons of the Prophets in their meanly-provided Colleges may ſay, not, Mors in olla, but fames? how many Churches may juſtly plead that which our Saviour bade his Diſciples, The Lord hath need? And if this infinite ſtore hath made your choyce doubtfull, how eaſie were it to ſhew you, wherein you might oblige the whole Church of God to you, and make your memoriall both eternall and bleſſed; or, if you had rather, the whole Common-wealth? But now I find my ſelfe too bold and too buſie, in thus looking to particularities: God ſhall direct you; and if you follow him, ſhall crowne you: howſoever, if good be done, and that betimes; he hath what he deſired, and your ſoule ſhall have more than you can deſire. The ſucceſſe of my weake, yet hearty counſell, ſhall make me as rich, as God hath made you with all your abundance. That God bleſſe it to you, and make both our recknings cheerefull in the day of our common Audit. A

To E.B. Dedicated to Sir George Goring.

EPIST. VIII. Remedies againſt dulneſſe and heartleſneſſe in our callings, and incouragements to cheerefulneſſe in labour.

IT falls out not ſeldome (if we may meaſure all by one) that the mind over-layed with worke, growes dull and heavy: and now doth nothing, becauſe it hath done too much; over-laviſh expence of ſpirits hath left it heartleſſe: as the beſt veſſell with much motion and vent, becomes flat, and dreggiſh. And not fewer (of more weak temper) diſcourage themſelves with the difficulty of what they muſt doe: ſome Travellers have more ſhrunk at the Map, than at the way. Betwixt both, how many ſit ſtill with their hands folded, and wiſh they knew how to be rid of time? If this e- B vill be not cured, we become miſerable loſers, both of good houres and of good parts. In theſe mentall diſeaſes, Empiricks are the beſt Phyſitians. I preſcribe you nothing but out of feeling: If you will avoid the firſt, moderate your owne vehemencie; ſuffer not your ſelfe to doe all you could doe: Riſe ever from your deske, not without an appetite. The beſt horſe will tire ſooneſt, if the reines lie ever looſe in his necke: Reſtraints in theſe caſes are encouragements: obtaine therefore of your ſelfe to deferre, and take new daies. How much better is it to refreſh your ſelfe with many competent meales, than to buy one daies gluttony, with the faſt of many? And if it be hard to call off the mind in the midſt of a faire and likely flight; know that all our eaſe and ſafety begins at the command of our ſelves; he can never taske himſelfe well, that cannot favour himſelfe. Perſwade your heart, that perfection comes by leiſure; and no excellent thing is done at once: the riſing and ſetting of many Sunnes (which C you think ſlackens your work) in truth ripens it. That gourd which came up in a night, withered in a day; whereas thoſe plants which abide age, riſe ſlowly. Indeed, where the heart is unwilling, prorogation hinders: what I liſt not to doe this day, I loath the next; but where is no want of deſire, delay doth but ſharpen the ſtomack. That which we doe unwillingly leave, we long to undertake: and the more our affection is, the greater our intention, and the better our performance. To take occaſion by the foretop, is no ſmall point of wiſdome; but to make time (which is wilde and fugitive) tame and pliable to our purpoſes, is the greateſt improvement of a man: All times ſerve him, which hath the rule of himſelfe.

If the ſecond, think ſeriouſly of the condition of your being: It is that we were made for; the Bird to flie, and Man to labour. What doe we here, if we repine at our worke? VVe had not beene, but that we might be ſtill buſie; if not in this taske we D diſlike, yet in ſome other of no leſſe toyle: there is no act that hath not his labour, which varies in meaſure, according to the will of the doer. This which you complaine of, hath beene undertaken by others, not with facility only, but with pleaſure; and what you chuſe for eaſe, hath beene abhorred of others, as tedious. All difficulty is not ſo much in the work, as in the Agent. To ſet the mind on the racke of a long meditation (you ſay) is a torment: to follow the ſwift foot of your hound all day long, hath no wearineſſe: what would you ſay of him, that finds better game in his ſtudy, than you in the field, and would account your diſport his puniſhment? Such there are, though you doubt and wonder. never think to detract from your buſineſſe, but adde to your will. It is the policie of our great enemie, to drive us with theſe feares, from that he fore ſees would grow profitable: like as ſome in hoſpitall Savages make E fearfull deluſions by ſorcery upon the ſhore, to fright ſtrangers from landing. Where you find therefore motions of reſiſtance, awaken your courage the more, and know there is ſome good that appeares not; vaine endevours find no oppoſition. All croſſes imply a ſecret commodity: reſolve then to will, becauſe you begin not to will: and either oppoſe your ſelfe, as Satan oppoſes you, or elſe you doe nothing. We pay no price to God for any good thing, but labour; if we higgle in that, we are worthy to loſe our bargaine. It is an invaluable gaine, that we may make in this traffique: for God is bountifull, as well as juſt; and when he ſees true endevour, doth not only

ſell

A ſell, but give: whereas idleneſſe neither gets nor ſaves; nothing is either more fruitleſſe of good, or more fruitfull of evill; for we doe ill whiles wee doe nothing, and loſe whiles we gaine not. The ſluggard is ſenſeleſſe; and ſo much more deſperate, becauſe he cannot complaine: but (though he feele it not) nothing is more precious than time, or that ſhall abide a reckning more ſtrict and fearefull: yea this is the meaſure of all our actions, which if it were not abuſed, our accounts could not be but even with God: ſo God eſteemes it (what ever our price be) that he plagues the loſſe of a ſhort time, with a reveng beyond all times. Houres have wings, and every moment flie up to the Author of time, and carry newes of our uſage, All our prayers cannot intreat one of them either to returne, or ſlacken his pace: the miſſpence of every minute is a new record againſt us in heaven. Sure, if we thought thus, we would diſmiſſe them with better reports, and not ſuffer them either to goe away empty, or
B laden with dangerous intelligence: how happy is it that every houre ſhould convey up, not onely the meſſage, but the fruits of good, and ſtay with the Ancient of dayes, to ſpeake for us before his glorious throne? Know this, and I ſhall take no care for your paines, nor you for paſtime. None of our profitable labours ſhall be tranſient; but even when we have forgotten them, ſhall welcome us into joy: we thinke wee have left them behinde us; but they are forwarder than our ſoules, and expect us where we would be. And if there were no crowne for theſe toiles, yet without future reſpects there is a tediouſneſſe in doing nothing. To man eſpecially, motion is naturall: there is neither mind, nor eye, nor joynt which moveth not: and as company makes a way ſhort, houres never goe away ſo merrily, as in the fellowſhip of worke. How did that induſtrious Heathen draw out water by night, and knowledge by day, and thought both ſhort; ever labouring, onely that he might labour? Certainely if idlenes
D were enacted by authority, there would not want ſome, which would pay their mulct, that they might worke: and thoſe ſpirits are likeſt to heaven, which move alwayes, and the freeſt from thoſe corruptions which are incident to nature. The running ſtreame clenſeth it ſelfe, whereas ſtanding ponds breed weeds, and mud. Theſe meditations muſt hearten us to that we muſt doe: whiles we are cheerefull, our labours ſhall ſtrive whether to yeeld us more comfort, or others more profit.

To Sir Iohn Harrington.

Epist. IX. Diſcuſſing this queſtion:

whether a man and wife after ſome yeeres mutuall and loving fruition of each other, may upon
C conſent, whether for ſecular, or religious cauſes, vow and performe a perpetuall ſeparation from each others bed, and abſolutely renounce all carnall knowledge of each other for ever.

I Wiſh not my ſelfe any other advocate, nor you any other adverſary, then S. Paul, who never gave (I ſpeake boldly) a direct precept, if not in this: his expreſſe charge whereupon I inſiſted, is, Defraud not one another, except with conſent for a time, that you may give your ſelves to faſting and prayer; and then againe come together, that Satan tempt you not for your incontinencie. Every word, (if you weigh it well) oppoſes your part, and pleads for mine. By conſent of all Divines, ancient and moderne [defrauding] is refraining from matrimoniall converſation: ſee what a word the Spirit of God hath choſen for this abſtinence; never but taken in ill part. But there is no fraud in conſent; as Chryſoſtome, Athanaſius, Theophilact, expound it: true; therefore S. Paul addes (unleſſe with conſent) that I may omit to ſay,
E that in ſaying (unleſſe with conſent) he implies, both that there may be a defrauding without it, and with conſent a defrauding, but not unlawfull: but ſee what he addes, (for a time) conſent cannot make this defrauding lawfull, except it be temporary: No defrauding without conſent, no conſent for a perpetuity. How long then, and wherefore? Not for every cauſe, not for any length of time, but onely for a while and for devotion (ut vacetis, &c.) Not that you may pray onely, (as Chryſoſtome notes juſtly) but that you might (give your ſelves to prayer.) In our mariage ſociety (ſaith he, againſt that paradox of Hierom) we may pray, and woe to us if we doe not; but we cannot (vacare orationi.) But we are bidden to pray continually: Yet not I hope, ever to faſt and pray. Marke how the Apoſtle addes, (that you may giue your ſelves to faſting and prayer.) It is ſolemne exerciſe, which the Appoſtle here intends, ſuch as is joyned with faſting and externall humiliation; wherein all earthly comforts muſt be forborne. but what if a man liſt to taske himſelfe continually, and will be alwayes painfully devote? may he then ever abſtaine? No: Let them meet together againe, ſaith the Apoſtle; not as a toleration, but as a charge. But what if they both can live ſafely thus ſevered? This is more than they can undertake: there is danger ſaith our Apoſtle, in this abſtinence (leſt Satan tempt you for your incontinencie) what can be more plaine? Neither may the maried refraine this conuerſation without conſent neither may they without conſent refraine it for ever. What can you now urge us with, but the examples and ſentences of ſome Ancients? Let this ſtand evicted for the true and neceſſary ſenſe of the Apoſtle; and what is this but to lay men in the balance with God? I ſee and confeſſe how much ſome of the fathers admired Virginity; ſo farre, that there wanted not ſome, which both deteſted mariage as vicious, and would force a ſingle life upon mariage, as commendable: whoſe authority ſhould move me, if I ſaw not ſome of them oppoſite to others, and others no leſſe to S. Paul himſelfe. How oft doth S. Auſtin redouble that rule, and importunately urge it to his Ecdicia, in that ſerious Epiſtle, that without conſent the continence of the maried, cannot be warantable; teaching her (from theſe words of S. Paul, which he charges her, in the contrary practice, not to have read, heard, or marked) that if her husband ſhould containe, and ſhe would not, he were bound to pay her the debt of mariage benevolence; and that God would impute it to him for continence notwithſtanding. Hom. in 1. Cor. 7. Hence is that of Chryſoſtome, that the wife is both the ſervant and the miſtris of her husband; a ſervant to yeeld her body, a miſtris to have power of his: who alſo in the ſame place determines it forbidden fraud, for the husband, or wife, to containe alone: according to that of the Paraphraſt; Let either both containe, or neither. Hierome contrarily, defines thus: But if one of the two (ſaith he) conſidering the reward of chaſtity, will containe, he ought not to aſſent to the other which containes not, &c. becauſe luſt ought rather to come to continencie, than continencie decline to luſt: concluding that a brother, or a ſiſter is not ſubject in ſuch a caſe; and that God hath not called us to uncleaneneſſe, but to holineſſe. A ſtrange gloſſe to fall from the pen of a Father: which yet I durſt not ſay, if it were more boldneſſe for me to diſſent from him, than for him to diſſent from all others. He that cenſures S. Paul to argue groſly to his Galathians, may as well tax him of an unfit direction to his Corinthians: It ſhall be no preſumption to ſay, that in this point all his writings bewray more zeale than truth: whether the conſcience of his former ſlip cauſed him to abhorre that ſex; or his admiration of Virginity tranſported him to a contempt of mariage. Antiquity will afford you many examples of holy men voluntarily ſequeſtred from their wives: Precepts muſt be our guides, and not patternes. You may tell me of Sozomens Ammon, that famous Monke, who having perſwaded his bride the firſt day to continuance of Virginity, lived with her 18 yeares in a ſeverall bed, and in a ſeverall habitation, upon the mountaine Nitria, 22 yeares: you may tell me of Ieromes Malchus, Auſtins Edicia, and ten thouſand others: I care not for their number, and ſuſpect their example: Doe but reconcile their practice with S. Pauls rule, I ſhall both magnifie and imitate them. I profeſſe before God and men, nothing ſhould hinder me but this law of the Apoſtle: whereto conſider, I beſeech you, what can be more oppoſite than this opinion, than this courſe of life.

The Apoſtle ſayes, Refraine not but with conſent for a time: your words, and their practice ſaith, Refraine with conſent for ever: he ſaith (meet together againe) you ſay, never more: he ſaith (meet leſt you be tempted) you ſay, meet not though you be tempted. I willingly grant with Athanaſius, that for ſome ſet time, eſpecially (as Anſelme interprets it) for ſome holy time, we may, and (in this latter caſe) we muſt forbeare all matrimoniall acts, and thoughts: not for that they are ſinfull, but unſeaſonable. As mariage muſt be alwaies uſed chaſtly, and moderately: ſo ſometimes it muſt be forgotten. How many are drunke with their owne vines, and ſurfet of their owne fruits: either immodeſty, or immoderation in man or wife, is adulterous. If yet

I shall further yeeld, that they may conditionally agree to refraine from each other, so long till they be perplexed with temptations on either part: I shall goe as farre as the reach of my warrant, at least; perhaps beyond it: since the Apostle chargeth, Meet againe lest you be tempted; not, meet when you are tempted: But to say absolutely, and for ever renounce (by consent) the conversation of each other, what temptation so ever assault you, is directly, not beyond, but against Pauls divinitie, no lesse than my assertion is against yours. The ground of all these errors, in this head of Matrimony, is an unworthy conceit of some unchristian filthinesse in the mariage-bed: Every man will not utter, but too many hold that conclusion of Hierome: It is good for a man not to touch a woman, therefore to touch her, is evill; whom I doubt not, but S. Austin meant to oppose, while he writes, Bonum inquam sunt nuptiæ, & contra omnes calumnias possunt fama ratione defendi: Mariage (I say) is a good thing, and may by sound proofe be defended, against all slanders: well may man say, that it is good, which God saith is honourable; and both good and honourable must that needs be, which was instituted by the honourable author of goodnesse, in the state of mans perfect goodnesse: Let us take heed of casting shame upon the ordinance of our Maker. But there was no carnall knowledge in Paradise. But againe, in Paradise God said, Increase and multiply: there should have beene, if there were not. Those that were naked without shame, should have beene conjoyned without shame, because without sinne. Meats and drinks, and acts of mariage (saith Austin) for these he compares both in lawfulnesse, and necessity) are, as they are used, either lawfull, veniall, or damnable. Meats are for the preservation of man: mariage acts for the preservation of mankind: neither of them without some carnall delight: which yet, if by the bridle of temperance it be held to the proper and naturall use, cannot be tearmed lust. There is no ordinance of God which either is of more excellent use, or hath suffered more abuse in all times: the fault is in men, not in mariage: let them rectifie themselves, their bed shall be blessed. Here need no separation from each other, but rather a separation of brutishnesse, and close corruption from the soule; which whosoever hath learned to remove, shall find the crowne of matrimoniall chastity, no lesse glorious than that of single continence.

Ep. X. Incouraging him to persist in the holy calling of the ministery; which upon conceit of his insufficiencie, and want of affection, he seemed inclining to forsake and change.

I Am not more glad to heare from you, than sorry to heare of your discontentment: whereof, as the cause is from your selfe, so must the remedy. We Schollers are the apteſt of all others to make our selves miserable: you might be your owne best counsellor, were you but indifferent to your selfe. If I could but cure your prejudice, your thoughts would heale you: and indeed the same hand that wounded you, were fittest for this service. I need not tell you, that your calling is honourable: if you did not think so, you had not complained. It is your unworthynesse that troubles you. Let me boldly tell you, I know you in this case better than your selfe: you are never the more unsufficient, because you think so: if we will be rigorous, Pauls question (mi ixo) will appose us all: but according to the gracious indulgence of him that calls things which are not as if they were, we are that we are, yea, that we ought; and must be thankfull for our any thing. There are none more fearefull than the able, none more bold than the unworthy. How many have you seene and heard, of weaker graces, (your owne heart shall be the Judge) which have sate without paleness, or trembling, in that holy chaire, and spoken as if the words had beene there owne; satisfying themselves, if not the hearers? And doe you (whose gifts many have envied) stand quaking upon the lowest staire? hath God given you that unusuall variety of tongues, stile of Arts, a stile worth emulation, and (which is worth all) a faithfull and honest heart; and doe you now shrinke backe, and say, Send him by whom thou shouldest send?

ſend? Give God but what you have; he expects no more: This is enough to honour him, and crowne you. Take heed while you complaine of want, leſt pride ſhroud it ſelfe under the skirts of modeſty: How many are thankfull for leſſe? You have more than the moſt; yet this contents you not; it is nothing unleſſe you may equall the beſt, if not exceed; yea, I feare how this may ſatisfie you, unleſſe you may thinke your ſelfe ſuch as you would be. What is this but to grudge at the beſtower of graces? I tell you without flattery, God hath great gaines by fewer tallents: ſet your heart to employ theſe, and your advantage ſhall be more than your maſters. Neither doe now repent you of the unadviſedneſſe of your entrance; God called you to it upon an eternall deliberation, and meant to make uſe of your ſuddenneſſe, as a meanes to fetch you into his worke, whom more leiſure would have found refractary: Full little did the one Saul think of a kingdome, when he went to ſeeke his fathers ſtrayes in the land of Shaliſhah; or the other Saul of an Apoſtleſhip, when he went with his Commiſſion to Damaſcus: God thought of both; and effected what they meant not. Thus hath he done to you, acknowledge this hand, and follow it. He found and gave both facultie and opportunity to enter: find you but a will to proceed, I dare promiſe you abundance of comfort. How many of the Ancients, after a forceable ordination, became not profitable only, but famous in the Church? But, as if you ſought ſhifts to diſcourage your ſelfe, when you ſee you cannot maintaine this hold of inſufficiencie, you flie to alienation of affection; in the truth whereof, none can controle you but your owne heart; in the juſtice of it, we both may, and muſt. This plea is not for Chriſtians; we muſt affect what we ought, in ſpight of our ſelves: wherefore ſerves religion, if not to make us Lords of our owne affections? If we muſt be ruled by our ſlaves, what good ſhould we doe? Can you more diſlike your ſtation, then we all naturally diſtaſt goodneſſe? Shall we neglect the purſuit of vertue, becauſe it pleaſes not; or rather diſpleaſe, and neglect our ſelves, till it may pleaſe us? Let me not aske whether your affections be eſtranged, but wherefore? Divinitie is a miſtreſſe worthy your ſervice: All other Arts are but drudges to her alone: Fooles may contemne her; who cannot judge of true intellectuall beauty: but if they had our eyes, they could not but be raviſhed with admiration. You have learned (I hope) to contemne their contempt, and to pity injurious ignorance. She hath choſen you as a worthy clyent, yea a favorite; and hath honoured you with her commands, and her acceptations; who but you would plead ſtrangeneſſe of affection? How many thouſands ſue to her, and cannot be lookt upon? You are happy in her favours, and yet complaine; yea ſo farre, as that you have not ſtucke to thinke of a change. No word could have fallen from you more unwelcome. This is Satans policie, to make us out of love with our callings, that our labours may be unprofitable, & our ſtandings tedious. He knowes that all changes are fruitleſſe, and that while we affect to be other, we muſt needs be weary of what we are: That there is no ſucceſſe in any endevour without pleaſure; that there can be no pleaſure, where the mind longs after alterations. If you eſpie not this craft of the common enemie, you are not acquainted with your ſelfe. Vnder what forme ſoever it come, repell it; and abhorre the firſt motion of it, as you love your peace, as you hope for your reward. It is the miſery of the moſt men, that they cannot ſee when they are happy; and whiles they ſee but the out-ſide of others conditions, preferre that which their experience teaches them afterwards to condemne, not without loſſe and teares. Far be this unſtableneſſe from you, which have beene ſo long taught of God. All vocations haue their inconveniencies; which if they cannot be avoided, muſt be digeſted. The more difficulties, the greater glory: Stand faſt therefore, and reſolve that this calling is the beſt, both in it ſelfe, & for you: and know that it cannot ſtand with your Chriſtian courage to run away from theſe incident evils, but to encounter them. Your hand is at the plough: if you meet with ſome tough clods, that will not eaſily yeeld to the ſhare, lay on more ſtrength rather; ſeeke not remedy in your feet by flight, but in your hands by a conſtant endeavour. A way with this weake timorouſneſſe, and wrongfull humility. Be cheerefull and couragious in this great worke of God; the end hall be glorious, your ſelfe happy and many in you.

THE SIXT DECAD.

To my Lord DENNY.

EPIST. I. A particular account how our dayes are, or ſhould bee ſpent, both common and holy.

EVery day is a little life; and our whole life is but a day repeated: whence it is that old Iacob numbers his life by daies, and Moſes deſires to be taught this point of holy Arithmeticke, To number not his yeares, but his dayes: Thoſe therefore that dare loſe a day, are dangerouſly prodigall; thoſe that dare miſ-ſpend it, deſperate. We can beſt teach others by our ſelves: let me tell your Lordſhip, how I would paſſe my dayes, whether common or ſacred; that you (or whoſoever others, over-hearing mee) may either approve my thriftineſſe, or correct my errors: To whom is the account of my houres either more due, or more knowne? All daies are his, who gave time a beginning, and continuance; yet ſome he hath made ours, not to command, but to uſe. In none may we forget him: in ſome we muſt forget all, beſides him. Firſt therefore, I deſire to awake at thoſe houres, not when I will, but when I muſt; pleaſure is not a fit rule for reſt, but health; neither doe I conſult ſo much with the Sunne, as mine owne neceſſity, whether of body, or in that, of the mind. If this vaſſall could well ſerve me waking, it ſhould never ſleepe: but now, it muſt be pleaſed, that it may be ſerviceable. Now, when ſleepe is rather driven away, than leaves me; I would ever awake with God; my firſt thoughts are for him, who hath made the night for reſt, and the day for travell: and as he gives, ſo bleſſes both. If my heart be early ſeaſoned with his preſence, it will ſavour of him all day after. While my body is dreſſing, not with an effeminate curioſity, nor yet with rude neglect; my mind addreſſes it ſelfe to her enſuing taske; bethinking what is to be done, and in what order; and marſhalling (as it may) my houres with my work: That done, after ſome whiles meditation, I walke up to my maſters and companions, my books; and ſitting downe amongſt them, with the beſt contentment, I dare not reach forth my hand to ſalute any of them, till I have firſt looked up to heaven, and craved favour of him to whom all my ſtudies are duly referred: without whom, I can neither profit, nor labour. After this, out of no over-great variety, I call forth thoſe, which may beſt fit my occaſions; wherein, I am not too ſcrupulous of age: Sometimes I put my ſelfe to ſchoole, to one of thoſe Ancients, whom the Church hath honoured with the name of Fathers; whoſe Volumes, I confeſſe not to open, without a ſecret reverence of their holineſſe, and gravity: Sometimes to thoſe later Doctors, which want nothing but age to make them claſſicall: alwaies, to Gods Booke. That day is loſt, whereof ſome houres are not improved in thoſe Divine Monuments: others I turne over out of choyce; theſe out of duty. Ere I can have ſate unto wearineſſe, my family, having now overcome all houſhold houſhold diſtractions, invites me to our common devotions: not without ſome ſhort preparation. Theſe heartily performed, ſend me up, with a more ſtrong and cheereſull appetite to my former worke, which I find made eaſie to me by intermiſſion, and varietie: Now therefore can I deceive the houres with change of pleaſures, that is, of labours. One while mine eies are buſied, another while my hand, and ſometimes my mind takes the burden from them both: Wherein, I would imitate the skilfulleſt Cooks, which make the beſt diſhes with manifold mixtures: one houre is ſpent in Textuall Divinity, another in Controverſie: Hiſtories releeve them both. Now, when the mind is weary of others labours, it begins to undertake her owne: ſometimes it meditates and winds up for future uſe; ſometimes it layes forth her conceits into preſent diſcourſe; ſometimes for it ſelfe, ofter for others. Neither know I whether it workes or playes in theſe thoughts: I am ſure no ſport hath more pleaſure, no worke more uſe: Onely the decay of a weake body, makes me think theſe delights inſenſibly laborious. Thus could I all day (as Ringers uſe) make my ſelfe Muſicke with changes, and complaine ſooner of the day for ſhortneſſe, than of the buſineſſe for toyle; were it not that this faint monitor interrupts me ſtill in the midſt of my buſie pleaſures, and inforces me both to reſpite and repaſt: I muſt yeeld to both; while my body and mind are joyned together in theſe unequall couples, the better muſt follow the weaker. Before my meales therefore, and after, I let my ſelfe looſe from all thoughts; and now, would forget that I ever ſtudied: A full mind takes away the bodies appetite, no leſſe than a full body makes a dull and unweildy mind: Company, diſcourſe, recreations, are now ſeaſonable and welcome; Theſe prepare me for a diet, not g'uttonous, but medicinall; The palate may not be pleaſed, but the ſtomack; nor that for it owne ſake: Neither would I think any of theſe comforts worth reſpect in themſelves, but in their uſe, in their end; ſo farre, as they may inable me to better things. If I ſee any diſh to tempt my palate, I feare a Serpent in that Apple, and would pleaſe my ſelfe in a wilfull deniall: I riſe capable of more, not deſirous: not now immediately from my trencher, to my booke; but after ſome intermiſſion. Moderate ſpeed is a ſure help to all proceedings; where thoſe things which are proſecuted with violence of endevour, or deſire, either ſucceed not, or continue not.

After my later meale, my thoughts are ſleight: onely my memory may be charged with her taske, of recalling what was committed to her cuſtody in the day; and my heart is buſie in examining my hands and mouth, and all other ſenſes, of that dayes behaviour: and now the evening is come, no Tradeſman doth more carefully take in his wares, cleare his ſhop-board, and ſhut his Windowes, than I would ſhut up my thoughts and cleare my mind. That Student ſhall live miſerably, which like a Camell lies downe under his burden. All this done, calling together my family, we end the day with God. Thus doe we rather drive away the time before us, than follow it. I grant, neither is my practice worthy to be exemplary, neither are our callings proportionable. The lives of a Nobleman, of a Courtier, of a Scholler, of a Citizen, of a Countryman, differ no leſſe than their diſpoſitions: yet muſt all conſpire in honeſt labour. Sweat is the deſtiny of all trades, whether of the browes, or of the mind. God never allowed any man to doe nothing. How miſerable is the condition of thoſe men, which ſpend the time as if it were given them, and not lent: as if houres were waſte creatures, and ſuch as ſhould never be accounted for: as if God would take this for a good bill of reckoning; Item, ſpent upon my pleaſures forty yeares. Theſe men ſhall once find, that no blood can privilege idleneſſe; and that nothing is more precious to God, than that which they deſire to caſt away: Time. Such are my common dayes: but Gods day calls for another reſpect. The ſame Sun ariſes on this day, and enlightens it; yet becauſe that Sun of righteouſneſſe aroſe upon it, & gave a new life unto the world in it, and drew the ſtrength of Gods morall precept unto it, therfore juſtly doe we ſing with the Pſalmiſt; This is the day which the Lord hath made. Now I forget the world, and in a ſort my ſelfe; and deale with my wonted thoughts, as great men uſe, who at ſome times of their privacie, forbid the acceſſe of all ſuters. Prayer, meditation, reading, hearing, preaching, ſinging, good conference, are the buſineſſes of this day; which I dare not beſtow on any work, or pleaſure, but heavenly. I hate ſuperſtition on the one ſide,

and looſeneſſe on the other; but I find it hard to offend in too much devotion, eaſie in prophaneneſſe. The whole weeke is ſanctified by this day: and according to my care of this, is my bleſſing on the reſt. I ſhew your Lordſhip what I would doe, and what I ought: I commit my deſires to the imitation of the weake; my actions to the cenſures of the Wiſe and Holy; my weakneſſes to the pardon and redreſſe of my merciſull God.

To Mr. T.S. Dedicated to Sir Fulke Greuill.

EP. II. Diſcourſing how we may uſe the world without danger.

HOw to live out of the danger of the World, is both a great and good care, and that which troubles to few. Some, that the world may not hurt them, run from it; and baniſh themſelves to the tops of ſolitary mountaines: changing the Cities for Deſarts, houſe for Caves, and the ſocietie of men for beaſts; and leſt their enemie might inſinuate himſelfe into their ſecrecie, have abridged themſelves of dyet, cloathing, lodging, harbour, fit for reaſonable creatures; ſeeming to have left off themſelves, no leſſe than companions.

As if the world were not every where; as if we could hide our ſelves from the Devill; as if ſolitarineſſe were privileged from Temptations: as if we did not more violently affect reſtrained delights; as if theſe Ieromes did not find Rome in their heart, when they had nothing but rocks and trees in their eye. Hence, theſe places of retiredneſſe, founded at firſt upon neceſſity mixt with devotion, have proved infamouſly uncleane; Cels of luſt, not of pietie. This courſe is prepoſterous; if I were worthy to teach you a better way, learne to be an Hermite at home: Begin with your owne heart, eſtrange and weane it from the love, not from the uſe of the world: Chriſtianity hath taught us nothing, if we have not learned this diſtinction; It is a great weakneſſe not to ſee, but we muſt be enamoured: Eliſha ſaw the ſecret ſtate of the Syrian Court, yet as an enemie: The bleſſed Angells ſee our earthly affaires, but as ſtrangers: Moſes his body was in the Court of Pharaoh, amongſt the delicate Egyptians, his heart was ſuffering with the afflicted Iſraelites. Lot tooke part of the faire medowes of Sodom, not of their ſinnes. Our bleſſed Saviour ſaw the glory of all Kingdomes, and contemned them: and cannot the world looke upon us Chriſtians, but we are bewitched? Wee ſee the Sunne daily, and warme us at his beames, yet make not an Idoll of it; doth any man hid his face, leſt he ſhould adore it? All our ſafety or danger therefore is from within. In vaine is the body an Anachoret, if the heart be a Ruffian: And if that be retired in affections, the body is but a Cipher: Lo then eyes will look careleſly and ſtrangly on what they ſee, and the tongue will ſometimes anſwer to that was not asked. We eat and recreate, becauſe we muſt, not becauſe we would: and when we are pleaſed, we are ſuſpicious: Lawfull delights, we neither refuſe nor dote upon, and all contentments goe and come like ſtrangers. That all this may be done, take up your heart with better thoughts; be ſure it will not be empty: if heaven have fore-ſtalled all the roomes, the world is diſappointed, and either dares not offer, or is repulſed. Fix your ſelfe upon the glory of that eternity, which abides you after this ſhort pilgrimage. You cannot but contemne what you find in compariſon of what you expect. Leave not till you attaine to this, that you are willing to live, becauſe you cannot as yet be diſſolved: Be but one halfe upon earth, let your better part converſe aboue whence it is, and enjoy that whereto it was ordained. Thinke how little the World can doe for you, and what it doth, how deceitfully: what ſtings there are with this Honey, what Farewell ſucceeds this Welcome.

When this Iael brings you milke in the one hand, know ſhe hath a naile in the other. Aske your heart what it is the better, what the merier, for all thoſe pleaſures wherewith it hath befriended you: let your one tryall teach you contempt; Thinke how ſincere, how glorious thoſe joyes are, which abide you elſewhere, and a thouſand times more certaine (though future) than preſent.

And let not theſe thoughts be flying, but fixed: In vaine doe we meditate, if we reſolve not: when your heart is once thus ſetled, it ſhall command all things to advantage. The world ſhall not betray, but ſerve it; and that ſhall be fulfilled which God promiſes by his Salomon; When the wayes of a man pleaſe the Lord, he will make his enemies alſo at peace with him.

Sir, this advice my poverty afforded long ſince to a weake friend; I write it not to you any otherwiſe, than as Schollers are wont to ſay their part to their Maſters. The world hath long and juſtly both noted and honoured you for eminence in wiſdome and learning, and I above the moſt; I am ready with the awe of a Learner, to embrace all precepts from you: you ſhall expect nothing from me, but Teſtimonies of reſpect and thankfulneſſe.

To Sir GEORGE FLEETWOOD.

EP. III. Of the remedies of ſinne, and motives to avoyd it.

THere is none, either more common or more troubleſome gueſt, than Sin. Troubleſome, both in the ſolicitation of it, and in the remorſe. Before the act, it wearies us with a wicked importunity; after the act, it torments us with feares, and the painfull gnawings of an accuſing Conſcience: Neither is it more irkſome to men, than odious to God; who indeed never hated any thing but it; and for it any thing. How happy were we, if we could be rid of it? This muſt be our deſire, but cannot be our hope, ſo long as we carry this body of ſinne and death about us: yet (which is our comfort) it ſhall not carry us, though we carry it: It will dwell with us, but with no command; yea, with no peace: We grudge to give it houſe-roome; but we hate to give it ſervice. This our Hagar will abide many ſtrokes, ere ſhe be turned out of doores: ſhe ſhall goe at laſt; and the ſeed of promiſe ſhall inherit alone. There is no unquietneſſe good, but this: and in this caſe, quietneſſe cannot ſtand with ſafety: neither did ever warre more truly beget peace, than in this ſtrife of the ſoule.

Reſiſtance is the way to victory; and that, to an eternall peace and happineſſe. It is a bleſſed care then, how to reſiſt ſinne, how to avoid it: and ſuch as I am glad to teach and learne. As there are two grounds of all ſinne, ſo of the avoidance of ſinne; Love and Feare: Theſe if they be placed amiſſe, cauſe us to offend: if right, are the remedies of evill. The love muſt be of God; Feare, of judgement.

As he loves much, to whom much is forgiven: ſo he that loves much, will not dare to doe that which may need forgiveneſſe. The heart that hath felt the ſweetneſſe of Gods mercies, will not abide the bitter relliſh of ſinne: This is both a ſtronger motive than Feare, and more Noble; None but a good heart is capable of this grace: which who ſo hath received, thus powerfully repels tentations.

Have I found my God ſo gracious to me, that he hath denied me nothing, either in earth or heaven: and ſhall not I ſo much as deny my owne will for his ſake? Hath my deare Saviour bought my ſoule at ſuch a price, and ſhall he not have it? Was he crucified for my ſinnes, and ſhall I by my ſinnes crucifie him againe? Am I his in ſo many bonds, and ſhall I ſerve the Devill? O God! is this the fruit of thy beneficence to me, that I ſhould wilfully diſhonor thee? Was thy blood ſo little worth, that I ſhould tread it under my feet? Doth this become him that ſhall be once glorious with thee? Haſt thou prepared heaven for me, and doe I thus prepare my ſelfe for heaven? Shall I thus recompence thy love, in doing that which thou hateſt? Satan hath no Dart (I ſpeake confidently) that can pierce this ſhield: Chriſtians are indeed too oft ſurprized, ere they can hold it out: there is no ſmall policy in the ſuddenneſſe of temptation: but if they have once ſetled it before their breſt, they are ſafe, & their enemie hopeleſſe. Vnder this head therefore, there is ſure remedy againſt ſinne, by looking upwards, backwards, into our ſelves, forwards. Vpwards, at the glorious Majeſtie, and infinite goodneſſe of that God whom our ſinne would offend, and in whoſe face we ſinne: whoſe mercies, and whoſe holineſſe is ſuch, that if there were no hell, we would not offend.

Backwards

Backwards, at the manifold favours, whereby we are obliged to obedience. Into our ſelves, at that honorable vocation, wherewith he hath graced us, that holy profeſſion we have made of his calling, and grace, that ſolemne vow and covenant, whereby we have confirmed our profeſſion; the gracious beginnings of that Spirit in us, which is grieved by our ſinnes, yea quenched. Forwards, at the joy which will follow upon our forbearance, that peace of conſcience, that happy expectation of glory, compared with the momentarie and unpleaſing delight of a preſent ſinne; All theſe, out of love; Feare is a retentive, as neceſſarie, not ſo ingenuous. It is better to be wonne, than to be frighted from ſinne: to be allured, than drawne. Both are little enough in our proneneſſe to evill: Evill is the only object of feare. Herein therfore, we muſt terrifie our ſtubbornneſſe, with both evills; Of loſſe, and of ſenſe: that if it be poſſible, the horror of the event may countervaile the pleaſure of the tentation: Of loſſe; remembring that now we are about to loſe a God; to caſt away all the comforts and hopes of another world; to rob our ſelves of all thoſe ſweet mercies we enjoyed; to thruſt his ſpirit out of doores (which cannot abide to dwell within the noiſome ſtench of ſinne,) to ſhut the doores of heaven againſt our ſelves. Of ſenſe; That thus we give Satan aright in us; power over us; advantage againſt us; That we make God to frowne upon us in heaven; That we arme all his good creatures againſt us on earth; That we doe as it were take Gods hand in ours: and ſcourge our ſelves with all temporall plagues, and force his curſes upon us, and ours: That we wound our owne conſciences with ſinnes, that they may wound us with everlaſting torments; That we doe both make a hell in our breaſts beforehand, and open the gates of that bottomleſſe pit, to receive us afterwards: That we doe now caſt brimſtone into the fire; and leſt we ſhould faile of tortures, make our ſelves our owne fiends: Theſe, and what ever other terrors of this kind, muſt be laid to the ſoule: which, if they be throughly urged to an heart, not altogether incredulous, well may a man aske himſelfe, how he dare ſinne? But if neither this Sun of mercies, nor the tempeſtuous winds of judgment can make him caſt off Peters cloake of wickedneſſe; he muſt be clad with confuſion, as with a cloake, according to the Pſalmiſt.

I tremble to thinke how many live, as if they were neither beholden to God, nor afraid of him, neither in his debt, nor danger: As if their heaven & hell were both upon earth; ſinning not onely without ſhame, but not without malice: It is their leaſt ill to doe evill: Behold they ſpeake for it, joy in it, boaſt of it, inforce to it: as if they would ſend challenges into heaven, and make love to deſtruction: Their lewdneſſe cals for our ſorrow, and zealous obedience; that our God may have as true ſervants, as enemies. And as we ſee naturall qualities, increaſed with the reſiſtance of their contraries; ſo muſt our grace with others ſinnes: we ſhall redeeme ſomewhat of Gods diſhonor by ſinne, if we ſhall thence grow holy.

To Mr. Doctor MILBURNE.

EP. IV. Diſcourſing how farre, and wherein Popery deſtroyeth the foundation.

THe meane in all things is not more ſafe than hard; whether to find or keep: and as in all other morality, it lyeth in a narrow roome; ſo moſt in the matter of our cenſure, eſpecially concerning Religion: wherein we are wont to be either careleſſe or too peremptory. How farre, and wherein Popery razeth the foundation, is worth our inquirie: I need not ſtay upon words. By foundation, we meane the neceſſary grounds of Chriſtian faith. This foundation Papiſtry defaces, by laying a new, by caſting downe the old. In theſe caſes, addition deſtroyes: he that obtrudes a new word, no leſſe overthrowes the Scripture, than he that denies the old; yea this very obtruſion denies: he that ſets up a new Chriſt, rejects Chriſt: Two foundations cannot ſtand at once; the Arke and Dagon: Now Papiſtry layes a double new foundation: the one, a new rule of faith, that is, a new word; the other, a new Author, or guide of faith, that is, a new head beſides Chriſt. God never laid other foundation, than in the Prophets and Apoſtles: upon their divine writing, he meant to build his Church; which he therefore inſpired, that they might be (like himſelfe) perfect and eternall: Popery builds upon an unwritten word; the voice of old (but doubtfull) Traditions; the voice of the preſent Church, that is, as they interpret it, theirs; with no leſſe confidence and preſumption of certainty, than any thing ever written by the finger of God: If this be not a new foundation, the old was none. God never taught this holy Spouſe to know any other husband, than Chriſt; to acknowledge any other head; to follow any other Shepherd; to obey any other King: he alone may be enjoyed without jealouſie, ſubmitted to without danger, without error beleeved, ſerved without ſcruple: Popery offers to impoſe on Gods Church a King, Shepherd, Head, Huſband, beſides her owne: A man; a man of ſinne. He muſt know all things, can erre in nothing: direct, informe, animate, command, both in earth and Purgatorie; expound Scriptures, canonize Saints, forgive ſinnes, create new Articles of Faith; and in all theſe, is abſolute & infallible as his Maker: who ſees not, that if to attribute theſe things to the Son of God, be to make him the foundation of the Church; then to aſcribe them to another, is to contradict him that ſaid, other foundation can no man lay, than that which is laid, which is Jeſus Chriſt. To lay a new foundation, doth neceſſarily ſubvert the old: yet ſee this further actually done in particulars; wherein yet this diſtinction may cleare the way: The foundation is overthrowne two wayes; either in flat tearmes, when a maine principle of faith is abſolutely denied, as the deity and conſubſtantialitie of the Son by Arrius, the Trinitie of perſons by Sabellius and Servetus, the reſurrection of the body by Himenæus and Philetus, the laſt judgement by S. Peters mockers: Or ſecondly, by conſequent, when any opinion is maintained, which by juſt ſequell over-turneth the truth of that principle, which the defendant profeſſes to hold; yet ſo, as he will not grant the neceſſitie of that deduction. So the ancient Minæi, of whom Ierome ſpeaketh, while they urged Circumciſion, by conſequent, according to Pauls rule, rejected Chriſt: So the Pelagians, while they defended a full perfection of our righteouſneſſe in our ſelves, overthrew Chriſts juſtification: and in effect ſaid, I beleeve in Chriſt, and in my ſelfe: So ſome Vbiquitaries, while they hold the poſſibilitie of converſion and ſalvation of reprobates, overthrow the doctrine of Gods eternall Decree, and immutabilitie. Popery comes in this latter ranke, and may juſtly be tearmed Hereſie, by direct conſequent: though not in their grant, yet in neceſſarie proofe and inference. Thus it overthrowes the truth of Chriſts humanitie, while it holds his whole humane body locally circumſcribed in heaven, and at once (the ſame inſtant) wholly preſent in ten thouſand places on earth, without circumſcription: That whole Chriſt is in the formes of bread, with all his dimenſions, every part having his owne place and figure; and yet ſo, as that he is wholly in every part of the bread. Our juſtification, while it aſcribes it to our owne works: The all-ſufficiencie of Chriſts owne ſacrifice, whiles they reiterate it daily by the hands of a Prieſt. Of his ſatisfaction, while they hold a paiment of our utmoſt farthings, in a deviſed Purgatory. Of his mediation, while they implore others to aid them, not onely by their interceſſion, but their merits; ſuing not onely for their prayers, but their gifts: The value of the Scriptures, whiles they hold them inſufficient, obſcure, in points eſſentiall to ſalvation, and bind them to an uncertaine dependance upon the Church. Beſides hundreds of this kind, there are Hereſies in actions, contrary to thoſe fundamentall practices which God requires of his: as prohibitions of Scriptures to the laitie: Preſcriptions of devotion in unknowne tongues: Tying the effect of Sacraments and Prayers to the externall worke; Adoration of Angels, Saints, Bread, Reliques, Croſſes, Images: All which, are ſo many reall underminings of the ſacred foundation, which is no leſſe active, than vocall. By this the ſimpleſt may ſee, what we muſt hold of Papiſts; neither as no Hereticks, nor yet ſo palpable as the worſt. If any man aske for their conviction: In the ſimpler ſort, I grant this excuſe faire and tolerable; poore ſoules, they cannot be any otherwiſe informed, much leſſe perſwaded: Whiles in truth of heart, they hold the maine principles which they know; doubtleſſe the mercy of God may paſſe over their ignorant weakneſſe, in what they cannot know. For the other, I feare not to ſay, that many of their errors are wilfull. The light of truth hath ſhined out of heaven to them, and they love darkneſſe more than light. In this ſtate of the Church, he ſhall ſpeake and hope idly, that shall call for a publique and universall eviction: How can that be, when they pretend to be Judges in their owne cause? Unlesse they will not be adversaries to themselves, or judge of us, this course is but impossible. As the Devill, so Antichrist, will not yeeld: both shall be subdued; neither will treat of peace: what remaines, but that the Lord shall consume that wicked man (which is now clearely revealed) with the breath of his mouth, and abolish him with the brightnesse of his comming. Even so, Lord Iesus come quickly. This briefly is my conceit of Popery; which I willingly referre to your cleare and deepe judgment; being not more desirous to teach the ignorant what I know, than to learne of you what I should teach, and know not: The Lord direct all our thoughts to his glory, and the behoofe of his Church.

Written long since to M^r. I.W.

EPIST. V. Dissuading from separation, and shortly oppugning the grounds of that error.

IN my former Epistle (I confesse) I touched the late separation with a light hand: onely setting downe the injury of it (at the best) not discussing the grounds in common: now your danger drawes me on to this discourse: it is not much lesse thankworthy to prevent a disease, than to cure it: you confesse that you doubt; I mislike it not; doubting is not more the way to error, than to satisfaction; lay downe first, all pride and prejudice, and I cannot feare you: I never yet knew any man of this way, which hath not bewraid himselfe far gone with over-weening: and therefore it hath been just with God, to punish their selfe-love with error; an humble spirit is a fit subject for truth: prepare you your heart, and let me then answer, or rather God for me; you doubt whether the notorious sinne of one unreformed, uncensured, defile not the whole congregation; so as we may not without sinne communicate therewith: and why not the whole Church? woe were us, if we should thus live in the danger of all men: have we not sinnes enow of our owne, but we must borrow of others? Each man shall beare his owne burden: is ours so light that we call for more weight, and undertake what God never imposed? It was enough for him that is God and Man, to beare others iniquities; it is no taske for us, which shrinke under the least of our owne. But it is made ours, you say (though anothers) by our toleration and connivence: indeed, if we consent to them, incourage them, imitate, or accompany them in the same excesse of ryot; yet more, the publike person that forbeares a knowne sinne, sinneth; but if each mans knowne sinne, be every mans, what difference is betwixt the root and the branches? Adams sinne spred it selfe to us, because we were in him, stood or fell in him; our case is not such. Doe but see how God scorneth that unjust Proverb of the Jewes, That the Fathers have eaten sowre grapes, and the childrens teeth are set on edge? How much lesse are strangers? Is any bond so neere as this of blood? Shall not the child smart for the Parent? and shall we (even spiritually) for others? You object Achans stealth, and Israels punishment: an unlike case, and extraordinary: for see how direct Gods charge is. Be ye ware of the execrable thing, lest ye make your selves execrable; and in taking of the execrable thing, make also the Host of Israel execrable and trouble it. Now every man is made a party, by a peculiar injunction: and not onely all Israel is as one man; but every Israelite is a publike person in this act, you cannot shew the like in every one, no, not in any: it was a law for the present, not intended for perpetuitie: you may as well challenge the Trumpets of Rams-hornes, and seven dayes walke unto every siege. Looke else-where: The Church of Thyatira suffers the woman Iezabel to teach and deceive. A great sinne, Yet to you (saith the Spirit) the rest of Thyatira, as many as have not this learning, I will put upon you none other burden, but that which you have, hold fast; He saith not, Leave your Church, but Hold fast your owne. Looke into the practice of the Prophets, ransack their burdens, and see if you find this there; yea, behold our best patterne, the Sonne of God. The Jewish Rulers in Christs time were notoriouſly covetous, proud, oppreſſing, cruell, ſuperſtitious: our Saviour feared not polluting, in joyning with them; and was ſo farre from ſeparating himſelfe, that hee called and ſent others to them. But, a little Leaven leavens the whole lumpe: it is true; by the infection of it, ſin, where it is unpuniſhed, ſpreadeth; it ſowreth all thoſe whoſe hands are in it, not others. If we diſlike it, deteſt, deſiſt, reprove, & mourne for it, we cannot be tainted: the Corinthian love-feaſts had groſſe and ſinfull diſorder: yet you heare not Paul ſay, Abſtaine from the Sacrament till theſe be reformed; Rather he enjoynes the act, and controules the abuſe: God hath bidden you heare and receive: ſhew me, where he hath ſaid, except others be ſinfull. Their uncleanneſſe can no more defile you, than your holineſſe can excuſe them. But while I communicate (you ſay) I conſent; God forbid. It is ſinne, not to caſt out the deſerving: but not yours; who made you a Ruler and a Judge? The uncleane muſt be ſeparated; not by the people: Would you have no diſtinction betwixt private and publike perſons? What ſtrange confuſion is this? And what other than the old note of Corah and his company, Yee take too much upon you, ſeeing all the Congregation is holy, every one of them, and the Lord is among them: wherefore then lift ye up your ſelves above the Congregation of the Lord? What is (if this be not) to make a Monſter of Chriſts body? hee is the head, his Church the body, conſiſting of divers limbs. All have their ſeverall faculties and imployments; not every one, all; who would imagine any man ſo abſurd, as to ſay, that this body ſhould be all tongue, or all hands; every man a Teacher, every man a Ruler? As Chriſt had ſaid to every man, Goe teach, and whoſe ſinnes yee remit: How ſenſeleſſe are theſe two extremes? Of the Papiſts, that one man hath the Keyes: Of the Browniſts, that every man hath them. But theſe privileges and charges are given to the Church: True; to be executed by her Governours: the faculty of ſpeech is given to the whole man, but the uſe of it to the proper inſtrument. Man ſpeaketh, but by his tongue; if a voice ſhould be heard from his hand, eare, foot, it were unnaturall: Now if the tongue ſpeake not when it ought, ſhall we be ſo fooliſh as to blame the hand? But you ſay; if the tongue ſpeake not, or ſpeake ill, the whole man ſmarteth; the man ſinneth: I grant it, but you ſhal ſet the natural body on too hard a rack, if you ſtraine it in all things, to the likeneſſe of the ſpirituall, or civill. The members of that being quickned by the ſame ſoule, have charge of each other, and therefore either ſtand or fall together: It is not ſo in theſe. If then notwithſtanding unpuniſhed ſins, we may joyne with the true Church: Whether is ours ſuch? You doubt, and your ſolicitors deny: ſurely, if we have many enormities, yet none worſe than raſh and cruell judgement; let them make this a colour to depart from themſelves: there is no leſſe woe to them that call good evill. To judge one man is bold and dangerous. Judge then what is it to condemne a whole Church; God knowes, as much without cauſe, as without ſhame. Vaine men may libell againſt the Spouſe of Chriſt: her husband never divorced her: No, his love is ſtill above their hatred, his bleſſings above their cenſures: Doe but aske them, were we ever the true Church of God? If they deny it; Who then were ſo? Had God never Church upon earth, ſince the Apoſtles time, till Barrow and Greenwood aroſe? And even then ſcarce a number? nay, when or where was ever any man in the world (except in the ſchooles perhaps of Donatus or Novatus) that taught their doctrine; & now ſtill hath he none, but in a blind lane at Amſterdam? Can you thinke this probable? If they affirme it, when ceaſed we? Are not the points controverted ſtill the ſame? The ſame government, the ſame doctrine? Their minds are changed, not our eſtate: Who hath admoniſhed, evinced, excommunicated us; and when? All theſe muſt be done. Will it not be a ſhame to ſay; that Francis Iohnſon, as he tooke power to excommunicate his brother, and Father; ſo had power to excommunicate his Mother, the Church? How baſe and idle are theſe conceits? Are wee then Hereticks condemned in our ſelves? Wherein overthrow we the foundation? What other God, Saviour, Scriptures, Juſtification, Sacraments, Heaven, do they teach beſides us? Can all the Maſters of Separation, yea can all the Churches in Chriſtendome, ſet forth a more exquiſite and worthy confeſſion of faith, than is contained in the Articles of the Church of England? Who can hold theſe and be hereticall? Or, from which of theſe are we revolted? But to make this good, they have taught you to ſay,

A ſay, that every truth in Scripture is fundamentall; ſo fruitfull is errour of abſurdities; Whereof ſtill one breeds another more deformed than it ſelfe. That Trophimus was left at Miletum ſicke, that Pauls Cloake was left at Troas, that Gaius, Pauls hoaſt, ſaluted the Romanes, that Nabal was drunke; or that Thamar baked Cakes, and a thouſand of this nature are fundamentall: how large is the Separatiſts Creed, that hath all theſe Articles? If they ſay all Scripture is of the ſame Author, of the ſame authority; ſo ſay we, but not of the ſame uſe: is it as neceſſary for a Chriſtian to know that Peter hoſted with one Simon a Tanner in Joppa, as that Jeſus Chriſt the Sonne of God was borne of the Virgin Mary? What a monſter is this of an opinion, that all truths are equall? that this ſpirituall houſe ſhould be all foundation, no walls, no roofe? Can no man be ſaved but he that knowes every thing in Scripture? Then both they and wee are excluded: heaven would not have ſo many, as their Parlor at Amſterdam. Can any
B man be ſaved that knowes nothing in Scripture? It is farre from them to be ſo overcharitable to affirme it: you ſee then that both all truths muſt not of neceſſity bee known, and ſome muſt; and theſe we juſtly call fundamentall: which who ſo holdeth, all his hay and ſtubble (through the mercy of God) condemne him not: ſtill he hath right to the Church on earth, and hope in heaven: but whether every truth be fundamentall, or neceſſary? diſcipline (you ſay) is ſo: indeed neceſſary to the well-being of a Church, no more: it may be true without it, not perfect. Chriſt compares his Spouſe to an Army with banners: as order is to an Armie, ſo is diſcipline to the Church: if the troops be not well marſhalled in their ſeverall rankes, and move not forward according to the diſcipline of warre, it is an Army ſtill: confuſion may hinder their ſucceſſe, it cannot bereave them of their name: it is, as beautifull proportion to the body, an hedge to a vineyard, a wall to a citie, an hem to a garment, ſeeling to an houſe. It may
C be a body, vineyard, city, garment, houſe, without them: it cannot be well and perfect: yet which of our Adverſaries will ſay we have no diſcipline? Some they grant, but not the right: as if they ſaid: Your Citie hath a Brick wall indeed, but it ſhould have one of hewne ſtone; your Vineyard is hedged, but it ſhould be paled and ditched: while they cavill at what we want, we thanke God for what we have; and ſo much we have, in ſpight of all detraction, as makes us both a true Church, and a worthy one.

But the maine quarrell is againſt our Miniſterie, and forme of worſhip: let theſe be examined; this is the circle of their cenſure. No Church, therefore no Miniſtery: and no Miniſtery, therefore no Church: unnaturall ſons, that ſpit in the face of thoſe ſpirituall Fathers that begot them, and the Mother that bore them. What would they have? Have we not competent gifts from above, for ſo great a function? Are we all unlearned, unſufficient? Not a man that knowes to divide the word aright? As Paul to D the Corinths, Is it ſo that there is not one wiſe man amongſt us? No man will affirme it: ſome of them have cenſured our exceſſe in ſome knowledge; none, our defect in all: What then? Have we not a true deſire to doe faithfull ſervice to God and his Church? No zeale for Gods glory? Who hath been in our hearts to ſee this? Who dare uſurpe upon God, and condemne our thoughts? Yea, we appeale to that onely Judge of hearts, whether he hath not given us a ſincere longing for the good of his Sion: he ſhall make the thoughts of all hearts manifeſt: and then ſhall every man have praiſe of God. If then we have both abilitie and will to do publike good: our inward calling (which is the main point) is good and perfect; for the outward, what want we? Are we not firſt (after good triall) preſented and approved by the learned in our Colledges, examined by our Church-governors, ordain'd by impoſition of hands of the Elderſhip, allowed by the Congregations we are ſet over? Doe we not labour in E word and doctrine? doe we not carefully adminiſter the Sacraments of the Lord Jeſus? have we not by our publike meanes wonne many ſoules to God? what ſhould we have and doe more? All this, and yet no true Miniſters? we paſſe very little to be judged of them, or of mans day: but our Ordainers (you ſay) are Antichriſtian: ſurely our cenſurers are unchriſtian: tho we ſhould grant it, ſome of us were baptized by Hereticks: is the Sacrament annihilated, and muſt it be redoubled? How much leſſe Ordination, which is but an outward admiſſion to preach the Goſpell? God forbid that we ſhould thus condemne the innocent: more hands were laid upon us, than one:

and

and of them, for the principall, except but their perpetuall honour, and ſome few immateriall Rites, let an enemy ſay what they differ from Super-intendents; and can their double honour make them no Elders? If they have any perſonall faults, why is their calling ſcourged? Looke into our Saviours times: what corruptions were in the very Prieſt-hood? It was now made annuall, which was before fixed and ſingular. Chriſt ſaw theſe abuſes, and was ſilent: here was much diſlike and no clamour: we, for leſſe, exclaime and ſeparate: even perſonall offences are fetcht in to the condemnation of lawfull courſes. God give both pardon and redreſſe to this foule uncharitableneſſe. Alas, how ready are we to toſſe the fore-part of our Wallet, whiles our owne faults are ready to break our necks behind us: all the world ſees and condemnes their Ordination to be faulty, yea none at all: yet they cry out firſt on us, craftily (I think) leſt we ſhould complaine. That Church-governors ſhould ordaine Miniſters, hath beene the conſtant practice of the Church, from Chriſts time, to this houre. I except onely, in an extreme deſolation, meerely for the firſt courſe: that the people ſhould make their Miniſters, was unheard of in all ages and Churches, till Bolton, Browne, and Barrow: and hath neither colour nor example: Doth not this compariſon ſeeme ſtrange and harſh? Their tradeſ-men may make true Miniſters, our Miniſters cannot: who but they would not be aſhamed of ſuch a poſition? Or who but you would not thinke the time miſ-ſpent in anſwering it? No leſſe frivolous are thoſe exceptions that are taken againſt our worſhip of God, condemned for falſe and idolatrous, whereof Volumes of Apologies are written by others: we meet together, pray, reade, heare, preach, ſing, adminiſter, and receive Sacraments: wherein offend we? How many Gods doe we pray to? or to whom but the true God? In what words but holy? whom doe we preach but the ſame Chriſt with them? what point of faith, not theirs? What Sacraments but thoſe they dare not but allow? Where lyes our Idolatry, that we may let it out? In the manner of performing: in ſet prayers, Antichriſtian Ceremonies of croſſing, kneeling, &c. For the former: what ſinne is this? The originall and truth of prayer is in the heart, the voyce is but as accidentall; if the heart may often conceive the ſame thought, the tongue her ſervant may often utter it, in the ſame words: and if daily to repeat the ſame ſpeeches be amiſſe, then to entertaine the ſame ſpirituall deſires, is ſinfull: to ſpeake once without the heart is hypocriticall: but to ſpeake often the ſame requeſt with the heart, never offendeth. What intolerable boldneſſe is this; to condemne that in us which is recorded to have beene the continuall practice of Gods Church in all ſucceſſions? Of the Iewes, in the time of Moſes, David, Salomon, Iehoſaphat, Ezekiah, Ieremie: Of the ancient Chriſtian aſſemblies, both Greeke, and Latine, and now at this day of all reformed Churches in Chriſtendome; yea, which our Saviour himſelfe ſo directly allowed, and in a manner preſcribed, and the bleſſed Apoſtles Paul and Peter in all their formall ſalutations (which were no other than ſet prayers) ſo commonly practiſed: for the other, (leſt I exceed a Letter) though we yeeld them ſuch as you imagine (worſe they cannot be) they are but Ceremonious appendances, the body and ſubſtance is ſound. Bleſſed be God that we can have his true Sacraments at ſo eaſie a rate, as the payment (if they were ſuch) of a few circumſtantiall inconveniences: how many deare children of God in all ages, even neere the golden times of the Apoſtles, have gladly purchaſed them much dearer, and not complained: but ſee how our Church impoſes them: not as to bind the conſcience, otherwiſe than by the common bond of obedience; not as actions, wherein Gods worſhip eſſentially conſiſteth, but as themſelves, Ceremonies: comely or convenient, not neceſſary; whatſoever: is this a ſufficient ground of ſeparation? How many moderate and wiſer ſpirits have we, that cannot approve the Ceremonies, yet dare not forſake the Church? & that hold your departure farre more evill, than the cauſe. You are invited to a feaſt: if but a Napkin or Trencher be miſ-placed, or a diſh ill carved; doe you run from the Table, and not ſtay to thank the Hoaſt? Either be leſſe curious, or more charitable. Would God both you and all other, which either favour the Separation, or profeſſe it, could but reade over the ancient ſtories of the Church to ſee the true ſtate of things and times; the beginnings, proceedings, increaſes, encounters, yeeldings, reſtaurations of the Goſpell, what the

A the holy Fathers of those first times were glad to swallow for peace; what they held, practised, found, left: whosoever knowes but these things, cannot separate; and shall not be contented only, but thankfull: God shall give you still more light: in the meane time, upon the perill of my soule, stay, and take the blessed offers of your God, in peace: And since Christ saith by my hand, will you also goe away? Answer him with that worthy Disciple, Master, whither shall I goe from thee? thou hast the words of eternall life.

To Mr. I. B.

EP. VI. A complaint of the mis-education of our Gentry.

B I Confesse, I cannot honour blood without good qualities; not spare it, with ill. There is nothing that I more desire to be taught, than what is true Nobility: What thanke is it to you, that you are borne well? If you could have lost this privilege of Nature, I feare you had not been thus farre Noble: that you may not plead desert, you had this before you were; long ere you could either know or prevent it; you are deceived if you think this any other than the body of Gentility: the life and soule of it, is in noble and vertuous disposition, in gallantnesse of spirit without haughtinesse, without insolence, without scornefull overlinesse: shortly, in generous qualities, carriage, actions. See your errour, and know that this demeanor doth not answer an honest birth: If you can follow all fashions, drink all healths, weare favours and good cloathes, consort with Ruffianly companions, sweare the biggest oathes, quarrell easily, fight desperately, game in every inordinate Ordinary, spend your patrimony ere it fall,
C looke on every man betwixt scorne and anger; use gracefully some gestures of apish complement, talke irreligiously, dally with a Mistris, or (which terme is plainer) hunt after Harlots, take smoke at a Play-house, and live as if you were made all for sport, you thinke you have done enough, to merit, both of your blood, and others opinion. Certainly, the world hath no basenesse, if this be generosity: well-fare the honest and civill rudenesse of the obscure sons of the earth, if such be the graces of the eminent: The shame whereof (me thinks) is not so proper to the wildnesse of youth, as to the carelesnesse or vanity of Parents: I speak it boldly; our Land hath no blemish comparable to the mis-education of our Gentry: Infancy and youth are the seed-times of all hopes: if those passe unseasonably, no fruit can be expected from our age, but shame and sorrow: who should improve these, but they which may command them? I cannot altogether complaine of our first yeares. How like are we to children, in the train-
D ing up of our children! Give a childe some painted Babe; he joyes in it at first sight, and for some dayes will not abide it out of his hand or bosome; but when he hath sated himself with the new pleasure of that guest, he now (after a while) casts it into corners, forgets it, and can looke upon it, with no care: Thus doe we by ours. Their first times find us not more fond, than carefull: we doe not more follow them with our love, than ply them with instruction: When this delight begins to grow stale, we begin to grow negligent. Nothing that I know can be faulted in the ordering of Childhood, but indulgence. Foolish Mothers admit of Tutors, but debar rods. These, while they desire their children may learne, but not smart, as is said of Apes, kill their young ones with love; for what can worke upon that age, but feare? And what feare without correction? Now at last, with what measure of Learning their owne will would vouchsafe to receive, they are too early sent to the common Nurseries of E Knowledge; There (unlesse they fall under carefull tuition) they study in jest, and play in earnest. In such universall meanes of Learning, all cannot fall besides them; what their company, what their recreation would either instill or permit, they bring home to their glad Parents. Thence are they transplanted to the Collegiate Innes of our common Lawes: and there too many learne to be lawlesse, and to forget their former little: Pauls is their Westminster, their Study, an Ordinary, or Play-house, or Dancing-schoole, and some Lambert their Ploydon. And now after they have (not without much expence) learned fashions & licentiousnesse, they returne home, full of welcomes and gratulations.

gratulations. By this time ſome bloſſomes of youth appearing in their face, admoniſh their Parents to ſeeke them ſome ſeaſonable match; Wherein the Father inquires for wealth, the ſon for beauty, perhaps the mother for Parentage, ſcarce any for Vertue, for Religion. Thus ſetled, What is their care; their diſcourſe, yea, their Trade, but either an Hound, or an Hawke? And it is well, if no worſe: And now, they ſo live, as if they had forgotten that there were books: Learning is for Prieſts, and Pedants; for Gentlemen, pleaſure. Oh! that either wealth or wit ſhould be caſt away thus baſely: That ever reaſon ſhould grow ſo debauched, as to think any thing more worthy than knowledge. With what ſhame and emulation may we looke upon other Nations (whoſe apiſh faſhions we can take up in the channels, neglecting their imitable examples) and with what ſcorne do they looke upon us? They have their ſolemne Academies for all thoſe qualities, which may accompliſh Gentility: from w^ch they returne richly furniſhed, both for action, and ſpeculation. They account knowledge and abilitie of diſcourſe as eſſentiall to greatneſſe, as blood: neither are they more above the vulgar in birth, than in underſtanding: They travell with judgement, and returne with experience: ſo doe they follow the exerciſes of the body, that they neglect not the culture of the mind. From hence growes civilitie, and power to manage affaires, either of Juſtice, or State: from hence encouragement to learning, and reverence from inferiors. For thoſe onely can eſteeme knowledge, which have it; and the common ſort frame either obſervance, or contempt, out of the example of their Leaders.

Amongſt them, the ſonnes of Nobles ſcorne not either Merchandize, or learned profeſſions; and hate nothing ſo much as to doe nothing: I ſhame and hate to think, that our Gallants hold, there can be no diſparagement, but in honeſt callings. Thus perhaps I have abated the envie of this reproofe, by communicating it to more; which I had not done, but that the generality of evill importunes redreſſe. I well ſee that either good or evill deſcends: In vaine ſhall we hope for the reformation of the many, while the better are diſordered. Whom to ſolicite herein, I know not, but all: How glad ſhould I be to ſpend my light to the ſnuffe, for the effecting of this! I can but perſwade and pray; theſe I will not faile of: The reſt to him that both can amend and puniſh.

To M. Ionas Reigesbergius in ZELAND.

Ep. VII. Written ſome whiles ſince, concerning ſome new opinions then broached in the Churches of Holland; and under the name of Arminius (then living) perſwading all great wits to a ſtudy and care of the common peace of the Church, and diſſwading from all affectation of ſingularitie.

I Received lately a ſhort relation of ſome new Paradoxes from your Leiden; you would know what we thinke: I feare not to be cenſured, as medling: your truth is ours: The Sea cannot divide thoſe Churches whom one faith unites. I know not how it comes to paſſe, that moſt men, while they too much affect civility, turne flatterers; and plaine truth is moſt-where counted rudeneſſe. He that tels a ſick friend he looks ill, or termes an angry tumour the Gowt, or a watriſh ſwelling Dropſie; is thought unmanerly. For my part, I am glad that I was not born to feed humors: However you take your owne evils, I muſt tell you, we pity you, and thinke you have juſt cauſe of dejection, and we for you: not for any private cares, but (which touch a Chriſtian neereſt) the Common-wealth of God. Behold, after all thoſe hils of carkaſſes, & ſtreames of blood, your civill ſword is ſheathed, wherin we neither congratulate, not feare your peace; lo now, in ſtead of that, another while, the ſpirituall ſword is drawn and ſhaken, and it is well, if no more. Now the politicke State ſits ſtill, the Church quarrels: Oh! the inſatiable hoſtilitie of our great enemy, with what change of miſchiefes chiefes doth he afflict miserable man? No sooner did the Christian world begin to breathe from persecution, but it was more punished with Arrianisme: when the red Dragon cannot devoure the child, he tries to drowne the mother; and when the waters faile, he raises warre. Your famous Iunius had nothing more admirable than his love of peace: when our busie Separatists appealed him, with what a sweet calmnesse did he reject them, and with a grave importunity call'd them to moderation! How it would have vexed his holy soule (now out of the danger of passions) to have foreseene his chaire troublesome. God forbid that the Church should find a Challenger, in stead of a Champion: Who would think but you should have beene taught the benefit of peace, by the long want? But if your temporall state (besides either hope, or beleefe) hath growne wealthy with warre, like those Fowles which fatten with hard weather: yet be too sure, that these spirituall broyles cannot but impoverish the Church; yea, affamish it. It were pitie that your Holland should be still the Amphitheatre of the world, on whose Scaffolds all other Nations should sit, and see variety of bloody shewes, not without pitie, and horror. If I might challenge ought in that your acute and learned Arminius; I would thus solicite and conjure him: Alas that so wise a man should not know the worth of peace; that so noble a sonne of the Church should not be brought to light, without ripping the wombe of his mother! What meane these subtill Novelties? if they make thee famous, and the Church miserable, who shall gaine by them? Is singularity so precious, that it should cost no lesse, than the safety and quiet of our common mother? If it be truth thou affectest; what alone? Could never any eyes (till thine) be blessed with this object? Where hath that sacred verity hid her selfe thus long from all her carefull Inquisitors, that shee now first shewes her head to thee unsought? Hath the Gospell shined thus long; and bright, and left some corners unseene? Away with all new truths; faire and plausible they may be, sound they cannot: some may admire thee for them; none shall blesse thee. But grant that some of these are no lesse true, than nice points; what doe these unseasonable crochets and quavers trouble the harmonious plain-songs of our peace? Some quiet error may be better than some unruly truth. Who binds us to speake all we think? So the Church may be still, would God thou wert wise alone. Did not our Adversaries quarrell enough before, at our quarrells? Were they not rich enough with our spoyles? By the deare name of our common parents, what meanest thou Arminius? Whither tend these new-rais'd dissentions? Who shall thrive by them but they which insult upon us, and rise by the fall of truth? Who shall be undone, but thy brethren? By that most precious, and bloody ransome of our Saviour, and by that awfull appearance we shall once make before the glorious Tribunall of the Son of God, remember thy selfe, and the poore distracted limmes of the Church: Let not those excellent parts, wherewith God hath furnished thee, lye in the narrow way, and cause any weake one either to fall, or stumble, or erre. For Gods sake, either say nothing, or the same. How many great wits have sought no by-pathes, and now are happy with their fellowes! Let it be no disparagement to goe with many to heaven. What could he reply to so plaine a charge? No distinction can avoyd the power of simple truth. I know he heares not this of me first: Neither that learned and worthy Fran. Gomarus, nor your other grave fraternitie of reverend Divines, have been silent in so maine a cause. I feare rather too much noyse in any of these tumults: There may too many contend, not intreat. Multitude of suters is commonly powerfull; how much more in just motions? But if either he, or you, shall turne me home, and bid me spend my little moysture upon our owne brands, I grant there is both the same cause, and the same need. This counsell is no whit further from us, because it is directed to you: Any Reader can change the Person: I lament to see, that every where peace hath not many Clients, but fewer lovers; yea, even many of those that praise her, follow her not. Of old, the very Novatian men, women, children, brought stones and mortar (with the Orthodox) to the building of the Church of the resurrection, and joyned lovingly with them, against the Arrians: lesser quarrels divide us; and every division ends in blowes, and every blow is returned; and none of all lights beside the Church. Even the best Apostles dissented; neither knowledge, nor holinesse holineſſe can redreſſe all differences: True, but wiſedome and charity could teach us A to avoid their prejudice. If we had but theſe two vertues, quarrels ſhould not hurt us, nor the Church by us: But (alas) ſelfe-love is too ſtrong for both theſe: This alone opens the floud-gates of diſſention, and drownes the ſweet, but low valley of the Church. Men eſteeme of opinions, becauſe their owne; and will have truth ſerve, not governe. What they have undertaken, muſt be true: Victory is ſought for, not ſatiſfaction; victory of the Author, not of the cauſe: He is a rare man that knowes to yeeld, as well as to argue: what ſhould we doe then, but beſtow our ſelves upon that which too many neglect, publike peace; firſt, in prayers that we may prevaile, than in teares that we prevaile not? Thus have I been bold to chat with you of our greateſt and common cares. Your old love, and late hoſpitall entertainment in that your Iland called for this remembrance; the rather to keepe your Engliſh tongue in breath, B which was wont not to be the leaſt of your deſires. Would God you could make us happy with newes, not of truce, but ſincere amitie and union; not of Provinces, but ſpirits. The God of ſpirits effect it both here and there, to the glory of his Name and Church.

To W. F. condemned for murder.

EP. VIII. Effectually preparing him, and (under his name) whatſoever Malefactor for his death.

IT is a bad cauſe that robbeth us of all the comfort of friends; yea, that turnes their remembrance into ſorrow. None can doe ſo, but thoſe that proceed from our C ſelves: for outward evils, which come from the infliction of others, make us cleave faſter to our helpers, and cauſe us to ſeeke and find eaſe in the very commiſera-tion of thoſe that love us: whereas thoſe griefes which ariſe from the juſt diſpleaſure of conſcience, will not abide ſo much as the memory of others affection; or if it doe, makes it ſo much the greater corasive, as our caſe is more uncapable of their comfort.
Such is yours. You have made the mention of our names tedious to your ſelfe, and yours to us. This is the beginning of your paine, that you had friends: If you may now ſmart ſoundly from us, for your good, it muſt be the onely joy you muſt expect, and the finall dutie we owe to you. It is both vaine and comfortleſſe, to heare what might have been; neither would I ſend you backe to what is paſt, but purpoſely to increaſe your ſorrow; who have cauſed all our comfort to ſtand in your teares. If therefore our former counſels had prevailed, neither had your hands ſhed innocent D blood, nor juſtice yours. Now, to your great ſinne, you have done the one: and the other muſt be done to your paine: and we your well-willers, with ſorrow and ſhame live to be witneſſes of both. Your ſinne is gone before, the revenge of juſtice will follow: ſeeing you are guilty, let God be juſt. Other ſinnes ſpeake, this cryeth, and will never be ſilent, till it be anſwered with it ſelfe. For your life; the caſe is hopeleſſe; feed not your ſelfe with vaine preſumptions, but ſettle your ſelfe to expiate anothers blood with your owne. Would God your deſert had been ſuch, that we might with any comfort have deſired you might live. But now, alas, your fact is ſo hainous, that your life can neither be craved without injuſtice, nor be protracted without inward torment. And if your private affection ſhould make us deafe to the ſhouts of blood, and partialitie ſhould teach us to forget all care of publique right; yet reſolve, there is no place for hope. Since then you could not live guiltleſſe, there remaines E nothing, but that you labour to die penitent; and ſince your body cannot be ſaved alive, to endevour that your ſoule may be ſaved in death. Wherein, how happy ſhall it be for you, if you ſhall yet give eare to my laſt advice; too late indeed for your recompence to the world, not too late for your ſelfe. You have deſerved death, and expect it: Take heed leſt you ſo faſten your eyes upon the firſt death of the body, that you ſhould not looke beyond it to the ſecond, which alone is worthy of trembling, worthy of teares.

For,

For, this, though terrible to Nature, yet is common to us, with you. You muſt die: what doe we elſe? And what differs our end from yours, but in haſte and violence? And who knowes whether in that? It may be a ſickneſſe as ſharpe, as ſudden, ſhall fetch us hence: it may be the ſame death, or a worſe, for a better cauſe: Or if not ſo, there is much more miſery in lingring: He dies eaſily, that dies ſoone: but the other is the utmoſt vengeance that God hath reſerved for his enemies: This is a matter of long feare, and ſhort paine. A few pangs let the ſoule out of priſon: but the torment of that other is everlaſting; after ten thouſand yeares ſcorching in that flame, the paine is never the neerer to his ending. No time gives it hope of abating; yea, time hath nothing to doe with this eternity. You that ſhall feele the paine of one minutes dying, thinke what paine it is to be dying for ever and ever. This, although it be attended with a ſharpe paine, yet is ſuch as ſome ſtrong ſpirits have endured without ſhew of yeeldance. I have heard of an Iriſh Traitor, that when he lay pining upon the wheele with his bones broke, asked his friend if he changed his countenance at all; caring leſſe for the paine, than the ſhew of feare. Few men have died of greater paines, than others have ſuſtained and live. But that other overwhelmes both body and ſoule, and leaves no roome for any comfort in the poſſibilitie of mitigation. Here, men are executioners, or diſeaſes; there fiends. Thoſe Devils that were ready to tempt the graceleſſe unto ſinne, are as ready to follow the damned with tortures. What ſoever become of your carkaſe, ſave your ſoule from the flames; and ſo manage this ſhort time you have to live, that you may die but once. This is not your firſt ſinne; yea, God hath now puniſhed your former ſinnes with this: a fearfull puniſhment in it ſelfe, if it deſerved no more: your conſcience (which now begins to tell truth) cannot but aſſure you, that there is no ſinne more worthy of hell, than murder; yea, more proper to it. Turne over thoſe holy leaves (which you have too much neglected, and now ſmart for neglecting) you ſhall find murderers among thoſe that are ſhut out from the preſence of God: you ſhall find the Prince of that darkneſſe, in the higheſt ſtile of his miſchiefe, termed a man-ſlayer. Alas! how fearefull a caſe is this, that you have herein reſembled him, for whom Topheth was prepared of old; and imitating him in his action, have endangered your ſelfe to partake of his torment! Oh, that you could but ſee what you have done, what you have deſerved; that your heart could bleed enough within you, for the blood your hands have ſhed: That as you have followed Satan our common enemy in ſinning, ſo you could defie him in repenting: That your teares could diſappoint his hopes of your damnation. What a happie unhappineſſe ſhall this be to your ſad friends, that your better part yet liveth? That from an ignominious place your ſoule is received to glory? Nothing can effect this but your repentance; and that can doe it. Feare not to looke into that horror, which ſhould attend your ſinne: and bee now as ſevere to your ſelfe, as you have beene cruell to another. Thinke not to extenuate your offence with the vaine titles of manhood: what praiſe is this, that you were a valiant murderer? Strike your owne breſt (as Moſes did his Rocke) and bring downe rivers of teares to waſh away your blood-ſhed. Doe not ſo much feare your judgement, as abhorre your ſinne; yea, your ſelfe for it. And with ſtrong cries lift up your guiltie hands to that God whom you offended, and ſay, Deliver me from blood-guiltineſſe O Lord. Let me tell you: As without repentance there is no hope; ſo with it, there is no condemnation. True penitence is ſtrong, and can grapple with the greateſt ſinne, yea with all the powers of hell. What if your hands be red with blood? Behold, the blood of your Saviour ſhall waſh away yours: If you can bathe your ſelfe in that; your Scarlet ſoule ſhall bee as white as ſnow. This courſe alone ſhall make your croſſe the way to the Paradice of God. This plaiſter can heale all the ſores of the ſoule, if never ſo deſperate: Onely, take heed that your heart bee deepe enough pierced, ere you lay it on; elſe, under a ſeeming skin of diſſimulation, your ſoule ſhall feſter to death. Yet joy us with your true ſorrow, whom you have grieved with your offence; and at once comfort your friends, and ſave your ſoule.

To Mr. IOHN MOLE, of a long time now prisoner under the Inquisition at Rome.

EPIST. IX. Exciting him to his wonted constancy, and encouraging him to Martyrdome.

WHat passage can these lines hope to find into that your strait and curious thraldome? Yet who would not adventure the losse of this pains for him, which is ready to lose himselfe for Christ? what doe we not owe to you which have thus given your selfe for the common faith? Blessed be the name of that God who hath singled you out for his Champion, and made you invincible: how famous are your bonds? how glorious your constancy? Oh, that out of your close obscurity, you could but see the honour of your suffering, the affections of Gods Saints, and in some, an holy envy at your distressed happinesse. Those walls cannot hide you: No man is attended with so many eyes from earth & heaven: The Church your Mother beholds you, not with more compassion, than joy: Neither can it be said, how she at once pities your misery, and rejoyces in your patience: The blessed Angels look upon you with gratulation and applause. The adversaries with an angry sorrow to see themselves overcome by their captive, their obstinate cruelty over-matched with humble resolution, and faithfull perseverance. Your Saviour sees you from above, not as a meer spectator, but as a patient with you, in you, for you: yea, as an agent in your indurance and victory, giving new courage with the one hand, and holding out a Crowne with the other. Whom would not these sights incourage? who now can pity your solitarines? The hearts of all good men are with you. Neither can that place be but full of Angels, which is the continuall object of so many prayers, yea the God of heaven was never so neere you, as now you are removed from men. Let me speak a bold, but true word. It is as possible for him to be absent from his heaven, as from the prisons of his Saints. The glorified spirits above sing to him; the persecuted soules below, suffer for him, and cry to him; he is magnified in both, present with both; the faith of the one, is as pleasing to him, as the triumph of the other. Nothing obligeth us men so much, as smarting for us; words of defence are worthy of thanks, but paine is esteemed above recompence. How doe we kisse the wounds which are taken for our sakes, & professe that we would hate our selves, if we did not love those that dare bleed for us? How much more shall the God of mercies bee sensible of your sorrowes, and crowne your patience? To whom you may truly sing that ditty of the Prophet, Surely for thy sake am I slaine continually, and am counted as a sheepe for the slaughter. What need I to stir up your constancy, which hath already amazed, and wearied your persecutors? No suspicion shall drive me hereto; but rather the thirst of your praise. He that exhorts to persist in well-doing, while he perswades, commendeth: Whither should I rather send you, than to the sight of your owne Christian fortitude? which neither prayers, nor threats, have been able to shake: Here stands on the one hand, liberty, promotion, pleasure, life, and (which easily exceeds all these) the deare respect of wife and children (whom your only resolution shall make widow and orphanes) these with smiles, and vowes, and teares, seeme to importune you. On the other hand, bondage, solitude, horror, death, (and the most lingring of all miseries) ruine of posterity: these with frownes and menaces labour to affright you: Betwixt both, you have stood unmoved; fixing your eyes either right forward upon the cause of your suffering, or upwards upon the crowne of your reward: It is an happy thing when our owne actions may be either examples, or arguments of good. These blessed proceedings call you on to your perfection; The reward of good beginnings prosecuted, is doubled; neglected, is lost. How vaine are those temptations, which would make you a loser of all this praise, this recompence? Goe on therefore happily; keepe your eyes where they are, and your heart cannot be but where it is, and where it ought: Looke still, for what you suffer, and for whom: For the truth, for Christ: what can be so precious as truth? Not life it ſelfe. All earthly things are not ſo vile to life, as life to truth; Life is momentarie, Truth eternall; life is ours, the truth, Gods: Oh happy purchaſe, to give our life for the truth. What can we ſuffer too much for Chriſt? he hath given our life to us; he hath given his owne life for us. What great thing is it, if he require what he hath given us, if ours for his? Yea, rather if he call for what he hath lent us; yet not to bereave, but to change it; giving us gold for clay, glory for our corruption. Behold that Saviour of yours weeping, and bleeding, and dying for you: alas! our ſoules are too ſtrait for his ſorrowes; we can be made but paine for him; he was made ſinne for us: we ſuſtaine, for him, but the impotent anger of men; he ſtrugled with the infinite wrath of his father for us. Oh, who can endure enough for him, that hath paſſed thorow death and hell for his ſoule? Thinke this, and you ſhall reſolve with David, I will be yet more vile for the Lord. The worſt of the deſpight of men, is but Death; and that, if they inflict not, a diſeaſe will; or if not that, Age. Here is no impoſition of that, which would not be; but an haſtning of that which will be: an haſtning to your gaine. For behold, their violence ſhall turne your neceſſity, into vertue and profit. Nature hath made you mortall: none but an enemy can make you a Martyr; you muſt die, though they will not; you cannot die for Chriſt, but by them. How could they elſe deviſe to make you happy? ſince the giver of both lifes hath ſaid, He that ſhall loſe his life for my ſake ſhall ſave it. Loe, this alone is loſt with keeping, and gained by loſſe. Say you were freed, upon the ſafeſt conditions, and returning: (as how welcome ſhould that newes be, more to yours, than to your ſelfe) perhaps, Death may meet you in the way, perhaps overtake you at home: neither place, nor time, can promiſe immunitie from the common deſtinie of men: Thoſe that may abridge your houres, cannot lengthen them; and while they laſt, cannot ſecure them from vexation; yea, themſelves ſhall follow you into their duſt; and cannot avoid what they can inflict; death ſhall equally tyrannize by them, and over them: ſo their favours are but fruitleſſe, their malice gainfull. For it ſhall change your Priſon into Heaven, your Fetters into a Crowne, your Jaylors to Angels, your miſery into glory. Looke up to your future eſtate, and rejoyce in the preſent: Behold, the Tree of life, the hidden Manna, the Scepter of power, the Morning-Starre, the white garment, the new name, the Crowne, and Throne of Heaven, are addreſſed for you. Overcome and enjoy them: oh glorious condition of Martyrs! whom conformity in death, hath made like their Saviour in bleſſedneſſe; whoſe honour is to attend him for ever, whom they have joyed to imitate. What are theſe which are araied in long white Robes, and whence came they? Theſe are (ſayes that heavenly Elder) they which came out of great tribulation, and waſhed their long Robes, and have made their Robes white, in the blood of the Lambe.

Therefore they are in the preſence of the Throne of God, and ſerve him day and night in his Temple: and he that ſitteth on the Throne, will dwell among them, and governe them, and lead them unto the lively Fountaines of waters, and God ſhall wipe all teares from their eyes.

All the elect have Seales in their fore-heads: but Martyrs have Palmes in their hands. All the elect have white Robes; Martyrs, both white and long: white, for their glory; long, for the largeneſſe of their glory. Once red with their owne blood; now white with the blood of the Lambe: there is nothing in our blood, but weake obedience; nothing but merit in the Lambes blood. Behold, his merit makes our obedience glorious. You doe but ſprinkle his feet with your blood; loe, he waſhes your long white Robes, with his. Every drop of your blood is anſwered with a ſtreame of his; and every drop of his is worth Rivers of ours: Precious in the ſight of the Lord is the death of his Saints: Precious in prevention, precious in acceptation, precious in remuneration. Oh, give willingly that which you cannot keepe, that you may receive what you cannot leeſe. The way is ſteep, but now you breathe towards the top. Let not the want of ſome few ſteps, loſe you an eternall reſt. Put to the ſtrength of your owne Faith: The prayers of Gods Saints ſhall further your pace; and that gracious hand that ſuſtaines heaven and earth, ſhall uphold, and ſweetly draw you up to your glory. Goe on to credit the Goſpell with your perſeverance: and ſhew the falſe-hearted clients of that Roman-Court, that the Truth yeelds reall and hearty profeſſors; ſuch as dare no leſſe ſmart, than ſpeake for her.

Without the wals of your reſtraint, where can you looke beſide encouragements of ſuffering? Behold in this, how much you are happier than your many predeceſſors. Thoſe have found friends, or wives, or children, the moſt dangerous of all tempters. Suggeſtions of weakneſſe, when they come masked with love, are more powerfull to hurt. But you, all your many friends, in the valour of their Chriſtian love, wiſh rather a bleſſed Martyr, than a living and proſperous revolter: yea, your deare wife (worthy of this honour, to be the wife of a Martyr) prefers your faith, to her affection; and in a courage beyond her ſex, contemnes the worſt miſery of your loſſe; profeſſing ſhe would redeem your life with hers, but that ſhe would not redeem it with your yeeldance: and while ſhe lookes upon thoſe many pawnes of your chaſte love, your hopefull children, wiſhes rather to ſee them fatherleſſe, than their father unfaithfull: The greateſt part of your ſufferings are hers: She beares them with a cheerefull reſolution: She divides with you in your ſorrowes, in your patience; ſhe ſhall not be divided in your glory: For us, we ſhall accompany you with our prayers, and follow you with our thankfull commemorations; vowing to write your name in red letters in the Kalendars of our hearts; and to regiſter it in the monuments of perpetuall Records, as an example to all poſterity, The memoriall of the juſt ſhall be bleſſed.

To all READERS.

EPIST. X Containing Rules of good advice for our Chriſtian and civill cariage.

I Grant, brevity where it is neither obſcure, nor defective, is very pleaſing, even to the daintieſt judgements. No marvell therefore, if moſt men deſire much good counſell in a narrow roome; as ſome affect to have great perſonages drawne in little tablets; or, as we ſee worlds of Countries deſcribed in the compaſſe of ſmall maps: Neither do I unwillingly yeeld to follow them; for both the powers of good advice are the ſtronger when they are thus united; and brevity makes counſell more portable for memorie, and readier for uſe. Take theſe therefore for more; which as I would faine practiſe, ſo am I willing to commend. Let us begin with him who is the firſt and laſt: Informe your ſelfe aright concerning God; without whom, in vaine doe we know all things: Be acquainted with that Saviour of yours, which paid ſo much for you on earth, and now ſues for you in heaven; without whom we have nothing to doe with God, nor he with us. Adore him in your thoughts, truſt him with your ſelfe: Renew your ſight of him every day, and his of you. Over-looke theſe earthly things; and when you doe at any time caſt your eyes upon heaven, think, there dwels my Saviour, there I ſhall be. Call your ſelfe to often recknings; caſt up your debts, payments, graces, wants, expences, employments; yeeld not to think your ſet devotions troubleſome: Take not eaſie denyals from your ſelfe: yea, give peremptory denyals to your ſelfe: He can never be good that flatters himſelfe: hold nature to her allowance; and let your will ſtand at courteſie: happy is that man which hath obtained to be the maſter of his owne heart. Think all Gods outward favours and proviſions the beſt for you: your owne ability, and actions the meaneſt. Suffer not your mind to be either a Drudge, or a Wanton; exerciſe it ever, but over-lay it not: In all your buſineſſes, look through the world, at God; whatſoever is your levell, let him be your ſcope: Every day take a view of your laſt; and think either it is this, or may be: Offer not your ſelfe either to honour, or labour; let them both ſeek you: Care you only to be worthy, and you cannot hide you from God. So frame your ſelfe to the time and company, that you may neither ſerve it, nor ſullenly neglect it; and yeeld ſo far, as you may neither betray goodneſſe, nor countenance evill. Let your words be few, and digeſted: It is a ſhame for the tongue to cry the heart mercy, much more to caſt it ſelfe upon the uncertaine pardon of others eares. There are but two things which a Chriſtian is charged to buy, & not to ſell, Time & Truth; both ſo precious, that we muſt purchaſe them at any rate. So uſe your friends, as thoſe which ſhould be perpetuall, may be changeable. While you are within your ſelfe, there is no danger: but thoughts once uttered muſt ſtand to hazard.

Do

A Doe not heare from your ſelfe, what you would be loth to heare from others. In all good things, give the eye and eare the full of ſcope, for they let into the mind: reſtraine the tongue, for it is a ſpender. Few men have repented them of ſilence. In all ſerious matters, take counſell of dayes, and nights, and friends; and let leiſure ripen your purpoſes: neither hope to gaine ought by ſuddenneſſe. The firſt thoughts may be confident, the ſecond are wiſer. Serve honeſty ever, though without apparent wages: ſhee will pay ſure, if ſlow. As in apparell, ſo in actions, know not what is good, but what becomes you. How many warrantable acts have miſ-ſhapen the Authors? Excuſe not your owne ill, agravate not others: and if you love peace, avoid cenſures, compariſons, contradictions. Out of good men chuſe acquaintance; of acquaintance, friends; of friends, familiars: after probation admit them, and after admittance change them not: Age commendeth friendſhip. Doe not alwaies
B your beſt: it is neither wiſe, nor ſafe for a man ever to ſtand upon the top of his ſtrength. If you would be above the expectation of others, be ever below your ſelfe. Expend after your purſe, not after your mind: take not where you may deny, except upon conſcience of deſert, or hope to requite. Either frequent ſuits, or complaints, are weariſome to a friend. Rather ſmother your griefes and wants as you may, than be either querulous, or importunate. Let not your face belie your heart, nor alwaies tell tales out of it: he is fit to live amongſt friends or enemies, that can be ingenuouſly cloſe. Give freely, ſell thriftily: Change ſeldome your place, never your ſtate: either amend inconven iences, or ſwallow them, rather than you ſhould run from your ſelfe to avoid them.

In all your recknings for the world, caſt up ſome croſſes that appeare not; either
C thoſe will come, or may: Let your ſuſpitions be charitable; your truſt fearfull; your cenſures ſure. Give way to the anger of the great: The thunder and cannon will abide no fence. As in throngs we are affraid of loſſe; ſo while the world comes upon you, looke well to your ſoule; There is more danger in good than in evill: I feare the number of theſe my rules; for Precepts are wont (as nayles) to drive out one another: but theſe, I intended to ſcatter omongſt many: and as I was loth that any gueſt ſhould complaine of a niggardly hand; Dainty diſhes are wont to be ſparingly ſerved out: homely ones ſuppy in their bigneſſe, what they want in their worth.

¶ Imprinted at LONDON, 1634.

TO THE RIGHT REVEREND FATHER IN GOD, AND MY VERY good Lord, THOMAS, Lord Biſhop of LONDON, I. H. wiſheth all Grace and happineſſe.

RIght Reverend and Honourable:

I Know there is ſtore of Sermons extant: The Pulpit ſcarce affordeth more than the Preſſe. If adde to the number, and complaine not: in all good things, abundance is an eaſie burden. If the ſoule may feed it ſelfe with varietie, both by the eare, and by the eye, it hath no reaſon to finde fault with choyce. But if any weaker ſtomacke (as in our bodily Tables) ſhall feare to ſurfet at the ſight of too much, it is eaſie for that man to looke off, and to confine his eyes to ſome few: Who cannot much ſooner abate to himſelfe, than multiply to another? Let not his nice ſullenneſſe prejudice that delight and profit which may ariſe to others from this number. For mee, I dare not be ſo envious, as not to bleſſe God for this plenty, and ſeriouſly to rejoyce that Gods people may thus liberally feaſt themſelves by both their ſenſes: neither know I for whether more: The ſound of the word ſpoken pierceth more; the letter written endureth longer: the eare is taught more ſuddenly, more ſtirringly; the eye with leiſure and continuance. According to my my poore abilitie, I have deſired to doe good both wayes; not ſo much fearing cenſures, as caring to edifie. This little labour ſubmiſſely offers it ſelfe to your Lordſhip, as juſtly yours: being both preached at your call, and (as it were) in your charge, and by one under the charge of your fatherly juriſdiction, who unfainedly deſires by all meanes to ſhew his true heart to Gods Church, together with his humble thankefulneſſe to your Lordſhip: and profeſſeth ſtill to continue

duty and obſervance,

PHARISAISME AND CHRISTIANITIE.

MATTH. CHAP. 5. Vers. 20.

Except your righteousnesse exceed the righteousnesse of the Scribes and Pharises, ye shall not enter into the Kingdome of heaven.

THE curious Doctors of the Jewes had reduced all Gods statute-law to six hundred and thirteene precepts; so many as there are dayes in the yeere, and members in the body. It was an honest and (which were strange) a Christian conceit of one of their Rabbins, that David abridges all these to eleven, in his Psalme 15. Esay to six, in his 33. 15. Michai yet lower to three, in his 6, 8. Esay yet againe to two, in his 56. 1. Habacuc to one, The just man shall live by faith. So yee see, the Law ends in the Gospell: and that Father said not amisse, The Law is the Gospell foretold; and the Gospell is the Law fulfilled. These two are the freehold of a Christian; and what but they?

Petr. Galatin. de arcan. fidei Cath. ad finem ex glos. Rab. Shelomoh.

Lex est Evangelium prædictum: Evangelium lex completa.

The Jewes of these times perverted the Law, rejected the Gospell. Our Saviour therefore, that great Prophet of the world (as it was high time) cleares the Law, delivers and settles the Gospell, well approving in both these, that he came not to consume, but to consummate the Law. Wherein (as Paul to his Corinths) he had a great doore, but many adversaries: amongst these were the great masters of Israel (so our Saviour tearmes the Pharises) and their fellowes (and yet their rivals) the Scribes: both so much harder to oppose, by how much their authoritie was greater.

1 Cor. 16. 9. Iohn 3. Art thou a Master in Israel?

Truth hath no roome till falshood be removed: Our Saviour therefore (as behooveth) first shewes the falshood of their Glosses, and the hollownesse of their profession: and if both their life and doctrine be naught; what free part is there in them? And loe both of these so faulty, that except your righteousnesse exceed the righteousnesse of the Scribes and Pharises, ye shall not enter into the Kingdome of Heaven.

What were the men? What was their righteousnesse? What wanted it? Follow me, I beseech you, in these three: and if my discourse shall seeme, for a while, more thorny and perplexed, remedy it with your attention.

Those things which are out of the ken of sense or memory, must be fetcht from Story. The Sect (or order whether) of the Pharises ceased with the Temple; since that, no man reades of a Pharise; and now is growne so farre out of knowledge, that the moderne Jewes are more ready to learne of us who they were: There is no point, wherein it is more difficult to avoid variety, yea ostentation of reading; without any curious traversing

traverſing of opinions, I ſtudy for ſimple truth, as one that will not lead you out of the rode-way to ſhew you the turnings. Scribes were ancient; Ezra is called (Sopher mahir) a prompt Scribe. As long before him, ſo ever ſince they continued till Chriſts time; but in two ranks; ſome were γραμματεῖς λαοῦ others νόμι: Some popular, others legall; Some the peoples; others, Gods; the one, Secretaries, Recorders, Notaries, as 2 Chron. 24. 11. (Sopher hamelec) the Kings Scribe: The other Doctors of the Law of God: The Law of the Lord is with us, in vaine made he it, the penne of the Scribe is in vaine.

Ezr.6.7.

Ier.8.8.

As the Phariſes were (νομοδιδάσκαλοι) Law maſters: ſo theſe are the ſame which Luke 11.45. are called (νομικοὶ) interpreters of the Law. Tho to ſome not meane Criticks it ſeemes theſe ſhould be a third ſort; which conſider not that our Saviour on purpoſe addreſſing his ſpeech to the Phariſes, fell by the way upon the Scribes; and being admoniſhed by one of them, as of an over-ſight, now averrs right downe of the Scribes, what before he had but indifferently glanced at. What they were, is plaine by Ezraes pulpit, and Moſes his chaire. Theſe and Phariſes differed not ſo much; they agreed in ſome good, but in more evill. But the profeſſion of Phariſes, becauſe it is more obſcure, you ſhall give me leave to fetch ſomewhat further.

Neh.8.4. Mat.23.2.

There were, ſaith old Egeſippus (as Euſebius cites him) divers opinions in the Circumciſion; which all croſſed the Tribe of Iuda: Eſſens, Galileans, Emerobaptiſts, Maſbutheans, Samaritans, Phariſes, Saddnees. It were eaſie to helpe him with more, Sabuæans, Cannæans, Sampſæans; and if need were, yet more. Where are thoſe waverers, that ſtagger in their truſt to the Church, becauſe of different opinions, receiving that rotten argument of profane Celſus againſt the Chriſtians? Say the Papiſts, one ſaith I am Calvins, another, I am Luthers. We diſclaime, we defie theſe titles, theſe diviſions: we are one in truth: would God we were yet more one: It is the lace and fringe of Chriſts garment that is queſtioned amongſt us, the cloth is ſound. But what? Was the Iewiſh Church before Chriſt, Gods true Church, or not? If it were not, which was it? If it were: lo that here rent in more than eight parts, and one of them dieringff from it ſelfe in eighteene opinions: and yet as Irenæus well obſerves, Before Chriſt, there were neither ſo many hereſies, nor ſo blaſphemous.

Clerici Iudæorũ, ſaith Ierome. Euſeb.eccl.hiſt. l.4.c.22.Erant in circumciſione diverſæ ſententiæ quæ maximè tribui Iudæ adverſabantur, &c. vide Ioſ.Scalig.reſp.ad Scrarii.&Orig.lib 5. adverſ.Celſ.chriſtia nos nõ habere verã religionem, quod in varias ſectas diviſi eſſent. Domus Sammai & Hillel. Ar. Mont.in Evang. Ante adventum Chriſti, non tot & tam blaſphemæ hæreſes. Iren. lib 5.

Shew me a Church on earth without theſe wrinkles of diviſion, and I will never ſeek for it in heaven: although to ſome Phariſaiſme ſeemes rather a ſeverall order, than a ſect: but S. Luke that knew it better, hath (αἵρεσιν ἐφαρισαίων) the ſect of the Phariſes. When the profeſſion began, no hiſtory recordeth. Some would faine fetch them Eſay 65. 5. Touch me not, for I am holier than thou. But theſe ſtraine too farre; for in the verſe before, the ſame men eat ſwines fleſh; which to the Phariſes is more than piacular. Heare briefly their name, their originall, their office. Their name (though it might admit of other probable derivations, yet) by conſent of all *Hebrew Doctors (I have a great author for it) is fetcht from ſeparation; tho upon what grounds, all agree not; doubtleſſe for the perfection of their doctrine, and auſterity of life. Their originall is more intricate; which after ſome ſcanning, I have thus learned of ſome great Maſters of Iewiſh Antiquities. Before there was any open breach in the old Iewiſh Church, there were two generall and divers conceits about Gods ſervice: One that tooke up only with the law of God; and if they could keepe that, thought they needed no more; neither would they ſapere ſupra ſcriptum, be wiſer than their Maker: Theſe were called (Karraim) of which ſort there are divers at this day in Conſtantinople, and otherwhere at deadly feod with the other Iewes, which they now call Rabbiniſts.

Acts. 15.5.

The other, that thought it ſmall thanks to doe only what they were bidden; Gods Law was too ſtraight for their holineſſe: It was nothing, unleſſe they did more than content God, earne him (for theſe were popiſh Iewes) and ſupererogate of him. Theſe were therefore called Chaſidim, Holy, above the Law. They plyed God with unbidden oblations, gave more than needed, did more than was commanded; yet ſo, as both parts pleaſed themſelves, reſiſted not the other. The more franke ſort upbraided not the other, with too much niggardlineſſe; neither did the ſtraiter-handed envy the other for too much laviſhneſſe. Would God we could doe thus. They agreed, though they differed. But now, when theſe voluntary ſervices began to be drawne into Canons (as Scaliger ſpeaketh) and that which was before but arbitrary, was impoſed as neceſſary, (neceſſary for beleefe, neceſſary for action) queſtions aroſe, and the rent began in the Jewes. Thoſe dogmaticall Doctors which ſtood for ſupererogation, and traditions above Law, were called (Peruſchim) Phariſes; ſeparate from the other in ſtrict judgement, in ſuperfluous holineſſe: Theſe, as they were the brood of thoſe (Chaſidim) whom we find firſt mentioned in the Machabees, by the corrupt name of Aſideans; ſo from them againe, in a ſecond ſucceſſion proceeded (as their more refined iſſue) the Eſſens, both Collegiate and Eremiticall: Theſe Phariſes then, were a fraternity or College of extraordinary devotion; whoſe rule was tradition, whoſe practice voluntary auſtereneſſe: To them the Scribes joyned themſelves, as the purer Jewes; for Paul calls them [ακριβεστατην αιρεσιν] the moſt exquiſite ſect; yea, and (as Ioſephus) the beſt expoſitors; willingly expounding the law according to their Traditions, and countenancing their traditions by the forced ſenſes of the Law. Both which profeſſions were greatly inlarged and graced by two famous Doctors, Sammai and Hillel (whom ſome, though falſly, would have the founders of them) not long before Chriſts time; for old Hillel of a 120. yeers, protracted his daies by likely computation, to ten yeers after Chriſts birth. How Hierom fetcheth their names with more wittines than probabilitie, from Diſſipating & Prophaning the Law: and what bickerings and deadly quarels were even amongſt themſelves in thoſe two famous houſes; and what were the foure expoſitions of the Law which they followed, I liſt not now to diſcourſe. Their imploiment was, expounding the Law, and urging Traditions: therefore their auditors had wont to ſay, when they called one another to Church (as S^t. Hierome tels us) [οι σοφοι δευτερωσιν] The wiſe, that is, the Phariſes, expound to day. Whence perhaps, that may be interpreted of S. Paul to the Corinths, Where is the wiſe? where is the Scribe? So did the Scribes too; but the difference was, that the Scribes were more Textuall, the Phariſes more Traditionall: therefore obſerve, that the Scribe finds fault with the ſuſpition of blaſphemy: the Phariſe, with unwaſhen hands: the Scribes (their Doctors) exceld for learning, the Phariſes for piety. Their attire was the ſame, and their faſhions: but the Phariſes had [πολιτειας μειζους] more ſway; and were more ſtrict and Cappucine-like; profeſſed more yeeres continency; and in a word, tooke more paines to goe to hell. Theſe did ſoe carry away the hearts of the Jewes, that there was no holy man, which was not tearmed a Phariſe; and therefore among the ſeven kinds of Phariſes in their Talmud, they make Abraham a Phariſe of Love, Iob a Phariſe of Feare. And if from the men you caſt your eyes upon their righteouſneſſe, you cannot but wonder at the curioſitie of their zeale. Wherein look (I beſeech you) firſt at their devotion, then their holy carriage, laſtly their ſtrict obſervation of the Law.

Such was their devotion, that they prayed [σωμαχως] as a Father ſaith, oft and long: thrice a day was ordinary; at nine, twelve, and three a clocke: yea their progenitors (whom they would ſcorne not to match) divided the day into three parts; whereof one was beſtowed on prayer, the next on the Law, the third on their work. See here, God had two parts of three, themſelves but one: beſides at their meales what ſtrictneſſe?

Their very diſciples were taught (to ſhame us Chriſtians) if they had forgotten to give thanks, to returne from the field to the boord to ſay grace. For divine ſervice; the Decalogue muſt be read once a day of every man: the Scribes ſay the firſt watch; the Phariſes, any houre of the night: others, twice, without moving eye, hand, foot, in a cleane place, free from any excrement, and foure cubits diſtant from any ſepulchre. For faſting, they did it twice a week; not popiſhly (which Wickliffe juſtly calls Foole-faſting) but in earneſt; on Monday and Thurſday. Beſides (to omit their almes, which were every way proportionable to the reſt) what miſerable penance did they wilfully? They beat their heads againſt the wals, as they went, till blood came: whence one of their ſeven Phariſes is called (Kizai) a Phariſe draw-blood: They put thornes in their Skirts, to ſting themſelves; they lay on plankes, on ſtones, on thornes: and Banus that Heremiticall Phariſe drencht himſelfe oft, night and day, in cold water [προς αγνειαν] for chaſtity; or (if you read it without an aſpiration) it ſignifies for folly rather; what could that apiſh and ſtigmaticall Frier have done either more or worſe? This was their devotion. The holineſſe of their carriage was ſuch, that they avoided every thing that might carry any doubt of pollution: they would not therefore converſe with any different religion; and this Law went currant amongſt them: He that eats a Samaritans bread, be as he that eats ſwines fleſh. An Hebrew Midwife might not helpe a Gentile; not bookes, not wax, not incenſe, might be ſold to them: yea, no familiarity might be ſuffered with their owne vulgar. For whereas there were three ranks among the Jewes; the wiſe, (thoſe were the Phariſes) their Diſciples, and the populus terræ, (as they called them) this was one of the ſix reproaches to a novice of the Phariſes, To eat with the vulgar ſort: and leſt (when they had beene abroad) they ſhould have beene toucht by any, contrary to the warning of their phylacteries, they ſcoure themſelves at their returne; and eat not, unleſſe they have waſht [πυγμῃ] that is, accurately, as the Syriac; oft, as Eraſmus; or with the grip't fiſt, as Beza following Hierome. And not with every water (marke the niceneſſe) but with that onely which they had drawne up with their owne labour: and to make up the meaſure of their pretended ſanctimony, they vowed continency, not perpetuall (as our Romaniſts urge) but for eight or tenne yeares. Thus they did unbidden. How ſtrictly did they performe what was injoyned? No men ſo exact in their tithes: I pay tithes of all, ſaith the boaſting Phariſe: Of all (as a great Doctor noteth) it was more than he needed. God would have a Sabbath kept; they over-keepe it. They would not on that day ſtop a running veſſell, not lay an apple to the fire, not quench a burning, not knock on a table to ſtill a childe: what ſhould I note more? not rub or ſcratch in publike. God commands them to weare (Totaphoth) phylacteries: they doe (which our Saviour reproves) [πλατυνουσιν] enlarge them: and theſe muſt be written with right lines in a whole parchment of the hide of a cleane beaſt. God commands to celebrate and roſt the Paſſeover; they will have it done (in an exceſſe of care) not with an iron, but a woodden ſpit, and curiouſly chuſe the wood of Pomegranate: God commanded to avoid Idolatry; they taught their Diſciples, if an Image were in the way, to fetch about ſome other; and if they muſt needs goe that way, to runne: and if a thorne ſhould light in their foot (neere to the place) not kneele, but ſit downe and pull it out, leſt they ſhould ſeeme to give it reverence. I weary you with theſe Jewiſh niceties. Conſider then how devout, how liberall, how continent, how true dealing, how zealous, how ſcrupulous, how auſtere theſe men were, and ſee if it be not a wonder that our Saviour thus brandeth them; Except your righteouſneſſe exceed the righteouſneſſe of the Scribes and Phariſes, yee ſhall not enter into the Kingdome of Heaven: That is, If your doctrine be not more righteous, you ſhall not be entred of the Church: if your holineſſe be not more perfect, you ſhall not enter into heaven: behold, Gods Kingdome below and above is ſhut upon them.

The poore Jewes were ſo beſotted with the admiration of theſe two, that they would have thought if but two men muſt goe to heaven, the one ſhould be a Scribe, the other a Phariſe. What ſtrange newes was this from him that kept the keyes of David, that neither of them ſhould come there? It was not the perſon of theſe men, not their learning, not wit, not eloquence, not honour they admired ſo much, but their righteouſneſſe: and loe nothing but their righteouſneſſe is cenſured: Herein they ſeemed to exceed all men: herein all that would be ſaved, muſt exceed them. Doe but thinke how the amazed multitude ſtared upon our Saviour, when they heard this Paradox. Exceed the Phariſes in righteouſneſſe? It were much for an Angell from Heaven. What ſhall the poore ſonnes of the earth doe, if theſe worthies be turned away with a repulſe? yea perhaps, your ſelves, all that heare me this day, receive this not without aſtoniſhment and feare, whiles your conſciences ſecretly comparing your holineſſe with theirs, find it to come as much ſhort of theirs, as theirs of perfection. And would to God you could feare more, and be more amazed with this compariſon; for (to ſet you forward) muſt we exceed them, or elſe not be ſaved? If we let them exceed us, what hope, what poſſibilitie is there of our ſalvation? Ere wee therfore ſhew how farre wee muſt goe before them, looke backe with me (I beſeech you) a little, and ſee how farre we are behind them.

They taught diligently, and kept Moſes his chaire warme: how many are there of us, whom the great Maſter of the Vineyard may find loytering in this publike Market-place, market-place, and shake us by the shoulder with a Quid statis otiosi? why stand you here idle?

They compast sea and land (Satans walke) to make a Proselyte: wee sit still and freeze in our zeale, and lose Proselytes with our dull and wilfull neglect. They spent one quarter of the day in prayer: how many are there of us that would not thinke this an unreasonable service of God? We are so farre from this extreme devotion of the old Euchitæ, that we are rather worthy of a censure with those Spanish Priests for our negligence. How many of your Citizens can get leave of Mammon to bestow one houre of the day in a set course, upon God? How many of you Lawyers, are first clients to God, ere you admit others, clients to you? How many of you have your thoughts fixed in Heaven, ere they bee in westminster? Alas, what dulnesse is this? what injustice? All thy houres are his, and thou wilt not lend him one of his owne for thine owne good. They read, they recited the Law, (some) twice a day; never went without some parts of it about them: but to what effect? There is not one of our people (saith Iosephus) but answers to any question of the Law as readily as his owne name. How shall their diligence upbraid, yea condemne us? Alas! how doe our Bibles gather dust for want of use, while our Chronicle, or our Statute-booke, yea perhaps our idle and scurrilous play-bookes, are worne with turning? Oh how happy were our fore-fathers (whose memory is blessed for ever) if they could with much cost, and more danger get but one of Pauls Epistles in their bosomes; how did they hugge it in their armes, hide it in their chest, yea in their hearts! How did they eat, walk, sleepe, with that sweet companion, and in spight of persecution, never thought themselves well, but when they conversed with it in secret! Lo now these shops are all open, we buy them not; these books are open, we reade them not, and we will be ignorant because we will. The Sunne shines and wee shut our windowes. It is enough for the miserable Popish Laitie to be thus dark, that live in the perpetuall night of Inquisition. Shall this be the only difference betwixt them and us; that they would read these holy leaves, and may not; wee may, and will not? There is no ignorance, to the wilfull. I stand not upon a formall and verball knowledge: that was never more frequent, more flourishing. But if the maine grounds of Christianity were throughly setled in the hearts of the multitude, wee should not have so much cause of shame and sorrow, nor our adversaries of triumph and insultation. Shew lesse therefore for Gods sake, and learne more; and ballace your wavering heart with the sound truth of godlinesse, that you may flie steadily thorow all the tempests of errours. Make Gods Law of your learned counsell with David, and be happy. Else if you will needs love darknesse, you shall have enough of it: you have here inward darknesse, there outward (σκότος ἐξώτερον) This is your owne darknesse, that his of whom the Psalmist; He sent darknesse, and it was darke: Darke indeed: A thicke and terrible darknesse, joyned with weeping and gnashing. I urge not their awfull reverence in their devotion, our sleepy or wilde carelesnesse; their austere and rough discipline of the body, our wanton pampering of the flesh; though who can abide to thinke of a chaste Pharise, and a filthy Christian? a temperate Pharise, and a drunken Christian? how shamefully is this latter vice (especially) growne upon us with time? we knew it once in our ordinary speech appropriated to beggers, now gallants fight for it. This beastlinesse had wont be bashfull, now it is impudent; once children were wont to shout at a drunkard (as some foule wonder) now not to be drunk is quarrell enough among men, among friends: Those knees, that we were wont to bow to the God of Heaven, are now bent to Bacchus, in a Paganish, bestiall, devillish devotion. To leave the title of Christians, for shame let us be either men, or beasts. My speech hastens to their holy and wise strictnesse of carriage; where in I can never complaine enough of our inequalitie: They hated the presence, the fire, the fashion, the bookes of a Gentile, of a Samaritane; neither was there any hatred lost on the Samaritanes part; for if he had but toucht a Jew, he would have throwne himselfe into the water, cloaths & all: both of them equally sick of a Noli me tangere; Touch me not, for I am holier, Esay 65.

Our Romish Samaritanes haunt our tables, our closets, our eares; we frowne not, we dislike not: We match, converse, conferre, consult with them carelesly, as if it were were come to the old ſtay of that indifferent Apelles in Euſebius; Sat eſt credere in crucifixum: but that which I moſt lament, and yee, Fathers and Brethren, if my voyce may reach to any whom it concerneth, in the bowels of Chriſt let me boldly (though moſt unworthy) move your wiſdoms, your care to redreſſe it. Our young ſtudents (the hope of poſterity) newly crept out of the ſhell of philoſophy, ſpend their firſt houres in the great Doctors of Popiſh controverſies; Bellarmine is next to Ariſtotle: yea, our very ungrounded Artizans, young Gentlemen, fraile women, buy, reade, traverſe promiſcuouſly the dangerous writings of our ſubtileſt Jeſuites. What is the iſſue? Many of them have taken poyſon, ere they know what milke is; and when they have once taſted this bane, they muſt drinke and die. Oh what pity, what vexation is it to a true heart, to ſee us thus rob'd of our hopes; them of their ſoules! I have heard, yea I have ſeene and envied the cautelous ſeveritie of our adverſaries, which upon the deepeſt paines forbid the ſale, yea the ſight of thoſe Authors, which they terme infectious; where was ever Calvin publikely bought in one of their Church-yards? where ever read without licence, without ſecurity? I cenſure not this as the peculiar fault of this place: would God this open remiſſneſſe were not a common evill, and had not ſpred it ſelfe wide thorow all thoſe Churches that are gone out of Babylon. Let no man tell me of the diſtinction of that old Canoniſt: Some things (ſaith he) we reade leſt they ſhould be neglected, as the Bible; ſome, leſt they ſhould be unknowne, as Arts and Philoſophy; ſome, that they may be rejected, as Hereticall bookes. True; But let them reade that can reject, that can confute; wee diſtruſt not our cauſe, but their weake judgements. A good Apothecarie can make a good medicine of a ſtrong poyſon; muſt children therefore be allowed that box? I know how unworthy I am to adviſe; only I throw downe my ſelfe at your feet, and beſeech you, that our loſſes and their examples may make us no leſſe wiſe in our generation.

Matth 23.23.

I follow the compariſon; They paid tithes of all they had: not a pot-herbe, but they tithed it. Heare this ye ſacrilegious Patrons, the merchants of ſoules, the Pirats of the Church, the enemies of religion; they tithed all; you nothing; they paid to their Levites, your Levites muſt pay to you: Your Cures muſt be purchaſed, your tithes abated, or compounded for: O the ſhame of Religion! How too juſtly may I uſurpe of you that of Seneca? Petite ſacrileges are puniſhed, while great ones ride in triumph. Never excuſe it with pretence of Ceremony; Moſes, never gave ſo ſtrict a charge for this, as Paul [κοινωνείτω δὲ] communicate all thy goods with thy Teacher; all, with an emphaſis. Well-fare yet the honeſt Phariſes, whoſe rule was: (Decima ut dives fias) Tithe and be rich: If ever thou be the fatter for this gravell, or the richer with that thou ſtealeſt from God, let me come to begge at thy doore.

Gal. 6. 6.

Woe to you ſpirituall Robbers. Our blind fore-fathers clothed the Church; you deſpoile it: their ignorant devotion ſhall riſe in judgement againſt your ravening coveteouſneſſe. If robbery, ſimony, perjury will not carry you to hell; hope ſtill that you may be ſaved. They gave plentifull almes to the poore: we inſtead of filling their bellies, grinde their faces. What excellent Lawes had wee lately enacted that there ſhould be no begger in Iſrael? Let our ſtreets, wayes, hedges, witneſſe the execution. Thy liberality releeves ſome poore. It is well. But hath not thine oppreſſion made more? Thy uſury, extorting, racking, incloſing, hath wounded whole Villages, and now thou befriendeſt two or three with the plaiſters of thy bounty. The mercies of the wicked are cruell. They were preciſe in their Sabbath; we ſo looſe in ours, as if God had no day: See whether our Tavernes, ſtreets, high-wayes deſcry any great difference. Theſe things I vowed in my ſelfe to reprove, if too bitterly, (as you thinke) pardon (I beſeech you) this holy impatience: and blame the foulneſſe of theſe vices, not my juſt vehemency. And you (Chriſtian hearers) than which no name can bee dearer, be perſwaded to ranſacke your ſecure hearts; and if there be any of you whoſe awaked conſcience ſtrikes him for theſe ſins, and places him below theſe Jewes in this unrighteouſneſſe, if you wiſh or care to be ſaved, thinke it high time, as you would ever hope for entrance into Gods Kingdome, to ſtrike your ſelves on the thigh, and with amazement and indignation to ſay, What have I done? to abandon your wicked courſes; to reſolve, to vow, to ſtrive unto a Chriſtian and conſcionable reformation.

Paul,

A Paul, a Pharise, was according to the righteousnesse of the Law unreproveable: yet if Paul had not gone from Gamaliels feet, to Christs, he had never beene saved. Unreproveable, and yet rejected? Alas, my brethren, what shall become of our gluttony, drunkennesse, pride, oppression, bribing, cousenages, adulteries, blasphemies, and our selves for them? God and men reprove us for these; what shall become of us? If the civilly righteous shall not bee saved, where shall the notorious sinner appeare? A Christian below a Jew? For shame, where are wee? where is our emulation? Heaven is our goale, we all run; loe the Scribes and Pharises are before thee; what safety can it bee to come short of those that come short of heaven? Except your righteousnesse, &c. Phil.63.

You have seene these Scribes and Pharises; their righteousnesse and our unrighteousnesse. See now with like patience, their unrighteousnesse that was, and our righteousnesse that must be, wherein they failed, and we must exceed. They failed then in B their Traditions and Practice. May I say they failed, when they exceeded? Their Traditions exceeded in number and prosecution, faulty in matter.

To run well, but out of the way, (according to the Greeke Proverbe) is not better than to stand still. Fire is an excellent thing: but if it be in the top of the chimney, it doth mischiefe rather. It is good to be zealous in spight of all scoffes, but [ἐν καλῷ] in a good thing. If they had beene as hot for God, as they were for themselves, it had beene happie: but now in vaine they worship mee (saith our Saviour) teaching for doctrines the Traditions of men. Hence was that axiome received currantly amongst their Jewish followers: There is more in the words of the wise than in the words of the Law: More; that is, more matter, more authority: and from this principally arises and continues that mortall quarrell betwixt them and their (Karraim) and (Minim) vnto this day. Gal.4.18.

Plus est in verbis sapientum quàm in verbis legis. Galatin. Serarius.

C A great Jesuite (at least that thinks himselfe so) writes thus in great earnest: The Pharises (saith he) may not unfitly be compared to our Catholikes. Some men speak truth ignorantly, some unwillingly; Caiaphas never spake truer, when he meant it not: one egge is not liker to another, than the Tridentine Fathers to these Pharises in this point, besides that of free-will, merit, full performance of the Law, which they absolutely received from them: For marke, with the same reverence and devotion doe wee receive and respect Traditions, that we doe the Bookes of the Old and New Testament, say those Fathers in their fourth Session: Heare both of these speake, and see neither: if thou canst discerne whether is the Pharise, refuse me in a greater truth. Not that wee did ever say with that Arrian in Hilary: We debarre all words that are not written: or would thinke fit with those phanaticall Anabaptists of Munster, that all bookes should bee burnt besides the Bible: some Traditions must have place in every Church; but, D Their place: they may not take wall of Scripture: Substance may not in our valuation give way to circumstance, God forbid. If any man expect that my speech on this opportunity should descend to the discourse of our contradicted ceremonies, let him know that I had rather mourne for this breach than meddle with it. God knowes how willingly I would spend my selfe into perswasions if those would availe any thing: but I well see that teares are fitter for this Theme than words. The name of our Mother is sacred, and her peace precious. As it was a true speech cited from that Father by Bellarmine: The war of Heretikes is the peace of the Church: so would God our experience did not invert it upon us: The war of the Church is the peace of Heretikes. Our discord is their musicke; our ruine their glory: Oh what a sight is this, Brethren strive, while the enemy stands still, and laughs and triumphs. If we desired the griefe of our common mother, the languishing of the Gospell, the extirpation of E Religion, the losse of posterity, the advantage of our adversaries, which way could these be better effected than by our dissentions? That Spanish Prophet in our Age (for so I find him stiled) when King Philip asked him how he might become master of the Low-Countries, answered: If he could divide them from themselves; According to that old Machivellian principle of our Jesuites, Divide and Rule. And indeed it is concord onely (as the Poesie or Mot of the united States runs) which hath upheld them in a rich and flourishing estate against so great and potent enemies. Our Adversaries already brag of their victories: and what good heart can but bleed to see what they have gained since we dissented; to foresee what they will gaine? They are our mutuall spoiles that have made them proud and rich. If you ever therefore looke to see the good daies of the Gospell, the unhorsing and confusion of that strumpet of Rome, for Gods sake, for the Churches sake, for our owne soules sake, let us all compose our selves to peace and love: Oh pray for the peace of Ierusalem: that peace may be within her walls, and prosperitie within her palaces.

Nostra miseria tu es magnus de Pomp. Mimus.

For the matter of their Traditions, our Saviour hath taxed them in many particulars; about washings, oathes, offerings, retribution: whereof he hath said enough when hee hath tearmed their doctrine, the Leaven of the Pharises, that is, sowre and swelling. S. Hierome reduces them to two heads: They were Turpia vanilia; some so shamefull that they might not bee spoken; others idle and dotish; both so numerous that they cannot be reckoned. Take a taste for all; and to omit their reall Traditions, heare some of their interpretative. The Law was, that no Leper might come into the Temple; their Tradition was, if he were let downe thorow the roofe, this were no irregularity. The Law was, a man might not carry a burthen on the Sabbath: their Traditionall glosse; if he carried ought on one shoulder, it was a burthen; if on both, none. If shooes alone, no burthen; if with nailes, not tolerable. Their stint of a Sabbaths journey was a thousand cubits; their glosse was, That this is to be understood without the walls: but if a man should walke all day thorow a Citie as bigge as Ninive, he offends not. The Church of Rome shall vie strange glossems and ceremonious observations with them, whether for number or for ridiculousnesse. The day would faile mee if I should either epitomize the volume of their holy rites, or gather up those which it hath omitted. The new elected Pope in his solemne Lateran procession must take copper money out of his Chamberlaines lap, and scatter it among the people, and say; Gold and silver have I none. Seven yeares penance is injoyned to a deadly sinne; because Miriam was separated seven dayes for her leprosie; and God sayes to Ezekiel, I have given thee a day for a yeare. Christ said to Peter, Lanch forth into the deepe: therefore he meant that Peters successor should catch the great fish of Constantines donation. But I favour your eares. That one I may not omit, how S. Hierome, whom they fondly terme their Cardinall, compares some Popish fashions of his time with the Pharisaicall; who when he had spoken of their purple fringes in the foure corners of their (Tallith) and the thornes which these Rabbins tye in their skirts, for pennance, and admonition of their dutie: Hoc apud nos (saith hee) superstitiosæ mulierculæ in parvulis Evangeliis, in crucis ligno & istiusmodi rebus factitant: That is, Thus superstitious old wives doe amongst us with little Gospels of Ioh. with the wood of the Crosse, and the like. Thus that Father directly taxeth this Romish use: who if he were now alive, and should heare their Church groaning under the number of Ceremonies more than the Jewish, would (besides holy Austins complaint) redouble that censure of our Saviours, Woe to you Scribes, Pharises, hypocrites: for ye find heavy burthens and grievous to bee borne, and lay them on mens shoulders. I forbeare to speake of the erroneous opinions of these Jewish Masters concerning that Pythagorian transanimation or passage of the soule from one body to another (a point which the Jewes had learned from them, Matth. 16. 14.) concerning the not rising up of the wicked, Astronomicall destiny, free will, merit of works, perfection of obedience; in every of which it were easie to lose my selfe and my speech. I haste to their maine unrighteousnesse; which was not so much the planting of these stocks, which God never set, as the grafting of all holinesse & Gods service, upon them; a fashionable observation of the outward letter, with neglect of the true substance of the Law; a vaine-glorious ostentation of piety and perfection; and more care to be thought, than to be good; a greater desire to be great, than good; crueltie and oppression coloured with devotion. My speech now towards the closure shall draw it selfe up within these two lists; of their Hypocrisie, their worldlinesse: Hypocrisie in Fashionablenesse and Ostentation; Worldlinesse in Covetousnesse, Ambition. Only stirre up your selves a while, and suffer not your Christian attention to faile in this last act.

Pharisæorum, quæ est nisi legis secundum carnem observatio. Hier. in Gal. 1.

Some of their Rabbins say well, that God requires two things concerning his law; Custodie and worke. Custodie in the heart; worke in the execution: These unsound and

A and overly Phariſes did neither. It was enough if they kept the Law in their hands; ſo they had a formall ſhew of godlineſſe, it was enough: if the outſide of the platter were cleane, they cared for no more. God had charged them to binde the Law to their hand, and before their eyes, Deut. 6. wherein, as Ierome and Theophylact well interpret it, he meant the meditation and practice of his Law: they, like unto the fooliſh Patient, which when the Phyſitian bids him take that preſcript, eats up the paper; if they could get but a liſt of parchment upon their left arme next their heart, and another ſcroll to tie upon their forehead, and foure corners of fringe, or (if theſe be denied) a red threed in their hand, thought they might ſay with Saul, Bleſſed be thou of the Lord, I have done the commandement of the Lord. That Opus operatum of the Papiſts (for I ſtill parallel them) is not more falſe Latine than falſe Divinity: it is not the outſide of thy obedience that God cares for, if never ſo holy, never ſo glori-
B ous; it is enough that men are couſened with theſe flouriſhes: the heart and the reins are thoſe that God looks after. What cares a good market-man how good the fleece be, when the liver is rotten? God doth not regard faſhion ſo much as ſtuffe. Thou deceiveſt thy ſelfe, if thou thinke thoſe ſhewes that bleared the eyes of the world, can deceive him. God ſhall ſmite thee thou whited wall, God ſhall ſmite thee. Doeſt thou thinke hee ſees not how ſmooth y thou haſt dawbed on thine whoriſh complexion? Hee ſees thee a far off, and hates thee while thy paraſites applaud thy beauty. I ſpeake not of this carrion-fleſh which thou wantonly infecteſt with the falſe colours of thy pride, which God ſhall once waſh off with rivers of brimſtone: I ſpeake of thy painted ſoule, and thy counterfeit obedience. Give me leave (yea let me take it) to complaine that we are fallen into a cold and hollow age, wherin the religion of many is but faſhion, and their piety gilded ſuperſtition: Men
C care onely to ſeeme Chriſtians; if they can get Gods liverie on their backes, and his name in their mouthes, they out-face all reproofes. How many are there, which if they can keepe their Church, give an almes, bow their knee, ſay their prayers, pay their tithes, and once a yeere receive the Sacrament (it matters not how corrupt hearts, how filthy tongues, how falſe hands they beare) can ſay in their hearts with Eſau, I have enough my brother? As if God cared for this thy vaine formalitie; as if he hated thee not ſo much more than a pagan, by how much thou wouldſt ſeeme more good. Be not deceived: If long devotions, ſad looks, hard penances, bountifull almes, would have carried it (without the ſolid ſubſtance of godlineſſe) theſe Scribes and Phariſes had never beene ſhut out of heaven. Conſider this therefore (deare brethren) none but your owne eyes can looke into your hearts: we ſee your faces, the world ſees your lives; if your lives be not holy, your hearts ſound, though
D your faces were like Angels, you ſhall have your portion with Devils. Tell not me thou heareſt, prayeſt, talkeſt, beleeveſt: How liveſt thou? What doeſt thou? Shew me thy faith by thy workes, ſaith Iames. It was an excellent anſwer that good Moſes gave to Lucius in the Church-ſtory: The faith that is ſeene, is better than the faith that is heard; and that of Luther not inferiour, that faith doth pingueſcere operibus, grow fat and well-liking with good workes. It is a leane ſtarved carcaſſe of faith thou pretendeſt without theſe. If profeſſion be all, the Scribes and Phariſes are before thee. Ranſacke thy heart, and finde ſound affection to God, firme reſolutions to goodneſſe, true hatred of ſinne: ranſacke thy life, and finde the truth of works, the life of obedience; then alone thy righteouſneſſe exceeds the righteouſneſſe of the Scribes and Phariſes, and thou ſhalt enter into Heaven. Their oſtentation followes; wherein E it is ſtrange to conſider, how thoſe that cared not to be good, ſhould deſire yet to ſeeme good: ſo did theſe Phariſes. They would not faſt without a ſmeared face, not give an almes without a trumpet, not pray without witneſſes. Scribes, Phariſes, hypocrites. They did act a religious part, they did but play devotion. They were nothing beſide the ſtage: all for ſight, nothing for ſubſtance. Would God this vice of hypocriſie had either died with them, or had only hereditarily deſcended to their ſucceſſors. Satan will not let us be thus happy. I ſee no mans heart: but I dare boldly ſay, the world is full of hypocriſie. By their fruits ye ſhall know them (ſaith our Saviour:) By their fruits; not by the bloſſomes of good purpoſes, nor the leaves of good profeſ-ſion, but by the fruit of their actions. Not to ſpeak how our mint and cummin hath incroched upon judgement and juſtice: Search your ſelves (yee Citizens:) now you draw neere to God with your lips, with your eares, where is your heart? Here your devout attention ſeemes to crie, The Lord is God: how many are there of you, that have any God at home? how many that have a falſe God? God at Church; Mammon in your ſhops? I ſpeake not of all; God forbid. This famous Citie hath in the darkeſt, in the wantoneſt times, afforded (and ſo doth) many, that have done God honour, honeſty to the Goſpell. But how many are there of you that under ſmooth faces have foule conſciences? Faire words, falſe meaſures, forſworn valuations, adulterate wares, griping uſuries, have filled many of your coffers, and feſtered your ſoules: You know this, and yet like Salomons Curtizan you wipe your mouthes, and it was not you. Your almes are written in Church-windowes, your defraudings in the ſand; all is good ſave that which appeares not. How many are there every where, that ſhame Religion by profeſſing it? whoſe beaſtly life makes Gods truth ſuſpected: for as, howſoever the Samaritan, not the Iew, releeved the diſtreſſed traveller, yet the Iews religion was true, not the Samaritans; ſo in others, truth of cauſes muſt not be judged by acts of perſons; yet, as he ſaid, It muſt needs be good that Nero perſecutes; ſo who is not readie to ſay: It cannot be good that ſuch a miſcreant profeſſes? Woe to thee Hypocrite, thou canſt not touch, not name goodneſſe, but thou defileſt it; God will plague thee for acting ſo high a part: See what thou art, and hate thy ſelfe; or (if not that) yet ſee how God hates thee: he that made the heart, ſayes thou art no better than an handſome tombe; the houſe of death. Behold here a greene turfe, or ſmooth marble, or ingraven braſſe, and a commending Epitaph; all ſightly: but what is within? an unſavoury, rotten carcaſſe. Though thou were wrapt in gold, and perfumed with never ſo loud prayers, holy ſemblances, honeſt proteſtations; yet thou art but noyſome carrion to God: Of all earthly things, God cannot abide thee; and if thou wouldſt ſee how much lower yet his deteſtation reacheth, know that when he would deſcribe the torments of Hell, he calls them (as their worſt title) but the portion of hypocrites. Wherefore cleanſe your hands yee ſinners, and purge your hearts yee double minded: For unleſſe your righteouſneſſe exceed the hypocriticall righteouſneſſe of the Scribes and Phariſes, yee ſhall not enter into the kingdome of Heaven.

Iam. 4.8. ἁγνίσατε.

My ſpeech muſt end in their Covetouſneſſe and Ambition: A paire of hainous vices. I joyne them together: for they are not only brethren, but twins; yet ſo as the elder here alſo ſerves the younger. It is Ambition that blowes the fire of Covetouſneſſe. Oppreſſion gets wealth; that wealth may procure honour. Why doe men labour to be rich, but that they may be great? Their covetouſneſſe was ſuch, that their throat (an open ſepulchre) ſwallowed up whole houſes of Widowes. Whence their goods are called by our Saviour [τὰ ἐνόντα] not τὰ ὄντα, as if they were already in their bowels: and which was worſt of all, while their lips ſeemed to pray, they were but chewing of that morſell. Their Ambition ſuch, that they womaniſhly brawled and ſhouldred for the beſt ſeat; the higheſt pew: A title, a wall, a chaire, a cap, a knee, theſe were goodly cares for them that profeſſed gravitie, humilitie, mortification. Let me boldly ſay, Ieruſalem never yeelded ſo very Phariſes as Rome. Theſe old diſciples of Sammai and Hillel were not Phariſes in compariſon of our Ieſuites. From judgement (you ſee) I am deſcended to practice: wherein it is no leſſe eaſily made good that theſe are more kindly Phariſes, than the ancient. A poore Widowes Cottage filled the panch of an old Phariſe; How many faire patrimonies of devout young Gentlemen * Druryed by them (pardon the word, it is their owne; the thing I know and can witneſſe) have gone downe the throat of theſe Loyoliſts, let their owne Quodlibet and Catechiſme report. What ſpeake I of ſecular inheritances? Theſe eyes have ſeene no meane houſes of devotion and charitie ſwallowed up by them.

Luke 13.41.

περιοκλασίαν καὶ περιοκοδιδοίαν. Matth. 23.6.

* A word which the Seminaries report (in their Quodlibet) uſuall amongſt them, to ſignifie beguiled and wiped of their inheritance: from the example of M. Henry Drury of Lawſhull in Suffolke, ſo defeated by the Ieſuits. As at Winnoxbergin Flanders neere Dunkerk, where a rich Legacie given by a charitable Lady for the building of an Hoſpitall, was cunningly turned to the maintenance of Ieſuits.

A As for their ambitious insinuations, not only all their owne Religious enviously cry downe, but the whole world sees and rings of. What oare of State can stir without their rowing? What Kingdome either stands or falls without their intermedling? What noble Familie complaines not of their proling and stealth? And all this with a sterne face of sad pietie and sterne mortification. Yea what other is their great Master, but the King of Pharises? who, under a pretence of simple pietie, challenges without shame to have devoured the whole Christian world, the naturall inheritances of secular Princes, by the foisted name of Peters patrimony, and now in most infamous and shameless ambition, calls great Emperours to his stirrup, yea to his foot-stoole. But what wander wee so farre from home? Ve nobis miseris (saith S. Jerome) aliquos Pharisæorum vitia transierunt, (Woe to us wretched men, to whom the Pharises vices are derived.) The great Doctor of the Gentiles long agoe said, All seeke their owne, and not the things of God; and is the world mended with age? would God we did not find it a sure rule; that (as it is in this little world) the older it growes, the more diseased, the more covetous: we are all too much the true sonnes of our great grand-mother; and have each of us an Eves sweet-tooth in our heads, we would be more than we are: and every man would be either (n) or (s) either the man, or some-body. If a number of your consciences were ript, O yee that would be Christian Gentlemen, Lawyers, Citizens, what doe we think would be found in your mawes? Here the devoured patrimony of poore Orphans; there the commons of whole Townships: here the impropriate goods of the Church; there piles of usury: here bribes and unlawfull fees; there the raw and indigested gobbets of Simony: yea, would God I might not say, but I must say it, with feare, with sorrow, even of our sacred and divine profession, that which our Saviour of his Twelve, Yee are cleane, but not all. The multitude of C our unregarded Charges, and soules dying and starved, for want of spirituall provision, (while they give us bodily) would condemne my silence for too partiall. In all conditions of men (for particulars are subject to envy and exception) the daughters of the horse-leach had never such a fruitfull generation: They cry still, Give, Give: not give alone, that is, the bread of sufficiencie; but Give, Give; that is, more than enough. But what is more than enough? What is but enough? What is not too little for the insatiable gulfe of humane desires? Every man would ingrosse the whole world to himselfe, and with that ambitious Conquerour feares it will be too little: and how few * Agurs are there, that pray against too much? From hence it is, that yee Courtiers grate upon poore Trades with hard monopolies. Hence, yee Merchants load them with deepe and unreasonable prices, and make them pay deare for dayes.
Hence ye great men wring the poore sponges of the Commonaltie into your private D purses, for the maintenance of pride and excesse. Hence yee cormorant corne-mongers hatch up a dearth in the time of plentie. God sends graine, but many times the Devill sends garners. The earth hath beene no niggard in yeelding: but you have beene lavish in transporting, and close in concealing. Never talke of our extreme frosts: wee see Gods hand, and kisse the rod; but if your hearts, your charitie, were not more frozen than ever the earth was, meane Housekeepers should not need to beg, nor the meanest to starve for want of bread. Hence lastly, our loud oppressions of all sorts crie to heaven, and are answered with threats, yea with variety of vengeances. Take this with thee yet, O thou worldling, which hast the greedy-worme under thy tongue with Esaies dogges, and never hast enough; Thou shalt meet with two things as unsatiable as thy selfe: the Grave and Hell; and thou, whom all the world could not satisfie, there be E two things whereof thou shalt have enough: Enough mould in the grave, enough fire in hell.

I love not to end with a judgement; and as it were to let my Sunne set in a cloud. Wee are all Christians, we should know the World what it is, how vaine, how transitory, how worthlesse. We know where there are better things, which wee professe our selves made for, and aspiring to: Let us use the world like it selfe, and leave this importunate wooing of it, to Heathens and Infidels, that know no other Heaven, no other God. Or if you like that counsell better; Bee covetous: Be ambitious; Covet spirituall gifts,

THE PASSION SERMON. PREACHED AT PAVLS CROSSE ON GOOD-FRIDAY. Aprill. 14. 1609.

By Ios. Hall.

¶ Imprinted at London, 1634.

TO THE ONELY HONOVR AND GLORY OF GOD MY DEARE AND BLESSED SAVIOVR (WHICH HATH DONE AND SVFFERED ALL THESE THINGS FOR MY SOVLE,)

HIS WEAKE AND VNWORTHY SERVANT HVMBLY DESIRES TO CONSECRATE HIMSELFE AND HIS POORE LABOVRS: BESEECHING HIM TO ACCEPT AND BLESSE THEM TO THE PUBLIKE GOOD, AND TO THE PRAISE OF HIS OWNE GLORIOVS NAME.

TO THE READER.

I Desire not to make any Apologie for the Edition of this my Sermon: It is motive enough, that herein I affect a more publike and more enduring good. Spirituall niceneſſe, is the next degree to unfaithfulneſſe: this point cannot be too much urged, either by the tongue, or Preſſe. Religion and our ſoules depend upon it, yet are our thoughts too much beſide it. The Church of Rome ſo fixes her ſelfe (in her adoration) upon the Croſſe of Chriſt, as if ſhe forgat his glorie: Many of us ſo conceive of him glorious, that wee neglect the meditation of his Croſſe, the way to his glorie and ours. If we would proceed aright, we muſt paſſe from his Golgotha to the mount of Olives, and from thence to heaven, and there ſeeke and ſettle our reſt. According to my weake ability, I have led this way in my ſpeech, beſeeching my Readers to follow mee with their hearts, that we may overtake him which is entred into the true Sanctuary, even the higheſt heavens, to appeare now in the ſight of God for us.

THE PASSION SERMON.

Ioh. 19. Ver. 30.

when Iesus therefore had received the viniger, he said, It is finished; and bowing the head, he gave up the ghost.

THE bitter and yet victorious passion of the Sonne of God, (Right honourable and beloved Christians) as it was the strangest thing that ever befell the earth; so is both of most soveraigne use, and lookes for the most frequent and carefull meditation. It is one of those things, which was once done, that it might be thought of for ever. Every day therefore must be the Good-Friday of a Christian: who, with that great Doctor of the Gentiles, must desire to know nothing but Jesus Christ, and him crucified.

There is no branch or circumstance in this wonderfull businesse, which yeelds not infinite matter of discourse. According to the solemnity of this time and place, I have chosen to commend unto your Christian attention, our Saviours Farewell to Nature (for his reviving was about it) in his last word, in his last act. His last word, It is finished; his last act, He gave up the Ghost. That which he said, hee did. If there be any theame that may challenge and command our eares and hearts, this is it: for behold, the sweetest word that ever Christ spake, & the most meritorious act that ever he did, are met together, in this his last breath. In the one ye shall see him triumphing; yeelding in the other, yet so as he overcomes. Imagine therefore, that you saw Christ Iesus, in this day of his passion (who is every day here crucified before your eies) advanced upon the Chariot of his Crosse; and now, after a weary conflict cheerefully over-looking the despight and shame of men, the wrath of his Father, the Law, sin, death, hell; which all lie gasping at his foot: and then you shall conceive, with what spirit he saith, Consummatum est, It is finished. What is finished? Shortly; All the prophecies that were of him; All legall observations, that prefigured him; his owne sufferings; our salvation. The prophecies are accomplisht, the ceremonies abolisht, his sufferings ended, our salvation wrought; these foure heads shall limit this first part of my speech; only let them find and leave you attentive.

Even this very word is propheſied of; All things that are written of me have an end, saith Christ. What end? This, It is finished. This very end hath his end here. What therefore is finished? Not this prediction only of his last draught, as Augustine: that were too particular. Let our Saviour himselfe say, All things that are written of mee by the Prophets. It is a sure and convertible rule; Nothing was done by Christ, which was not foretold: Nothing was ever foretold by the Prophets of Christ, which was not done.

It would take up a life to compare the Prophets and Evangeliſts, the predictions & the hiſtorie, and largely to diſcourſe how the one foretells, and the other anſwers: let it ſuffice to looke at them running. Of all the Evangeliſts, Saint Matthew hath beene moſt ſtudious, in making theſe references and correſpondences; with whom, the burden or underſong of every event, is ſtill (vt impleretur) that it might be fulfilled. Thus hath he noted (if I have reckoned them aright) two and thirty ſeverall prophecies concerning Chriſt, fulfilled in his birth, life, death.

To which S. Iohn addes many more. Our ſpeech muſt be directed to his Paſſion: Omitting the reſt, let us inſiſt in thoſe.

He muſt be apprehended: it was fore-propheſied; The Anointed of the Lord was taken in their nets, ſaith Ieremie: but how? he muſt be ſold: for what? for thirtie ſilver peeces; and what muſt thoſe doe? buy a field: all foretold; And they tooke thirty ſilver peeces, the price of him that was valued, and gave them for the potters field, ſaith Zacharie (miſwritten Ieremie, by one letter miſtaken in the abbreviation.) By whom? That childe of perdition, that the Scripture might be fulfilled. Which was hee? It is foretold; He that eateth bread with me, ſaith the Pſalmiſt. And what ſhall his Diſciples doe? Runne away: ſo ſaith the Prophecie; I will ſmite the ſhepherd, and the ſheepe ſhall be ſcattered, ſaith Zacharie. What ſhall be done to him? Hee muſt bee ſcourged and ſpet upon: behold, not thoſe filthy excrements could have light upon his ſacred face, without a prophecie; I hid not my face from ſhame and ſpetting, ſaith Eſay. What ſhall be the iſſue? In ſhort, he ſhall be led to death: it is the prophecie, The Meſſias ſhall be ſlaine, ſaith Daniel: what death? He muſt be lift up; Like as Moſes lift up the Serpent in the wildernesſe, ſo ſhall the Sonne of man be lift up. Chryſoſtome ſaith well, that ſome actions are parables; ſo may I ſay, ſome actions are prophecies, ſuch are all types of Chriſt, and this with the formoſt. Lift up, whither? to the Croſſe: it is the prophecie, hanging upon a tree, ſaith Moſes: how lift up? nailed to it: ſo is the prophecie, Foderunt manus, They have pierced my hands and my feet, ſaith the Pſalmiſt: With what company? Two theeves: With the wicked was hee numbred, ſaith Eſay: Where? Without the gates, ſaith the prophecie: What becomes of his garments? They cannot ſo much as caſt the dice for his coat, but it is propheſied; They divided my garments, and on my veſtures caſt lots, ſaith the Pſalmiſt. He muſt die then on the Croſſe: but how? voluntarily. Not a bone of him ſhall be broken: what hinders it? loe, there he hangs, as it were neglected and at mercy; yet all the raging Jewes, no, all the Devils in hell cannot ſtirre one bone in his bleſſed bodie: It was propheſied in the Eaſter-Lamb, and it muſt be fulfilled in him that is the true Paſſeover, in ſpight of fiends and men: how then? he muſt be thruſt in the ſide: behold, not the very ſpeare could touch his precious ſide being dead, but it muſt be guided by a prophecie; They ſhall ſee him whom they have thruſt thorow, ſaith Zacharie: what ſhall he ſay the while? not his very words but are fore-ſpoken: his complaint, Eli Eli lamma ſabactani, as the Chaldee, or עזבתני as the Hebrew, Pſal. 22. 2. his reſignation, In manus tuas, Into thy hands I commend my ſpirit, Pſal. 31. 5. his requeſt, Father forgive them: He prayed for the tranſgreſſors, ſaith Eſay. And now when he ſaw all theſe prophecies were fulfilled, knowing that one remained, he ſaid I thirſt. Domine quid ſitis? ſaith one, O Lord, what thirſteſt thou for? A ſtrange hearing, that a man, yea that God and man dying, ſhould complaine of thirſt.

Could he endure the ſcorching flames of the wrath of his Father, the curſe of our ſinnes, thoſe tortures of body, thoſe horrours of ſoule, and doth he ſhrinke at his thirſt? No, no: he could have borne his drought, he could not beare the Scripture not fulfilled. It was not neceſſity of nature, but the neceſſitie of his Fathers decree, that drew forth this word, I thirſt. They offered it before, he refuſed it: Whether it were an ordinary potion for the condemned to haſten death (as in the ſtorie of M. Antonie which is the moſt received conſtruction) or whether it were that Jewiſh potion, whereof the Rabbins ſpeake; whoſe tradition was, that the malefactor to be executed, ſhould

A ſhould after ſome good counſell from two of their Teachers, be taught to ſay; Let my death be to the remiſſion of all my ſinnes; and then that he ſhould have given him a boule of mixt wine, with a graine of Frankincenſe, to bereave him both of reaſon and paine.

Sit mors mea in remiſſionem omnium iniquitatum mearum. Vt uſus rationis tollatur.

I durſt be confident in this latter; the rather for that Saint Marke calls this draught, οἶνον ἐσμυρνισμένον, Myrrhe-wine, mingled (as is like) with other ingredients. And Montanus agrees with me in the end, Ad ſtuporem & mentis alienationem: A faſhion which Galatine obſerves out of the Sannedrim, to be grounded upon Prov. 31. 6. Give ſtrong drinke to him that is ready to periſh. I leave it modeſtly in the middeſt; let the learneder judge. Whatſoever it were, he would not die till he had complained of thirſt, and in his thirſt taſted it. Neither would he have thirſted for, or taſted any but this bitter draught; that the Scripture might be fulfilled; They gave me vineger to drinke: And loe, B now Conſummatum eſt; All is finiſhed.

If there be any Jew amongſt you, that like one of Iohns unſeaſonable Diſciples, ſhall aske, Art thou he, or ſhall we looke for another? he hath his anſwer; Yee men of Iſrael, why ſtand you gazing and gaping for another Meſſias? In this alone, all the Prophecies are finiſhed; and of him alone, all was propheſied that was finiſhed. Pauls old rule holds ſtill, To the Iewes a ſtambling block; and that more ancient curſe of David, Let their table be made a ſnare: And Stevens two brands ſtick ſtill in the fleſh of theſe wretched men: One in their neck, ſtiffe necked; the other in their heart, uncircumciſed; the one, Obſtinacie; the other, Vnbeleefe: ſtiffe necks indeed, that will not ſtoope and relent with the yoke of ſixteene hundred yeeres judgement and ſervilitie; uncircumciſed hearts, the filme of whoſe unbeleefe would not be cut off with ſo infinite convictions. Oh mad and miſerable Nation! let them ſhew us one prophecie that is not C fulfilled, let them ſhew us one other in whom all the prophecies can be fulfilled, and we will mix pity with our hate: If they cannot, and yet reſiſt, their doome is paſt; Thoſe mine enemies, that would not have me to reigne over them, bring them hither, and ſlay them before me. So let thine enemies periſh, O Lord.

σκληροτράχηλοι. ἀπερίτμητοι.

But what goe I ſo farre? Even amongſt us (to our ſhame) this riotous age hath bred a monſtrous generation (I pray God I be not now in ſome of your boſomes, that heare me this day) compounded, much like to the Turkiſh religion, of one part, Chriſtian; another, Jew; a third, worldling; a fourth, Atheiſt; a Chriſtians face, a Jewes heart, a worldlings life; and therefore Atheous in the whole; that acknowledge a God, and know him not; that profeſſe a Chriſt, but doubt of him; yea, beleeve him not: The foole hath ſaid in his heart, There is no Chriſt. What ſhall I ſay of theſe men? They D are worſe than devils: that yeelding ſpirit could ſay, Ieſus I know: and theſe miſcreants are ſtill in the old tune of that tempting devill; Si tu es filius Dei, If thou be the Chriſt. Oh God, that after ſo cleare a Goſpell, ſo many miraculous confirmations, ſo many thouſand martyrdomes, ſo many glorious victories of truth, ſo many open confeſſions of Angels, men, devils, friends, enemies; ſuch conſpirations of heaven and earth, ſuch univerſall conteſtations of all Ages and people; there ſhould be left any ſparke of this damnable infidelity in the falſe hearts of men. Behold then, yee deſpiſers, and wonder, and vaniſh away: Whom have all the Prophets foretold? or what have the prophecies of ſo many hundreds, yea thouſands of yeeres, foreſaid, that is not with this word finiſhed? who could foretell theſe things, but the Spirit of God? who could accompliſh them, but the Sonne of God? He ſpake by the mouth of his holy Prophets, ſaith Zacharie: hee hath ſpoken, and hee hath done; one true God in both: none other E ſpirit could foreſay theſe things ſhould be done; none other power could doe theſe things, thus fore-ſhewed: this word therefore can fit none but the mouth of God our Saviour, It is finiſhed. Wee know whom we have beleeved; Thou art the Chriſt the Sonne of the living God. Let him that loves not the Lord Jeſus be accurſed to the death.

Aug. ad Hie. Dum volunt & Iudæi eſſe & Chriſtiani, nec Iudæi ſunt, nec Chriſtiani.

Thus the prophecies are finiſhed: Of the legall obſervations, with more brevity. Chriſt is the end of the Law: What Law? Ceremoniall, Morall. Of the Morall; it was kept perfectly by himſelfe, ſatisfied fully for us: Of the Ceremoniall; it was referred to him, obſerved of him, fulfilled in him, aboliſht by him. There were nothing more eaſie, than to ſhew you how all thoſe Jewiſh Ceremonies lookt at Chriſt: how Circumciſion, Paſſeover, the Tabernacle, both outer and inner, the Temple, the Laver, both the Altars, the Tables of Shew-bread, the Candleſtickes, the Vaile, the Holy of Holies, the Arke, the Propitiatorie, the pot of Manna, Aarons Rod, the High Prieſt, his Order and Line; his Habits, his Inaugurations, his Waſhings, his Anointings, his Sprinklings, Offerings, the Sacrifices, ἱλαστικὰ ἐυχαριστικὰ, and what ever Jewiſh Rite; had their vertue from Chriſt, relation to him, and their end in him. This was then their laſt gaſpe; for, now ſtraight they died with Chriſt, now the vaile of the Temple rent: as Auſtin well notes out of Matthewes order; It tore then, when Chriſts laſt breath paſſed. That conceit of Theophylact is wittie; that as the Jewes were wont to rend their garments, when they heard blaſphemy: ſo the Temple not enduring theſe execrable blaſphemies againſt the ſonne of God, tore his vaile in peeces. But that is not all: the vaile rent, is the obligation of the rituall Law cancelled; the way into the heavenly Sanctuary opened; the ſhadow giving roome to the ſubſtance: in a word, it doth that which Chriſt ſaith, Conſummatum eſt. Even now then the law of Ceremonies died: It had a long and ſolemne buriall, as Auguſtine ſaith well; perhaps figured in Moſes, who died not lingringly, but was thirty dayes mourned for: what meanes the Church of Rome to dig them up, now rotten in their graves? and that, not as they had beene buried, but ſowen with a plenteous increaſe; yea, with the inverted uſurie of too many of you Citizens; ten for one. It is a grave and deepe cenſure of that reſolute Hierome; Ego e contrario loquar, &c. I ſay, ſaith he, and in ſight of all the world dare maintaine, that now the Iewiſh ceremonies are pernicious and deadly; and whoſoever ſhall obſerve them, whether he be Iew or Gentile, in barathrum Diaboli devolutum; ſhall frie in Hell for it. Still Altars? ſtill Prieſts? ſacrifices ſtill? ſtill waſhings? ſtill unctions? ſprinkling, ſhaving, purifying? ſtill all, and more than all? Let them heare but Auguſtines cenſure, Quiſquis nunc, &c. Whoſoever ſhall now uſe them, as it were raking them up out of their duſt, he ſhall not be Pius deductor corporis, ſed impius ſepulturæ violator; an impious and ſacrilegious wretch, that ranſacks the quiet tombes of the dead.

I ſay not that all Ceremonies are dead; but the Law of Ceremonies, and of Jewiſh. It is a ſound diſtinction of them, that profound Peter Martyr hath in his Epiſtle to that worthy Martyr, Father, Biſhop Hooper: Some are typicall, fore-ſignifying Chriſt to come: ſome of order and decencie, thoſe are abrogated, not theſe: the Jewes had a faſhion of Prophecying in the Churches; ſo the Chriſtians from them, as Ambroſe: the Jewes had an eminent pulpit of wood; ſo we: they gave names at their Circumciſion; ſo we at Baptiſme: they ſung Pſalmes, melodiouſly in Churches, ſo doe we: they paid and received tithes, ſo doe we: they wrapt their dead in linnen with odors; ſo we: the Jewes had ſureties at their admiſſion into the Church; ſo we: theſe inſtances might be infinite: the Spouſe of Chriſt cannot be without her laces, and chaines, and borders. Chriſt came not to diſſolve order. But thou O Lord, how long? how long ſhall thy poore Church find her ornaments, her ſorrowes? and ſee the deare ſonnes of her wombe, bleeding about theſe apples of ſtrife: let me ſo name them, not for their value (even ſmall things, when they are commanded, looke for no ſmall reſpect) but for their event: the enemie is at the gates of our Siracuſe; how long will we ſuffer our ſelves, taken up with angles and circles in the duſt: ye Men, Brethren, and Fathers, help; for Gods ſake put to your hands, to the quenching of this common flame: the one ſide by humility and obedience; the other by compaſſion; both by prayers and teares: who am I, that I ſhould revive to you the ſweet ſpirit of that divine Auguſtine, who when he heard and ſaw the bitter contentions betwixt two grave and famous Divines, Ierome and Ruffine; Heu mihi, ſaith he, qui vos alicubi ſimul invenire non poſſum; Alas, that I ſhould never find you two together, how I would fall at your feet, how I would embrace them, and weepe upon them, and beſeech you, either of you for other, and each for himſelfe, both of you for the Church of God, but eſpecially, for the weake, for whom Chriſt died, who not without their owne great danger, ſee you two fighting in this Theatre of the world. Yet let me doe what he ſaid he would doe; beg for peace, as for life: by your filiall piety to the Church of God, whoſe ruines follow upon our diviſions; by your love of Gods truth; by the graces of that one bleſſed Spirit, whereby we are all

Ex qui apparet tunc ſciſſum eſſe, cum Chriſtus emiſit ſpiritum.

Ceremoniæ ſicut defunctæ corpora neceſſariorum officijs deducenda erant ad ſepulturâ, non ſimulatè, ſed religioſè, nec deſerenda continuo. Auguſtin. Ego è contrario loquar, & reclamante mundo libera voce pronunciem, ceremonias Iudaeorũ perniciosas eſſe, & mortiferas, & quicunque eas obſervaverit, ſive ex Iudæis ſive ex Gentibus, in barathrum diaboli devolutum Hier. Quiſquis nunc ea celebrare voluerit, tanquam ſopitos cineres erumens, non erit pius, &c.

A all informed and quickned; by the precious blood of that Sonne of God, which this day, and this houre, was ſhed for our redemption, be inclined to peace and love: and though our braines be different, yet let our hearts be one. It was, as I heard, the dying ſpeech of our late reverend, worthy and gracious Dioceſan; Modo me moriente vivat ac floreat Eccleſia; Oh, yet if, when I am dead, the Church may live and flouriſh.

What a ſpirit was here? what a ſpeech? how worthy never to die? how worthy of a ſoule ſo neere to his heaven? how worthy of ſo happie a ſucceſſion? Yee whom God hath made inheritours of this bleſſed care, who doe no leſſe long for the proſperity of Sion, live you to effect what he did but live to wiſh; all peace with our ſelves, and warre with none but Rome and Hell. And if there be any wayward Separatiſt, whoſe ſoule profeſſeth to hate peace; I feare to tell him Pauls meſſage, yet I muſt: Would to God thoſe were cut off that trouble you. How cut off? As good Theodoſius B ſaid to Demophilus, a contentious Prelate; Si tu pacem fugis, &c. If thou flie peace, I will make thee flie the Church. Alas, they doe flie it: that which ſhould be their puniſhment, they make their contentment; how are they worthy of pitie? As Optatus of his Donatiſts; they are Brethren, might be companions, and will not. Oh wilfull men; whither doe they run? from one Chriſt to another? Is Chriſt divided? we have him, thanks be to our good God, and we heare him daily; and whither ſhall we goe from thee? thou haſt the words of eternall life.

Si tu pacem fugis, ego te ab Eccleſia fugere mando.

Thus the Ceremonies are finiſhed: now heare the end of his ſufferings, with like patience and devotion: his death is here included; it was ſo neere, that he ſpake of it as done; and when it was done, all was done. How eaſie is it to loſe our ſelves in this diſcourſe! how hard not to be overwhelmed with matter of wonder; and to find either beginning or end! his ſufferings found an end, our thoughts cannot. Lo, with this word C he is happily waded out of thoſe deeps of ſorrowes, whereof our conceits can find no bottome: yet let us, with Peter, gird our coat, and caſt our ſelves a little into this ſea.

All his life was but a perpetuall Paſſion: In that hee became man, he ſuffered more than we can doe, either while we are men, or when we ceaſe to be men; he humbled, yea, he emptied himſelfe. Wee, when we ceaſe to be here, are cloathed upon, 2. Cor. 5. Wee both winne by our being, and gaine by our loſſe; he loſt, by taking our more or leſſe to himſelfe, that is, manhood. For, though ever as God, I and my Father are one: yet as man, My Father is greater than I. That man ſhould be turned into a beaſt, into a worme, into duſt, into nothing; is not ſo great a diſparagement, as that God ſhould become man: and yet it is not finiſhed; it is but begun. But what man? If, as the abſolute Monarch of the world, he had commanded the vaſſalage of all Emperours, and D Princes, and had trod on nothing but Crownes and Scepters, and the necks of Kings, and bidden all the Potentates of the earth to attend his traine; this had carried ſome port with it; ſuitable to the heroicall Majeſty of Gods Sonne. No ſuch matter: here is neither Forme nor Beautie; unleſſe perhaps (μορφὴν δούλου) the forme of a ſervant: you have made me to ſerve with your ſinnes. Behold, he is a man to God; a ſervant to man; and, be it ſpoken with holy reverence, a grudge to his ſervants. He is deſpiſed and rejected of men; yea (as himſelfe, of himſelfe) a worme, and no man, the ſhame of men, and contempt of the people. Who is the King of glory? the Lord of Hoaſts, he is the King of glorie. Set theſe two together; the King of glorie; the ſhame of men: the more honour, the more abaſement. Looke back to his Cradle: there you find him rejected of the Bethlemites; borne and laid, alas, how homely, how unworthily; ſought for by Herod, exiled to Ægypt, obſcurely brought up in the Cottage of a E poore Foſter-Father, tranſported and tempted by Sathan, derided of his kindred, blaſphemouſly traduced by the Jewes, pinched with hunger, reſtleſſe, harbourleſſe, ſorrowfull, perſecuted by the Elders and Phariſes, ſold by his owne ſervant, apprehended, arraigned, ſcourged, condemned, and yet it is not finiſhed. Let us, with that Diſciple, follow him afar off; and paſſing over all his contemptuous uſage in the way ſee him brought to his Croſſe. Still the further we looke, the more wonder: every thing addes to this ignominie of ſuffering, and triumph of over-comming. Where was it? not in a corner, as Paul ſaith to Feſtus, but in Jeruſalem, the eye, the heart of the world. Obſcurity abateth ſhame: publique notice heightens it: Before all Iſrael

ἐν γονίᾳ. Act. 26. 27.

and

and before this Sunne, ſaith God to David, when hee would throughly ſhame him: In Jeruſalem, which he had honoured with his preſence, taught with his preachings, aſtoniſht with his miracles, bewayled with his teares; O Ieruſalem, Ieruſalem, how oft would I, and thou wouldſt not: O yet, if in this thy day. Cruelty and unkindneſſe, after good deſert, afflict ſo much more, as our merit hath beene greater. Whereabouts? without the gates: in Calvarie, among the ſtinking bones of execrable Malefactors. Before, the glory of the place bred ſhame; now the vileneſſe of it. When? but in the Paſſeover; a time of greateſt frequence, and concourſe of all Jewes and Proſelytes: An holy time: when they ſhould receive the figure, they reject the ſubſtance: when they ſhould kill and eat the Sacramentall Lambe, in faith, in thankfulneſſe, they kill the Lambe of God, our true Paſſeover, in crueltie and contempt. With whom? The qualitie of our company either increaſes or leſſens ſhame. In the midſt of theeves (ſaith one) as the Prince of theeves: there was no guile in his mouth, much leſſe in his hands: yet behold he that thought it no robberie to be equall with God, is made equall to robbers and murderers; yea ſuperiour in evill. What ſuffered he? As all lifes are not alike pleaſant, ſo all deaths are not equally fearefull. There is not more difference betwixt ſome life and death, than betwixt one death and another. See the Apoſtles gradation: He was made obedient to the death, even the death of the Croſſe. The Croſſe, a lingring, tormenting, ignominious death. The Jewes had foure kinds of death for malefactors; the towell, the ſword, fire, ſtones; each of theſe above other in extremitie. Strangling with the towell, they accounted eaſieſt: the ſword worſe than the towell; the fire worſe than the ſword: ſtoning worſe than the fire: but this Roman death was worſt of all. Curſed is every one that hangeth on a Tree. Yet (as Ierome well) he is not therefore accurſed, becauſe he hangeth; but therefore he hangeth, becauſe he is accurſed. He was made (κατάρα) a Curſe for us. The curſe was more than the ſhame: yet the ſhame is unſpeakable; and yet not more than the paine. Yet all that die the ſame death, are not equally miſerable: the very theeves fared better in their death than he. I heare of no irriſion, no inſcription, no taunts, no inſultation on them: they had nothing but paine to encounter, he paine and ſcorne. An ingenuous and noble Nature can worſe brooke this than the other; any thing rather than diſdainfulneſſe and deriſion: eſpecially, from a baſe enemie. I remember that learned father begins Iſraels affliction, with Iſmaels perſecuting laughter. The Jewes, the Souldiers, yea, the very Theeves flouted him, and triumpht over his miſery; his blood cannot ſatisfie them, without his reproch. Which of his ſenſes now was not a window to let in ſorrow? his eies ſaw the teares of his Mother and friends, the unthankfull demeanure of Mankind, the cruell deſpight of his enemies: his eares heard the revilings and blaſphemies of the multitude; and (whether the place were noyſome to his ſent) his touch felt the nailes, his taſte the gall. Looke up, O all ye beholders, looke upon this precious body, and ſee what part yee can find free. That head which is adored and trembled at by the Angelicall ſpirits, is all raked and harrowed with thornes: that face, of whom it is ſaid; Thou art fairer than the children of men, is all beſmeared with the filthy ſpittle of the Jewes, and furrowed with his teares; thoſe eyes, cleerer than the Sun, are darkned with the ſhadow of death; thoſe eares that heare the heavenly conſorts of Angels, now are filled with the curſed ſpeakings and ſcoffs of wretched men: thoſe lips that ſpake as never man ſpake, that command the ſpirits both of light and darkneſſe, are ſcornfully wet with vineger and gall: thoſe feet that trample on all the powers of hell (his enemies are made his foot ſtoole) are now nailed to the footſtoole of the Croſſe: thoſe hands that freely ſway the ſcepter of the heavens, now carry the reed of reproach, and are nailed to the tree of reproach: that whole body, which was conceived by the Holy-Ghoſt, was all ſcourged, wounded, mangled: this is the out-ſide of his ſufferings. Was his heart free? Oh no: the inner part or ſoule of this paine, which was unſeene, is as far beyond theſe outward and ſenſible, as the ſoule is beyond the body; Gods wrath beyond the malice of men: theſe were but love-tricks to what his ſoule endured, O all ye that paſſe by the way, behold and ſee, if there be any ſorrow like to my ſorrow: Alas, Lord, what can wee ſee of thy ſorrowes? we cannot conceive ſo much as the hainouſneſſe and deſert of one of thoſe ſinnes which thou bareſt: we can no more ſee thy paine, than we could undergoe dergoe it; onely this we ſee, that what the infinite ſinnes, of almoſt infinite men, committed againſt an infinite Majeſty, deſerved in infinite continuance, all this thou in the ſhort time of thy Paſſion haſt ſuſtained. We may behold and ſee; but all the glorious ſpirits in Heaven cannot looke into the depth of this ſuffering. Doe but looke yet a little into the paſſions of this his Paſſion: for, by the manner of his ſufferings, we ſhall beſt ſee, what he ſuffered. Wiſe and reſolute men doe not complaine of a little; holy Martyrs have beene racked, and would not be looſed; what ſhall we ſay if the author of their ſtrength, God and Man, bewray paſſions? what would have overwhelmed men, would not have made him ſhrinke; and what made him complaine, could never have beene ſuſtained by men. What ſhall we then think, if he were affrighted with terrours, perplexed with ſorrowes, and diſtracted with both theſe; And lo, he was all theſe: for, firſt, here was an amazed feare; for millions of men to deſpaire was not ſo much as for him to feare: and yet it was no ſlight feare: he began (ἐκθαμβεῖσθαι) to be aſtoniſhed with terror, which in the dayes of his fleſh, offered up prayers and ſupplications, with ſtrong cries and teares, to him that was able to helpe him, and was heard in that he feared. Never was man ſo afraid of the torments of Hell, as Chriſt (ſtanding in our roome) of his Fathers wrath. Feare is ſtill ſutable to apprehenſion. Never man could ſo perfectly apprehend this cauſe of feare; he felt the chaſtiſements of our peace, yea the curſe of our ſinnes; and therefore might well ſay with David, I ſuffer thy terrors with a troubled mind; yea with Iob; The arrowes of God are in me, and the terrors of God fight againſt me. With feare, there was a dejecting ſorrow, (ἀδημονία) My ſoule is on all ſides heavy to the death: his ſtrong cries, his many teares, are witneſſes of this Paſſion: he had formerly ſhed teares of pittie, and teares of love, but now of anguiſh: he had before ſent forth cries of mercy; never of complaint till now: when the Sonne of God weepes and cries, what ſhall we ſay or thinke? yet further, betwixt both theſe and his love what a conflict was there? It is not amiſſe diſtinguiſhed, that he was alwayes in Agone; but now in ἀγωνία, in a ſtrugling paſſion of mixed griefe. Behold, this field was not without ſweat and bloud; yea, a ſweat of bloud. Oh what man or Angell can conceive the taking of that heart, that without all outward violence, meerely, out of the extremitie of his owne Paſſion, bled (through the fleſh and skinne,) not ſome faint deaw, but ſolid drops of blood? No thornes, no nailes fetcht blood from him, with ſo much paine as his owne thoughts: hee ſaw the fierce wrath of his Father, and therefore feared: he ſaw the heavy burden of our ſins to be undertaken; and thereupon, beſides feare, juſtly grieved: he ſaw the neceſſitie of our eternall damnation, if he ſuffered not: if he did ſuffer, of our redemption; and therefore his love incountred both griefe and feare. In it ſelfe, he would not drinke of that cup. In reſpect of our good, and his decree, he would and did; and while he thus ſtriveth, hee ſweats and bleeds. There was never ſuch a combat, never ſuch a bloodſhed, and yet it is not finiſhed; I dare not ſay with ſome Schoolemen, that the ſorrow of his Paſſion, was not ſo great as the ſorrow of his compaſſion: yet that was ſurely exceeding great. To ſee the ungratious careleſneſſe of mankinde, the ſlender fruit of his ſufferings, the ſorrowes of his Mother, Diſciples, friends; to fore-ſee, from the watch-tower of his Croſſe, the future temptations of his children, deſolations of his Church; all theſe muſt needs ſtrike deepe into a tender heart. Theſe he ſtill ſees and pitties, but without paſſion; then he ſuffered in ſeeing them.

Can we yet ſay any more? Lo, all theſe ſufferings are aggravated by his fulneſſe of knowledge, and want of comfort: for, he did not ſhut his eies, as one ſaith, when he drunke this cup: he ſaw how dreggiſh, and knew how bitter it was. Sodaine evills affliict, if not leſſe, ſhorter. He fore-ſaw, and fore-ſaid, everie particular he ſhould ſuffer: ſo long as he fore-ſaw, he ſuffered: the expectation of evill, is not leſſe than the ſenſe: to looke long for good, is a puniſhment; but for evill, is a torment. No paſſion workes upon an unknowen object: as no love, ſo no feare is of what we know not. Hence men feare not Hell, becauſe they fore-ſee it not: if we could ſee that pit open before we come at it, it would make us tremble at our ſins, and our knees to knocke together, as Baltazars; and perhaps without faith, to runne madde at the horror of judgement.

judgement. He ſaw the burden of all particular ſinnes to be laid upon him; every dramme of his Fathers wrath was meaſured out to him, ere he toucht this potion; this cup was full, and he knew that it muſt be wring'd, not a drop left: it muſt be finiſhed. Oh yet, if as he fore-ſaw all his ſorrowes, ſo he could have ſeene ſome mixture of refreſhing. But I found none to comfort me, no, none to pity me. And yet it is a poore comfort that ariſes from pity. Even ſo, O Lord, thou treadeſt this wine-preſſe alone; none to accompany, none to aſſiſt thee. I Remember Ruffinus in his Eccleſiaſticall ſtorie reports, that one Theodorus a Martyr, told him, that when he was hanging ten houres upon the racke for religion under Iulians perſecution, his joynts diſtended and diſtorted, his body exquiſitely tortured with change of executioners; ſo as never age (ſaith he) could remember the like: he felt no paine at all, but continued indeed all the while in the ſight of all men ſinging and ſmiling: for there ſtood a comely young man by him on his jibbet (an Angell rather, in forme of a man) which with a cleane towell, ſtill wip't off his ſweat, and powred coole water upon his racked limbs; wherewith he was ſo refreſhed, that it grieved him to be let downe. Even the greateſt torments are eaſie, when they have anſwerable comforts: but a wounded and comfortleſſe ſpirit, who can beare? If yet but the ſame meſſenger of God might have attended his Croſſe, that appeared in his agony; and might have given eaſe to their Lord, as he did to his ſervant. And yet, what can the Angels helpe, where God will ſmite? Againſt the violence of men, againſt the furie of Satan, they have prevailed in the cauſe of God, for men: they dare not, they cannot comfort, where God will afflict. When our Saviour had beene wreſtling with Satan in the End of his Lent, then they appeared to him, and ſerved; but now, while about the ſame time, he is wreſtling with the wrath of his Father for us, not an Angell dare be ſeene to looke out of the windowes of heaven to releeve him. For men, much leſſe could they, if they would; but what did they? Miſerable comforters are ye all: the Souldiers, they ſtript him, ſcorned him with his purple crowne, reed, ſpat on him, ſmote him; the paſſengers, they reviled him; and inſulting, wagging their heads and hands at him, Hey thou that deſtroyedſt the Temple, come downe &c. The Elders and Scribes; alas, they have bought his blood, ſuborned witneſſes, incenſed Pilate, preferred Barrabas, undertooke the guilt of his death, cried out, Crucifie, Crucifie. He thou that ſavedſt others. His Diſciples: alas, they forſooke him, one of them forſweares him, another runs away naked, rather than he will ſtay and confeſſe him. His mother and other friends, they looke on indeed, and ſorrow with him; but to his diſcomfort. Where the griefe is extreme, and reſpects neere, partnerſhip doth but increaſe ſorrow. Paul chides this love: what doe you weeping & breaking my heart? The teares of thoſe we love, doe either ſlacken our hearts, or wound them. Who then ſhall comfort him? himſelfe? Sometimes our owne thoughts find a way to ſuccour us, unknowne to others; no, not himſelfe. Doubtleſſe (as Aquinas) the influence of the higher part of the ſoule, was reſtrained from the aid of the inferiour: My ſoule is filled with evills, Pſalm. 87.4. Who then? his Father? here, here was his hope: If the Lord had not holpen me, my ſoule had almoſt dwelt in ſilence: I and my Father are one. But now (alas) hee, even he, delivers him into the hands of his enemies; when he hath done, turnes his backe upon him as a ſtranger; yea, he woundeth him as an enemie. The Lord would breake him, Eſay 53. 10. yet any thing is light to the ſoule whiles the comforts of God ſuſtaine it: who can diſmay, where God will releeve? But here, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? What a word was here, to come from the mouth of the Sonne of God? My diſciples are men, weake and fearefull; no marvell if they forſake me. The Jewes are themſelves, cruell and obſtinate. Men are men, graceleſſe and unthankfull. Devils are, according to their nature, ſpightfull and malicious. All theſe doe but their kinde; and let them doe it: but thou, O Father, thou that haſt ſaid, This is my welbeloved Sonne, in whom I am well pleaſed: thou of whom I have ſaid, It is my Father that glorifies me; what? forſaken me? Not onely brought me to this ſhame, ſmitten me, unregarded me; but, as it were, forgotten, yea, forſaken me? What, even me, my Father? How many of thy conſtant ſervants have ſuffered heavy things: yet in the multitudes of the ſorrowes of their hearts, thy preſence and comforts have refreſhed their ſoules. Haſt thou releeved them, and doſt

thou

A thou forſake me? me, thine onely, deare, naturall, eternall Sonne? O ye heavens and earth, how could you ſtand, whiles the Maker of you thus complained? Ye ſtood: but partaking after a ſort of his Paſſion: the earth trembled and ſhooke, her rocks tore, her graves opened, the heavens withdrew their light, as not daring to behold this ſad and fearefull ſpectacle.

Oh deare Chriſtians, how ſhould theſe earthen and rockie hearts of ours ſhake, and rend in peeces at this Meditation? how ſhould our faces be covered with darkneſſe, and our joy be turned into heavineſſe? All theſe voyces, & teares, and ſweats, & pangs, are for us; yea from us. Shall the Sonne of God thus ſmart for our ſinnes, yea with our ſins, and ſhall not we grieve for our owne? ſhall he weepe to us in this Market-place, and ſhall not we mourne? Nay, ſhall he ſweat and bleed for us, and ſhall not we weepe for our ſelves? Shall he thus lamentably ſhrieke out, under his Fathers wrath, and ſhall
B not we tremble? Shall the heavens and earth ſuffer with him, and we ſuffer nothing? I call you not to a weake and idle pitie of our glorious Saviour: to what purpoſe? His injury was our glory. No, no; Ye daughters of Ieruſalem, weepe not for me, but weepe for your ſelves: for our ſinnes, that have done this; not for his ſorrow that ſuffered it: not for his pangs, that were; but for our owne, that ſhould have beene, and (if we repent not) ſhall be. Oh how grievous, how deadly are our ſins, that coſt the Sonne of God (beſides blood) ſo much torment? how far are our ſoules gone, that could not be ranſomed with an eaſier price? that, that took ſo much of this infinite Redeemer of men, God and man, how can it chuſe but ſwallow up, and confound thy ſoule, which is but finite and ſinfull? If thy ſoule had beene in his ſoules ſtead, what had become of it? it ſhall be, if his were not in ſtead of thine. This weight that lies thus heavy on the Son of God, and wrung from him theſe teares, ſweat, blood, and theſe unconceiveable
C groanes of his afflicted ſpirit, how ſhould it chuſe but preſſe downe thy ſoule to the bottome of hell? and ſo it will doe: if he have not ſuffered it for thee, thou muſt and ſhalt ſuffer it for thy ſelfe. Goe now thou lewd man, and make thy ſelfe merry with thy ſins; laugh at the uncleanneſſes, or bloodineſſe of thy youth: thou little knoweſt the price of a ſin; thy ſoule ſhall doe, thy Saviour did, when he cried out, to the amazement of Angels, and horror of men; My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? But now no more of this; It is finiſhed: the greater conflict, the more happy victory. Well doth he find and feele of his Father, what his type ſaid before, He will not chide alwaies, nor keepe his anger for ever. It is fearefull; but in him, ſhort: eternall to ſinners; ſhort to his Son, in whom the God-head dwelt bodily. Behold; this ſtorme, wherewith all the powers of the world were ſhaken, is now over. The Elders, Phariſes, Judas, the Souldiers, Prieſts, witneſſes, Judges, theeves, executioners, devils, have all tyred themſelves
D in vaine, with their owne malice; & he triumphs over them all, upon the throne of his Croſſe: his enemies are vanquiſht, his Father ſatisfied, his ſoule with this word at reſt and glory; It is finiſhed. Now there is no more betraying, agonies, arraignements, ſcourgings, ſcoffing, crucifying, conflicts, terrors; all is finiſhed. Alas, beloved, and will we not let the Sonne of God be at reſt? doe we now againe goe about to fetch him out of his glory, to ſcorne and crucifie him? I feare to ſay it: Gods ſpirit dare and doth; They crucifie againe to themſelves the Sonne of God, and make a mocke of him. To themſelves not in himſelfe: that they cannot, it is no thank to them; they would doe it. See and conſider: the notoriouſly-ſinfull converſations of thoſe, that ſhould be Chriſtians, offer violence unto our glorified Saviour, they ſtretch their hand to heaven, and pull him downe from his throne, to his Croſſe: they teare him with thornes, pierce him with nailes, load him with reproches. Thou hateſt the Jewes, ſpitteſt at the name of Iudas, raileſt on Pi- E late, condemneſt the cruell butchers of Chriſt; yet, thou canſt blaſpheme, and ſweare him quite over, curſe, ſwagger, lye, oppreſſe, boyle with luſt, ſcoffe, ryot, and liveſt like a debauched man; yea like an humane Beaſt; yea like an uncleane Devill. Cry Hoſanna as long as thou wilt; thou art a Pilate, a Iew, a Iudas, an Executioner of the Lord of life; and ſo much greater ſhall thy judgement be, by how much thy light and his glory is more. Oh, beloved, is it not enough that he died once for us? Were thoſe paines ſo light, that we ſhould every day redouble them? Is this the entertainement that ſo gracious a Saviour hath deſerved of us by dying? Is this the recompence of that infinite love of his, that thou ſhouldeſt thus cruelly vex and wound him with thy ſinnes? Every of our ſinnes is a thorne, and nayle, and ſpeare to him: while thou powreſt downe thy drunken carowſes, thou giveſt thy Saviour a potion of gall; while thou deſpiſeſt his poore ſervants, thou ſpitteſt on his face: while thou putteſt on thy proud dreſſes, and lifteſt up thy vaine heart with high conceits, thou ſetteſt a Crowne of thornes on his head: while thou wringeſt and oppreſſeſt his poore children, thou whippeſt him, and draweſt blood of his hands and feet. Thou hypocrite; how dareſt thou offer to receive the Sacrament of God, with that hand, which is thus imbrued with the blood of him whom thou receiveſt? In every Ordinary thy profane tongue walks, in the diſgrace of the religious and conſcionable. Thou makeſt no ſcruple of thine owne ſins, and ſcorneſt thoſe that doe: Not to be wicked, is crime enough. Heare him that ſaith, Saul, Saul, why perſecuteſt thou me? Saul ſtrikes at Damaſcus; Chriſt ſuffers in heaven. Thou ſtrikeſt; Chriſt Jeſus ſmarteth, and will revenge. Theſe are the [ὑστερήματα] afterings of Chriſts ſufferings: In himſelfe it is finiſhed; in his members it is not, till the world be finiſhed. We muſt toyle, and groane, and bleed, that we may reigne: if he had not done ſo, It had not beene finiſhed. This is our warfare; this is the religion of our ſorrow & death. Now are we ſet upon the ſandie pavement of our Theatre, and are matched with all ſorts of evils; evill men, evill ſpirits, evill accidents; and (which is worſt) our owne evill hearts; temptations, croſſes, perſecutions, ſickneſſes, wants, infamies, death; all theſe muſt in our courſes, be encountred by the Law of our profeſſion. What ſhould we doe but ſtrive and ſuffer, as our Generall hath done, that we may reigne as he doth, and once triumph in our Conſummatum eſt? God and his Angells ſit upon the ſcaffolds of heaven, and behold us: our Crowne is ready: our day of deliverance ſhall come; yea our redemption is neere, when all teares ſhall be wip't from our eies; and we that have ſowne in teares ſhall reape in joy. In the meane time, let us poſſeſſe our ſoules not in patience only, but in comfort: let us adore and magnifie our Saviour in his ſufferings, and imitate him in our owne: our ſorrowes ſhall have an end, our joyes ſhall not: our paines ſhall ſoone be finiſhed; our glory ſhall be finiſhed, but never ended.

Thus his ſufferings are finiſhed; now together with them, mans ſalvation. Who knowes not, that man had made himſelfe a deepe debtor, a bankrupt, an out-law to God? Our ſins are our debts; and by ſins, death. Now, in this word and act, our ſins are diſcharged, death endured, and therefore we cleared: the debt is paid, the ſcore is croſſed, the Creditor ſatisfied, the Debtors acquitted, & ſince there was no other quarrell, ſaved: we are all ſicke, and that mortally: ſinne is the diſeaſe of the ſoule: Quot vitia, tot febres, ſaith Chryſoſtome; ſo many ſinnes, ſo many fevers, and thoſe peſtilent. What wonder is it, that we have ſo much plague, while we have ſo much ſin? Our Saviour is the Ppyſitian: The whole need not the Phyſitian, but the ſicke: wherein? He healeth all our infirmities: he healeth them after a miraculous manner; not by giving us receits, but by taking our receits for us. A wonderfull Phyſitian; a wonderfull courſe of cure: One while he would cure us by abſtinence; our ſuperfluity, by his forty dayes emptineſſe, according to that old rule; Hunger cures the diſeaſes of gluttony: Another while, by exerciſe: He went up and downe from City to City, and in the day was preaching in the Temple; in the night praying in the Mount. Then, by dyet; Take, eat, this is my body: and, Let this cup paſſe. After that yet, by ſweat, ſuch a ſweat as never was, a bloody one: yet more, by inciſion; they pierced his hands, feet, ſide: and yet againe by potion; a bitter potion, of vineger and gall. And laſtly, which is both the ſtrangeſt and ſtrongeſt receit of all, by dying: which dyed for us, that whether we wake or ſleepe, we ſhould live together with him. We need no more, we can goe no further; there can be no more phyſicke of this kind: there are cordials after theſe, of his Reſurrection and Aſcenſion; no more penall receits. By this blood we have redemption, Epheſ. 1.7. Juſtification, Rom. 3.24. Reconciliation, Coloſ. 1.20. Sanctification, 1 Pet. 1.2. Entrance into glory, Heb. 10.19. Is it not now finiſhed? Woe were us if he had left but one mite of ſatisfaction upon our ſcore, to be diſcharged by our ſoules: and woe be to them that derogate from Chriſt, that they may charge themſelves; that botch up theſe all-ſufficiently meritorious ſufferings of Chriſt, as imperfect, with the ſuper-fluities of fleſh & blood. Maledictus homo qui ſpem ponit in homine. We may not with patience ſee Chriſt wrong'd

1 Theſſ. 5. 10.

A wrong'd by his falſe friends; As that heroicall Luther ſaid in the like; Curſed be that ſilence that here forbeareth. To be ſhort, here be two injuries intolerable; both give Chriſt the lie upon his Croſſe: It is finiſhed. No: ſomewhat remaines: the fault is diſcharged, not the puniſhment. Of puniſhments, the eternall is quit, not the temporall. It is finiſhed by Chriſt: No, there wants yet much; the ſatisfaction of Saints applied by this Vicar; adde mens ſufferings unto Chriſts; then the treaſure is full; till then, It is not finiſhed.

Maledictum filentium quod hic connivet.

Two qualities ſtrive for the firſt place in theſe two opinions; impiety and abſurditie: I know not whether to preferre. For impietie; here is God taxed of injuſtice, unmercifulneſſe, inſufficiencie, falſhood. Of injuſtice, that hee forgives ſinne, and yet puniſhes for that which he hath forgiven: unmercifulneſſe, that he forgives not while he forgives, but doth it by halves: inſufficiencie, that his ranſome muſt be ſupplied by men: falſhood, in that he ſaith, It is finiſhed, when it is not. For abſurditie; how B groſſe and monſtrous are theſe poſitions? that at once the ſame ſinne ſhould be remitted and retained; that there ſhould be a puniſhment, where there is no fault; that what could ſtrike off our eternall puniſhment, did not wipe off the temporall; that hee which paid our pounds, ſticks at our farthings; that God will retaine what man may diſcharge; that it is, and it is not finiſhed.

If there be any opinions, whoſe mention confutes them, theſe are they. None can be more vaine, none had more need of ſolidity: for this prop beares up, alone, the weight of all thoſe millions of indulgences, which Rome creates and ſels to the world. That Strumpet would well-neere goe naked, if this were not. Theſe ſpirituall Treaſures fetcht in the temporall: which yet our reverend & learned Fulk, juſtly cals, a moſt blaſphemous & beggerly principle: It brings in whole cheſts, yea mines of gold, like the Popes Indies; & hath not ſo much as a ragge of proofe to cover it, whether of Antiquity, of Reaſon, of Scripture. Not of Antiquity: for theſe Jubily proclamations began but about three hundred yeares agoe. Not of Reaſon: how ſhould one meere man pay for another, diſpenſe with another, to another, by another? Not of Scripture, which hath flatly ſaid, The blood of Ieſus Chriſt his Sonne, purgeth us from all ſinne: and yet I remember that acute Sadeel hath taught me, that this practice is according to Scripture: what Scripture? He caſt the money-changers out of the Temple, and ſaid; Yee have made my houſe a denne of theeves. Which alſo Ioachim, their Prophetical Abbot, well applies to this purpoſe. Some modeſt Doctors of Lovan would faine have minced this Antichriſtian blaſphemie; who began to teach, that the paſſions of the Saints are not ſo by Indulgences applied, that they become true ſatisfactions; but that they onely ſerve to move God, by the ſight of them to apply unto us Chriſts ſatisfaction. But theſe mealemouth'd Divines were ſoone charm'd; foure ſeverall Popes (as their Cardinall confeſſeth) fel upon the neck of them & their opinion: Leo the tenth, Pius the fift, Gregory the D thirteenth, and Clemens the ſixt: and with their furious Buls bellow out threats againſt them, and toſſe them in the aire for Hereticks, & teach them upon paine of a curſe, to ſpeak home with Bellarmine, Paſſionibus ſanctorum expiari delicta, & ſtraight, Applicari nobis ſanctorum paſſiones ad redimendas pœnas, quas pro peccatis Deo debemus: That by the ſufferings of Saints, our ſins are expiated; and that, by them applied, we are redeemed from thoſe puniſhments, which we yet owe to God. Blaſphemy, worthy the tearing of garments: How is it finiſhed by Chriſt, if men muſt ſupply? Oh bleſſed Saviour, was every drop of thy blood enough to redeem a world, and doe we yet need the help of men? How art thou a perfect Saviour, if our brethren alſo muſt be our redeemers? Oh ye bleſſed Saints, how would you abhorre this ſacrilegious glory? & with thoſe holy Apoſtles, yea, that glorious Angell, ſay, Vide ne feceris, & with thoſe wiſe Virgins; leſt E there will not be enough for us and you, goe to them that ſell, and buy for your ſelves. For us, we envy not their multitude: let them have as many Saviours as Saints, and as many Saints as men; wee know with Ambroſe, Chriſti paſſio adjutore non eguit; Chriſts paſſion needs no helper: and therefore, with that worthy Martyr, dare ſay, None but Chriſt, none but Chriſt. Let our ſoules die, if he cannot ſave them; let them not feare their death or torment, if he have finiſhed. Heare this thou languiſhing and afflicted ſoule: There is not one of thy ſins but it is paid for; not one of thy debts in the ſcroll of God, but it is croſſed; not one farthing of all thine infinite ranſome is unpaid. Alas, thy ſins (thou ſayeſt) are ever before thee, and Gods indignation goes ſtill over thee, and thou goeſt mourning all the day long, & with that pattern of diſtreſſe, cryeſt out in the bitterneſſe of thy ſoule, I have ſinned, what ſhall I doe to thee, O thou preſerver of men? What ſhouldſt thou doe? Turne & beleeve. Now thou art ſtung in thy conſcience with this firy Serpent, look up with the eies of faith to this brazen Serpent, Chriſt Jeſus, and be healed. Behold, his head is humbly bowed downe in a gracious reſpect to thee; his armes are ſtretched out lovingly to embrace thee; yea, his precious ſide is open to receive thee, & his tongue interprets all theſe to thee for thine endleſſe comfort; It is finiſhed. There is no more accuſation, judgement, death, hell for thee: all theſe are no more to thee than if they were not. Who ſhall condemne? It is Chriſt which is dead. I know how ready every man is to reach forth his hand, to this dole of grace, and how angry to be beaten from this doore of mercy. We are all eaſily perſwaded to hope well, becauſe we love our ſelves well: Which of all us in this great congregation, takes exceptions to himſelfe, and thinks, I know there is no want in my Saviour; there is want in me. He hath finiſhed, but I beleeve not, I repent not. Every preſumptuous & hard heart ſo catches at Chriſt, as if he had finiſht for all, as if he had broken downe the gates of hell, and looſed the bands of death, and had made forgiveneſſe as common as life: Proſperitas ſtultorum perdit eos, ſaith wiſe Salomon; Eaſe ſlayeth the fooliſh, and the proſperity of fooles deſtroyeth them; yea, the confidence of proſperity. Thou ſayeſt, God is mercifull, thy Saviour bounteous, his paſſion abſolute: all theſe, and yet thou maieſt be condemned. Mercifull, not unjuſt; bountifull, not laviſh; abſolutely ſufficient for all, not effectuall to all. Whatſoever God is, what art thou? Here is the doubt: Thou ſayeſt well; Chriſt is the good Shepheard. Wherein? He gives his life: but for whom? for his ſheepe. What is this to thee? While thou art ſecure, prophane, impenitent, thou art a Wolfe or a Goat: My ſheepe heare my voyce: what is his voice, but his precepts? Where is thine obedience to his commandements? If thou wilt not heare his Law, never hearken to his Goſpell. Here is no more mercy for thee, than if there were no Saviour. He hath finiſhed, for thoſe in whom he hath begun: if thou have no beginnings of grace as yet, hope not for ever finiſhing of ſalvation: Come to me all yee that are heavy laden, ſaith Chriſt: thou ſhalt get nothing, if thou come when he calls thee not. Thou art not called, and canſt not be refreſhed, unleſſe thou be laden, not with ſin (this alone keepes thee away from God) but with conſcience of ſin: A broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not deſpiſe. Is thy heart wounded with thy ſin? doth griefe and hatred ſtrive within thee, whether ſhall be more? Are the deſires of thy ſoule with God? Doeſt thou long for holineſſe, complaine of thy imperfections, ſtruggle againſt thy corruptions? Thou art the man, feare not, It is finiſhed. That Law which thou wouldeſt have kept, and couldeſt not, thy Saviour could, and did keep for thee: that ſalvation which thou couldeſt never work out alone (alas, poore impotent creatures, what can we doe towards heaven without him, which cannot move on earth but in him?) he alone for thee hath finiſhed. Look up therefore boldly to the throne of God, and upon the truth of thy repentance and faith, know that there is no quarrell againſt thee in heaven, nothing but peace and joy. All is finiſhed. He would be ſpitted on, that he might waſh thee; he would be covered with ſcornfull robes, that thy ſins might be covered; he would be whipped, that thy ſoule might not be ſcourged eternally; he would thirſt, that thy ſoule might be ſatisfied; he would beare all his Fathers wrath, that thou mighteſt beare none; he would yeeld to death, that thou mighteſt never taſte of it; he would be in ſenſe for a time as forſaken of his Father, that thou mighteſt be received for ever.

Now bid thy ſoule returne to her reſt, and enjoyne it Davids taske: Praiſe the Lord O my ſoule; and, What ſhall I render to the Lord for all his benefits? I will take the cup of ſalvation, and call upon the name of the Lord. And, as raviſht from thy ſelfe with the ſweet apprehenſion of his mercy, call all the other creatures to the fellowſhip of this joy with that divine Eſay: Rejoyce O yee heavens, for the Lord hath done it: ſhout ye lower parts of the earth, breſt forth into praiſes ye mountaines: for the Lord hath redeemed Iacob, and will be glorified in Iſrael. And even now begin that heavenly Song, which ſhall never end with thoſe glorified Saints: Praiſe, and honour, and glory, and power, be to Him that ſitteth upon the Throne, and to the Lamb for evermore.

Thus

Thus our ſpeech of Chriſts laſt word is finiſhed. His laſt act accompanied his words: our ſpeech muſt follow it. Let it not want your devout and carefull attention; He bowed, and gave up the ghoſt.

The Croſſe was a ſlow death, and had more paine than ſpeed: whence a ſecond violence muſt diſpatch the crucified: their bones muſt be broken, that their hearts might break. Our Saviour ſtayes not deaths leiſure, but willingly and couragiouſly meets him in the way; and like a Champion that ſcornes to be overcome, yea, knowes he cannot be, yeeldeth in the middeſt of his ſtrength, that he might by dying, vanquiſh death. He bowed and gave up: Not bowing, becauſe he had given up, but becauſe he would. Hee cried with a loud voice, ſaith Matthew. Nature was ſtrong, hee might have lived; but he gave up the ghoſt: and would die, to ſhew himſelfe Lord of life and death. Oh wonderous example! he that gave life to his enemies, gave up his owne: he gives them to live, that perſecute and hate him; and himſelfe will die the whiles for thoſe that hate him. Hee bowed and gave up: not they; they might crowne his head, they could not bow it: they might vex his ſpirit, not take it away: they could not doe that without leave; this they could not doe, becauſe they had no leave. He alone would bow his head, and give up his ghoſt: I have power to lay downe my life. Man gave him not his life; man could not bereave it. No man takes it from mee. Alas, who could? The High-Prieſts forces, when they came againſt him armed, he ſaid but, I am he, they flee and fall backward. How eaſie a breath diſperſt his enemies? whom hee might as eaſily have bidden the earth, yea, hell to ſwallow, or fire from heaven to devour. Who commanded the Devils and they obeyed, could not have beene attached by men: he muſt give not only leave, but power to apprehend himſelfe, elſe they had not lived to take him: he is laid hold of; Peter fights: Put up, ſaith Chriſt; Thinkeſt thou that I cannot pray to my Father, and hee will give mee more than twelve Legions of Angels? What an Armie were here? more than threeſcore and twelve thouſand Angels, and every Angell able to ſubdue a world of men: he could, but would not be reſcued; he is led by his owne power, not by his enemies; and ſtands now before Pilate, like the ſcorne of men; crowned, robbed, ſcourged, with an Ecce homo; Yet thou couldſt have no power againſt me, unleſſe it were given thee from above,

Behold, he himſelfe muſt give Pilate power againſt himſelfe, elſe he could not be condemned: he will be condemned, lifted up, nailed; yet no death without himſelfe. Hee ſhall give his ſoule an offering for ſinne, Eſay 53. 10. No action, that ſavours of conſtraint, can be meritorious: he would deſerves, therefore he would ſuffer and dye. He bowed his head, and gave up the ghoſt. O gracious and bountifull Saviour: hee might have kept his ſoule within his teeth, in ſpight of all the world; the weakneſſe of God is ſtronger than men: and if he had but ſpoken the word the heavens and earth ſhould have vaniſht away before him: but he would not. Behold, when he ſaw, that impotent man could not take away his ſoule, he gave it up, and would die, that we might live. See here a Saviour, that can contemne his owne life for ours; and cares not to be diſſolved in himſelfe, that we might be united to his Father. Skin for skin, ſaith the Devill, and all that he hath a man will give for his life. Loe here, to prove Satan a lyer, Skinne and life and all hath Chriſt Jeſus given for us. Wee are beſotted with the earth, and make baſe ſhifts to live; one with a maimed body, another with a perjured ſoule, a third with a rotten name: and how many had rather neglect their ſoule than their life, and will rather renounce and curſe God, than die? It is a ſhame to tell; Many of us Chriſtians dote upon life, and tremble at death; and ſhew our ſelves fooles in our exceſſe of love, cowards in our feare. Peter denies Chriſt thrice, and forſweares him; Marcellinus twice caſts graines of incenſe into the Idols fire; Ecebolius turnes thrice; Spira revolts and deſpaires: Oh let me live, ſaith the fearfull ſoule. Whether doeſt thou reſerve thy ſelfe, thou weake and timorous creature? or what wouldeſt thou doe with thy ſelfe? Thou haſt not thus learned Chriſt: he died voluntarily for thee, thou wilt not be forced to die for him: he gave up the ghoſt for thee; thou wilt not let others take it from thee for him, thou wilt not let him take it for himſelfe.

Quod emittitur. voluntarium eſt: quod amittitur neceſſarium. Ambr.

When I looke backe to the firſt Chriſtians, and compare their zealous contempt of death with our backwardneſſe; I am at once amazed and aſhamed: I ſee there even women (the feebler ſex) running with their little ones in their armes, for the preferment of Martyrdome, and ambitiouſly ſtriving for the next blow. I ſee holy and tender Virgins, chuſing rather a ſore and ſhamefull death, than honourable Eſpouſals. I heare the bleſſed Martyrs, intreating their tyrants and tormentors for the honour of dying. Ignatius, amongſt the reſt, fearing leſt the beaſts will not devoure him; and vowing the firſt violence to them, that he might be diſpatched. And what leſſe courage was there in our memorable & glorious fore-fathers of the laſt of this age? and doe we, their cold and feeble off-ſpring, looke pale at the face of a faire and naturall death; abhorre the violent, though for Chriſt? Alas, how have we gathered ruſt with our long peace? Our unwillingneſſe is from inconſideration, from diſtruſt. Looke but up to Chriſt Jeſus upon his Croſſe, and ſee him bowing his head, and breathing out his ſoule, and theſe feares ſhall vaniſh: he died, and wouldeſt thou live? he gave up the ghoſt, and wouldeſt thou keep it? whom wouldeſt thou follow, if not thy Redeemer? If thou die not, if not willingly, thou goeſt contrary to him, and ſhalt never meet him. Though thou ſhouldeſt every day die a death for him, thou couldeſt never requite his one death; and doeſt thou ſticke at one? Every word hath his force; both to him and thee: he died, which is Lord of life, and commander of death; thou art but a tenant of life, a ſubject of death: and yet it was not a dying, but a giving up, not of a vaniſhing & aërie breath, but of a ſpirituall ſoule, which after ſeparation, hath an entire life in it ſelfe, He gave up the ghoſt: he died, that hath both overcome, and ſanctified, and ſweetned death. What feareſt thou? He hath pull'd out the ſting and malignity of death: If thou be a Chriſtian, carry it in thy boſome, it hurts thee not. Dareſt thou not truſt thy Redeemer? If he had not died, Death had beene a Tyrant; now he is a ſlave. O death where is thy ſting? O grave where is thy victory? Yet the Spirit of God ſaith not, he died, but gave up the ghoſt. The very Heathen Poet ſaith; Hee durſt not ſay, that a good man dies. It is worth the noting (me thinks) that when S. Luke would deſcribe to us the death of Ananias and Sapphira, he ſaith (ἐξέψυξε) he expired: but when Saint Iohn would deſcribe to us the death, he ſaith, παρέδωκε τὸ πνεῦμα, He gave up the ghoſt: How? How gave he it up, and whither? So, as after a ſort he retained it: his ſoule parted from his body; his God-head was never diſtracted either from ſoule or body: this union is not in nature, but in perſon. If the natures of Chriſt could be divided, each would have his ſubſiſtence; ſo there ſhould bee more perſons. God forbid, one of the natures thereof may have a ſeparation in it ſelfe: the ſoule from the body: one nature cannot be ſeparate from other, or either nature from the perſon. If you cannot conceive, wonder: the Son of God hath wedded unto himſelfe our humanity, without all poſſibility of divorce; the body hangs on the Croſſe, the ſoule is yeelded, the God-head is eviternally united to them both; acknowledges, ſuſtaines them both. The ſoule in his agony feeles not the preſence of the God-head; the body upon the Croſſe feeles not the preſence of the ſoule. Yet as the Fathers of Chalcedon ſay truly, (ἀδιαιρέτως, ἀχωρίστως) indiviſibly, inſeparably is the God-head with both of theſe, ſtill and ever, one and the ſame perſon. The Paſſion of Chriſt (as Auguſtine) was the ſleep of his Divinity: ſo I may ſay, The death of Chriſt was the ſleep of his humanity. If he ſleepe, he ſhall doe well, ſaid that Diſciple of Lazarus. Death was too weake to diſſolve the eternall bonds of this heavenly conjunction. Let not us Chriſtians goe too much by ſenſe; we may be firmely knit to God and not feele it: thou canſt not hope to bee ſo neere thy God, as Chriſt was, united perſonally: thou canſt not feare, that God ſhould ſeeme more abſent from thee, than he did from his owne Son: yet was he ſtill one with both body and ſoule, when they were divided from themſelves; when he was abſent to ſenſe, he was preſent to faith; when abſent in viſion, yet in union one and the ſame: ſo will he be to thy ſoule, when he is at worſt. He is thine, and thou art his: if thy hold ſeeme looſened, his is not. When temptations will not let thee ſee him, he ſees thee and poſſeſſes thee; onely beleeve thou againſt ſenſe, above hope; and though he kill thee, yet truſt in him. Whither gave he it up? Himſelfe expreſſes; Father, into thy hands; And, This day ſhalt thou be with me in Paradiſe. It is juſtice to reſtore, whence wee receive; Into thy hands. He knew where it ſhould bee both ſafe and happy: True; hee might bee bold (thou ſayeſt) as the Sonne with the Father. The ſervants have done ſo; David before him, Steven after him. And leſt we ſhould not thinke it our common right; Father, (ſaith he) I will that thoſe thou haſt given me, may be with me, even where I am: he wills it, therefore it muſt be. It is not preſumption, but faith, to charge God with thy ſpirit; neither can there ever be any beleeving ſoule ſo meane, that he ſhould refuſe it; all the feare is in thy ſelfe: how canſt thou truſt thy jewell with a ſtranger? What ſudden familiarity is this? God hath beene with thee, and gone by thee; thou haſt not ſaluted him: and now in all the haſte thou bequeatheſt thy ſoule to him. On what acquaintance? How deſperate is this careleſneſſe? If thou have but a little money, whether thou keep it, thou layeſt it up in the Temple of truſt; or whether thou let it, thou art ſure of good aſſurance, ſound bonds. If but a little land, how carefully doeſt thou make firme conveyances to thy deſired heires? If goods, thy Will hath taken ſecure order, who ſhall enjoy them: We need not teach you Citizens to make ſure worke for your eſtates. If children, thou diſpoſeſt of them in trades, with portions: onely of thy ſoule (which is thy ſelfe) thou knoweſt not what ſhall become. The world muſt have it no more; thy ſelfe wouldſt keep it, but thou knoweſt thou canſt not: Satan would have it, and thou knoweſt not whether he ſhall: thou wouldſt have God have it, and thou knoweſt not whether he will: yea, thy heart is now ready with Pharaoh to ſay, who is the Lord? O the fearefull and miſerable eſtate of that man, that muſt part with his ſoule, he knowes not whither: which if thou wouldeſt avoid, (as this very warning ſhall judge thee if thou doe not) be acquainted with God in thy life, that thou maiſt make him the Guardian of thy ſoule in thy death. Given up it muſt needs be, but to him that hath governed it: if thou have given it to Satan in thy life, how canſt thou hope God will in thy death entertaine it? Did you not hate me, and expell me out of my Fathers houſe? how then come ye to me now in this time of your tribulation, ſaid Ieptha to the men of Gilead. No, no, either give up thy ſoule to God while he cals for it in his word, in the provocations of his love, in his afflictions, in the holy motions of his ſpirit to thine: or els when thou wouldſt give it, he will none of it, but as a Judge to deliver it to the Tormentor.

What ſhould God doe with an uncleane, drunken, prophane, proud, covetous ſoule? Without holineſſe, it is no ſeeing of God. Depart from me, ye wicked, I know ye not: Goe to the gods you have ſerved. See how God is even with men: they had, in the time of the Goſpell, ſaid to the holy one of Iſrael, Depart from us; now in the time of judgement, he ſaith to them, Depart from me: They would not know God when they might: now God will not know them when they would.

Now therefore (beloved) if thou would'ſt not have God ſcorne the offer of thy death-bed, fit thy ſoule for him in thy health; furniſh it with grace; inure it to a ſweet converſation with the God of heaven: then mayeſt thou boldly give it up, and he ſhall as graciouſly receive it, yea fetch it by his Angels to his glory.

He gave up the ghoſt. We muſt doe as he did: not all with the ſame ſucceſſe. Giving up, ſuppoſes a receiving, a returning. This inmate that we have in our boſome, is ſent to lodge here for a time, may not dwell here alwayes. The right of this tenure is the Lords, not ours: As he ſaid of the hatchet; It is but lent, it muſt be reſtored: It is ours to keepe, his to diſpoſe and require. See and conſider both our privilege and charge. It is not with us as with bruit creatures: we have a living ghoſt to informe us, which yet is not ours, (and, alas, what is ours, if our ſoules be not?) but muſt be given up to him that gave it.

Why doe we live as thoſe that tooke no keepe of ſo glorious a gueſt? as thoſe that ſhould never part with it, as thoſe that thinke it given them to ſpend, not to returne with a reckoning?

If thou hadſt no ſoule, if a mortall one, if thine owne, if never to be required, how couldſt thou live but ſenſually? Oh remember but who thou art, what thou haſt, and whither thou muſt; and thou ſhalt live like thy ſelfe, while thou art, and give up thy ghoſt confidently, when thou ſhalt ceaſe to be. Neither is there here more certainty of our departure, than comfort. Carry this with thee to thy death-bed, and ſee if it can refreſh thee, when all the world cannot give thee one dram of comfort. Our ſpirit is our deareſt riches: if we ſhould loſe it, here were juſt cauſe of griefe. Howle and lament, if thou thinkeſt thy ſoule periſheth: it is not forfeited, but ſurrendred. How ſafely doth our ſoule paſſe through the gates of death, without any impeachment, while it is in the hand of the Almighty? Woe were us, if he did not keepe it while we have it; much more when we reſtore it. We give it up to the ſame hands that created, infuſed, redeemed, renewed; that doth protect, preſerve, eſtabliſh, and will crown it: I know whom I have beleeved, and am perſwaded that he is able to keepe that which I have committed to him againſt that day. O ſecure and happy eſtate of the godly: O bleſſed exchange of our condition: while our ſoule dwels in our breaſt, how is it ſubject to infinite miſeries, diſtempered with paſſions, charged with ſinne, vexed with tentations? above, none of theſe: how ſhould it be otherwiſe? This is our pilgrimage, that our home: this is our wilderneſſe, that our land of promiſe: this our bondage, that our Kindome: our impotencie cauſeth this our ſorrow.

When our ſoule is once given up, what evill ſhall reach unto heaven, and wreſtle with the Almightie? Our lothneſſe to give up, comes from our ignorance and infidelitie. No man goes unwillingly to a certaine preferment. I deſire to be diſſolved, ſaith Paul; I have ſerved thee, I have beleeved thee, and now I come to thee, ſaith Luther. The voice of Saints, not of men. If thine heart can ſay thus, thou ſhalt not need to intreat with old Hilarion, Egredere mea anima, egredere, quid times? Goe thy wayes forth my ſoule, goe forth, what feareſt thou? but it ſhall flie up alone cheerefully from thee, and give up it ſelfe into the armes of God, as a faithfull Creator and Redeemer. This earth is not the element of thy ſoule, it is not where it ſhould be. It ſhall be no leſſe thine, when it is more the owners. Thinke now ſeriouſly of this point; Gods Angell is abroad, and ſtrikes on all ſides; we know not which of our turnes ſhall be the next: we are ſure we carry deaths enow within us. If we be ready, our day cannot come too ſoone. Stirre up thy ſoule to an heavenly cheerfulneſſe, like thy Saviour: Know but whither thou art going; and thou canſt not but with divine Paul, ſay from our Saviours mouth, even in this ſenſe: It is a more bleſſed thing to give, than to receive. God cannot abide an unwilling gueſt: give up that ſpirit to him, which he hath given thee; and he will both receive what thou giveſt, and give it thee againe, with that glory and happineſſe: which can never be conceived, and ſhall never be ended. Even ſo Lord Jeſus come quickly.

THE IMPRESE OF GOD.

THE FIRST PART.

ZACHAR. 14. 20.

In that day shall be written upon the bridles (or, bels) of the Horses, Holinesse unto the Lord: and the pots of the Lords house, shall be like the bowles before the Altar.

IF any man wonder whither this discourse can tend, of horses, and bels, and pots, and bowles for the Altar; Let him consider that of Tertullian, Ratio divina in medulla est, non in superficie: These Horses if they bee well menaged, will prove like those fierie Horses of Elias, to carry us up to our heaven, 2 King. 2. 11. These Bels, like those golden bels of Aarons robe, Exod. 39. 25. These Pots like that Olla pulmenti of the Prophets, after Elisha's meale, 2 King. 4. and these Bowles, like that blessed and fruitfull navell of the Church, Cant. 7. 2.

S. Paul asks, Doth God take care for oxen? so may I here, Doth God take care for horses? Surely, to provide for them, not to propheſie of them; much lesse of their bels, the unnecessary ornaments of a necessary creature; But he that forbids us to learne of the horse that lesson of stubbornnesse, by the Psalmist, and checks us oft by the oxe and asse, for their good nature, would have us learne here, under this parable of the horse, and the bels of the horse, and the writing on those bels, the estate of our owne peace and sanctification. God doth both speake, and worke in Parables, as that Father saith well: Of this then I may truly say, as Hierome said of the booke of Iob, Singula verba plenissunt sensibus: Suffer your selves with Abrahams Ram, to bee perplexed a while in these bryers, that you may be prepared for a fit sacrifice to God.

In that day:] What day is that? All dayes are his, who is the Ancient of dayes; and yet he sayes, Abraham saw my day, and rejoyced. He that made all dayes, sayes yet againe, This is the day which the Lord hath made: There is one day of the weeke, Gods; κυριακη, Revel. 1. and yet I would it were his; Gods day by creation, by ordination, I would it were his by observation too: There is one day in an Age his: While it is called to day, Heb. 3. The day of visitation; and yet this thy day, Luk. 19. 42. One day in a world his, Matth. 7. 22. In that day: A day beyond the world, his. To day have I begotten thee, Hodie, i. ab Eterno, which is a nunc stans, as Aquinas defines it. The Heathens had five famous periods of computations, Ninus Monarchie, Ogyges Flood, Troj in Warre, Olympiads, Vrbs condita; All ours is ab illo die, which S. Paul cals, The fulnesse of Time; But Christ hath two dayes, as two commings: His first, In die illa radix Iesse, saith Esay 11. 10. The day of his comming to sojourne in the world; His second, 1 Cor. 1. 8. The day of his returne, which S. Paul cals ἡμεραν ἀπολυτρωσεως Ephes. 4. 30. when he comes to ransome us, and to judge the world: both are dayes indeed; In the first, there is no night of his absence, though to our sense there bee some little darknesse of our miserie: In the second, no absence, nor no miserie; A day day without night, *Revel.*21.25. This prophecie is true of both; Partially, and inchoately of the firſt; totally and abſolutely of the ſecond: Of the firſt ſo farre as it makes way for, and reſembles the ſecond: and this as it is here principally intended, ſo ſhall it be the drift of our diſcourſe. A

This is the day: Now what of this day? There ſhall be a Motto written: An honourable Motto; ſuch as was written upon the מִצְנֶפֶת the Turbant of the High Prieſt; Holineſſe to the Lord: And where ſhall it be written? An honourable Motto in an ignoble place; עַל מְצִלּוֹת; Not as Aquila and Theodotian, under the belly of the horſe, ſuper profundum; Nor as Symmachus, under his feet, ſuper inceſſum umbroſum; The ſenſes are ſenſeleſſe (though you take them cum grano ſalis, as the Lawyers admoniſh) they ſavour neither the ſenſe, nor word; Not, as Ierome, the Septuagint and Geneve, ſuper frænum; Tho this hath the ſenſe well, not the word; Hieroms Maſter came a little neerer (ſuper phaleras); Thoſe of the Rabbins yet light righteſt both on the word; and ſenſe, which turne ſuper Tintinnabula; For ten times at leaſt in the Chronicles and Ezra, is the ſame word dually uſed; for Cymbals; and the Verbe of this root, is the ſame, where by God would expreſſe the tingling of the eares; הַעֲלֹת *Tinnient aures audientium. Ier.*19. To adorne their horſes with bels, was not only a faſhion in thoſe South-Eaſt Countries, but in our fore-fathers dayes in this Land: as it were eaſie to ſhow you, but out of Chaucers Antiquity; and ſome of us have ſeene it ſtill in uſe elſewhere. What bells then were theſe? Not of the Prieſt; It had beene eaſie to transferre his embleme from his forehead, to his skirts; but of the horſes: The horſe an uncleane beaſt, Levit. 11. A warlike beaſt, Equus paratur in diem belli. Prov. 21. 31. Whence ſtill ſhall you find Horſes and Chariots put together; and In bello & equis, Oſe. 1. 7. Behold this Motto had wont to be written upon a man, now upon a beaſt; had wont upon an holy man, The High Prieſt: now upon an uncleane beaſt; before, upon a man of peace, now on a beaſt of warre; Before upon the forehead of the High Prieſt, now (as Rab. Eliezar) inter oculos, betwixt the eyes of the Horſe. But what? not to continue there; as ſome Rabbins and good Interpreters; but ſo that of theſe very Bells ſhall be made Pots for the uſe of ſacrifice; Like as of the glaſſes of the Jewiſh women was made a Laver; and of the Jewels of the Midianitiſh Camels, a rich Ephod. This is well, to come thus neer; yet they ſhall bee promoted higher: They ſhall be bowles for the Altar: The Pots might be greater, for there was Olla Grandis. 2 King. 4. But the bowles were more noble, and more peculiarly devoted to Gods ſervice: Moſes ſhall comment upon Zacharie: *Num.*7. Twelve ſeverall times you have the matter of theſe bowles (ſilver) the weight, 70. ſhekels; The uſe, for floure and oyle for the meate-offering, beſides that following imployment for the incenſe. But I hold not this dependance neceſſary: Here are rather two diſtinct propheſies, though to one purpoſe, as we ſhall ſee in the proceſſe. You ſee now Zacharies holy riddle read; That God, under the Goſpell will effect a gracious ſanctification both of things, and perſons; and by thoſe things which in their uſe have beene altogether prophane, will indifferently glorifie himſelfe, and worke them both to peace, and holineſſe: And as Cyprian ſaith, Fidem rerum curſus implevit. B C D

What now is more fit for Courtiers to heare of, than an Impreſe of honour? What more fit for kings and Princes than the Impreſe of the God of heaven? And as in all Impreſes, there is a body, and a ſoule, as they are termed; ſo are both here without any affectation: The ſoule of it is the Motto, or Word, Holineſſe to the Lord: The body, is the ſubject it ſelfe; As oft-times the very ſhield is the device: The ſubject, Bells of the horſes.

In the Word, firſt ſee the ancient uſe of Heraldry in the Scriptures; That part eſpecially which concernes Inſcriptions; as on Coynes, Sheilds, Enſignes: If the Teſtament of the Patriarks had as much credit, as antiquitie, all the Patriarks had their Armes aſſign'd them by Iacob; Iudah a Lyon, Dan a Serpent, Nepthali an Hinde, Benjamin a Wolfe, Ioſeph a bough, and ſo the reſt. The Coyne which Iacob paid to the Shechemites; was ſtamped with a Lambe, *Gen.*32. And, if Iudahs ring that he left with Thamar, had not had an inſcription, it could not ſo certainly have deſcryed his Maſter. Theſe coynes had a figure without a word; The frontall of the High Prieſt had a word, without a figure; The ſhekel of the Sanctuarie (whoſe Character we have oft ſeene) E had both a word and a figure: the word, Holy Ieruſalem; the figure, A pot of Manna, like a large chalice, and Aarons rod, not budding but branching out. Salomon compares the Church to an Armie with Banners; there could be no uſe, no diſtinction of Banners, without inſcriptions; The Maccabees had foure Hebrew letters in their Enſigne, for both their word, and device: whence they had their name: Yea, this is not in via only but in patria: They ſhall have a white ſtone, and a new name written in it: The field and the armes, both named, and vnknowne: The uſe therefore of inſcriptions and armes muſt needs be very laudable, as ancient; ſince God himſelfe was the firſt Herald, and ſhall be the laſt. Yea the very Anabaptiſts, that ſhake off all the yoke of Magiſtracie, yet when they had ripened their fanaticall projects, and had raiſed their king Becold, from the ſhop-boord to the Throne, would not want this point of honour: And therfore he muſt have one henchman on the right hand to carry a Crowne, and a Bible, with an inſcription; On the left, another, that carried a ſword naked, and a ball of Gold: Himſelfe in great ſtate carries a Globe of Gold, with two ſwords acroſſe. His preſſing iron and ſheeres would have become him better.

And if I ſhould looke to heatheniſh Antiquitie, I ſhould need to ſay no more, than that the Ægyptian Hieroglyphicks, whereof they ſay Horus Apollo was the inventer, were nothing elſe, but Emblems, & Impreſes: among the reſt, it is memorable that Ruffinus reports, that the ſigne of the croſſe was one of their χαμμαια ιερογλυφικα, their ancient figures long before Chriſt: which (ſaith he) ſignified to them, eternall life: and Socrates adds, that when they found the ſigne of the Croſſe (in templo Serapidis) the Heathen and Chriſtians contended for it, each challenged it for theirs; and when the Heathen knowing the ſignification of it, ſaw it thus fulfilled to the Chriſtians, many of them converted to Chriſtianity. Be it farre from us, to put any ſuperſtition in this; I think it done, by the ſame inſtinct whereby the Sybils propheſied of Chriſt. And as Armes, and Embleticall devices are thus ancient, and commendable; ſo more directly Poſies and words, whether for inſtruction, or diſtinction, are here warranted. So the word of a faithfull King, is Dominus mihi adjutor; or when he would thankfully aſcribe his peace to God; Exurgat Deus, diſſipentur inimici: ſo of a good Prince, either, I ſerve, to expreſſe his officious care; Or, One of your owne, to ſignifie his reſpective love. So the good Stateſman's ſhould be given him by Salomon, Non eſt conſilium contra Dominum, No policie againſt the Lord: A good Courtier's, by Samuel, Honorantes me honorabo: A good Biſhop's, by Paul, ευκαιρως ακαιρως; In ſeaſon, out of ſeaſon. A good ſubject's, Not for feare but Conſcience. A good Chriſtians, Chriſtus mihi vivere eſt. So the Iſraelites were charged to make their Embleme the Law of God; for their poſts, for their garments. But theſe things may not be written upon our walls, or ſhields onely; They muſt be written upon our hearts; elſe we are as very painted walls, as our walls themſelves: Elſe we ſhall be like ſome Inne, that hath a Crowne for the ſigne without, and within there is none but Peſants; or a Roſe upon the poſt without, and nothing but ſluttiſhneſſe and filth within: Or an Angell without, and nothing within, but lewd drunkards. As it is ſaid of God, Dixit, & factum eſt; So alſo, ſcripſit, & factum eſt; They ſhall be written holy, that is, they ſhall be made holy: Happy is it for us, tho we write no new emblemes of our owne, if we can have this holy Impreſe of God, written not in our fore-heads, but in our hearts, Holineſſe to the Lord. Thus much of the Embleme, or word. Now for the ſubject and Circumſtances: In that day, above this; there is the proficiency of the Church; Holineſſe ſhall bee written upon the Bells; prophane things ſhall be holy, There is the ſanctification of the Church: The bells of warlike horſes ſhall be turned to the quiet uſe of Religion: There is the religious peace of the Church. Thirdly, the pots to ſeethe in, ſhall be as Bowles, to offer up incenſe in; There is the degrees of the Churches perfection: ſo that here ariſe foure heads of our ſpeech; The proficiencie, Sanctification, Peace, Perfection of the Church. All which crave your gracious and Chriſtian attention; or leſt I be too long, two of them onely.

When therefore ſhall this be fulfilled? Not under the Law: It had beene a great profanation: For none but the High-Prieſt might weare this poſie: the place oft-times diſparages; As to put the Arke of God into a Cart, or to ſet it by Dagon.

It

It is under the Goſpell, that this poſie of Holineſſe ſhall be ſo common; in illa die; and this is that day: How great is this proficiency of the Church? Looke how much difference there is betweene one and many, betweene the holieſt of men, and an ordinary beaſt, betweene the frontall of the High-Prieſt, and the Bells of horſes, ſo much there muſt be betwixt the Church in that day, and in this. It is the faſhion of the true Church, to grow up ſtill, from worſe to better, as it is ſaid of the head of the Church, Creſcebat & corroborabatur. As it is compared to ſtones for firmneſſe, ſo to grafts for growth; Yea the kingdome of heaven is like a graine of muſtard-ſeed, that of the leaſt ſeed, proves the greateſt plant, in his kind: the river of God flowes firſt up to the ankles, then to the knees, and at laſt to the chin. A

The Church was an Embryo till Abrahams time; In ſwathing-bands till Moſes; In child-hood till Chriſt; A man in Chriſt, A man full-growne in glory. As man is an Epitome of the world, ſo is every Chriſtian an abridgement of the Church; Beſt at laſt; In illa die. Hee is like to the feaſt of Cana, where the beſt wine was brought in laſt; not naturally, but by tranſmutation. It was a blaſphemous, and (mee thinks) a Vorſtian reaſon, that Toſtatus brings, why God did not create the voices out of the Propitiatorie, Quia Deus non poteſt agere per ſucceſſionem: Surely in us hee doth; and as wee can doe nothing, in inſtante, no more doth God in us. As in the Creation hee could have made all at once, but hee would take dayes for it, ſo in our re-creation by grace: As naturall, ſo ſpirituall agents, doe agere per moram. That rule of Aquinas is ſure, Succeſſivorum non ſimul eſt eſſe & perfectio: to which that accords of Tertullian, Perfectio ordine poſt-humat. There muſt bee an illa dies, for our full ſtature; till which, if we be true Chriſtians, we muſt grow from ſtrength to ſtrength: herein grace is contrary to nature, ſtrongeſt at laſt. We muſt change till then, but in melius; till we come to our beſt; and then, wee muſt bee like him, in whom is no ſhadow by turning. B C

But, where wee ſhould be like the Sunne till noone, ever riſing; there be many like Ezekiaes Sunne, that goe backe many degrees in the diall: whoſe beginnings are like Neroes firſt five yeares, full of hope, and peace; Or, like the firſt moneth of a new ſervant; or like unto the foure Ages, whoſe firſt was gold, the laſt iron: Or to Nebuchadnezzars image, which had a precious head, but baſe feet. Looke to your ſelves, this is a fearefull ſigne, a fearefull condition: can hee ever bee rich, that growes every day poorer? Can hee ever reach the Goale, that goes every day a ſtep backe from it? Alas then, how ſhall he ever reach the Goale of glory, that goes every day a ſtep backward in grace? He that is worſe every day, can never be at his beſt, In illa die, In that day.

Hitherto the proficiencie; The ſanctification followes. The Moſaicall Law was ſcrupulous: There were unholy places, unholy garments, perſons, beaſts, fowles, veſſels, touches, taſtes: Under the Goſpell all is holy. All was made unholy, when the firſt Adam ſinned; when the ſecond Adam ſatisfied for ſinne, all was made holy: Moſes the ſervant built his houſe, with a τὸ μεσοτοιχον φραγμα, Epheſ. 2. 14. a partition wall in the midſt: Chriſt the Sonne pull'd downe that ſcreene, and caſt all into one ἀμφοτερα ἐν: Jewes and Gentiles, whole hoofes and cloven, dwell now both under a roofe. Moſes branded ſome creatures with uncleanneſſe; he that redeemed his children from morall impurity, redeemed his creatures from legall: What ſhould S. Peters great ſheet let downe by foure corners teach us, but that all creatures through the foure corners of the world, are cleane and holy? S. Paul proclaimes the ſumme of Peters viſion; Omnia munda mundis: It is an injurious ſcrupulouſneſſe, to make differences of creatures; injurious to God, to the creature, to our ſelves: To God, while we will not let him ſerve himſelfe of his owne: To the creature, while we powre that ſhame upon it, which God never did: To our ſelves, while we bring our ſelves into bondage, where God hath inlarged us. When Iulian had poyſoned the wells, and ſhambles, and fields, with his heathenish Luſtrations; the Chriſtians (ſaith Theodoret) ate freely of all, by vertue of Pauls, Quicquid in macello: To let paſſe the idle curiouſneſſe of our ſemi-Anabaptiſts, of the ſeparation, at whoſe follie, if any man be diſpoſed to make himſelfe ſport, let him read the Tragicomicall relation of the Troubles and Excommunication D E

A nication of the Engliſh at Amſterdam; There ſhall he ſee ſuch warres waged betwixt brothers, for but a buske, or whale-bone, or lace, or cork-ſhooe, as if all Law and Goſpell ſtood upon this point; as if heaven and earth were little enough to be mingled in this quarrell; Nec gemino bellum Trojanum. To paſſe over all other lighter niceneſſe of this kinde: Who can chuſe but be aſhamed of the Church of Rome; which is here in a double extremity, both groſſe: In denying, wiping out holineſſe, where God hath written it: and in writing it, where God hath not written it: in the firſt, how doe they drive out Devils out of good creatures, by fooliſh exorciſmes? I would hee were no more in themſelves. How doe they forbid meats, drinks, dayes, mariage which God hath written holy? Hee that reads Navars Manuall, ſhall finde cholericke blaſphemie a veniall ſinne, pag. 91. ſome theft veniall, p. 140. Common lying, veniall, p. 191. Curſing of Parents, if not malicious, veniall, p. 100. and yet the ſame Author,
B chap. 21. nu. 11. p. 209. to eat of a forbidden diſh, or an allowed diſh more than once on a forbidden day, is a mortall ſinne: And now theſe venialls (ſaith Francis à Victoria) by a Pater-noſter, or ſprinkling of holy water, or knock of the breſt are cleared; but that mortall eater is ἔνοχος τῇ κρίσει, guilty of judgement, yea, of hell it ſelfe: Scribes, Phariſes, Hypocrites, which prate of Peters chaire, but will never take out Peters leſſon, That which God hath ſanctified, pollute thou not. In the other: What Holineſſe doe they write in religious cowles, Altars, Reliques, Aſhes, Candles, Oyles, Salts, Waters, Enſignes, Roſes, Words, Graines, Agnus Dei, Medalls, and a world of ſuch traſh: So much, that they have left none in themſelves. Let me have no faith, if ever play-booke were more ridiculous, than their Pontificall, and booke of holy Ceremonies. It is well that Ierome reads theſe words, ſuper frænum, not ſuper Tintinnabulum; Elſe, what a rule ſhould we have had; tho he had ſaid, Equorum, not Templorum: What compariſons would have beene; If Holineſſe to the Lord muſt be written
C on the Bells of Horſes, much more on the Bells of Churches. What a colour would this have beene for the waſhing, anointing, bleſſing, chriſtening of them? What a warrant for driving away Devils, chaſing of ghoſts, ſtilling of tempeſts, ſtaying of thunders, yea delivering from Tentations, which the Pontificall aſcribes to them? By whoſe account, there ſhould be more vertue in this peece of metall, than in their holy Father himſelfe, yea than in any Angell of heaven: But their vulgar bridles them in this, which reads it, ſuper frænum, which ſome ſuperſtitious man would ſay were fulfilled in Conſtantines ſnaffle made of the nailes that pierced Chriſt. How worthy are they in the meane time of the whip, not of men onely, but of God, which thus in a ridiculous preſumption write Holineſſe, where God would have a blanke; and wipe out Holineſſe, where God hath written it?

D For us, there is a double holineſſe; for uſe, for vertue: All things are holy to us for uſe; nothing is holy for vertue of Sanctification, but thoſe things which God hath ſanctified to this vertue; his word, his ſacraments: We may uſe the other, and put no holineſſe in them; we muſt uſe theſe, and expect holineſſe from them: οὐδὲν κοινὸν, Nothing uncleane, is Peters rule, but with Pauls explication, Munda mundis: All things are cleane in themſelves; to thee they are not cleane, unleſſe thou be cleane. Mine owne clothes ſhall make me filthy, ſaith Iob, 9. 31. Many a one may ſay ſo, more juſtly. The proud mans gay coat, the wanton womans beaſtly faſhions, both ſhew them to be uncleane, and make them ſo. But the lewd man makes his owne clothes, filthy; his meats, drinks, ſports, garments, are uncleane to him, becauſe he is uncleane to God; they are curſed to him, becauſe he is curſed of God: God hath written on the outſide of his creatures, Holy to the Lord; we write on the inſide, Unholy to E men; becauſe our outſide and inſide is unholy to God: yea, we doe not onely deface this inſcription of holineſſe in other creatures to us, but we will not let God write it upon us, for himſelfe. O our miſery and ſhame! All things elſe are holy; Men, Chriſtians, are unholy. There is no impurity but where is Reaſon, and Faith, the grounds of Holineſſe. How oft would God have written this title upon our foreheads? and ere he can have written one full word, we blot out all: One ſweares it away, another drinks it away, a third ſcoffs it away, a fourth riots is away, a fift ſwaggers it away; and I would to God it were uncharitable to ſay, that there is as much holineſſe in the Bridles of the Horſes, as in ſome of their Riders. Oh holineſſe, the riches of the Saints, the beauty of Angels, the delight of God, whither haſt thou withdrawne thy ſelfe? where ſhould we finde thee if not among Chriſtians? and yet how can we be, or be named Chriſtians without thee? I ſee ſome that are afraid to be too holy: and I ſee but ſome that feare to be too prophane. We are all Saints, πάντες ἅγιοι, 1 Cor. 1. 2. All by calling; and ſome but by calling: By calling of men, not of God: As the Church of Rome hath ſome Saints which are queſtioned whether ever they were in nature; others, whether they be not in hell; burning Tapers to them on earth, to whom perhaps the fiends light firebrands below. As Cæſarius the Monke brings in Petrus Cantor, and Roger the Norman diſputing the caſe of Becket; ſo we have many titular Saints, few reall; many which are written in red Letters in the Calendar of the world, Holy to the Lord, whom God never canonizes in heaven, and ſhall once entertaine with a Neſcio, I know you not. Theſe men yet have Holineſſe written upon them, and are like, as Lucian compares his Græcians, to a faire, gilt, boſſed booke: looke within, there is the Tragedy of Thyeſtes, or perhaps Arrius his Thalia; the name of a Muſe, the matter hereſie; or Conradus Vorſtius his late monſter, that hath De Deo in the front, and Atheiſme and Blaſphemie in the text. As S. Paul ſayes to his Corinths, would God yee could ſuffer me a little: Yee cannot want praiſers, yee may want reprovers; and yet you have not ſo much need of Panegyricks, as of reprehenſions. Theſe by how much more rare they are, by ſo much more neceſſarie. Nec cenſura deeſt quæ increpet, nec medicina quæ ſanet, ſaith Cyprian. A falſe praiſe grieves, and a true praiſe ſhames, ſaith Anaſtaſius. As Kings are by God himſelfe called Gods (for there are Dii nuncupativè, and not eſſentialiter, as Gregorie diſtinguiſhes) becauſe of their reſemblance of God, ſo their Courts ſhould be like to heaven, and their attendants like Saints and Angels: Decet domum tuam ſanctitudo, agrees to both. Thus you ſhould be: But alas, I ſee ſome care to bee gallant, others care to bee great, few care to bee holy. Yea I know not what Devill hath poſſeſſed the hearts of many great ones of our time in both ſexes, with this conceit, that they cannot be gallant enough, unleſſe they be godleſſe. Holineſſe is for Divines, or men of meane ſpirits, for grave, ſubdued, mortified, retired minds; not for them that ſtand upon the tearmes of honour, height of place and ſpirit, noble humours; hence are our oathes, duels, profaneneſſes. Alas, that we ſhould be ſo beſotted, as to think that our ſhame, which is our onely glory: It is reaſon that makes us men, but it is holineſſe that makes us Chriſtians. And woe to us that we are men, if we be not Chriſtians. Thinke as baſely of it as yee will: you ſhall one day finde, that one dram of holineſſe is worth a whole world of greatneſſe; yea, that there is no greatneſſe, but in holineſſe. For Gods ſake therefore doe not ſend holineſſe to Colledges, or Hoſpitals for her lodging, but entertaine her willingly into the Court, as a moſt happy gueſt. Thinke it a ſhame, and danger, to goe in fine clothes, while you have foule hearts; and know, that in vaine ſhall you be honour'd of men, if you be not holy to the Lord. Your goodly outſides may admit you into the Courts on earth; but you ſhall never looke within the gates of the Court of heaven without holineſſe: Without holineſſe no man ſhall ſee God. O God, without holineſſe we ſhall never ſee thee; and without thee we ſhall never ſee holineſſe: write thou upon theſe flinty hearts of ours, Holineſſe to thy ſelfe: Make us holy to thee, that we may be glorious with thee and all thy Saints and Angels.

All this onely for thy Chriſts ſake, and to whom, &c.

THE IMPRESE OF GOD.

THE SECOND PART.

ZACH. vlt. 20.

In that day ſhall there be written upon the bridles of the horſes, The holineſſe unto the Lord, and the pots in the Lords houſe ſhall be like the bowles before the Altar.

C

IT is well-neere a yeere agoe, ſince in this Gracious Preſence, wee entred upon this myſticall, yet pertinent Text. You then heard what This day is; what theſe Bells or Bridles; what this inſcription; what theſe Pots and Bowles: And out of That day you heard the proficiencie of the Church; out of Holineſſe written on the Bells, the ſanctification of the Church: You ſhall now heare, out of theſe Bells, or Bridles of warlike horſes, thus inſcribed, the change of the holy warre, and peace of the Church; out of theſe Pots, advanced to the likeneſſe of the Bowles
D of the Altar, the degrees of the Churches perfection, and acceptation; All which crave your gracious and honourable attention. That conceit (which yet is graced with the name of ſome Fathers) that takes this in the literall ſenſe of Conſtantines bridle, wee paſſe, as more worthy of ſmiles than confutation: Queſtionleſſe, the ſenſe is ſpirituall: and it is a ſure rule, that as the hiſtoricall ſenſe is fetcht from ſignification of words, ſo the ſpirituall from the ſignification of thoſe things, which are ſignified by the words.

For this inſcription then, it ſhall not be upon the bells, for their owne ſakes, but for the horſes: not as bells, but as bells of the horſes; And on the horſes, not for their owne ſakes, but as they ſerve for their Riders. The horſe, a militarie creature; there is no other mention of him in Scripture, no other uſe of him of old: when the eyes of Eliſhaes ſervant were open, he ſaw the hill full of horſes, 2 Kings 6. Even the celeſtiall
E warfare is not expreſſed without them: Hence you ſhall ever find them matcht with Chariots in the Scripture: And the Poet, Nunc tempus equos, nunc poſcere currus: hee ruſheth into the battell, ſaith Ieremie; and he is made for it; for he hath both ſtrength and nimbleneſſe. He is ſtrong: there is fortitudo equi, Pſalm. 47. and God himſelfe acknowledges it. Haſt thou given the horſe his ſtrength, Iob 39. He is ſwift, ſaith Ieremy, 4. 13. yea as Eagles, or Leopards, ſaith Abacuc. We muſt take theſe horſes then, either as continuing themſelves, or as altered. If the firſt; The very warres under the Goſpell ſhall be holy; and God ſhall much glorifie himſelfe by them: He ſaith not, There ſhall be no horſes, or thoſe horſes ſhall have no bells, or thoſe bells no inſcription; but thoſe horſes, and their uſe, which is warre, and their ornaments, which are bells, ſhall have a title of Holineſſe. While Cornelius Agrippa writes of the vanity of Sciences, we may well wonder at the vanity of his opinion, that all warre was forbidden under the Goſpell. But let Aprippa be vaine in this, as a meere Humaniſt, and the Anabaptiſts groſſly falſe, as being frantick heretiques: It is marvell how Eraſmus ſo great a ſcholler, and Feruus ſo great a Text-man could miſcarry in this Manichean conceit. Alphonſus à Caſtro would faine have our Oecolampadius to keepe them company, but Bellarmine himſelfe can hardly beleeve him: No marvell, when he ſees Zuinglius die in the field, tho as a Paſtor, not as a ſouldier: and when our ſwords have ſo well taught them, beſides our tongues, that the hereticks are as good friends to warre, as enemies to them. It is Gods everlaſting title, Dominus exercituum. To ſpeake nothing of the old Teſtament; What can Cornelius Agrippa ſay to Cornelius the Centurion; I feare no man would give that title to him that oppoſed warre, which Gods ſpirit gives to this agent in war; A juſt man, and fearing God: His warfare, ſaith Chryſoſtome, hurt him not. Did not Chriſt himſelfe bid (even he that ſaid, Who ſo ſmites with the ſword, ſhall periſh with the ſword, in caſe of private revenge) Qui non habet gladium, vendat tunicam, emat gladium? The Angels themſelves are heavenly ſouldiers; Every Chriſtian is a ſouldier; as he is a Chriſtian, he fights not againſt fleſh and blood, but principalities and powers; as he is a Chriſtian ſouldier, he fights both againſt fleſh and blood, and principalities; All the warres of God: So that contrary to S. Martin, who ſaid, I am a Chriſtian, I may not fight; he muſt ſay, I am a Chriſtian, I muſt fight. And why may he not? God when he makes us Chriſtians, leaves us the ſame wit to deviſe ſtratagems, the ſame hands to execute them. All things (as Eraſmus wittily) have in them naturally a meanes of defence; the Horſe heeles, Dog teeth, Oxe hornes, Porcupine quills, Bee ſting, Serpent poyſon; thoſe weaker creatures that cannot reſiſt, have either nimble feet to out-run us, or wings to out-flie us; Only man is left naked: Yet ſo, as his furniture within can ſoon furniſh him for without: Yet all Horſes, all wars, are not written holy; As there is a ſpirituall evill war, of the fleſh againſt the ſpirit: ſo there is a temporall of fleſh, againſt fleſh. Vnde bella? ſaith S. Iames. Militare propter prædam, to fight for a booty, (ſaith Ambroſe) is ſinne. That witty Alphonſus King of Arragon (to whom we are beholden for ſo many Apothegmes) had for his Impreſe a Pellican ſtriking her ſelfe in the breſt, and feeding her young with the bloud; with a word, Pro lege, & grege. All warre drawes blood: oft of the innocent part, πολεμος is πολυ-αμος, and therefore muſt never be but pro lege, for Religion; or pro grege, for the Common-wealth. And as it hath theſe two grounds; ſo alſo two directors; Juſtice and Charitie. Juſtice, that requires both authoritie in the menager, and innocence in menaging; Authoritie; A ſubordinate power is not capable of holy warre: He onely may ſay pro lege, that is cuſtos utriuſque tabulæ; he only pro grege, that is ποιμην λαων: If private men ſhall ſay, pro lege, or pro grege, they are traitors, and not ſouldiers; In them, as he ſaid to Alexander, warre is but theft and murder. Only Kings are the publike Juſticers of the world: which can command peace, with their owne, and puniſh the breach of peace in others Innocence. Wrong no man, ſaith Ioh. Bapt. That non ex jure, is more than unchriſtian, bruitiſh.

Charity; whether in the intention; Peace muſt be the end of war. Bellarmine ſaid this one thing well, that war to the Common-wealth is as vulnera Chirurgi: or, in the action; both of undertaking and ceſſation: undertaking; according to the Jewiſh proverbe, firſt we muſt inquire of Abel; and the heathen Poet could ſay, extrema nemo primo tentavit loco: no juſt war is ακηρυκτος: Ceſſation, upon juſt ſatisfaction; as Sheba's head raiſes the ſiege of Abel: This is bellum Domini; and Holineſſe is written upon the bells of theſe horſes of warre. Such were the warres of that bleſſed Conſtantine, both Theodoſii, Honorius, and all whom God wrote Holy, and made happy. Such were many gallant Princes of old perſwaded that thoſe warres of Paleſtine were; who in a cunning wile were ſent to get the Holy Land, that in the meane time they might leeſe their owne: How many Councels were ſummon'd, how many Armies levied, one of 300000 at once, by Pope Vrbans procurement? how many ſtreams of Chriſtian blood ſpilt to recover the land of them that murdred Chriſt, which God had curſed to confuſion,

A ſion, terram ſacerrimam, in the Plautine ſenſe? Such are thoſe that are undertaken againſt the ſcourge of Chriſtendome, the creature of Mahomet, that Turkiſh Magog. Such are thoſe that the Defender of the Chriſtian faith hath been juſtly provoked to undertake againſt that Romiſh uſurper, Peters ſucceſſor in nothing, but in denying his Maſter. The inclemencie of the late Pope labouring to foreſtall him in his juſt throne, and the abſurd pragmaticall impudencie of the preſent, in that groſſe prohibition of a favourable and naturall oath, for his Majeſties ſecurity, in a ſort countenancing rebellion againſt his Perſon; beſide thoſe ſhameleſſe libels of his factors, to the ſcorne of Gods Anointed, have ſeemed to uſurpe Samuels Meſſage, Vade, percute, demolire. To omit private motives; Pope Vrbane in that his zealous Oration to the Councell of Cleremont uſed no one reaſon to perſwade the world to draw their ſword againſt the Turkes, which might not juſtly be urged to Chriſtian Princes, to ſcale the walls of Rome. Doth

B he ſpeake of the Saracens prophaning of Jeruſalem? we parallel the ſhamefull profanations of the ſpirituall Jeruſalem, their heatheniſme was never ſo idolatrous. Doth he ſpeak of abuſing the ſepulcher of Chriſt? we parallel them with the abuſing of his ſacred body. Doth he ſpeake of the cruelty of thoſe ſavages? we alſo may ſay of them, Effunditur ſanguis Chriſtianus, Chriſti ſanguine redemptus &c. neither need I feare to ſay with Iunius, that in this they are Trucis Truciores. But I know what difference there is betwixt a Preacher, and an Herald: our title is Evangeliz antes pacem: And tho the ſword of the hand doth well, yet it is the ſword of the mouth, that muſt ſlay that Man of ſin: Yet this I dare ſay, that if in the cauſe of God and his Church, this warre ſhould bee undertaken, Holineſſe ſhould be written upon our Horſes bridles; and, as we ſhall enter with fewer croſſes upon our breſts, than thoſe honeſt ſouldiers into their holy warre: ſo both our cauſe ſhould be more holy, and we ſhould returne with fewer croſſes on

C our backes; But I meddle not with this. There is a warre that we cannot ſhake off: Not with the perſon, but the corruptions of that foule Church: we have long waged it. God had never any quarrell upon earth, if this be not his. Our bleſſed forefathers have ſhed their bloud in this field, & are glorious: let us ſtir up our chriſtian courage to this ſervice, upon our horſes heads ſhall be written holineſſe; upon ours, glory and immortality. But take theſe horſes and bels altered (as fits better) by this writing from themſelves; what God writes is done: Write this man childleſſe; therefore he muſt be ſo: Iel doth not ſo well comment upon this place, Breake your plow-ſhares into ſwords, and your ſithes into ſpears, Ioel 3. 10. as Micah 4. 3. They ſhall break their ſwords into mattocks, and their ſpeares into ſithes; Mattocks and ſithes the inſtruments of pro-

D fit, one for the commodities above the earth, the other for thoſe under it: which as I take it, would not be ſo ſtrictly reſtrained to the very time of Chriſts comming, when there was an univerſall peace on earth, and the Temple of Ianus was ſhut: as Cyril, Chryſoſtome, Euſebius, Hieronie, underſtand it: rather it is a prophecie of that outward and during peace under the Goſpell, which all the true profeſſors of it ſhould maintaine with themſelves. All nations, though fierce & ſterne of diſpoſition, yet if they once ſtoop ſincerely to the Goſpell, ſhall compoſe themſelves to a ſweet accordance, and imploy their united ſtrength to the ſervice of God: But how is this fulfilled? Some in all ages have run forth into fury, & troubled the common peace: It is true: but theſe are blanks, ſuch as upon whom God hath not written holines. It is no hoping that all horſes ſhal be bridled, or all bridles written on. As grace, ſo peace is not in ſuch ſort univerſall, that all ſhould incline to it, on all conditions: There are ſome שונאי שלום Peace-haters; it is as poſſible to tame a waſp, as to incline them to peace: Such are the wilful Romaniſts of our time (to omit Schiſmes) which will rather mingle heaven and earth together, than

E remit one gainfull error. But what ever become of theſe Mamzers, which doe thus exclude themſelves from the congregation of God, it were happy, if all the true and acknowleged ſons of the Church would admit the inſcription of an holy peace. Alas, why doe we that are brethren fall out for our change of ſuits by the way? and make thoſe quarrels deadly, which deſerve not to be quarrels? Oh that ſome bleſſed Dove would bring an Olive of peace into this Arke of God! Who is ſo fit for this glorious ſervice, as our gracious peace-maker? Nemo me impune laceſſet, is a good Poſie; but Beati pacifici, is a better. Let the Vice-gerent of him which is the Prince of peace, as he was made for? the peace of the walls, and proſperity of the gates of Sion, be that Angelus pacis, Eſ. 33.7. Let his wiſdome and ſweet moderation proceed to allay all theſe unkindly ſtormes of the Church, that we way live to ſee that happy greeting of the Pſalmiſt, Righteouſneſſe and Peace have kiſſed each other. And as this holds in matter of judgement, ſo of practice too. Do you ſee a looſe & lawleſſe man, wilfull in his deſires, unbridled in his affections, inordinate in his life, imploying his wit to ſcoffe at his Creator, caring for nothing but the worſe part of himſelfe? There is one of Zacharies horſes; when Gods ſpirit breaths upon the ſoule of this man, he is now another from himſelfe: Holineſſe to the Lord is written upon his Bells. This was done ſometimes of old: Saul was among the Prophets; Salomon and Manaſſes, great patternes of converſion; but rarely in reſpect of the dayes of the Goſpell. What ſhould I ſpeak of S. Paul? No ground would hold him, he runs chafing and foaming from Hieruſalem to Damaſcus; of his Jaylor? of Mary Magdalen? Behold whole troupes of wild natures reclaimed, Eph. 4. Coloſſ. 3. Act. 2. Who can deſpaire where God undertakes? Shew me never ſo violent and deſperate a ſinner, let him be as Iobs wilde aſſe in the deſart, or as Amos his horſe, that will run upon the rocks, Amos 6.12. if God once take him in hand, thou ſhalt ſoone ſee that this horſe is fleſh, & not ſpirit; and ſhalt ſing Deborahs, Vngulæ tecciderunt, Iudg. 5.22. or Ioſuahs, Subnervabis, Ioſ. 11.6. Now ſhalt thou ſee him ſtand quaking under the almighty hand of God, ſo that he may write what he will in his bridle, yea in his skin. And if there be any ſuch headſtrong & reſtie ſteed here among us, let him know, that God will either break his ſtomack or his heart: Flagellum equo, ſaith Salomon; & if that will not ſerve, Collidam in te equum & equitem, Ier. 51.21. But alas, how rare are theſe examples of reclamation? Where is this power of the Goſpell? Men continue beaſts ſtill, and with that filthy Gryllus plead for the privilege of their beſtiality. The ſins of men ſtrive to outface the glory of the Goſpell. What ſhall I ſay to this? If after all theſe meanes, thou have no bridle, or thy bridle no inſcription, it is a fearefull doome of the Apoſtle: If our Goſpell be hid, it is hid to them that periſh. Thus much of the horſes & bels. Now from the pots and bowles, you ſhall ſee the degrees of the Churches perfection: and ſee it, I beſeech you, without wearineſſe, with intention. The pots of the Temple were ſeething veſſels for the uſe of ſacrifice: Theſe are the Prieſts themſelves here, for that there is a diſtinction made betwixt the Pots of the Lords houſe, and every pot in Ieruſalem. The ordinary Jew was every pot: therfore the Pots of the Lords houſe muſt be his Miniſters. Theſe under the Goſpell ſhall be of more honourable uſe; (as the bowles before the Altar) like as the Altar of perfumes was more inward, and of higher reſpect. The pots were of ſhining braſſe; bowles of gold, 1 King. 7. 50. It is no brag to ſay, that the Miniſterie of the Goſpell is more glorious than that of the Law: The leaſt in the kingdome of heaven, (ſaith Chriſt) is greater than Iohn Baptiſt, Matth. 11. 11. The kingdome of heaven, that is, the Church; not as Auſten, Ierome, Bede, expound it, of the third heaven; for Chriſt would make an oppoſition betwixt the old and new Teſtament. The not unlearned Jeſuite Maldonat, while he taxeth us for preferring every Miniſter of the Goſpell to Iohn Baptiſt, mends the matter ſo well, that he verifies it of every perſon; Minimus quiſque in Evangelio, that is qui Evangelium recipit, major eſt illo; not feeling how he buffets himſelfe: for if the leaſt of thoſe that receive the Goſpell, how much more the leaſt of thoſe that preach it? This is no arrogance. God would have every thing in the laſt Temple more glorious than in the firſt, which was figured by the outward frame, more glorious in Chriſts time, than that of Salomon; as that was beyond the Tabernacle. This is a better Teſtament, Heb. 7. 22. That had the ſhadow, this the ſubſtance, Heb. 10. Under this, is greater illumination; Effundam ſpiritum meum, ſaith the Prophet; before, ſome few drops diſtilled; now a whole current of graces; Effundam. If therefore Iohn Baptiſt were greater than the ſonnes of men, becauſe they ſaw Chriſt to come, he pointed at him comming; ours muſt needs be more glorious, becauſe we ſee and point at him now come, and fully exhibited. We will not conteſt with the Leviticall Prieſthood, for coſt of clothes, for price of veſſels; let the Church of Rome emulate this pompe, (which cares not if ſhe have golden veſſels, though ſhee have leaden Prieſts,) we envy it not; but for inward graces, for learning, knowledge, power of teaching, there is no leſſe difference, than betwixt the pots of the Temple, and bowles of

of the Altar: God ſayes of them in way of rejection, Non eſt mihi voluntas in vobis, Mal. 1. Hence the Prieſt-hood of the new Law is Levi refined, Mal. 3. 3. Et purgabit filios Levi; which Hierome not unlikely, interprets of the miniſterie of the Goſpell: They are the ſonnes of Levi, which ſignifies Copulation; quia homines cum Deo copulant; but of Levi purged, and purged as gold: As much difference betweene them, as betwixt gold in the Ore, and in the wedge. Hence is double honour challenged to the Evangelicall Miniſtery, yea, and given: Yee received me, ſaith S. Paul, as an Angell of God, yea as Chriſt Jeſus, Gal. 4. 14. Hence the Angell, of himſelfe to John, I am thy fellow-ſervant. Woe be to them therefore which ſpet in the faces of thoſe whom God hath honoured: It is Gods ſecond charge, this of his Prophets: His firſt is, Touch not mine anointed; his ſecond, Hurt not my Prophets. And if one diſgraceſull word ſpoken but by rude children to a Prophet of the old Teſtament, coſt ſo many throats, God be merciſull to thoſe dangerous and deadly affronts that have beene, and are daily offered to the Prophets of the new: What can we ſay, but with the women of Tekoah, Serva ô Rex. We bleſſe God that we may bemoane our ſelves to the tender and indulgent eares of a gracious Soveraigne, ſenſible of theſe ſpirituall wrongs; who yet (we know) may well anſwer us with Iacobs queſtion, An loco Dei ego ſum? It grieves me to thinke and ſay of our ſelves, that for a great part of this, Perditio tua ex te. Woe to thoſe corrupted ſonnes of Heli, which through their inſufficiency and unconſcionableneſſe, have powred contempt on their owne faces. That proud fugitive Campian could ſay, Miniſtris illorum nihil vilius, &c. As falſly as ſpightfully. Let heaven and earth witneſſe, whether any Nation in the world can afford ſo learned, ſo glorious a Clergy. But yet, among ſo many pots of the Temple, it is no marvell if ſome be drie for want of liquor, others ruſty for want of uſe, others full of liquor without meat, others ſo full of meat that they want liquor. Let the Lords anointed, whoſe example and incouragements have raiſed even this divine learning to this excellent perfection, by his gracious countenance, diſpell contempt from the profeſſors of it, and by his effectuall endevours remove the cauſes of this contempt.

But as every Chriſtian under the Goſpell is a Prieſt and Prophet, let the people bee theſe pots, or the offerings of the people. That ſhall be in reſpect of the frequence, or fragrance, according to the double acception of that particle of compariſon (Camiſrachim) as the bowles; for number, or qualitie. For the frequence. A few ſeething pots ſerved the ſacrifice; but bowles they uſed many: what for the uſe of the Altar of incenſe, what for the receiving of the blood of the ſacrifice, Salomon made an 100 of gold. Now then ſaith God, in the dayes of the Goſpell, there ſhall bee ſuch ſtore of oblations to God, that the number of the pots ſhall equalize the number of the bowles of the Altar: not unlike, becauſe of the following words; Every pot in Jeruſalem ſhall be faine to be employed to the ſacrifices. This frequence then, is either of the officers, or offerings; perſons, or acts. For the perſons; they were few in compariſon, under the Law. All Paleſtine, which comprehends all their officers, except ſome few Proſelytes, was but (as Ierome, which was a Lieger there, reckons it) an 160 miles long from Dan to Beerſheba, and 46 miles broad from Ioppa to Bethleem. Now the partition wall is broken downe, all nations under heaven yeeld franke offerers to the Altar of God. There was no offering then but at Jeruſalem: now Jeruſalem is every where. So much therefore as the world is wider than Judea, ſo much as Chriſtendome is larger than the walles of the Temple; ſo many more officers hath the Goſpell than the Law. And it were well, if there were as many, as they ſeeme. If but as many as all the world over offer their preſence to Gods ſervice on Gods day (leave thoſe that ſpend it in the Stewes and Tavernes, to him whom they ſerve) were true offerers, how rich would the Altar be, and the Temple how glorious? But alas, if God will bee ſerved with mouthes full of oathes, curſes, bitterneſſe, with heads full of wine, with eyes full of luſt, with hands full of blood, with backs full of pride, with panches full of gluttonie, with ſoules and lifes full of horrible ſins, he may have offerers as many as men: elſe as Eſay, relicta eſt in urbe ſolitudo; a few pots will hold our ſacrifices: and what is this, but through our wilfull diſobedience, to croſſe him which hath ſaid, that in this day the pots of the Temple ſhall be as the bowles of the Altar. The act or commodity is offerings; whether outward, or inward. The outward fulfilled in thoſe large endowments of the Church, by our devout and bountifull predeceſſors. What liberall revenues, rich maintenances were then put into (mort-maine) the dead hand of the Church? Lawes were faine to reſtraine the bounty of thoſe contributions (the grounds whereof I examine not) in ſtead of Moſes his proclamation, Nequis facito deinceps opus ad oblationem Sanctuarii, ſatis enim eſt, adeoque ſupereſt, Exod. 26. 6. Then mons Domini, mons pinguis: but now the Church may cry with the Prophet, My leanneſſe, my leanneſſe. For ſhame, why ſhould ſacrilege croud in with religion? why ſhould our better knowledge find us leſſe conſcionable? O injurious zeale of thoſe men, which think the Church cannot be holy enough, unleſſe ſhe beg. It hath beene ſaid of old, That Religion bred wealth, and the daughter eat up the mother: I know not, if the daughter devoured the mother; I am ſure theſe men would devour both daughter and mother: Men of vaſt gorges, and inſatiable. Our Saviour cryed out againſt the Scribes and Phariſes, yet they devoured but widowes houſes, poore low cottages: but theſe gulfes of men, whole Churches; and yet the ſepulchers of their throats are open for more. I can tell them of a mouth that is wider than theirs, and that is the Prophets, Os inferni: Therefore Hell hath inlarged it ſelfe, and hath opened his mouth, without meaſure: and their glory, and their pompe, and he that rejoyceth in it, ſhall deſcend into it, Eſa. 5. 14. In the meane time, Oh that our Samſon would pull this hony of the Church out of the jawes of theſe Lyons; or if the cunning conveyances of ſacrilege have made that impoſſible, ſince it lies not now entire in the combes, but is let downe and digeſted by theſe raveners, let him whoſe glory it is not to be Pater Patriæ only, but Pater Eccleſiæ, provide that thoſe few pots we have, may ſtill ſeeth, and that if nothing will be added, nothing can be recovered, yet nothing may be purloyned from the Altars of God. But theſe outward offerings were but the types of the inward: What cares God for the blood or fleſh of bullocks, rams, goats? Non delectaris ſacrificio ut dem, holocauſtum non vis, ſaith David: what then? The ſacrifice of God is a contrite ſpirit, a broken heart. Our humiliation is ſacrificium pœnitentiæ, our new obedience is ſacrificium juſtitiæ, our thankfull commemorations are ſacrificium laudis. Theſe are the oblations which as they ſhall bee frequent under the Goſpell, ſo moſt fragrant unto God: and this is that laſt, and perhaps moſt proper ſenſe, wherein the fleſh-pots of the ſacrifices erunt ſicut aromata, ſhall be as perfumes in the bowles of incenſe. A lively ſacrifice is well matcht with holy and acceptable. When Noah ſacrificed to God after the Deluge, it is ſaid God ſmelt a ſavour of reſt, alluding to his name: but now the ſacrifices we offer are ὀσμὴν εὐωδίας, a ſavour of ſweetneſſe: ſo that the ſame ſavour that Chriſts oblation had, Epheſ. 5. 2. the ſame have our offerings, Philip. 4. 18. Gods children, out of the conſcience of their owne weakneſſes, are eaſily diſcouraged in the valuation of their owne obedience. As therefore they can ſay of their perſons, with Mephiboſheth, What is thy ſervant? ſo of their ſervices, as Philip ſaid of the five loaves and two fiſhes, ἀλλὰ ταῦτα τί ἐστιν, Alas, what are theſe? But they & their offerings cannot be ſo baſe to themſelves, as they are precious to God. There is no ſenſe that gives ſo lively a refreſhing to the ſpirits, as that of ſmelling: no ſmell can yeeld ſo true and feeling delight to the ſenſe, as the offerings of our penitence, obedience, praiſe, ſend up into the noſtrils of the Almighty. Hence as the Church can ſay of Chriſt, He is as a bundle of myrrh lying between her breaſts; ſo he againe of her in that heavenly Epithalamion, Thy plants are as an Orchard of Pomegranates, with ſweet fruits, as cypres, ſpickenard, ſaffron, calamus, and cinamon, with all the trees of incenſe, myrrh, and aloes, with all the chiefe ſpices, Cant. 4. 13. Let this therfore comfort us, againſt our imperfections; If we be pots of the Lords houſe, thoſe faint ſtreams that we ſend up, ſhall be as ſweet, as the beſt incenſe of the bowles of the Altar, & God ſaies to us, as to Cornelius, Thy praiers & thine almes are come up, Act. 10. And how are they come up? Like pillars of ſmoke perfumed with myrrh & incenſe, & with all the chiefe ſpices, Cant. 3. 6. I ſay if we be pots of the Lords houſe; for if we be Ægyptian fleſh-pots, that reeke of the ſtrong-ſmelling onions and garlike of our owne corruptions; If we be Ezechiels bloody pots, whoſe ſcumme or (as the vulgar) whoſe ruſt is in them, Ezec. 24. If we boile with luſt, if with revenge, if with ambition; I can ſay no other of us, than the ſonnes of the Prophets ſaid of theirs,

Mors

A Mors in olla, Death is in the pot; a double death, of body, and ſoule. It is a true ſpeech of Origen, Peccatum eſt putidi odoris: No carion is ſo noiſome. Alas, what ſavours are ſent up to God from thoſe, that would ſeeme not only pots of the Temple, but bowles of the Altar? How unſavoury is the pride, prophaneneſſe, riotouſneſſe, oppreſſion, beaſtlineſſe of our times? It were happy if the Court were free: and as it receives more ſweet influences of favour, than all other places; ſo, that it returned backe more fragrant obedience: that as it is ſaid of Maries ſpicknard, wherewith ſhee anointed Chriſt, that the whole houſe was filled with the ſavour of the ointment, Ioh. 12.3. ſo the whole world might bee full of the pleaſant perfumes of vertuous example, that might ariſe from hence. But alas, the painted faces, and manniſhneſſe, and monſtrous diſguiſedneſſe of the one ſex, the factious hollowneſſe, prodigall gariſhneſſe, wanton pampering, exceſſe in our reſpect to our ſelves, defects in our reſpects to God in the B other, argue too well, that too many of us ſavour more like the golden ſockets of the holy lights, than the bowles of the Altar; God cannot abide theſe ill ſents. The five Cities of the plaines ſent up ſuch poyſonous vapours to God, that he ſent them downe brimſtone againe with their fire. That which hell is deſcribed by, is ſent downe from Heaven, becauſe that ſuch helliſh exhalations aſcend from them, to heaven. How ſhould the ſinnes of Sodome not expect the judgements of Sodome? Well might the Jewes feare, becauſe they would not be ſerviceable caldrons unto God, that therefore they ſhould be the fleſh, and their Citie the caldron, Ezec. 11.3. Well may we feare it, who have had ſo ſenſible proofes, as of the favours, ſo of the judgements of God: and happy ſhall it be for us, if we can ſo feare, that our feare may prevent evils. Let theſe pots of ours therefore ſend up ſweet fumes of contrition, righteouſneſſe, thankſgiving, into the noſtrils of God; and the ſmoke of his diſpleaſure, wherewith coales of C eternall fire are kindled againſt his enemies, ſhall not come forth of his noſtrils againſt us; Hee ſhall ſmell a ſavour of reſt from us; we a ſavour of peace and life from him: which God for his mercy ſake, and for his ſonne Chriſts ſake, vouchſafe to grant us. To whom with the Father, and the holy Ghoſt, one glorious God, bee given all praiſe, honour, and glory, now and for ever.

Amen.

A FAREWELL SERMON.

REVEL. 21. 3.

C And I heard a great voice from heaven, ſaying, Behold the Tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they ſhall be his people, and God himſelfe ſhall bee their God with them.

And God ſhall wipe away all teares from their eies, and there ſhall be no more death, neither ſorrow, nor crying, neither ſhall there be any more paine, for the firſt things are paſſed. And hee that ſate upon the throne ſaid; Behold, I make all things new.

D IT is no wonder, if this place, as it is (for the preſent) the Well-head of ſorrow to all Chriſtendome, have ſent forth abundance of waters of teares. And perhaps, you may expect, that as the trumpets of our late heavy funerall-ſolemnitie, ſounded baſeſt and dolefullеſt, at the laſt, ſo my ſpeech being the laſt publike breath of this ſad diſſolving Family, ſhould bee moſt paſſionately ſorrowfull. And ſurely I could eaſily obtaine of my ſelfe, out of the bitterneſſe of my ſoule, to ſpend my ſelfe in lamentations, and to breake up this aſſembly, in the violent expreſſions of that griefe, wherewith our hearts are already broken: but I well conſider, that we ſhall carry ſorrow enough home with us, in my ſilence; and that it is both more hard, and more neceſſary for us, to be led forth to the waters of comfort. And becauſe our occaſions of griefe are ſuch, as no earthly tongue can releeve us, nor no earthly object, A voice from heaven ſhall doe it, and a voice leading us from earth to heaven, And I heard a voice from heaven, &c.

E This day is a day of note for three famous periods. Firſt, it is the day of the diſſipation of this Royall Family. Then, the laſt day of our publike and joynt mourning. Laſtly, the day of the alteration and renewing of our ſtate, and courſe of life, with the New-yeere. All theſe meet in this Text with their cordialls, and divine remedies; Our diſſipation and diſſolution in theſe words, Behold the Tabernacle of God is with men. Our mourning, God ſhall wipe away all teares, &c. Our change of eſtate, Behold, I will make all things new. I muſt crave leave to glide thorow all of theſe with much ſpeed, and (for the better conveniencie of our diſcourſe) thorow the firſt, laſt.

My ſpeech therefore ſhall as it were climbe up theſe ſix ſtaires of doctrine.

1. That here our eies are full of teares: how elſe ſhould they be wip't away? how all, unleſſe many? A

2. That theſe teares are from ſorrow; and this ſorrow from death, and toyle, out of the connexion of all theſe.

3. That God will once free us, both from teares which are the effect of ſorrow, and from toyle and death, which are the cauſes of it.

4. That this our freedome muſt be upon a change; for that the firſt things are paſſed.

5. That this change ſhall be in our Renovation. Behold I make all things new.

6. That this renovation and happy change ſhall be in our perpetuall fruition of the inſeparable preſence of God, whoſe Tabernacle ſhall be with men.

As thoſe grounds that lie low are commonly mooriſh, this baſe part of the world wherein we live, is the vale of teares, That true Bochim, as the Iſraelites called their mourning-place: We begin our life with teares, & therefore our Lawyers define life, by weeping; if a child were heard cry, it is a lawfull proofe of his living: elſe if he be dead, we ſay he is ſtill-borne; and at our parting God finds teares in our eies, which he ſhall wipe off. So we find it alwayes, not onely (לבכות עה) a time of weeping, but (סבורך) of ſolemne mourning, as Salomon puts them together, Eccl. 3.4. Except we be in that caſe that David and his people were in, (and Ieremie ſayes the ſame in his Lamentations, of the Jewes) that they wept till they could weepe no more: Here are teares at our devotion; The Altar covered with teares, Mal. 2. Teares in the bed, David watered his couch with teares, Pſal. 6. Teares to waſh with, as Maries. Teares to eat, Pſal. 42.3. Teares to drinke, Pſal. 80. yea drunkenneſſe with teares, Eſay 16.9. This is our deſtiny as we are men, but more as we are Chriſtians, To ſow in Teares; and God loves theſe wet ſeed-times; they are ſeaſonable for us here below: Thoſe men therefore are miſtaken, that think to goe to heaven with dry eyes, and hope to leape immediately out of the pleaſures of earth, into the Paradiſe of God; inſulting over the drouping eſtate of Gods diſtreſſed ones. As Ierome, and Bede, ſay of Peter, that he could not weepe while he was in the High Prieſts walls, ſo theſe men cannot weep where they have offended. But let them know that they muſt have a time of teares, and if they doe not begin with teares, they ſhall end with them; Woe be to them that laugh, for they ſhall weepe; and if they will not weepe, and ſhake their heads here, they ſhall weepe and waile, and gnaſh their teeth hereafter: Here muſt be teares, and that good ſtore: All teares; as rivers are called the teares of the Sea; (נבבי ים) Iob 38. ſo muſt our teares be the rivers of our eies, Pſal. 119.136. and our eies fountaines, Ier. 9.1. Here muſt be teares of penitence, teares of compaſſion, and will be teares of ſorrow: Well are thoſe two met therefore; teares and ſorrow: for though ſome ſhed teares for ſpight, others for joy, as Cyprians Martyrs, Gaudium pectoris lachrymis exprimentes; yet commonly teares are the juyce of a mind preſſed with griefe; And as well doe teares, and crying, and ſorrow, accompany death; either in the ſuppoſition, or the deniall; For as worldly ſorrow (even in this ſenſe) cauſeth death, by drying the bones, and conſuming the body: ſo death ever lightly, is a juſt cauſe of ſorrow; ſorrow to nature in our ſelves, ſorrow to ours. And as death is the terribleſt thing, ſo it is the ſaddeſt thing, that befals a man. Nature could ſay in the Poet, Quis matrem in funere nati Flere vetat? yea God himſelf allowed his holy Prieſts, to pollute themſelves in mourning, for their neereſt dead friends, except the High Prieſt; which was forbidden it in figure. And the Apoſtle while he forbids the Theſſalonians to mourne, as without hope, doth in a ſort command their teares, but bar their immoderation. It was not without a ſpeciall reference to a judgement, that God ſayes to Ezechiel, Sonne of Man, behold I will take from thee the pleaſure of thy life with a plague, yet ſhalt thou neither mourne nor weepe, neither ſhall thy teares run downe. So fit did the Jewes hold teares for Funerals, that they hired mourners, which with incompoſed geſtures ran up and downe the ſtreets, Eccl. 12. who did alſo cut and lance themſelves, that they might mourne in earneſt, Ier. 16. That good natur'd Patriarch Iſaac, mourned three yeeres for his mother, as the Chineſes doe at this day for their friends. Iacob mourned two and twenty yeares for Ioſeph: and there want not ſome, which have thought Adam and Eve mourned

A ned an 100 yeares for Abel: but, who knowes not the wailings of Abel-mitzraim for Ioseph; of the valley of Megiddon for Iosiah? And if ever any corps deserved to swim in teares, if ever any losse could command lamentation; then this ofours, yea of this whole Iland, yea of the whole Church of God, yea of the whole world, justly calls for it, and truly hath it.

O Henry our sweet Prince, our sweet Prince Henry, the second glory of our Nation, ornament of mankind, hope of posterity, and life of our life, how doe all hearts bleed, and eies worthily gush out, for thy losse! A losse, that we had neither grace to feare, nor have capacity to conceive. Shall I praise him to you, who are therefore now miserable, because you did know him so well? I forbeare it; though to my paine; If I did not spare you, I could not so swiftly passe over the name, and the vertues of that glorious Saint, our deare Master, or the aggravation of that losse,
B whereof you are too sensible: my true commiseration shall command me silence: yet I could not but touch our sore (with this light hand) tho yet raw and bleeding: Death (especially such a death) must have sorrow and teares; All Nations, all succession of times shall beare a part with us in this lamentation: And if we could but as heartily have prayed for him before, as we have heartily wept for him since; perhaps we had not had this cause of mourning. From sorrow, let us descend to paines (which is no small cause of crying and teares) as I feare some of us must: the word howsoever it is here translated, is (πονος) labour; I must confesse, labour and paine are neere one another; whence we say, that he which labours, takes paines; and contrarily, that a woman is in labour, or travell, when she is in the paine of child-birth; teares cannot be wip't away whiles toyle remaines; That the Israelites, may leave crying, they must be delivered from the brick-kilnes of Ægypt. Indeed, God had in
C our creation alotted us labour, without paine; but when once sinne came into the soule, paine seized upon the bones, and the mind was possessed with a wearinesse, and irksome loathing of what it must doe: and ever since, sorrow and labour have beene inseparable attendants upon the life of man: Insomuch as God, when he would describe to us the happy estate of the dead, does it in those termes, They shall rest from their labours: Look into the field, there you shall see toyling at the plough and sithe. Looke into the waters, there you see tugging at the oares and cabels. Looke into the City, there you see plodding in the streets, sweating in the shops. Looke into the studies, there you see fixing of eies, tossing of bookes, scratching the head, paleneſſe, infirmity. Look into the Court, there you see tedious attendance, emulatory officiousneſſe. All things are full of labour, and labour is full of sorrow. If we doe
D nothing, idleneſſe is wearisome; if any thing, worke is wearisome; in one or both of these, the best of life is consumed. Who now can be in love with a life, that hath nothing in it but crying, and teares, in the entrance; death, in the conclusion; labour and paine in the continuance; and sorrow in all these? What Gally-slave but we would be in love with our chaine? what prisoner would delight in his dungeon? How hath our infidelity besotted us, if we doe not long after that happy estate of our immortality, wherein all our teares shall be wip't away; and we at once free from labour, sorrow, and death? Now, as it is vaine to hope for this till then; so then not to hope for it, is paganish and brutish. He that hath tasked us with these penances, hath undertaken to release us. God shall wipe away all teares.

While we stay here, he keepes all our teares in a bottle, so precious is the water that is Psal.56.
distilled from penitent eies; and because he will be sure not to faile, he notes how many drops there be, in his register. It was a pecious ointment, wherewith the woman in E the Pharises house (it is thought Mary Magdalen) anointed the feet of Christ: but her Luke.7.37.
teares wherewith she washt them, were more worth than her spiknard. But that which is here precious, is there unseasonable; then he shall wipe away those which here he would save. As death, so passions are the companions of infirmitie; Whereupon some that have beene too nice, have called those which were incident into Christ, Propassions; not considering that he which was capable of death, might be as well of passions. These troublesome affections of griefe, feare, and such like, doe not fall into glorified soules. It is true, that they have love, desire, joy in their greatest perfection: yea they could not have perfection without them; but like as God loves, and hates, and rejoyces truly, but in a manner of his owne, abſtracted from all infirmity, and paſſion: ſo doe his glorified Saints in imitation of him. There therefore, as we cannot die, ſo we cannot grieve, we cannot be afflicted. Here one ſayes, My belly, my belly, with the Prophet; another, Mine head, mine head, with the Shunamites ſonne; another, My ſonne, my ſonne, as David; another, My father, my father, with Eliſha. One cryes out of his ſins, with David; another of his hunger, with Eſau; another of an ill wife, with Iob; another, of treacherous friends, with the Pſalmiſt; One of a ſore in body, with Ezechias; another of a troubled ſoule, with our Saviour in the garden; every one hath ſome complaint, or other, to make his cheeks wet, and his heart heavy. Stay but a while, and there ſhall be none of theſe: There ſhall be no crying, no complaining in the ſtreets of the new Jeruſalem: No axe, no hammer ſhall be heard within this heavenly Temple. Why are we not content to weepe here a while, on condition that we may weepe no more? Why are we not ambitious of this bleſſed eaſe? Certainly, we doe not ſmart enough with our evils, that we are not deſirous of reſt; Theſe teares are not yet dry, yet they are ready to be overtaken by others, for our particular afflictions. Miſeries, as the Pſalmiſt compares them, are like waves, which breake one upon another, and toſſe us with a perpetuall vexation; and we vaine men, ſhall we not wiſh to be in our heaven? Are we ſick, and grieve to think of remedy? Are we ſtill dying, and are we loth to thinke of life? Oh this miſerable unbeleefe, that tho we ſee a glorious heaven above us, yet we are unwilling to goe to it: we ſee a weariſome world about us, and yet are loth to think of leaving it: This gracious maſter of ours, whoſe diſſolution is ours, while he was here amongſt us, his princely crowne could not keepe his head from paine, his golden rod could not drive away his fevers; now is he freed from all his aches, agues, ſtitches, convulſions, cold ſweats: now he triumphs in glory, amongſt the Angels and Saints; now he walkes in white robes, and attends on the glorious bridegroome of the Church; and doe we think he would be content now, for all the Kingdomes of the world, to be as he was? We that profeſſe it was our joy and honour to follow him, whitherſoever he had gone; In his diſports, in his warres, in his travels; why are we not now ambitious of following him to his better crowne; yea of reigning together with him, (for heaven admits of this equality) in that glory, wherein he reignes with his Saviour and ours? Why doe we not now heartily, with him that was raviſhed into the third heaven, ſay, Cupio diſſolvi & eſſe cum Chriſto, not barely to be diſſolved; a malecontent may doe ſo; but therefore to be diſſolved, that we may be with Chriſt, poſſeſſed of his everlaſting glory, where we ſhall not onely not weepe, but rejoyce and ſing Halleluiahs for ever; not onely not die, but enjoy a bleſſed and heavenly life. Even ſo Lord Jeſus come quickly. Now if any man ſhall aske the Diſciples queſtion: Maſter, when ſhall theſe things be; the celeſtiall voice tels him, it muſt be upon a change; For the firſt things are paſſed; It ſhall be in part, ſo ſoone as ever our firſt things, our life, the condition of our mortality are paſſed over; It ſhall be fully, when the firſt things of the world are paſſed; Paſſed not by abolition, but by immutation, as that Father ſaid well; Not the frame of the world, but the corruption of that frame muſt paſſe. The Spirit of God is not curious, he calls thoſe things firſt, which were onely former; not in reſpect of the ſtate which is, but that which ſhall be; For thoſe things which were firſt of all, were like their Maker; good, not capable of deſtruction: Our ſinnes tainted the whole creation, and brought ſhame upon all the frame of heaven, and earth: That which we did, ſhall be diſanulled, that which God did, ſhall ſtand for ever; and this diſſolution ſhall be our glory: other diſſolutions ſtrike teares into our eyes; as this day is witneſſe: it is our ſorrow that the firſt things are paſſed, our offices, our penſions, our hopes, our favours, and (which we eſteemed moſt) our ſervices are gone: Let this laſt diſſolution comfort us againſt the preſent. Who can grieve to ſee a familie diſſolved, that conſiders the world muſt be diſſolved? This little world of ours, firſt, whereof this day gives us an image: for as our ſervice, ſo our life muſt away; and then that great one, whoſe diſſolution is repreſented in theſe. The difference is, that whereas this diſſolution brings teares to ſome eies, that wipes them away from all: for all our teares, and ſorrow, and toyle, and crying,

2. Kings 4.

A crying, and death, are for our ſins; take away corruption, and miſery goes away with it, and till then, it will never be removed: No man puts new wine into old veſſels; much leſſe will God put the new wine of glory, into the old veſſells of corruption: They are our ſinnes, which as in particular they have rob'd us of our Prince, changed our ſeaſons, ſwept away thouſands with varieties of deaths, ſo in generall, they have deformed the face of heaven and earth, and made all the Creation ſigh and groane, and ſtill make us incapable of the perfection of our bleſſedneſſe; for while the firſt things continue, there muſt needs be teares, and ſorrow, and death. Let us therefore look upon heaven and earth as goodly creatures; but, as blemiſhed, as tranſitory, as thoſe which we ſhall once ſee more glorious. Let us looke upon our ſelves with indignation, which have thus diſtained them; and as thoſe which after ſome terme of their cottage expired, are aſſured they ſhall have a marble palace built for them, doe long after the time pre-
B fixed them, and thinke the dayes and moneths pace ſlowly away, till then; ſo let us earneſtly deſire the day of the diſſolution of this great houſe of the world, that wee may have our conſummation in the new heaven. For ſo ſoone as ever the old is paſt, Behold (ſaith God) I will make all things new. Yea, the paſſage of the one, is the renewing of the other: As the Snake is renewed, not by putting on any new coat, but by leaving his ſlough behind him: the gold is purified, by leaving his droſſe in the fire; Therefore he addes, not, I will, but, I doe make all new; and becauſe this is a great work, behold a great Agent; He that ſate upon the Throne ſaid, Behold I make all new.

A Throne ſignifies Majeſty, and ſitting permanence or perpetuitie: God ſayes, Heaven is my Throne, in the Pſalme: but as Salomons throne of ivory and gold, was the beſt peece of his houſe; So Gods throne is the moſt glorious heaven, the heaven of C heavens; for you ſee that tho heaven and earth paſſe away, yet Gods throne remain'd ſtill, and he ſitting on it; neither ſinne nor diſſolution, may reach to the Empyreall heaven, the ſeat of God.

Here is a ſtate worthy of the King of Kings; All the thrones of earthly Monarchs, are but peeces of his foot-ſtoole. And as his throne is majeſticall and permanent, ſo is his reſidence in it; He ſate in the throne. S. Stephen ſaw him ſtanding, as it were ready for his defence and protection: S. Iohn ſees him ſitting (as our Creed alſo runnes) in regard of his inalterable glory. How brittle the thrones of earthly Princes are, and how they doe rather ſtand than ſit in them, and how ſlippery they ſtand too, we feele this day, and lament. O Lord, eſtabliſh the throne of thy ſervant our King, and let his ſeed endure for ever. Let his throne be as the Sunne before thee for evermore; and as the Moone a faithfull witneſſe in heaven. But howſoever it bee with our earth-
D ly Gods, of his Kingdome there is no end. Here is a maſter for Kings, whoſe glory it is, to riſe up from their thrones, and throw downe their Crownes at his feet, and to worſhip before his foot-ſtoole.

Be wiſe therefore, O ye Kings; be learned ye Rulers of the earth: ſerve this Lord in feare, and rejoyce in him with trembling.

Yea behold here (ſince we have the honour to ſerve him, whom Kings ſerve) a royall Maſter for us; It was one of our ſinnes, I feare, that we made our Maſter, our God; I meane, that we made fleſh our arme; and placed that confidence in him, for our earthly ſtay, which wee ſhould have fixed in heaven: Our too much hope hath left us comfortleſſe: Oh that we could now make God our Maſter, and truſt him ſo much the more, as we have leſſe in earth to truſt to. There is no ſervice to the King of hea-
E ven; for both his throne is everlaſting and unchangeable, and his promotions certaine and honourable: He that ſits on the Throne hath ſaid it, To him that overcomes will I give to ſit with me in my throne; even as I overcame and ſit with my Father in his throne. Behold, yee ambitious ſpirits, how ye may truly riſe to more than ever the ſonnes of Zebedee deſired to aſpire to: ſerving is the way to reigning; ſerve him that ſits vpon the Throne, and ye ſhall ſit your ſelves upon the Throne with him.

This is the Agent; the act is fit for him, I make all things new. Even the very Turks in their Alcoran, can ſubſcribe to that of Tertullian, Quæ potuit facere, poteſt & reficere: I feare to wrong the holy Majeſty with my rude compariſon; It is not ſo much to God, to make a world, as for us, to ſpeak: He ſpake the word and it was done: There is no change which is not from him: Hee makes new Princes, new yeeres, new governments, and will make new heavens, new earth, new inhabitants; how easie then is it for him, to make new provisions for us? If we be left destitute, yet where is our faith? Shall God make us new bodies, when they are gone to dust? shall he make new heavens, and new earth, and shall not he (whose the earth is, and the fulnesse thereof) provide some new meanes, and courses of life for us, while we are upon earth? Is the maintenance of one poore worme more than the renewing of heaven and earth? shall he be able to raise us when we are not, and shall hee not sustaine us while we are?

Away with these weake diffidences; and if wee bee Christians, trust God with his owne: Wait thou on the Lord, and keepe his wayes, and he shall exalt thee. He will make all things new: And shall all things be made new, and our hearts bee old? shall nothing but our soules be out of the fashion? Surely beloved, none but new hearts are for the new heavens: Except we be borne anew, we enter not into life. All other things shall in the very instant receive their renovation; onely our hearts must be made new before hand, or else they shall never be renewed to their glory. S. Peter, when he had told us of looking for new heavens, and new earth; infers this use upon it; wherefore (beloved) seeing yee looke for such things, be diligent, that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blamelesse. Behold, the new heavens require pure and spotlesse inhabitants. As ever therefore we looke to have our part in this blessed renovation, let us cast off all our euill and corrupt affections, put off the old man with his works, and now with the new yeere, put on the new: labour for a new heart, begin a new life. That which S. Iohn saies here, that God will say and doe in our entrance to glorification; Behold, I make all things new. Saint Paul saith he hath done it already, in our regeneration; Old things are passed away, all things are become new. What meanes this, but that our regeneration must make way for our glorification, and that our glory must but perfect our regeneration? and God supposes this is done, when there are meanes to doe it. Why doe we then still (in spight of the Gospell) retaine our old corruptions, and think to go to the wedding feast in our old clothes? if some of us doe not rather (as the vulgar reads that, Iudg. 10. 6.) Addere nova veteribus, adde new sins to our old; new oathes, new fashions of pride, new complements of drunkennesse, new devices of filthinesse, new tricks of Machiavelisme: these are our novelties which fetch downe from God new judgements upon us, to the tingling of the eares of all hearers, and for which Topheth was prepared of old. If God have no better newes for us, wee shall never enjoy the new heaven with him. For Gods sake therefore, and for our soules sake, let us be wiser, and renew our covenant with God; and seeing this is a day of gifts, let my New-yeers-gift to you be this holy advice from God, which may make you happy for ever: Let your New-yeeres-gift to God be your hearts, the best part of your selves, the center of your selves, to which all our actions are circumferences: and if they be such a present, as we have reason to feare God will not accept, because they are sinfull; yet if they be humbled, if penitent, we know we will receive them: A contrite and a broken heart, O God, thou wilt not despise. And if we cannot give him our hearts, yet give him our desires, and he will take our unworthy hearts from us; I will take the stony hearts out of their bodies, Ezec. 11. 19. and he will gratiously returne an happy New-yeeres-gift to us, I will put a new spirit within their bowels, and will give them an heart of flesh. He will create a cleane heart, and renew a right spirit within us; so, as he will make a new heaven for us, he will make us new for this heaven; he will make his Tabernacle in us, that hemay make ours with him. Behold, the Tabernacle of God is with men &c.

The superstitious Listrians cryed out amazed, that Gods were come downe to them in the likenesse of men: but we Christians know, that it is no rare thing for God to come and dwell with men; Yee are the Temples of the living God, and I will dwell among them and walke there. The faithfull heart of man is the Tabernacle of God. But because though God be ever with us, wee are not alwayes so with him, yea whiles we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord, as S. Paul complaines, therefore will God vouchsafe us a neerer cohabitation that shall not be capable of any interposition, of any absence. Behold, the Tabernacle of God is with men. But besides this Tabernacle of flesh, time was when God dwelt in a materiall visible house with men: Hee had his Tabernacle

Tabernacle first, which was a moving Temple; and then his Temple, which was a fixed Tabernacle: both of them had one measure, both one name. But, as one said upon that, Ezec. 42. Mensus est, similitudinem domus; that both the Tabernacle and Temple were similitudes of Gods house, rather than the house it selfe: so say I, that they were intended for notable resemblances both of the holy Church of God upon earth, and of the glorious Sanctuarie of heaven. This is the true היבל of God, which word signifieth both a Temple, Ezra 4. 1. and a Palace, Dan. 1. 4. because he dwels where he is worshipped, and he is magnificent in both: It is the materiall Tabernacle which is alluded to, the immateriall which is promised; A Tabernacle that goes a thousand times more beyond the glittering Temple of Salomon, than Salomons Temple went beyond the Tabernacle of Moses: Neither let it trouble any man, that the name of a Tabernacle implies flitting and uncertainty. For as the Temple, howsoever it were called (בת עלם) a house of Ages; yet lasted not (either the first, I meane, or second) unto 500. yeers: so this house, though God call it a Tabernacle, yet he makes it an everlasting habitation; for he tels us, that both age and death are gone before it come downe to men. But why rather doth the Tabernacle of God descend to men, than men ascend to it? Whether this be in respect of Iohns vision, to whom the new Ierusalem seemed to descend from heaven; descendit (as one saith) innotescenda, & therefore it is resembled by all the riches of this inferiour world, gold, precious stones, pearle; or whether heaven is therefore said to descend to us, because it meets us in the ayre, when Christ Jesus attended with innumerable Angels shall descend to fetch his elect; or whether this phrase be used for a greater expression of love, and mercy, since it is more for a Prince to come to us, than for us to goe to his Court. Certainly, God meanes onely in this to set forth that perpetuall and reciprocall conversation, which he will have with men: They shall dwell with God, God shall dwell with them. Our glory begins ever in grace: God doth dwell with all those in grace, with whom he will dwell in glory: Every Christian carries in his bosome a shrine of God; know ye not that Christ Iesus is in you, saith S. Paul. Whereseever God dwels, there is his Temple: wilt thou pray in the Temple, pray in thy selfe, saith Austen.

Here is the Altar of a cleane heart, from which the sweet incense of our praiers, as a pleasant perfume, is sent up into the nostrils of God: Here are the pure candles of our faith ever burning before God, night and day; never to be extinguished: Here is the spirituall Shew-bread, the bread of life standing ever ready upon the Table of the soule: Here doth the Arke of the heart, in the inwardest of the brest, keepe the Law of God, and that Manna that came downe from heaven: Here God dwels, and here he is worshipped. Behold, what need we care whither we goe, while we carry the God of heaven with us? He is with us, as our companion, as our guide, as our guest: No impotency of person, no crosse of estate, no distance of place, no opposition of men, no gates of hell can separate him from us: Hee hath said it, I will not leave, nor forsake thee: We are all now parting one from another: and now is loosing a knot of the most loving, and entire fellowship, that ever met in the Court of any Prince: our sweet Master (that was compounded of all lovelinesse) infused this gracious harmony into our hearts; now we are saluting our last, and every one is with sorrow enough, taking his owne way: how safe, how happy shall we be, if each of us shall have God to goe with him! Certainly (my deare fellowes) we shall never complaine of the want of Masters, of friends, while we find our selves sure of him; nothing can make us miserable while we are furnished with him. Shall we thinke he cannot fare ill that hath money in his purse; and shall we thinke he can miscarry that hath God in his heart? How shall not all comfort, all happinesse accompany that God, whose presence is the cause of all blessednesse? He shall counsell us in our doubts, direct us in our resolutions, dispose of us in our estates, cheere us in our distresses, prosper us in our lives, and in our deaths crowne us. And if such felicity follow upon Gods dwelling with us in these smoky cottages of our mortalitie, where we (through our unquiet corruptions) will not suffer our selves to have a full fruition of God; what happinesse shall there bee in our dwelling with God, in those eternall Tabernacles of rest and glory? Beloved, there is no losse, no misery, which the meditation of heaven cannot digest: we have lived in in the eye of a Prince, whose countenance was able to put life into any beholder: How oft hath that face shined upon us, and we have found our heart warme with those comfortable beames? Behold, we shall live with that God, in whose presence is the fulnesse of joy: we have lived in the society of worthy men; yet, but men; subject to all passions, infirmities, selfe-respects: which of us all can have escaped without some unkindnesses, detractions, emulations? Earthly Courts can be no more without these, than these can be without corruption: there, we shall live in the company of innumerable Angels, and the spirits of just and perfect men; neither can there be any jar in Revel. 19. 3. these Hallelujahs, which wee shall all sing to God. Wee have lived to see the magnificence of earthly Princes, and to partake of it; in their buildings, furnitures, feasts, triumphs; in their wealth, pompe, pleasures: But open your eyes and see the new Jerusalem, the Citie of the great King of Saints, and all these sublunary vanities shall be contemned. Here you shall see a foure square Citie; the wals of Jasper, the foundations garnished with all precious stones, Twelve gates of twelve pearles, The houses and streets of pure gold, like shining glasse: A Crystall river runs in the midst of it; and on the banks of it growes the tree of life; ever greene, ever fruitfull; this is for the eye. The eare shall be filled with the melody of Angels, ever singing, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almightie. The taste shall be satisfied with Manna, the food of Angels, with the fruit of the tree of life, with that new wine which our Saviour hath promised to drinke with us in his Kingdome; These are the dimme shadowes of our future blessednesse. At thy right hand O God are pleasures for evermore; and such pleasures, as if they could be expressed or conceived, were not worthy of our longings, nor able to satisfie us: Oh that wee could so much the more long to enjoy them, by how much lesse we are able to comprehend them! When S. Paul made his Fare-well sermon to the Ephesians, hee fetcht teares from the eyes of his auditors (so full of holy passion was his speech) especially with that one clause. And now behold I

Act. 20. 25. know, that henceforth you all, through whom I have gone preaching the Kingdome of God, shall see my face no more: A sad clause indeed, You shall see my face no more. The mind of man cannot endure to take a finall leave of any thing that offends it not; but the face of a friend, of a companion, hath so much pleasure in it, that wee cannot without much sorrow thinke of seeing it our last: But what if we shall meet here no more? what if we shall no more see one anothers face? Brethren, wee shall once meet together above; we shall once see the glorious face of God, and never look off againe.

Let it not over-grieve us to leave these Tabernacles of stone, since we must shortly lay downe these Tabernacles of clay, and enter into Tabernacles not made with hands; eternall in the heavens. Till then, farewell my deare brethren, farewell in the Lord: Goe in peace, and live as those that have lost such a Master, and as those that serve a Master, whom they cannot lose: And the God of peace goe with you, and prosper you in all your wayes; and so fix this Tabernacle in you upon earth, that you may bee received into those Tabernacles of the new Jerusalem, and dwell with him for ever, in that glory which hee hath provided for all that love him.

Amen.

SERMON PREACHED

at Pauls Crosse upon the anniversarie Solemnitie of the happy Inauguration of our dread Soveraigne Lord, King James, March 24. 1613.

By Ios. Hall.

¶ Imprinted at London, 1634.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

SIR IOHN SWINERTON

Knight, Lord Maior of the Citie of LONDON,

All Grace and Happineſſe.

RIght Honourable:

MY owne forwardneſſe (whereof it repenteth me not) hath ſent forth other of my labours unbidden, but this your effectuall importunitie hath drawne forth into the common light. It is an holy deſire that the eye may ſecond the eare in any thing that may helpe the ſoule: and we, that are fiſhers of men, ſhould be wanting to our ſelves, if we had not baits for both thoſe ſenſes. I plead not the diſadvantage of a dead letter, in reſpect of that life which elocution puts into any diſcourſe. Such as it is, I make it both publike and yours. I have cauſed my thoughts, ſo neere as I could, to goe backe to the very tearmes wherein I expreſſed them, as thinking it better to fetch thoſe words I have let fall, than to follow thoſe I muſt take up. That therefore which it pleaſed your Lo. to heare with ſuch patient attention, and with so good affection to desire, I not unwillingly suffer abroad, that these papers may speak that permanently to the eyes of all our Countrymen, which in the passage found such favour in the eares of your Citizens, and such roome in so many hearts. Besides your first and vehement motion for the Presse, your knowne love to learning deserves a better acknowledgement, and no doubt finds it from more worthy hands. And if my gratulation would adde any thing, those should envy you which will not imitate you. For the rest, God give your Lo. a wise, understanding, and courageous heart, that you may prudently and strongly menage these wilde times, upon which you are fallen: and by your holy example and powerfull endevours, helpe to shorten these raines of licentiousnesse: That so this Citie, which is better taught than any under heaven, may teach all other places how to live; and may honour that profession which hath made it renounced, and all Gods Church joyfull: The welfare and happinesse whereof, and your Lo. in it, is unfainedly wished, by

Your Lordships humbly devoted,

IOS. HALL.

AN HOLY PANEGYRICKE.

1 Sam. 12. 24, 25.

Therefore feare you the Lord, and ſerve him in truth with all your hearts, and conſider how great things he hath done for you. But if you doe wickedly, yee ſhall periſh, both yee and your King.

I Hold it no ſmall favour of God (Right Honourable and beloved) that hee hath called mee to the ſervice of this day, both in the name of ſuch a people, to praiſe him for his Anointed, and in his name to praiſe his anointed to his people. The ſame hand that gives the opportunity, vouchſafe to give ſucceſſe to this buſineſſe. That which the Jewes ſinned in but deſiring, it is our happineſſe to enjoy. I need not call any other witneſſe than this day, wherein we celebrate the bleſſing of a King, and (which is more) of a King higher than other Princes by the head and ſhoulders. And if other yeeres had forgotten this tribute of their loyalty and thankfulneſſe, yet the example of thoſe ancient Romane Chriſtians (as Euſebius and Sozomen report) would have taught us, that the tenth compleat yeere of our Conſtantine deſerves to be ſolemne and Jubilar. And if our ill nature could be content to ſmother this mercy in ſilence, the very Lepers of Samaria ſhould riſe up againſt us and ſay, We doe not well; this is a day of good tidings, and we hold our peace. My diſcourſe yet ſhall not be altogether laudatorie; but as Samuels, led in with exhortation, and carried out with threatning. For this Text is a compoſition of duties, favours, dangers: of duties which we owe, of favours received, of dangers threatned. The duties that God lookes for of us, come before the mention of the favours we have received from him (though after their receit) to teach us, that as his mercy, ſo our obedience ſhould be abſolute: and the danger followes both, to make us more carefull, to hold the favours, and performe the duties. And me thinkes there cannot be a more excellent mixture. If we ſhould heare only of the favours of God, nothing of our duties, we ſhould fall into conceitedneſſe: if onely of our duties, without recognition of his favours, we ſhonld prove uncheerefull; and if both of theſe without mention of any danger, we ſhould preſume on our favours, and be ſlack in our duties. Prepare therefore your Chriſtian eares and hearts for this threefold cord of God, that (through his bleſſing) theſe duties may draw you to obedience, the dangers to a greater awe, and the favours to a further thankfulneſſe.

Decimum quemque annum Imperatores Romani magna feſtivitate celebrant, Sozom. l. 1. c. 24. Idem Euſeb. de vita Conſt.

The goodneſſe of theſe outward things is not ſuch as that it can privilege every deſire of them from ſin. Monarchie is the beſt of governments, and likeſt to his rule that ſits in the aſſembly of Gods. One God, one King, was the acclamation of thoſe ancient Chriſtians: and yet it was miſ-deſired of the Iſraelites: We may not ever deſire that which is better in it ſelfe, but that which is better for us; Neither muſt we follow our conceit in this judgement, but the appointment of God; Now, though God had appointed in time, both a Scepter and a Law-giver to Iuda, yet they ſinned in mending the paſe of God, and ſpurring on his decree. And if they had ſtaid his leaſure, ſo that they had deſired that which was beſt in it ſelfe, beſt for them, appointed by God, and now appointed; yet the manner and ground offended: For out of an humour of innovation, out of diſcontent, out of diſtruſt, out of an itch of conformitie to other Nations, to aske a King, it was not onely a ſin, as they confeſſe, verſ. 29. but (ragnah rabbah) a great wickedneſſe, as Samuel tels them, verſ. 17. and (as oftentimes we may read Gods diſpleaſure in the face of heaven) he ſhewes it in the weather. God thunders and raines in the middeſt of wheat-harveſt. The thunder was fearfull; the raine in that hot climate and ſeaſon, ſtrangely unſeaſonable: both to be in the inſtant of Samuels ſpeech, was juſtly miraculous. The heathen Poets bring in their fained God thundring in applauſe; I never find the true God did ſo. This voice of God brake theſe Cedars of Lebanon, and made theſe Hinds to calve; and now they cry Peccavimus, verſe. 19. If ever we will ſtoop, the judgements of God will bring us on our knees. Samuel takes vantage of their humiliation, and according to the golden ſentence of that Samian-wiſe-man, that bids us lay weight upon the loden, (how ever Hierom take it in another ſenſe) he lades them with theſe three duties; Feare, ſervice, conſideration.

Feare and ſervice goe ſtill together. Serve the Lord in feare, ſaith David. Feare the Lord and ſerve him, ſaith Ioſhua; And, feare ever before ſervice, for that unleſſe our ſervice proceed from feare, it is hollow and worthleſſe. One ſaies well, that theſe inward diſpoſitions are as the kernell; outward acts are as the ſhell; he is but a deafe nut therefore, that hath outward ſervice, without inward feare: Feare God (ſaith Salomon) firſt, & then, keepe his commandements. Behold, the ſame tongue that bade them not feare, verſ. 20. now bids them feare; and the ſame ſpirit that tells us they feared exceedingly (ver. 18.) now injoynes them to feare more. What ſhall we make of this? Their other feare was at the beſt Initiall; for now they began to repent; and as one ſaies of this kind of feare, that it hath two eyes fixed on two divers objects, ſo had this of theirs: One eye looked upon the raine and thunder; the other looked up to the God that ſent it. The one of theſe it borrowed of the ſlaviſh or hoſtile feare (as Baſil calls it,) the other of the filiall; for the ſlaviſh feare caſts both eies upon the puniſhment; the filiall lookes with both eyes on the party offended. Now then Samuel would rectifie and perfect this affection, and would bring them from the feare of ſlaves through the feare of penitents, to the feare of ſonnes: and indeed one of theſe make way for another. It is true that perfect love thruſts out feare: but it is as true, that feare brings in that perfect love which is joyned with the reverence of ſonnes. Like as the needle or briſtle (ſo one compares it) drawes in the thred after it, or as the potion brings health. The compunction of feare (ſaith Gregorie) fits the mind for the compunction of love. We ſhall never rejoyce truly in God, except it be with trembling: Except we have quaked at his thunder, we ſhall never joy in his ſun-ſhine. How ſeaſonably therefore doth Samuel, when he ſaw them ſmitten with that guilty and ſervile feare, call them to the reverentiall feare of God; Therefore feare ye the Lord? It is good ſtriking, when God hath ſtriken; there is no fiſhing ſo good as in troubled waters. The conſcience of man is a nice and ſullen thing: and if it be not taken at fit times, there is no medling with it. Tell one of our gallants, in the midſt of all his jollity and revels, of devotion, of pietie, of judgements; he hath the Athenian queſtion ready, What will this babler ſay? Let that man alone till God hath toucht his ſoule with ſome terror, till he have caſt his body on the bed of ſickneſſe, when his feather is turned to a kerchiefe, when his face is pale, his eyes ſunke, his hand ſhaking, his breath ſhort, his fleſh conſumed, now he may be talkt with, now he hath learned of Eli to ſay, Speake Lord, for thy ſervant heareth. The convex or out-bowed ſide of a veſſell will hold nothing; it

A it must be the hollow and depressed part that is capable of any liquor. Oh if we were so humbled with the varieties of Gods judgements as we might, how savory should his counsels be, how precious and welcome would his feare be to our trembling hearts? whereas now our stubborne senselesnesse frustrates (in respect of our successe, though not of his decree) all the threatnings and executions of God.

There are two maine affections, Love and Feare; which as they take up the soule where they are, and as they never goe asunder, (for every love hath in it a feare of offending and forgoing; and every feare implies a love of that, which we suspect may miscary) so each of them fulfills the whole Law of God. That love is the abridgement of the Decalogue, both our Saviour and his blessed Apostle have taught us: It is as plaine of Feare. The title of Iob is, A just man, and one that feared God; justice is expressed by Feare. For what is justice, but freedome from sin? And the feare of the B Lord hates evill, saith Salomon. Hence Moses his יראה Thou shalt feare, is turned by our Saviour (προσκυνησεις) Thou shalt worship, or adore. And that which Esay saith, In vaine they feare me, our Saviour renders, In vaine they worship me; as if all worship consisted in Feare. Hence it is probable that God hath his name in two languages from (θεος) Feare, and the same word in the Greeke signifies both Feare and Religion. And Salomon when he saies, The feare of the Lord is ראשית the beginning (as we turne it) of wisdome, saies more than we are aware of; for the word signifies as well Caput or Principatum, the head or top of wisdome; yea (saith Siracides) it is the crowne upon the head; it is the root of the same wisdome, whereof it is the top-branch, saith the same Author. And surely this is the most proper disposition of men towards God; for though God stoope downe so low as to vouchsafe to be loved of men, yet that infinite inequality, which there is betweene him and us, may seeme not to allow so perfect a
C fitnesse of that affection, as of this other; which suits so well betwixt our vilenesse, and his glory, that the more disproportion there is betwixt us, the more due and proper is our feare. Neither is it lesse necessary than proper, for we can be no Christians without it; whether it be (as Hemingius distinguishes it well) timor cultus, or culpæ, either our feare in worshipping, or our feare of offending; the one is a devout feare, the other a carefull feare. The latter was the Corinthians feare, whose godly sorrow when the Apostle had mentioned, he addes, Yea what indignation, yea what feare, yea what desire? The former is that of the Angels, who hide their faces with their wings; yea of the Son of God, as man, who fell on his face to his Father. And this is due to God, as a Father, as a master, as a benefactor, as a God infinite in all that he is. Let me be bold to speake to you, with the Psalmist, Come ye children, hearken to me, and I will
D teach you the feare of the Lord. What is it therefore to feare God; but to acknowledge the glorious (tho invisible) presence of God in all our wayes, with Moses his eyes ὁρωποφοβος: to be awfully affected at his presence with Iacob (quam tremendus?) to make an humble resignation of our selves to the holy will of God with Eli, It is the Lord; and to attend reverently upon his disposing with David; Here I am, let him doe to me as seemeth good in his eyes. This is the feare of the Lord. There is nothing more talkt of, nothing lesse felt. I appeale from the tongues of men to their hands; the wise Heathen taught mee to doe so, Verba rebus proba. The voice of wickednesse is actuall, saith the Psalmist, wickednesse saith there is no feare of God before his eyes. Behold whersoever is wickednesse, there can be no feare of God; these two cannot lodge under one roofe, for the feare of God drives out evill (saith Ecclesiasticus.) As therefore Abraham argues well from the cause to the effect; Because the feare of God is not in this place, therefore they will kill me: So David argues back from the effect to the cause, E They imagine wickednesse on their bed, &c. therefore the feare of God is not before them. I would to God his argument were not too demonstrative. Brethren, our lives shame us. If we feared the Lord, durst we dally with his name, durst we teare it in peeces? Surely we contemn his person, whose name we contemn. The Jewes have a conceit, that the sin of that Israelite which was stoned for blasphemie, was onely this, that he named that ineffable name of foure letters Iehovah. Shall their feare keepe them from once mentioning the dreadfull name of God, and shall not our feare keepe us from abusing it? Durst we so boldly sinne God in the face, if we feared him? Durst we mock God with a formall flouriſh of that, which our heart tells us we are not, if we feared him? Durſt we be Chriſtians at Church, Mammoniſts at home, if we feared him? Pardon me if in a day of gratulation, I hardly temper my tongue from reproofe: for as the Jewes had ever ſome malefactor brought forth to them in their great feaſt: ſo it ſhall be the happieſt peece of our triumph and ſolemnity, if we can bring forth that wicked profaneneſſe, wherewith we have diſhonoured God, and blemiſht his Goſpell, to be ſcourged, and diſmiſſed with all holy indignitie. From this feare, let us paſſe as briefly, through that which we muſt dwell in all our lives; the ſervice of God. This is the ſubject of all Sermons, mine ſhall but touch at it. You ſhall ſee how I haſten to that diſcourſe which this day and your expectaion calls me to. A

Divine Philoſophy teaches us to referre, not only our ſpeculations, but our affections to action. As therefore our ſervice muſt be grounded upon feare, ſo our feare muſt be reduced to ſervice. What ſtrength can theſe maſculin diſpoſitions of the ſoule yeeld us, if with the Iſraelites brood they be ſmothered in the birth? Indeed the worſt kind of feare, is that we call ſervile: but the beſt feare, is the feare of ſervants: For there is no ſervant of God, but feares filially. And againe, God hath no ſonne but he ſerves. Even the naturall ſonne of God, was ſo in the forme of a ſervant, that he ſerved indeed: and ſo did he ſerve, that he endured all ſorrow, & fulfilled all righteouſneſſe. So every Chriſtian is a ſon and heyre to the King of heaven, and his word muſt be, I ſerve. We all know what ſervice meanes. For we all are, or were (I imagine) either ſervants of maſters, or ſervants of the publike; or maſters of ſervants, or all theſe. We cannot therefore be ignorant either what we require of ours, or what our ſuperiours require of us. If ſervice conſiſted onely in wearing of liveries, in taking of wages, in making of curteſies, and kiſſing of hands, there were nothing more eaſie, or more common. All of us weare the cognizance of our Chriſtianity in our Baptiſme, all live upon Gods trencher in our maintenance, all give him the complements of a faſhionable profeſſion. But, be not deceived, the life of ſervice is worke; the work of a Chriſtian is obedience to the Law of God. The Centurion, when he would deſcribe his good ſervant in the Goſpell, needed ſay no more but this; I bid him doe this, and he doth it. Service then briefly is nothing but a readineſſe to doe as we are bidden; and therfore both Salomon, and he that was greater than Salomon, deſcribes it by keeping the commandements: and the choſen veſſell gives an everlaſting rule: His ſervants ye are to whom ye obey. Now I might diſtinguiſh this ſervice, into habituall and actuall. Habituall; for as the ſervant, while he eats or ſleepes, is in ſervice ſtill; ſo are we to God. Actuall whether univerſall in the whole cariage of our lives (which Zacharie tells us is in holineſſe, and righteouſneſſe; holineſſe to God, righteouſneſſe to men) or particular, either in the duties which are proper, to God, Inuocation and Attendance on his ordinance (which by an excellence is tearmed his ſervice) or in thoſe which are proper to us, as we are peeces of a Familie, Church, Common-wealth; the ſtations whereof God hath ſo diſpoſed, that we may ſerve him in ſerving one another. And thus you ſee I might make way for an endleſſe diſcourſe; but it ſhall content mee (paſſing over this world of matter) to glance onely at the generality of this infinite theme. B C D

Luke.1.75.

As every obedience ſerves God, ſo every ſin makes God ſerve us: One ſaid wittily, that the angry man made himſelfe the Judge, and God the executioner. There is no ſin that doth not the like. The glutton makes God his cator, and himſelfe the gueſt, and his belly his God, eſpecially in the new-found feaſts of this Age, wherein profuſeneſſe and profaneneſſe ſtrive for the tables end. The laſcivious man makes himſelfe the lover, and (as Vives ſaies of Mahumet) God the Pander. The covetous man makes himſelfe the Uſurer, and God the broker. The ambitious makes God his ſtale, and Honour his God. Of every ſinner doth God ſay juſtly, Seruire me feciſti; Thou haſt made me to ſerve with thy ſins. There cannot be a greater honor for us than to ſerve ſuch a maſter, as commands heaven, earth, and hell: whom it is both diſhonour and baſeneſſe not to ſerve. The higheſt ſtile that King David could deviſe to give himſelfe (not in the phraſe of a frivolous French complement, but in the plaine ſpeech of a true Iſraelite) was, Behold I am thy ſervant; and he that is Lord of many ſervants of the Devill. Non reputet magnum quod Deo ſervis, ſed maximum reputet, quod ipſe dig-

A Devill, delights to call himselfe the servant of the servants of God. The Angels of Heaven rejoyce to bee our fellowes in this service. But there cannot bee a greater shame than to see servants ride on horsebacke, and Princes walking as servants on the ground; I meane, to see the God of heaven made a lacquey to our vile affections, and in the lives of men, to see God attend upon the world. Brethren, there is service enough in the world, but it is to a wrong master. In mea patria Deus venter (as Hierome said;) Every worldling is a Papist in this, that hee gives δουλειαν, service, to the creature, which is the lowest respect that can bee: Yea so much more humble than (latria) as it is more absolute, and without respect of recompence. Yea, I would it were uncharitable to say, that many besides the savages of Calecut, place Satan in the throne, and God on the foot-stoole. For as Witches and Sorcerers converse with evill spirits in plausible and familiar formes, which in ugly shapes they would abhor:
B so many a man serves Satan under the formes of gold and silver, under the images of Saints and lightsome Angels, vnder glittering coates, or glorious titles, or beauteous faces, whom they would defie as himselfe. And as the free-borne Israelite might become a servant, either by forfaiture upon trespasse, or by sale, or by spoile in war; so this adcursed servitude is incurred the same waies, by them which should be Christians. By forfaiture: for though the debt and trespasse be to God, yet (tradet lictori) he shall deliver the debtor to the Jaylor. By saile, as Ahab sold himselfe to work wickednesse: sold under sinne, saith the Apostle. By spoile: Beware least any man make a spoyle of your συλαγωγων saith Paul to his Colossians. Alas, what a miserable change doe these men make, to leave the living God, which is so bountifull, that he rewards a cup of cold water with eternall glory, to serve him that hath nothing to give but his bare wages; and what wages? The wages of sinne is death; And what death? not the death
C of the body, in the severing of the soule; but the death of the soule, in the separation from God: there is not so much difference betwixt life and death, as there is betwixt the first death and the second. Oh woefull wages of a desperate worke! Well were these men, if they might goe unpaid, and serve for nothing: but as the mercy of God will not let any of our poore services to him goe unrewarded; so will not his justice suffer the contrary service goe unpaid; in flaming fire rendering vengeance to them that know not God, and those that obay not the Gospell of our Lord Iesus. Beloved, as that worthy Bishop said on his death-bed, we are happy in this, that we serve a good Master: how happy shall it be for us, if wee shall doe him good service, that in the day of our account wee may heare, Euge serve bone, well done good servant, enter into thy Masters joy.

Now he that prescribes the act (service,) must also prescribe the manner (Truly, totally.) God cannot abide wee should serve him with a double heart (an heart and an D heart) that is hypocritically. Neither that we should serve him with a false heart, that is, niggardly and unwillingly: but against doubling, he will be serv'd in truth; and against halving, he will be served with all the heart. To serve God and not in truth, is mockerie. To serve him truly, and not with the whole heart, is a base dodging with God. This ὀφθαλμοδουλεια eye-service is a fault with men: but let us serve God, but while he sees us, it is enough. Behold he sees us every where. If he did not see our heart, it were enough to serve him in the face; and if the heart were not his, it were too much to give him a part of it; but now that he made this whole heart of ours, it is reason he should bee served with it; and now that hee sees the inside of the heart, it is madnesse not to serve him in truth. Those serve God, not in truth, which as Seneca saies of some auditors, come to heare, not to learne: which bring their tablets to E write words, not their hearts for the finger of God to write in. Whose eyes are on their Bible, whiles their heart is on their Count-booke; which can play the Saints in the Church, Ruffians in the Taverne, Tyrants in their houses, Cheators in their shops; those Dames which under a cloke of modesty and devotion, hide nothing but pride and fiendishnesse. Those serve God, not with all their heart; whose bosome is like Rachels tent, that hath (Teraphim) Idols hid in the straw; or rather like a Philistims Temple, that hath the Arke and Dagon under one roofe; That come in ever with Naamans exceptives, Onely in this: Those that have let downe the world like the spies into the bottome bottome of the well of their heart, and cover the mouth of it with wheat : I meane that hide great oppreſſions, with the ſhew of ſmall beneficences: Thoſe which like Salomons falſe Curtizan, cry (Dividatur) and are willing to ſhare themſelves betwixt God and the world. And certainly, this is a noble policy of the Devill, becauſe he knowes, he hath no right to the heart, he can be glad of any corner ; but withall he knowes, that if he have any, he hath all ; for where he hath any part, God will have none. This baſe-mindedneſſe is fit for that evill one. God will have all, or nothing. It was an heroicall anſwer, that Theodoret reports of Valentinian, whom when the ſouldiers had choſen to be Emperor, they were conſulting to have another joyned with him. No (my ſouldiers) ſaid he, it was in your power to give me the Empire, while I had it not: but now when I have it, it is not in your power to give me a partner. We our ſelves ſay, The bed and the throne can abide no rivals. May we not well ſay of the heart, as Lot of Zoar, Is it not a little one? Alas it is even too little for God: what doe we think of taking an Inmate into this cottage? It is a favour and happineſſe, that the God of glory will vouchſafe to dwell in it alone. Even ſo (O God) take thou up theſe roomes for thy ſelfe; and enlarge them for the entertainment of thy ſpirit: have thou us wholly, and let us have thee. Let the world ſerve it ſelfe. O let us ſerve thee, with all our hearts.

God hath ſet the heart on worke to feare, the hands on worke to ſerve him: now (that nothing may be wanting) he ſets the head on work to conſider ; and that, not ſo much the judgements of God, (yet thoſe are of ſingular uſe, and may not be forgotten) as his mercies, What great things he hath done for you, not againſt you. He that looked upon his owne works, and ſaw they were good, and delighted in them, delights that wee ſhould looke upon them too, and applaud his wiſdome, power, and mercy that ſhines in them. Even the leaſt of Gods works are worthy of the obſervation of the greateſt Angell in heaven : but (the magnalia Dei) the great things he hath done are more worthy of our wonder, of our aſtoniſhment. Great things indeed that he did for Iſrael ; hee meant to make that Nation a precedent of mercy ; that all the world might ſee what he could doe for a people. Heaven and earth conſpir'd to bleſſe them. What ſhould I ſpeake of the wonders of Ægypt ? Surely I know not whether their preſervation in it, or deliverance out of it, were more miraculous. Did they want a guide? Himſelfe goes before them in fire. Did they want a ſhelter? His cloud is ſpred over them for a covering. Did they want way? The ſea it ſelfe ſhall make it ; and be at once a ſtreet, and a wall to them. Did they want bread? Heaven it ſelfe ſhall powre downe food of Angels. Did they want meat to their bread ? The wind ſhall bring them whole drifts of Quailes into their Tents. Doe they want drinke to both? The very Rocks ſhall yeeld it them. Doe they want ſuits of apparell? Their very clothes ſhall not wax old on their backs. Doe they want advice? God himſelfe ſhall give his vocall Oracle betweene the Cherubins. Doe they want a law? God ſhall come downe upon Sinai, and deliver it in fire, thundring, ſmoke, earth-quakes, and write it with his owne finger, in tables of ſtone. Doe they want habitations? God ſhall provide them a land that flowes with milke and honie. Are they perſecuted? God ſtands in fire betweene them and their harmes. Are they ſtung to death ? The brazen ſerpent ſhall cure them. Are they reſiſted? The walles of Jericho ſhall fall downe alone ; haile-ſtones braine their enemies. The Sunne ſhall ſtand ſtill in heaven, to ſee Ioſhuahs revenge and victorie. Oh great and mighty things that God did for Iſrael!

And if any Nation under heaven could either parallel or ſecond Iſrael in the favours of God, this poore little Iland of ours is it. The cloud of his protection hath covered us. The blood-red ſea of perſecution hath given way to us, and we are paſſed it dry-ſhod. The true Manna from heaven is rained downe abundantly about our tents. The water of life guſheth forth plenteouſly to us : The better law of the Goſpell is given us from heaven by the hands of his Sonne: The walls of the ſpirituall Jericho are fallen downe before us, at the blaſt of the trumpets of God ; and curſed be he that goes about to build them up againe. Now therefore, that we may come more cloſe to the taske of this day ; Let me ſay to you, as Samuel to his Iſraelites, Conſider with mee what great things the Lord hath done us : and as one wiſht that the envious had eyes in every place ; ſo could I ſeriouſly wiſh that all which have ill will at our Sion had their eares eares with me but one houre, that if they belong not to God, they might burſt with Iudas, which repine with Iudas at this ſeaſonable coſt of the precious ointment of our praiſes.

If I ſhould looke back to the ancient mercies of God, and ſhew you that this Kingdome (though divided from the world) was one of the firſt that received the Goſpell: That it yeelded the firſt Chriſtian Emperor that gave peace and honour to the Church: The firſt and greateſt lights that ſhone forth in the darkeſt of Poperie, to all the world, and that it was the firſt kingdome that ſhooke Antichriſt fully out of the ſaddle; I might find juſt matter of praiſe and exultation: but I will turne over no other Chronicles but your memorie: This day alone hath matter enough, of an eternall gratulation. For this is the communis terminus, wherein Gods favours meet upon our heads; which therefore repreſents to us, both what we had, and what we have; The one to our ſenſe, the other to our remembrance. This day was both Queene Elizabeths Initium gloriæ, and King Iames his Initium regni. To her Natalitium ſalutis, as the paſſion dayes of the Martyrs were called of old; and Natalis Imperii to him. Theſe two names ſhew us happineſſe enough to take up our hearts for ever. And firſt, why ſhould it not be our perpetuall glory and rejoycing, that we were her ſubjects? Oh bleſſed Queene, the mother of this Nation, the Nurſe of this Church, the glory of womanhood, the envy and example of forraine Nations, the wonder of times, how ſweet and ſacred ſhall thy memorie be to all poſterities? How is thy name not Parables of the duſt, as the Jewes ſpeake; not written in the earth, as Ieremie ſpeakes, but in the living earth of all loyall hearts, never to be razed. And though the foule mouths of our Adverſaries ſtick not to call her miſeram fœminam, as Pope Clement did; nor to ſay of her, as Evagrius ſayes uncharitably of Iuſtinian the great Law-giver (ad ſupplicia juſto Dei iudicio apud inferos luenda profecta eſt;) and thoſe that durſt bring her on the ſtage living, bring her now dead (as I have heard by thoſe that have ſeene it) into their proceſſions, like a tormented ghoſt attended with fiends and firebrands, to the terror of their ignorant beholders: Yet, as we ſaw ſhe never proſpered ſo well, as when ſhe was moſt curſed by their Pius 5; ſo now we hope ſhee is rather ſo much more glorious in heaven, by how much they are more malicious on earth. Theſe arrogant wretches, that can at their pleaſure fetch Salomon from heaven to hell, and Traian and Falconella from hell to heaven; Campian and Garnet from earth to heaven, Queene Elizabeth from earth to hell, ſhall find one day that they have miſtaken the keyes; and ſhall know what it is to judge, by being judged. In the meane time, in ſpight of the gates of Rome, Memoria juſtæ in benedictionibus. To omit thoſe vertues which were proper to her ſex, by which ſhe deſerved to be the Queene of women, how excellent were her Maſculine graces of learning, valour, wiſdome, by which ſhe might juſtly challenge to be the Queene of men! So learned was ſhee, that ſhee could give preſent anſwers to Embaſſadors in their owne tongues: or if they liſted to borrow of their neighbours, ſhee paid them in that they borrowed. So valiant, that her name like Ziſcaes drum, made the proudeſt Romaniſts to quake. So wiſe, that whatſoever fell out happily againſt the common Adverſary in France, Netherlands, Ireland; it was by themſelves aſcribed to her policie. What ſhould I ſpeake of her long and ſucceſſefull government, of her miraculous preſervations, of her famous victories, wherein the waters, winds, fire, and earth fought for us, as if they had beene in pay under Her? of Her excellent lawes, of Her carefull executions? Many daughters have done worthily, but thou ſurmounteſt them all. Such was the ſweetneſſe of her government, and ſuch the feare of miſerie in her loſſe, that many worthy Chriſtians deſired their eyes might be cloſed before Hers; and how many thouſands therefore welcomed their owne death, becauſe it prevented Hers. Every one pointed to her white haires, and ſaid with that peaceable Leontius, When this ſnow melts, there will be a floud. Never day, except alwayes the fift of November, was like to be ſo bloudy as this; not for any doubt of Title (which never any loyall heart could queſtion, nor any diſloyall ever did, beſides Dolman) but for that our Eſuites comforted themſelves againſt us, and ſaid, The day of mourning for our mother will come ſhortly, then will we ſlay our brethren. What ſhould I ſay more? Lots were caſt upon our Land; and that honeſt Politician (which wanted nothing but a gibbet to have made him a Saint) Father Parſons, tooke paines to ſet downe downe an order, how all Engliſh affaires ſhould be marſhalled when they ſhould come to be theirs. Conſider now the great things that the Lord hath done for us. Behold this day, which ſhould have beene moſt diſmall to the whole Chriſtian world, he turned to the moſt happy day that ever ſhone forth to this Iland. That now wee may juſtly inſult with thoſe Chriſtians of Antioch (πῦ σῦ τὰ μαστῆια μάξιμα ωυρὶ) Where are your prophecies, O ye fond Papiſts? Our ſnow lies here melted, where are thoſe flouds of bloud that you threatned? Yea, as that bleſſed ſoule of hers gained by this change of an immortall crowne, for a corruptible; ſo (bleſſed be the name of our God) this Land of ours hath not loſt by that loſſe. Many thinke that this evening the world had his beginning. Surely a new and golden world began this day to us, and (which it could not have done by her loynes) promiſes continuance (if our ſinnes interrupt it not) to our poſterities. I would the flatterie of a Prince were treaſon; in effect it is ſo: (for the flatterer is (ὀυτος σφάκτης, a kind murtherer.) I would it were ſo in puniſhment. If I were to ſpeake before my ſoveraigne King and Maſter, I would praiſe God for him, not praiſe him to himſelfe. A Preacher in Conſtantines time, ſaith Euſebius, (auſus eſt Imperatorem in os beatum dicere) preſumed to call Conſtantine an happy Emperor to his face; but he went away with a check; ſuch ſpeed may any Paraſite have, which ſhall ſpeake, as if he would make Princes proud, and not thankfull. A ſmall praiſe to the face may be adulation, (though it be within bounds:) a great praiſe in abſence may be but juſtice. If we ſee not the worth of our King, how ſhall we be thankfull to God that gave him? Give mee leave therefore freely to bring forth the Lords anointed before you, and to ſay with Samuel, See you him whom the Lord hath choſen.

As it was a great preſage of happineſſe to Mauritius the Emperour, that an (ἰμπωσα) a familiar Devill removing him from place to place in his ſwathing bands, yet had no power to hurt him; So that thoſe early conſpiracies, wherewith Satan aſſaulted the very cradle of our deare Soveraigne, prevailed not, it was a juſt bodement of his future greatneſſe and beneficiall uſe to the world. And hee that gave him life and crowne together, and miraculouſly preſerved them both, gave him graces fit for his Deputie on earth to weild that Crowne, and improve that life to the behoofe of Chriſtendome. Let me beginne with that (which the Heathen man required to the happineſſe of any ſtate) his learning and knowledge: wherein I may ſafely ſay hee exceedeth all his 105 predeceſſors. Our Conqueror King William (as our Chronicler reports) by a blunt proverb that he was wont to uſe againſt unlearned Princes, made his ſonne Henry a Beauclerc to thoſe times. But a candle in the darke will make more ſhew, than a bonfiere by day. In theſe dayes ſo lightſome for knowledge, to excell (even for a profeſſed ſtudent, is hard, and rare. Never had England more learned Biſhops and Doctors; which of them ever returned from his Majeſties diſcourſe without admiration? What King chriſtened hath written ſo learned volumes? To omit the reſt, his laſt (of this kind) wherein he hath ſo held up Cardinall Bellarmine and his Maſter Pope Paulus, is ſuch, that Pleſſis and Mouline (the two great lights of France) profeſſe to receive their light in this diſcourſe, from his beames; and the learned Jeſuite Salkeild, could not but be converted with the neceſſity of thoſe demonſtrations; and I may boldly ſay, Popery (ſince it was) never received ſo deepe a wound from any worke, as from that of his. What King ever moderated the ſolemne acts of an Univerſitie in all profeſſions, and had ſo many hands clapt in the applauſe of his acute, and learned determinations? Briefly, ſuch is his entire acquaintance with all ſciences, and with the Queene of all, Divinitie, that hee might well diſpute with the infallible Pope Paulus Quintus for his triple Crowne; and I would all Chriſtian quarrels lay upon this duell. His juſtice in governing matcheth his knowledge how to governe: for as one that knowes the Common-wealth cannot bee unhappy, wherein (according to the wiſe Heathens rule) law is a Queene, and will a ſubject, He hath ever endevoured to frame the proceedings of his government to the lawes, not the lawes to them. Witneſſe that memorable example, whereof your eyes were witneſſes; I meane the unpartiall execution of one of the ancienteſt Barons of thoſe parts, for the murder of a meane ſubject. Wherein not the favour of the block might be yeelded, that the diſhonour of the death might bee no leſſe than the paine of the death.

Yet

A Yet who will not grant his Mercy to bee eminent amongſt his vertues, when Parſons himſelfe yeelds it? And if a vertue ſo continuing, could bee capable of exceſſe, this might ſeeme ſo in him. For that which was ſaid of Anaſtaſius the Emperor, that hee would attempt no exploit (though never ſo famous) if it might coſt the price of Chriſtian blood; and that which was ſaid of Mauritius, that by his good will he would not have ſo much as a traitor die; and that of Veſpaſian, that he wept even for juſt executions; and laſtly that of Theodoſius, that hee wiſht he could recall thoſe to life againe that had wronged him; may in ſome ſenſe be juſtly verified of our mercifull Soveraigne. I pray God the meaſure of this vertue may never hurt himſelfe; I am ſure the want of it ſhall never give cauſe of complaint to his adverſaries. But among all his Heroicall Graces, which commend him as a Man, as a Chriſtian, as a King; Pietie and firmneſſe in religion calls mee to it, and will not ſuffer me to deferre the mention of it any longer. A private man unſetled in opinion, is like a looſe tooth in the head, B troubleſome and uſe-leſſe: but a publike perſon unſtayed, is dangerous. Reſolution for the truth is ſo much better than knowledge, by how much the poſſeſſing of a treaſure, is better than knowing where it is. With what zeale did his Majeſtie flie upon the blaſphemous novelties of Vorſtius? How many ſolicitations, threats, promiſes, profers hath hee trampled under his feet in former times, for but a promiſe of an indifferent connivence at the Romiſh religion? Was it not an anſwer worthy of a King, worthy of marble and braſſe, that he made unto their agent for this purpoſe, in the times of the greateſt perill of reſiſtance, That all the Crownes and Kingdomes in this world ſhould not induce him to change any jot of his profeſſion? Hath he not ſo ingaged himſelfe in this holy quarrell, that the world confeſſes Rome had never ſuch an Adverſary? and all Chriſtian Princes rejoyce to follow him as their worthy leader in all the C battles of God; and all Chriſtian Churches in their Prayers and exclamations, ſtile him, in a double right, Defender of the faith, more by deſert, than inheritance.

But becauſe as the Sunne beames, ſo praiſes are more kindly, when they are caſt oblique upon their objects, than when they fall directly; let me ſhew you him rather in the bleſſings we receive from him, than in the graces which are in him. And not to inſiſt upon his extinguiſhing of thoſe helliſh feuds in Scotland, and the reducing of thoſe barbarous borderers to civilitie and order, (two acts worthy of eternitie, and which no hand but his could doe) Conſider how great things the Lord hath done for us by him in our Peace, in our freedome of the Goſpell, in our Deliverance.

Continuance detracts from the value of any favour. Little doe we know the price of peace. If we had beene in the coat of our forefathers, or our neighbours, we ſhould have knowne how to eſteeme this deare bleſſing of God. Oh, my deare brethren, D we never knew what it was to heare the murdering peeces about our eares; to ſee our Churches and houſes flaming over our heads; to heare the fearefull cracks of their falls mixed with the confuſed out-cries of men, killing, incouraging to kill, or reſiſt, dying, and the ſhriekings of women and children; we never ſaw tender babes ſnatcht from the breſts of their mothers, now bleeding upon the ſtones, or ſprawling upon the pikes; and the diſtracted mother raviſhed, ere ſhee may have leave to die. Wee never ſaw men and horſes lie wallowing in their mingled blood, and the ghaſtly viſages of death deformed with wounds. The impotent wife hanging with teares on her armed husband, as deſirous to die with him, with whom ſhe may not live. The amazed runnings to and fro of thoſe that would faine eſcape if they knew how, and the furious pace of a bloody victor; The rifling of houſes for ſpoile, and every ſouldier running with his load, and ready to fight with other for our booty; The miſerable E captive driven manacled before the inſulting enemie. Never did wee know how cruell an Adverſary is, and how burdenſome an helper is in war. Looke round about you. All your neighbours have ſeene and taſted theſe calamities. All the reſt of the world have beene whirled about in theſe wofull tumults: onely this Iland hath like the center ſtood unmoveable. Onely this Iſle hath beene like Nilus, which when all other waters over-flow, keeps within the banks. That wee are free from theſe and a thouſand other miſeries of war, Whither ſhould we aſcribe it, but next under God, to his Anointed, as a King, as a King of Peace? For both Anarchie is the mother of diviſion, diuision, as we see in the state of Italie: wherein, when they wanted their King, all ran into civill broyles; The Venetians with them of Ravenna; Verona and Vincentia, with the Paduans, and Tarvisians; The Pisans and Florentines with them of Luca and Sienna. And besides, every King is not a Peace-maker; Ours is made of Peace. There have beene Princes, which as the Antiochians said of Iulian (taking occasion by the Bull which hee stampt in his coyne) have goared the world to death. The brests of some Princes have beene like a Thunder-cloud, whose vapours would never leave working till they have vented themselves with terror to the world: Ours, hath nothing in it, but a gracious raine to water the inheritance of God. Behold, He, even He alone, like to Noahs Dove, brought an Olive of Peace to the tossed Arke of Christendome; He like another Augustus, before the second comming of Christ, hath becalmed the world, and shut the iron gates of warre; and is the bond of that peace he hath made. And if the Peace-maker both doth blesse, and is blessed; how should we blesse him, and blesse God for him, and hold our selves blessed in him?

Now what were peace without religion, but like a Nabals sheep-shearing; like the fatting of an Epicurean hogge; the very festivall revels of the Devill. But for us; we have Gloria in excelsis Deo, sung before our Pax in terris; in a word, we have Peace with the Gospell. Machiavel himselfe could say in his discourses, that two continued successions of vertuous Princes (fanno grandi effetti) cannot but doe great matters. Wee prove it so this day; wherein religion is not only warmed, but locked in her seat so fast, that the gates of hell shall never prevaile against it. There have been Princes, and that in this land, which (as the heathen Politician compared his Tyrant) have been like to ill Physitians, that have purged away the good humours and left the bad behind them; with whom any thing hath been lawfull, but to be religious. Some of your gray haires can be my witnesses. Behold the evils we have escaped, shew us our blessings. Here hath beene no dragging out of houses, no hiding of Bibles, no creeping into woods, no Bonnering or Butchering of Gods Saints, no rotting in dungeons, no casting of infants out of the mothers bellie into the mothers flames; nothing but Gods truth abundantly preached, cheerefully professed, incouraged, rewarded. What nation under heaven yeelds so many learned Divines? What times ever yeelded so many preaching Bishops? when was this Citie (the Citie of our joy) ever so happy this way, as in these late successions? Whither can wee ascribe this health of the Church, and life of the Gospell, but, next to God, to His example, His countenance, His endevours: Wherein I may not omit how right he hath trod in the steps of that blessed Constantine, in all his religious proceedings. Let us in one word parallel them. Constantine caused fifty Volumes of the Scriptures to be faire written out in parchment, for the use of the Church. King Iames hath caused the Bookes of Scriptures to be accurately translated and published by thousands. Constantine made a zealous edict against Novatians, Valentinians, Marcionites. King Iames besides his powerfull proclamations and soveraigne lawes hath effectually written against Popery, and Vorstianisme. Constantine took away the libertie of the meetings of Hereticks: King Iames hath by wholsome lawes inhibited the assemblies of Papists and Schismatickes. Constantine sate in the middest of Bishops, as if hee had beene one of them. King Iames besides his solemne conferences, vouchsafes (not seldome) to spend his meales in discourse with his Bishops, and other worthy Divines. Constantine charged his sonnes (ut plane & sine fuco Christiani essent) that they should be Christians in earnest. King Iames hath done the like in learned and divine precepts, which shall live till time be no more. Yea, in their very coynes is a resemblance: Constantine had his picture stampt upon his metals praying. King Iames hath his picture with prayer about it; O Lord, protect the kingdomes which thou hast united. Lastly, Constantine built Churches; one in Jerusalem, another in Nicomedia. King Iames hath founded one Colledge, which shall helpe to build and confirme the whole Church of God upon earth. Yee wealthy Citizens that love Jerusalem, cast in your store after this royall example, into the Sanctuarie of God: and whiles you make the Church of God happy, make your selves so. Brethren, if we have any relish of Christ, any sense of heaven, let us blesse God for the life of our soule, the Gospell; and for the spirit of this life, his Anointed.

A But where had beene our peace, or this freedome of the Goſpell, without our deliverance? and where had our deliverance beene without him? As it was reported of the Oake of Mamre, that all religions rendred their yeerly worſhip there: The Jewes becauſe of Abraham their Patriarch; the Gentiles becauſe of the Angels that appeared there to Abraham; The Chriſtians becauſe of Chriſt that was there ſeene of Abraham with the Angels; So was there to King Iames in his firſt beginnings, a confluence of all ſects, with papers in their hands, and (as it was beſt for them) with a Rogamus Domine, non pugnamus, like the ſubjects of Theodoſius. But our cozens of Samaria, when they ſaw that Salomons yoke would not bee lightned, ſoone flew off in a rage, What portion have we in David? And now thoſe, which had ſo oft lookt up to Heaven in vain, reſolve to dig downe to Hell for aid. Satan himſelfe met them, and offered (for ſaving of their labour) to bring hell up to them. What a world of ſulphur had he provi-
B ded againſt that day? What a brewing of death was tunned up in thoſe veſſels? The murderous pioners laught at the cloſe felicity of their project; and now before-hand ſeemed in conceit to have heard the crack of this helliſh thunder, and to ſee the mangled carkaſſes of the Hereticks flying up ſo ſuddenly, that their ſoules muſt needs goe upward towards their perdition; their ſtreets ſtrewed with legges and armes; and the ſtones braining as many in their fall, as they blew up in their riſe. Remember the Children of Edom, O Lord, in the day of Ieruſalem, which ſaid, Downe with it, downe with it, even to the ground. O Daughter of Babel, worthy to be deſtroyed, bleſſed ſhall he be that ſerveth thee as thou wouldeſt have ſerved us. But hee that ſits in Heaven laught as faſt at them; to ſee their preſumption that would be ſending up bodies to heaven before the reſurrection, and preferring companions to Elias in a fiery Chariot; and ſaid (ut quid fremuerunt?) Conſider now how great things the Lord hath done for us; The ſnare is broken, and wee are
C delivered. But how? As that learned Biſhop well applied Salomon to this purpoſe, Divinatio in labiis Regis. If there had not beene a divination in the lips of the King, we had beene all in jawes of death. Under his ſhadow we are preſerved alive, as Ieremie ſpeaketh. It is true, God could have done it by other meanes; but hee would doe it by this, that we might owe the being of our lives to him, of whom we held our well-being before. Oh praiſed be the God of heaven for our deliverance! Praiſed be God for his anointed, by whom wee are delivered. Yea how ſhould we call to our fellow creatures? The Angels, Saints, heavens, elements, meteors, mountaines, beaſts, trees, to helpe us praiſe the Lord for this mercy. And (as the oath of the Romane ſouldiers ranne) how deare and precious ſhould the life of Cæſar be to us, above all earthly things? how ſhould we hate the baſe unthankfulneſſe of thoſe men, which can ſay of D him, as one ſaid of his Saint Martin, Martinus bonus in auxilio, charus in negotio; who whiles they owe him all, grudge him any thing. Away with the mention of outward things: all the blood in our bodies is due to him: all the prayers and well-wiſhes of our ſoules are due tohim. How ſolemnly feſtivall ſhould this day bee to us and to our poſterities for ever? How cheerefully for our peace, our religion, our deliverance, ſhould wee take up that acclamation which the people of Rome uſed in the Coronation of Charles the great, Carolo Iacobo a Deo coronato, magno & pacifico Britannorum Imperatori, vita & victoria. To Charles Iames crowned of God, the great and peaceable Emperor of Britaine, Life and victorie, and let God and his people ſay, Amen.

Theſe were great things indeed, that God did for Iſrael; great that he hath done for us; great for the preſent, not certaine for the future. They had not, no more have we, the bleſſings of God by entaile, or by leaſe. Only at the good will of the Lord; and that
E is, during our good behaviour, Sin is a forfeiture of all favours. If you doe wickedly, you ſhall periſh. It was not for nothing, that the ſame word in the originall ſignifies both ſin and puniſhment. Theſe two are inſeparable. There is nothing but a little priority in time between them. The Angels did wickedly, they periſht by their fall from heaven. The old world did wickedly, they periſht by waters from heaven. The Sodomites did wickedly, they periſht by fire from heaven. Corah and his company did wickedly, they periſht by the earth. The Ægyptians did wickedly, they periſht by the Sea. The Cananites did wickedly, they periſht by the ſword of Iſrael. The Iſraelites did wickedly, they periſht by peſtilence, ſerpents, Philiſtims. What, ſhould I run my ſelfe out of breath in this endleſſe courſe of examples? There was never ſin, but it had a puniſhment, either in the Actor, or in the Redeemer. There was never puniſhment, but was for ſin. Heaven ſhould have no quarell againſt us, Hell could have no power over us, but for our ſins. Thoſe are they that have plagued us: Thoſe are they that threaten us.

But what ſhall be the judgement? Periſhing. To whom? To you and your King. He doth not ſay, If your King doe wickedly, you ſhall periſh, as ſometimes hee hath done: nor, If your King doe wickedly, he ſhall periſh, although Kings are neither priviledged from ſinnes, nor from judgements: nor if you doe wickedly, you only ſhall periſh; but, If ye doe wickedly, ye and your King ſhall periſh. So neer a relation is there betwixt the King and Subjects; the ſin of the one reacheth to the judgement of the other; and the judgement of the one is the ſmart of both. The King is the Head, the Commons the ſtomack: if the head be ſick, the ſtomack is affected. David ſinnes, the people die. If the ſtomack be ſick, the head complaines. For the tranſgreſſion of the people are many Princes. What could have ſnatcht from our head that ſweet Prince, of freſh and bleeding memory, (that might juſtly have challenged Othoes name, Mirabilia mundi) now in the prime of all the worlds expectation, but our traiterous wickedneſſes? His Chriſtian modeſty upon his death-bed could charge himſelfe, (no, no, I have ſins enow of my owne to doe this.) But this very accuſation did cleare him, and burden us. O glorious Prince, they are our ſins that are guilty of thy death, and our loſſe. We have done wickedly, thou periſhedſt. A harſh word for thy glorified condition. But ſuch a periſhing as is incident to Saints; (for there is a Perire de medio, as well as a Perire à facie) a periſhing from the earth, as well as a periſhing from God. It was a joyfull periſhing to thee: our ſins have advantaged thy ſoule, which is partly therfore happy, becauſe wee were unworthy of thee; but they have robbed us of our happineſſe in thee. Oh our treacherous ſins, that have offered this violence to that ſweet hopefull ſacred perſon! And doe they not yet ſtill conſpire againſt him, that is yet dearer to us, the root of theſe goodly branches, the breath of our noſtrils, the anointed of God? Brethren let me ſpeak it confidently: As every ſin is a traitor to a mans owne ſoule, ſo every wicked man is a traitor to his King: yea, every of his crying ſins is a falſe-hearted rebel, that hides powder and pocket dags for the precious life of his Soveraigne. Any ſtates-man may learne this even of Machiavel himſelfe: which I confeſſe when I read, I thought of the Devill confeſſing Chriſt. That the giving of God his due, is the cauſe of the greatneſſe of any State; and contrarily, the neglect of his ſervice, the cauſe of ruine: and if any prophane Zoſimus ſhall doubt of this point, I would but turne him to Evagrius his diſcourſe to this purpoſe, where he ſhall find inſtances of enow particulars. What-ever politick Philoſophers have diſtinguiſhed, betwixt bonus vir, and civis, I ſay, that as a good man cannot be an ill ſubject, ſo a lewd man can no more be a good ſubject, than evill can be good. Let him ſooth, and ſweare what he will, his ſins are ſo many treaſons againſt the Prince and State: for, Ruine is from iniquity, ſaith Ezechiel. Alas, what ſafety can we be in, when ſuch miſcreants lurk in our houſes, jet in our ſtreets; when the Country, City, Court, is ſo full of theſe ſpirituall conſpiracies? Ye that are Magiſtrates, not for Gods ſake only, but for your Kings ſake, whoſe Deputies ye are, as he is Gods; not for religion only, but for very policy, as you tender the dear life of our gracious Soveraigne; as you regard the ſweet peace of this State, and Kingdome; the welfare of this Church; yea, as you love your own life, peace, welfare; rouze up your ſpirits, awaken your Chriſtian courage, and ſet your ſelves heartily againſt the traitorly ſins of theſe times, which threaten the bane of all theſe. Cleanſe ye theſe Augean ſtables of our drunken Tavernes, of our prophane Stages, and of thoſe blind Vaults of profeſſed filthineſſe, Whoſe ſteps goe downe to the chambers of death, yea, to the deepe of hell. And ye, my holy brethren, the meſſengers of God, if there be any ſons of Thunder amongſt you, if ever you ratled from heaven the terrible judgements of God againſt ſinners, now do it; for (contrary to the naturall) the deep winter of iniquity is moſt ſeaſonable for this ſpirituall thunder. Be heard above, be ſeene beneath. Out-face ſin, out-preach it, out-live it. We are ſtars in the right hand of God: let us be like any ſtars ſave the Moon, that hath blots in her face; or the ſtar worm-wood, whoſe fall

Rev. 8. 11.

A fall made bitter waters ; or Saint Judes planets, that wander in irregularities. Let the light of our lives ſhine in the faces of the world, and dazle them whom it ſhall not guide. Then ſhall we with authority ſpeak what we doe, when we doe that which we ſpeak. We can never better teſtifie our thankfull and loyall reſpects to ſo good a King in whoſe favour is our life, and by whoſe grace we are upheld againſt the unworthy affronts of this ſacrilegious Age, than by crying downe, by living downe thoſe ſinnes which threaten our happineſſe in him. And ye, beloved Chriſtians, whoſe faces ſeem worthily to congratulate the joy of this day, if ye would approve your ſelves good ſubjects to our King, labour to be good ſubjects to His King, the King of Heaven. Away with thoſe rebellious wickedneſſes which may bee prejudiciall to our peace. In vaine ſhall we teſtifie our loyalty by theſe outward ceremonies of rejoycing, if we be faulty in the ſubſtance. To what purpoſe ſhall we ring our bels, if in the meane time

B we hold faſt Salomons (funes peccatorum) cords of ſin ; yea, the Prophets cart-ropes of iniquity ; and thereby pull downe judgement upon our heads ? To what purpoſe ſhall we kindle Bonefires in our ſtreets, if we kindle the flame of Gods diſpleaſure againſt us by our ſinnes ? To what purpoſe ſhall ye feaſt one another in your houſes, if you ſhall feaſt the fiends of hell with your wilfull ſinnes ? Dæmonum cibus ebrietas ; Hierome ſaith well, Drunkenneſſe, luxurie, fornication, and every ſinne is the very diet and dainties of the Devill. For Gods ſake therfore, for your Kings ſake, for your owne ſoules ſake, bee good, that you may be loyall. Oh my brethren, let us not with old Toby ſuffer our eyes to bee blinded with the ſwallowes dung of this world. Let us not dare to make a willing ſhipwrack of conſcience, for the venture of a little ballaſt of gaine. Away with our pride, uſury, oppreſſion, falſe weights, falſe oaths, falſe faces; Doe no more wickedly, that we periſh not.

C They are our ſins, which as they threaten to loſe us our beſt friend above, (the God of our ſalvation) ſo they hearten our adverſaries againſt us on earth. Their hopes, their deſignes, their wickedneſſe to us, hath been profeſt to be built upon ours to God. If they did not ſee we did evill, they durſt not hope we could periſh. Authority hath wiſely and ſeaſonably taken order for diſarming of wilfull Recuſants. What ſhould weapons doe in the hand of diſloyalty ? Oh that it could take order to ſtrip us of our ſinnes, which will elſe arme God and his creatures againſt us ! The gates of Rome, the gates of hell, could not hurt us, if wee did not hurt our ſelves. Oh that wee could ſo love our ſelves, as to part with all our plauſible and gainfull evills ; that wee would this day renue our holy covenants with God, and keepe them for ever ? How would he ſtill feed us with the fineſt of the wheat ? How would he, that (as this day) when wee feared a tempeſt, gave us an happy calme, prevent a tempeſt in our calme when

D we feare not ? How ſafely ſhould our children play, and we feaſt in our ſtreets ? How memorable a patterne of mercy ſhould this Iland be to all poſterities ? What famous Trophees of victory would hee erect over all Antichriſtianiſme amongſt us ? How freely and loud ſhould the Goſpell of God ring every where in the eare of the generations yet unborne ? How ſure ſhould we be, long and long to enjoy ſo gratious and deare a Soveraigne, ſo comfortable a peace, ſo happy a government ? even till this Eve of the Annunciation of the firſt comming of Chriſt, overtake the day of the Annunciation of the ſecond comming, for our redemption. Which God for his mercies ſake, for his Chriſts ſake, vouchſafe to grant us. Amen.

A SERMON PREACHED BEFORE HIS MAJESTIE AT his Court at THEBALDS, on Sunday the 15. of SEPTEMBER, 1622.

IOHN 7. 24.

Iudge not according to the appearance, but iudge righteous iudgement.

AS in the civill body, so in the naturall; the head as it is the higheſt, ſo the chiefe part: according to the place is the dignity: Of the head, the higheſt Region is chiefeſt, ſerving only for the uſe of intellectuall powers; whereas the lower part of it is onely imployed for bodily nutrition: Now, as the reaſonable part of the Soule is Vertex animæ, being contradiſtinguiſhed to the ſenſitive; So, if ye diſtinguiſh the reaſonable into Judgement & Deliberation, Naturale Indicatorium dicetur eſſe vertex, ſaith Aquinas; Judgement is the top of our Soule, and therefore cals for the top of our care; If the higheſt Wheele goe right, the inferiour hardly erre. Heare then the golden rule of the Author, of the Judge of our judgement, Iudge not according to the appearance, but judge righteous judgement. The negative part is firſt, Iudge not; then, Iudge: Where the minde is free and cleare, it is good to begin with the poſitive documents of right, which is the rule to it ſelfe and the wrong; but where the heart is foreſtalled with miſ-opinion, ablative directions are firſt needfull to unteach error, ere we can learne truth. Judge not therefore according to the appearance: κατ' ὄψιν, is (as the Vulgar rightly) ſecundum faciem, according to the face, becauſe the face onely appeares, the reſt is hid: Every thing, not man onely, hath both a face and an heart; a face which is pervious to every eye, an heart to which none eye can pierce but the wiſe. This face, as of man, ſo of things, is a falſe rule of judgement; Frons, oculi, &c. The forehead, eyes, countenance tell many a lye. Judge not therefore according to appearance: it is no meaſuring by a crooked line: There is nothing more uncertaine than appearance; ſome things appeare that are not, and ſome things are that appeare not; and that (beſides naturall occurrences) in morally both good and evill: Some things appeare good that are not, and therefore miſ-lead the heart both to an unjuſt proſecution, and to a falſe applauſe; ſome things appeare evill that are not, and therefore miſ-lead us to an injurious cenſure, and undeſerved abomination: Againe, ſome things are good that appeare not, and therefore loſe both our allowance and purſuit; ſome things are evill that appeare not, and therefore inſinuate themſelves into our acquaintance and love, to our coſt: Many a Snake lies hid under the Strawberry

leaves, and ſtings us ere we be aware. Vitia virtutes mentiuntur, ſaith Gregorie, Vice too oft makes a maske of the skin of Vertue, and lookes lovely: Vertue as often comes forth (like a Martyr in the Inquiſition) with a San-benit upon her back, and a cap painted with Devils upon her head, to make her ugly to the beholders; Iudge not therefore according to the appearance.

The appearance or face, is of things, as of men: We ſee it at once with one caſt of the eye, yet there are angles, and hills, and dales, which upon more earneſt view the eye ſees cauſe to dwell in: ſo it is with this appearance or face of things, which however it ſeemes wholly to appeare to us at the firſt glance, yet upon further ſearch will deſcry much matter of our inquiry: For every thing from the skin incluſively to the heart, is the face; every thing beſides true being, is appearance. All the falſe ψευδεῖα that uſe to beguile the judgement of man, hide themſelves under this appearance: Theſe reduce themſelves to three heads; Preſumptions, falſe Formes, Events: Preſumptions muſt be diſtinguiſhed; for whereas there are three degrees of them, firſt (levia Probabilia) light Probabilities, then faire Probabilities, and thirdly, ſtrong Probabilities, which are called, Indicia juris, the two firſt are allowed by very Inquiſitors, but as ſufficient to cauſe ſuſpition, to take information, to attach the ſuſpected, not enough whereon to ground the Libell or the torture, much leſſe a finall judgement: Thus Elie ſees Annaes lips goe, therefore ſhe is drunke: The Phariſes ſee Chriſt ſit with ſinners, he is a friend to their ſins.

Falſe formes are preſented either to the eye or to the eare. In the former, beſides ſupernaturall deluſions, there is a deceit of the ſight, whether through the indiſpoſition of the Organ, or the diſtance of the Object, or the miſ-diſpoſition of the medium: So as if we ſhould judge according to appearance, the Sun ſhould double it ſelfe by the firſt, through the croſneſſe of the eye, it ſhould diminiſh it ſelfe by the ſecond, and ſeeme as big as a large Sive, or no large Cart-wheele at the moſt: It ſhould dance in the riſing, and move irregularly by the third. To the eare are miſ-reports, and falſe ſuggeſtions, whether concerning the perſon, or the cauſe. In the former, the calumniating tongue of the Detractor, is the Iugler that makes any mans honeſty or worth appeare ſuch as his malice liſteth: In the latter, the ſmooth tongue of the ſubtile Rhetorician is the Impoſtor which makes cauſes appeare to the unſetled judgement, ſuch as his wit or favour pleaſeth: Events, which are oft-times as much againſt the intention, and above the remedie of the Agent, as beſides the nature of the Act: There is ſometimes a good event of evill, as Iaſons adverſary cured him in ſtabbing him; the Iſraelites thrive by oppreſſion, the Field of the Church yeelds moſt when it is manured with bloud: There is ſometimes an ill event of good; Abimelech gives David the Shew-bread, and the Sword, he and his family dies for it: Sapientis eſt præſtare culpam; It is enough for a wiſe man to wield the Act, the iſſue he cannot: Wiſdome makes demonſtrative Syllogiſmes, à priori, from the cauſes; folly Paralogiſmes, a poſteriori, from the ſucceſſe. Careat ſucceſſibus opto quiſquis ab eventu, &c. was of old the word of the Heathen Poet. If therefore either upon ſlight probabilities, or falſe formes, or ſubſequent events wee paſſe our verdict, we doe what is here forbidden, judge according to appearance.

Had the charge beene only Iudge not, and gone no further, it had beene very uſefull, and no other than our Saviour gave in the Mount: we are all on our way; Every man makes himſelfe a Juſtice Itinerant, and paſſeth ſentence of all that comes before him, yea (beyond all commiſſion) of all above him; and that many times not without groſſe miſ-conſtruction, as in the caſe of our late directions: Our very Judges are at our barre; Secrets of Court, of Counſell, of State eſcape us not, yea not thoſe of the moſt reſerved Cabinet of Heaven: Quis te conſtituit Iudicem? Who made thee a Judge? as the Iſraelite (unjuſtly) to Moſes: Theſe are ſawcy uſurpers of forbidden Chaires; and therefore it is juſt with God, that (according to the Pſalmiſt) ſuch Judges ſhould be caſt downe in ſtony places, yea, as it is in the Originall, בצאטר בורי סלע that they ſhould be left in the hands of the rocke (allidantur Petræ) that they ſhould bee daſht againſt the rocks, that will be ſailing without Card or Compaſſe, in the vaſt Ocean of Gods Counſels, or his Anointeds.

But

A But now here our Saviour ſeales our Commiſſion, ſets us upon the Bench; allowes us the act, but takes order for the manner; we may judge, we may not judge according to the appearance; we may be Judges (whether κρίται, or δικασταί) the one to condemne, the other to abſolve; we may not be κριταὶ διαλογισμῶν πονηρῶν Judges of evill thoughts; and we ſhall be evill-thoughted Judges, if wee ſhall judge according to appearance. Not only Fortune and Love, but even Juſtice alſo is wont to be painted blindfold; to import that it may not regard faces. God ſayes to every Judge as he did to Samuel, concerning Eliab, Looke not on his countenance, nor the height of his ſtature. Is an outragious rape committed? Is bloud ſhed? Looke not whether it be a Courtiers or a Peaſants, whether by a Courtier or a Peaſant; either of them cries equally loud to heaven; Juſtice cannot bee too Lyncean to the being of things, nor too blind to the appearance.

B The beſt things appeare not, the worſt appeare moſt; God, the Angels, ſoules both glorified and encaged in our boſomes, grace, ſupernaturall truths, theſe are moſtwhat the objects of our faith, and faith is the evidence of things not ſeene; Like as in bodily objects, the more pure and ſimple ought is (as aire and ethereall fire) the more it flyeth the ſight; the more groſſe and compacted (as water and earth) the more it fils the eye, Iudge not therefore according to appearance.

It is an vſefull and excellent rule for the avoiding of errour in our judgement of all matters whether Naturall, Civill, or Divine.

Naturall; what is the appearance of a perſon, but the colour, ſhape, ſtature? The colour is oft-times bought or borrowed, the ſhape forced by Art, the ſtature raiſed (to contradict Chriſt) a cubit high; Iudge not therefore according to appearance. What are the colluſions of Juglers and Mountebanks, the weepings and motions of Images, the noyſes of miraculous cures and diſpoſſeſſions, but appearances? Fit aliquando in Eccleſiâ maxima deceptio populi in miraculis fictis à ſacerdotibus; There is much cozenage of the poore people by cogged miracles, ſaith Cardinall Lyranus; theſe holy frauds cold not gull men if they did not judge according to appearance. Should appearance bee the rule, our harveſt had beene rich; there was not more ſhew of plentie in our fields, than now of ſcarcity in our ſtreets. This dearth (to ſay truth) is not in the graine, but in the heart; If the hearts of men were not more blaſted with covetouſneſſe and cruell ſelfe-love, than their graine with diſtemper of aire, this needed not; The Barnes and Granaries are full, the Markets empty; Authority knowes how to remedy this evill, how to prevent a dearth in abundance; that men may not affamiſh whom God hath fed; and that when God hath given us the ſtaffe of bread, it may not bee either hid, or broken; ſhortly, that our ſtore may not be judged by the appearance.

D Civill; Wiſemen and ſtateſmen eſpecially may not alwayes looke the ſame way they would goe; like skilfull Sea-men, they ſometimes lavere, and (as the wind may ſtand) fetch compaſſes of lawfull policies to their wiſhed point. That of Tiberius was fearefull; of whom Xiphiline ὃν ἔλεγεν ἐξὸν εἶναι ἐψεύδεσθαι That hee ſayled ever againſt the wind of his words: But ſometimes a good Conſtantius or Anaſtaſius, will wiſely pretend what hee intends not: As our Saviour made as if he went further, when hee meant to turne into Emaus: The hearts of Kings are as deepe waters; wee may not thinke to draine them in the hollow of our hand: Secret things to them of whom God hath ſaid, Dixi dii eſtis; things revealed to us and our children. Even wee meane ones would be loth to have alwayes our hearts read in our faces; Iudge not therefore according to appearance.

E Divine; In theſe our ſpeech muſt dwell; If we ſhould judge according to the appearance, we ſhould thinke baſely of the Saviour of the world; Who that had ſeene him ſprawling and wringing in the Cratch, flitting to Ægypt, chopping of chips at Nazareth, famiſhing in the Deſart, tranſported by Satan, attended by Fiſhermen, perſecuted by his Kindred, betrayed by one Servant, abjured by another, forſaken of all, apprehended, arraigned, condemned, buffeted, ſpat upon, ſcourged to bloud, ſceptred with the reed, crowned with thornes, nailed to the Croſſe, hanging naked betwixt two Theeves, ſcorned of the beholders, ſealed up in a borrowed grave, could ſay other, than, Hee hath no forme nor beauty, when wee ſhall ſee him there is nothing that that wee ſhould deſire him? Who that ſhould have ſeene his skinne all dewed with pearles of bloody ſweat, his back bleeding, his face blubbered and beſmeared, his forehead harrowed, his hands and feet pierced, his ſide guſhing out, his head bowed downe in death, and ſhould withall have heard his dying lips ſay, My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me? would not have ſaid; He is deſpiſed and rejected of men, yea (in appearance) of God himſelfe. Yet even this while to the cutting of the ſinewes of thoſe ſtiff-necked Jewes, the Angels owned him for their Lord, the Sages adored him, the Star deſigned him, the Prophets fore-ſhewed him, the Devils confeſſed him, his Miracles evinced him, the earth ſhook, the Rocks rent, the Dead lookt out, the Sunne lookt in, aſtoniſhed at the ſufferings of the God of nature; Even whiles he was deſpiſed of men, hee commanded the Devils to their chaines: whiles baſe men ſhot out their tongues at him, Principalities and Powers bowed their knees to him; whiles he hanged deſpicably upon the tree of ſhame, the powers of hell were dragged captive after the triumphant chariot of his Croſſe; the appearance was not ſo contemptible, as the truth of his eſtate glorious. Iudge not therfore according to appearance. A B

Should appearance be the rule, how ſcornfully would the carnall eye over-look the poore ordinances of God? What would it find here but fooliſhneſſe of preaching, homelineſſe of Sacraments, an inky Letter, a Prieſts lips, a ſavorleſſe meſſage, a morſell of Bread, a mouth full of Wine, an handfull of water, a ſlander-beaten Croſſe, a crucified Saviour, a militant Church, a deſpiſed profeſſion. When yet this fooliſhneſſe of preaching is the power of God to ſalvation; theſe mute Letters the lively Oracles of God; theſe vile lips the Cabinets of heaven to preſerve knowledge; this unplauſible Meſſage, magnalia Dei; this Water, the Water of Life in the midſt of the Paradiſe of God: (ἀειζῶν μὲν ὕδωρ) this Bread the Manna of Angels, this Wine heavenly Nectar; this Church the Kings Daughter, all glorious within, this dying Sacrifice the Lord of life, this Croſſe the Banner of Victory, this Profeſſion Heaven upon earth. Iudge not therefore according to appearance. C

Should appearance be the rule, woe were Gods children, happy were his enemies. Who that had ſeene Cain ſtanding maſterly over the bleeding carkaſſe of Abel, Ioſeph in his bonds, his Miſtreſſe in her dreſſe, Moſes in the Flags, Pharaoh in the Palace, David ſculking in the wilderneſſe, Saul commanding in the Court, Elias fainting under his Juniper tree, Iezebel painting in her cloſet, Michaiah in the priſon, Zidkiiah in the preſence, Ieremie in the dungeon, Zedekiah in the throne, Daniel trembling among the Lions, the Median Princes feaſting in their Bowers, Iohns head bleeding in the Platter, Herods ſmiling at the Revels, Chriſt at the Barre, Pilate on the Bench, the Diſciples ſcourged, the Scribes and Elders inſulting, would not have ſaid; O happy Cain, Potiphars wife, Pharaoh, Saul, Ieſebel, Zidkiiah, Zedekiah, Median Princes, Pilate, Herod, Elders; miſerable Abel, Ioſeph, Moſes, David, Eliah, Michaiah, Ieremie, Daniel, Iohn, Chriſt, the Diſciples: Yet we know Cains victorie was as wofull, as Abels martyrdome glorious; Ioſephs irons were more precious, than the golden tires of his Miſtreſſe; Moſes Reeds were more ſure than Pharaohs Cedars; Davids Cave in the Deſart more ſafe than the Towers of Saul; Eliahs Raven a more comfortable purveyor than all the Officers of Iezebel; Michaiahs priſon was the guard-chamber of Angels, when Ahabs preſence was the counſell-chamber of evill ſpirits; Ieremies Dungeon had more true light of comfort than the ſhining ſtate of Zedekiah; Daniel was better guarded with the Lions, than Darius and the Median Princes with their Janiſaries; Iohns head was more rich with the Crowne of his martyrdome, than Herods with the Diadem of his Tetrarchate; Chriſt at the Barre gave life and being to Pilate on the Bench, gave motion to thoſe hands that ſtruck him, to that tongue that condemned him, and in the meane while, gave ſentence on his Judge; The Diſciples were bettter pleaſed with their ſtripes and wales than the Jewiſh Elders with their proud Phylacteries. After this, who that had ſeene the primitive Chriſtians, ſome broyled on Gridirons, others boyled in Lead, ſome roſted, others frozen to death, ſome fleaed, others torne with horſes, ſome craſhed in peeces by the teeth of Lions, others caſt downe from the rocks to the ſtakes, ſome ſmiling on the wheele, others in the flame, all wearying their tormentors and ſhaming their Tyrants with their patience, would not have ſaid; Of all things I would D E

A not bee a Christian; Yet, even this while were these poore torturing stocks higher (as Marcus Arethusius bragged) than their persecutors; dying Victors, yea Victors of death; never so glorious as when they begin not to be; in gasping crowned, in yeelding the ghost more than Conquerours; Iudge not therfore according to appearnce.

When thou lookest about, and seest on the one hand, a poore conscionable Christian drouping under the remorse of his sinne, austerely checking his wanton appetite and curbing his rebellious desires, wearing out his dayes in a rough penitentiall severity, cooling his infrequent pleasures with sighs, and saucing them with teares; on the other hand ruffling Gallants made all of pleasure and loviall delights, bathing themselves in a sea of all sensuall satieties, denying their pampered nature nothing under heaven, not wine in bowles, not strange flesh, and beastly dalliance, not unnatu rall titillations, not violent filthinesse; that feast without feare, and drink without
B measure, and sweare without feeling, and live without God; their bodies are vigorous, ther coffers full, their state prosperous, their hearts chearfull: O how thou blessest such men: lo these (thou saist) these are the darlings of heaven and earth; Sic o sic iuvat vivere: Whiles those other solen mopish creatures are the (περιψήματα) offscouring and recrements of the world; Thou foole, give mee thy hand, let me lead thee with David into the sanctuary of God: Now what seest thou? The end, the end of these men is not peace. Surely O God thou hast set them in slippery places, and castest them downe into desolation: how suddenly are they perished, and horribly consumed! Woe is mee, they doe but dance a Galliard over the mouth of hell, that seemes now covered over with the greene sods of pleasure; The higher they leape, the more desperate is their lighting: Oh wofull, wofull condition of those godlesse men, yea those epicurean Porkets, whose belly is their God, whose heaven is their pleasure,
C whose cursed jollity is but a feeding up to an eternall slaughter: the day is comming, wherein every minute of their sinfull unsatisfying joyes shall bee answered with a thousand thousand millions of yeeres frying in that unquenchable fire; And when those damned Ghosts shall forth of their incessant flames see the glorious remuneration of the penitent and pensive soules which they have despised, they shall then gnash and yell out that late recantation; now they are counted among the children of God, and their portion is among the Saints, ours amongst Devils: Iudge not therefore according to appearance.

Should we judge according to appearance, all would bee Gold that glistereth, all drosse that glistereth not: Hypocrites have never shewed more faire than some Saints foule. Saul weepes, Ahab walks softly: Tobias and Sanballat will be building Gods wals; Herod heares Iohn gladly; Balaam prophecies Christ, Iudas preaches him, Satan confesses
D him; When even an Abraham dissembles, a David clokes adultery with murder, a Salomon gives (at least) a toleration to idolitry; a Peter forsweares his Master; briefly, the prime disciple is a Satan; Satan an Angell of light. For you: How gladly are we deceived in thinking you all such as you seeme; None but the Court of Heaven hath a fairer face. Prayers, Sermons, Sacraments, geniculation, silence, attention, reverence, applause, knees, eyes, eares, mouthes full of God; Oh that ye were thus alwaies! Oh that this were your worst side! But if we follow you from the Church, and find cursing and bitternesse under your tongues; licentious disorder in your lives, bribery and oppression in your hands; If God look into the windowes of your hearts, and find there bee (intus rapinæ) we cannot judge you by the appearance; or, if wee could, What comfort were it to have deceived our charity with the appearance of Saints, when the righteous Judge shall give you your portion with Hypocrites; What ever
E we doe, he will be sure not to judge according to appearance.

If appearance should be the rule, false religion should be true, true false. Quædam falsa probabiliora quibusdam veris, is the old word; Some falshoods are more likely than some truths: Native beauty scornes Art: Truth is as a matron; Error a curtizan: The matron cares onely to concile love by a grave and gracefull modesty, the curtizan with philtres and farding. Wee have no hierarchy mounted aboue Kings, no pompous ostentation of magnificence, no garish processions, no gaudy altars, no fine images clad with Taffats in summer, with velvets in winter, no flourishes of universality, no rumors rumors of miracles, no ſumptuous canonizations, we have nothing but (γλαε ἀδολον) the ſincerity of Scriptures, ſimplicity of Sacraments, decency of rare ceremonies, Chriſt crucified. We are gone if ye goe by appearance: Gone? alas, who can but bluſh and weepe, and bleed to ſee that Chriſtian ſoules ſhould (after ſuch beams of knowledge) ſuffer themſelves to be thus palpably cozened with the gilded ſlips of error, that after ſo many yeeres pious government of ſuch an incomparable ſucceſſion of religious Princes, authority ſhould have cauſe to complaine of our defection.

Deare Chriſtians (I muſt be ſharpe) are wee children or fooles, that we ſhould bee better pleaſed with the glittering tinſell of a painted baby from a Pedlers ſhop, than with the ſecretly-rich and invaluable Jewell of divine Truth? Have wee thus learned Chriſt? Is this the fruit of ſo cleere a Goſpell? of ſo bleſſed ſcepters? For Gods ſake be wiſe and honeſt, and yee cannot be Apoſtates.

Shortly, for it were eaſie to be endleſſe: If appearance might be the rule, good ſhould be evill, evill good; there is no vertue that cannot be counterfeited, no vice that cannot be blanched: we ſhould have no ſuch friend as our enemy, a flatterer; no ſuch enemy as our friend that reproves us. It were a wonder if ye great ones ſhould not have ſome ſuch burs, hanging upon your ſleeves; As ſoon ſhall corne grow without chaffe, as greatneſſe ſhall be free from adulation: Theſe ſervile ſpirits ſhall ſooth up all your purpoſes, and magnifie all your actions, and applaud your words, and adore your perſons: Sin what ye will, they will not check you; Project what you will, they will not thwart you; ſay what ye will, they will not faile to ſecond you; be what ye will, they will not faile to admire you; Oh how theſe men are all for you, all yours, all you; They love you as the Ravens doe your eyes. How deare was Siſera to Iael, when ſhe ſmoothed him up, and gave him milk in a lordly diſh, Samſon to Dalilah, when ſhe lulled him in her lap; Chriſt to Iudas, when he kiſſed him; See how he loved him, would ſome foole have ſaid, that had judged by appearance,

In the meane time an honeſt plaine dealing friend is like thoſe ſauces which a man praiſes with tears in his eyes: like a cheſnut, which pricks the fingers, but pleaſes our taſte; or like ſome wholſome medicinall potion, that diſtaſtes and purges us (perhaps makes us ſick) that it may heale us. Oh let the righteous ſmite me, for that is a benefit, let him reprove me, and it ſhall be a precious oyle that ſhall not break my head; Break it? no, it ſhall heale it, when it is mortally wounded by mine owne ſinne, by others aſſentation: Oh how happy were it, if we could love them that love our ſoules, and hate them that love our ſinnes. They are theſe rough hands that muſt bring us ſavory diſhes, and carry away a bleſſing; truth is for them now, thanks ſhall be for them hereafter, but in the meane time they may not be judged by the appearance.

Laſtly, if we ſhall judge friendſhip by complement, ſalubrity by ſweetneſſe ſervice by the eye, fidelity by oathes, valour by brags, a Saint by his face, a Devill by his feet, we ſhall be ſure to be deceived: Iudge not therefore according to appearance.

But (that yee miſtake not) though we may not judge only by the appearance, yet appearance may not be neglected in our judgement. Some things according to the Philoſopher (ὁποῖα μέν, ὅτι ἦν) ſeeme and are, are as they ſeeme: Semblances are not alwaies ſevered from truth; Our ſenſes are ſafe guides to our underſtandings. We juſtly laugh at that Scepticke in Laertius who becauſe his ſervants robbed his cupbord, doubted whether he left his victualls there: What doe we with eyes if we may not beleeve their intelligence? That world is paſt, wherein the gloſſe Clericus amplectens fœminam præſumitur benedicendi cauſa feciſſe; The wanton imbracements of another mans wife muſt paſſe with a Clarke for a ghoſtly benediction; Men are now more wiſe, leſſe charitable: Words and probable ſhewes are appearances, actions are not; and yet even our words alſo ſhall judge us; if they be filthy, if blaſphemous, if but idle, wee ſhall account for them, wee ſhall bee judged by them; Ex ore tuo; a foule tongue ſhewes ever a rotten heart; By their fruits yee ſhall know them, is our Saviours rule; I may ſafely ſay, No body deſires to borrow colours of evill; if you doe ill, thinke not that wee will make daintie to thinke you ſo; When the God of love can ſay by the Diſciple of love, Qui facit peccatum, ex diabolo eſt; Hee that committeth ſinne, is of the Devill: Even the righteous Judge of the world judgeth

(ſecundum

A (ſecundum opera) according to our works; we cannot erre whiles we tread in his ſteps. THE GREAT IMPOSTOR, LAID OPEN, OVT OF IER. 17. 9.

The heart is deceitfull above all things.

I Know where I am; in one of the famous Phrontiſteries of Law, and Juſtice: wherefore ſerves Law and Juſtice, but for the prevention or puniſhment of fraud and wickedneſſe? Give me leave therefore to bring before you, Students, Maſters, Fathers, Oracles of Law and Juſtice, the greateſt Cheator and Malefactor in the world, our owne Heart. It is a great word that I have ſaid, in promiſing to bring him before you; for this is one of the greateſt advantages, of his fraud, that he cannot bee ſeene: That as that old Jugler Apollonius Thyanæus, when he was brought before the Judge, vaniſhed out of ſight; ſo this great Impoſtor, in his very preſenting before
D you, diſpeareth and is gone; yea ſo cunningly, that he doth it with our owne conſent, and we would be loth that he could be ſeene: Therefore as an Epiphonema to this juſt complaint of deceitfulneſſe, is added Who can know it? It is eaſie to know that it is deceitfull, and in what it deceives, though the deceits themſelves cannot bee knowne, till too late; As we may ſee the ſhip, and the ſea, and the ſhip going on the ſea, yet the way of a ſhip in the ſea (as Salomon obſerves) we know not: God askes, and God ſhall anſwer; What he askes by Ieremie, he ſhall anſwer by S. Paul, Who knowes the heart of man? Even the ſpirit of man that is in him. If then the heart have but eyes enow to ſee it ſelfe by the reflection of thoughts, it is enough: Ye ſhall eaſily ſee and heare enough (out of the ana'ogie and reſemblance of hearts) to make you both aſtoniſhed and aſhamed. 1 Cor. 2. 11.

The heart of man lies in a narrow roome, yet all the world cannot fill it; but that
E which may be ſaid of the heart, would more than fill a world: Here is a double ſtile given it; of deceitfulneſſe; of wickedneſſe; either of which knowes no end, whether of being, or of diſcourſe. I ſpend my houre, and might doe my life, in treating of the firſt.

See then, I beſeech you, the Impoſtor, and the Impoſture; The Impoſtor himſelfe, The heart of man; The Impoſture, Deceitfull above all things.

As deceitfull perſons are wont ever to goe under many names, and ambiguous, and muſt be expreſt with an [alias] ſo doth the heart of man; Neither man himſelfe, nor any part of man hath so many names, as the heart alone; For every facultie that it hath, and every action it doth, it hath a severall name: Neither is there more multiplicitie, than doubt in this name; Not so many termes are used to signifie the heart, as the heart signifies many things. A

When ye heare of the heart, ye think straight of that fleshie part in the center of the bodie which lives first, and dies last; and whose beatings you find to keepe time all the body over; That is not it which is so cunning; Alas, that is a poore harmelesse peece meerely passive: and if it doe any thing, as the submiństration of Vitall spirits, to the maintenance of the whole frame, it is but good; no, it is the spirituall part that lurkes in this flesh, which is guilty of such deceit. We must learne of wittie Idolatry to distinguish betwixt the stocke and the invisible powers that dwell in it. It is not for me to be a stickler betwixt the Hebrewes, and the Greeke Philosophers, and Physitians, in a question of naturall learning, concerning the seat of the soule; nor to insist upon the reasons why the spirit of God rather places all the spirituall powers in the heart, than in the braine; Doubtlesse in respect of the affections there resident, whereby all those speculative abilities are drawne to practice; It shall suffice us to take things as we find them, and to hold it for granted, that this Monosyllable (for so it is in many languages) comprises all that intellective and affective world which concerneth man; and in plaine termes to say, that when God saies The heart is deceitfull, hee meanes, the understanding, will, affections are deceitfull. B

The understanding is doubly deceitfull; It makes us beleeve it knowes those things which it doth not; and that it knowes not those things which it doth: As some foolish Mountebanke, that holds it a great glory to seeme to know all things; or some presuming Physitian, that thinks it a shame not to professe skill in any state, of the body or disease; so doth our vaine understanding; therein framing it selfe according to the spirits it meets withall; if they be proud and curious, it perswades them, they know every thing; if careless, that they know enough. C

In the first kind; What hath not the fond heart of man dared to arrogate to it selfe? It knowes all the starres by their names; Tush, that is nothing; It knowes what the stars meane by their very lookes, what the birds meane by their chirping, as Apollonius did; What the heart meanes, by the features of the face; it knowes the events of life by the lines of the hand: the secrets of Art, the secrets of Nature, the secrets of State, the secrets of others hearts, yea the secrets of God in the closet of heaven; Yea, not onely what God hath done, but what he will doe: This is (sapiens stultitia) a wise folly, as Irenæus said of his Valentinians; All Figure-casters, Palmesters, Physiognomers, Fortune-tellers, Alchymists, fantastick projectors, and all the rabble of professors of those ἀτεχνία, not so much curious as idle Arts, have their word given them by the Apostle, Deceiving and deceived; neither can these men make any worse fooles than their hearts have made themselves; and well may that Alexandrian tax be set upon them in both names, whether of active, or passive folly: And (as it commonly falls out, that superfluous things rob the heart of necessary) in the meane while, those things which the heart may, and should know, it lightly misknowes: As our senses are deceived by distance, or interpositions, to think the stars beamie and sparkling; the Moone horned, the Planets equally remote, the Sunne sometimes red, pale other some: so doth also our understanding erre, in misopinion of divine things; It thinks it knowes God, when it is but an Idoll of fancie, as Sauls messengers, when they came into the roome, thought they had the true David, when it was but a Wispe; it knowes the will of God, when it is nothing but grosse misconstruction: so as the common knowledge of men, though they thinke it a Torch, is but an Ignis Fatuus to lead them to a ditch: How many thousand Assyrians think they are in the way to the Prophet, when they are in the midst of Samaria? How many millions think they walke fairely on to heaven, when indeed they are in the broad way that leads to destruction? Oh poore blinde Pagans, halfe-sighted Turks, bleare-eied Iewes, blind-folded Papists, Squint-eied Schismaticks, purblind ignorants, how well doe they find themselves pleased with their devotion, and thinke God should be so too; when it is nothing but a mixture of mesprison, superstition, conceitednesse; D E

A conceitednesse; and (according to the seldome-reverently-used proverbe) whiles they thinke they have God by the finger, they hold a Devill by the toe; and all this, because their heart deceives them. If careless and loth to be at the paines of knowing more, it perswades them they know enough; that they crie out of more, as he did on the ointment, (Vt quid perditio hæc?) What needs all this waste? and makes them as conscionable for knowledge, as Esau was for cattle, I have enough, my brother, keepe that thou hast to thy selfe; or as contentedly-resolute, as the Epicure in the Gospell: Soule take thy ease, thou hast knowledge enough laid up for many yeeres.

From whence it is, that too many rest simply (yea wilfully) in their owne measure, not so much as wishing more skill in Soule-matters; applauding their owne safe mediocritie; like the credulous blind man that thought he now saw a shimmering of the Sunne-beames, when indeed his back was towards it: Hence it is that they scoffe at B the foolishnesse of preaching, scorne the forward bookishnesse of others, fearing nothing but a surfet of Manna, and hating to know more than their neighbours, than their fore-fathers; and thus are led on muffled up in an unfelt ignorance, to their grave, yea, (without the mercy of God) to their hell.

And as in these things there is a presumption of knowing what we doe not; so contrarily, a dissimulation and concealment of the knowledge of what wee doe understand: The heart of man is a great lier to it selfe this way; Saint Paul saies that of Pagans, which I may boldly say of Christians, they have the effect of the law written in their hearts; yet many of them will not be acknowne of one letter ingraven there by the finger of God: Certaine common principles there are (together with this law) interlinearily written in the Tables of the heart, as that we must doe as we would be C done to; That there is a God; That this God is infinite in justice and truth, and must be served like himselfe; these they either blot out, or lay their finger on, that they may not be seene, purposely, that they may sinne freely; and faine would perswade themselves they never had any such evidence from God: so putting off the checks of conscience with bold denials; like the harlot of Iericho, (but worse than she) that hath hid the Spies, and now out-faces their entertainment: Wherein the heart doth to it selfe, that which Nahash the Ammonite would have done to Israel, put out his owne right eye, that it may not see that law whereby it might bee convinced, and find it selfe miserable. Thus the understanding of man is every way deceitfull in over-knowing, mis-knowing, dissembling; in all which it is like an evill and unfaithfull eye, that either will be seeing by a false glasse, or a false light, or with distortion; or else wilfully closes the lids that it may not see at all; and in all this deceives us.

The will is no lesse cunning; which though it make faire pretences of a generall D inclination to good, yet (hic & nunc) in particulars, hangs towards a pleasing evill; Yea though the understanding have sufficiently informed it of the worthinesse of good, and the turpitude of evill, yet being overcome with the false delectableness of sinne, it yeelds to a misse-assent; Reason being (as Aquinas speakes) either swallowed up by some passion, or held downe by some vicious habit: It is true, still the Will followes the Reason, neither can doe otherwise; but therefore, if Reason misled bee contrary to Reason, and a schisme arise in the soule, it must follow that the Will must needs be contrary to Will and Reason; Wherein it is like a Planet, which though it be carried about perpetually by the first mover, yet slily creeps on his owne way, contrary to that strong circumvolution: And though the mind be sufficiently convinced of the necessity, or profit of a good act, yet for the tediousnesse annexed E to it, in a dangerous spirituall acedie, it insensibly slips away from it, and is content to let it fall; As some idle, or fearefull Merchant, that could be glad to have gold, if it would come with ease, but will not either take the paines, or hazard the adventure to fetch it: Thus commonly the will (in both respects) Water-man-like lookes forward, and rowes backward; and under good pretences doth nothing but deceive.

The affections are as deceitfull as either; whether in mis-placing, measure, or manner.

Mis-placing: They are fiery where they should be coole; and where they should burne, freeze; Our heart makes us beleeve it loves God, and gives him pledges of affection; affection; whiles it secretly doats upon the world; like some false strumpet, that entertaines her husband with her eyes, and in the meane time treads upon the toe of an Adulterer under the boord: That it loves justice, when it is but revenge; That it grieves for the missing of Christ, when indeed it is but for the loaves and fishes; That it feares God, when indeed it is but afraid of our owne torment; That it hates the sin, when it is the person; That it hates the world, when it thrusts God out of doores to lodge it. A Measure: That we love God enough, and the world but enough, when as indeed the one love is but as the cold fit of an ague, the other an hot; we chill in the one, no lesse than we glow in the other; when we make God onely a stale, to draw on the world; That we doe enough hate our corruptions, when (at our sharpest) we doe but gently sneape them, as Hely did his sonnes; or as some indulgent parent doth an unthrifty darling; whom he chides, and yet feeds with the fewell of his excesse; That we have grieved enough for our sinnes, when they have not cost us so much as one teare, nothing but a little fashionable wind, that never came further than the roots of our tongue; That we doe enough compassionate the afflictions of Ioseph, when we drinke wine in bowles; That we feare God more than men, when we are ashamed to doe that in presence of a child, which we care not to doe in the face of God. B

Manner. That our heart loves, and hates, and feares, and joyes, and grieves truly, when it is an hypocrite in all; That it delights constantly in God, and holy things, when it is but an Ephraims morning dew; That our anger is zealous, when it is but a flash of personall malice, or a superstitious furie; That we feare as sonnes, when it is as cowards, or slaves; That we grieve as Gods patients, when we fret, and repine, and struggle like franticks against the hand of our Maker. Thus (to summe up all) the heart of man is wholly set upon cozenage; the understanding over-knowing, mis-knowing, dissembling; The will pretending, and inclining contrarily; the affections mocking us in the object, measure, manner; and in all of them the heart of man is deceitfull. C

Ye have seene the face of this Cheator; look now at his hand; and now ye see who this Deceiver is, see also the sleights of his deceit; and therein the fashion, the subject, the sequell of it; from whence we will descend to our Demeanour, towards so dangerous an Impostor.

The fashion of his deceit is the same with our ordinary Juglers; either cunning conveyance, or false resemblance. Cunning conveyance, whether into us, in us, from us.

The heart admits sin, as Paradise did the Serpent; There it is, but by what chinks or cranies it entred, we know not; so as we may say of sin as the Master of the feast in the Gospell said to his slovenly guest, Quomodo intrasti? How camest thou in hither? Corruption doth not eat into the heart as our first Parents did into the apple, so as the print of their teeth might be seene, but as the worme eats into the core, insensibly; Neither is there lesse closeness when it is entred; I would it were as untrue a word, as it is an harsh one, that many a professedly-Christian heart, lodges a devill in the blinde roomes of it, and either knowes it not, or will not be acknowne of it; every one that harbours a willing sin in his breast, doth so: The malicious man hath a furious devill; the wanton an uncleane devill, a Beelphegor, or a Tammuz; the proud man a Lucifer, the covetous a Mammon; Certainely, these foule spirits are not more truly in hell, than in a wicked heart; there they are, but so closely, that I know not if the heart it selfe know it; it being verified of this citadell of the heart, which was said of that vast Ninive, that the enemie had taken some parts of it, long ere the other knew it: What should I speake of the most common, and yet most dangerous guest, that lodges in this Inne of the heart, Infidelity? Call at the doore, and aske if such a one host not there; They within make strange of it, deny it, forsweare it; Call the officers, make privie search, you shall hardly find him: Like some Jesuite in a Popish dames chamber, hee is so closely contrived into false floores, and double walls, that his presence is not more easily knowne, than hardly convinced, confessed. How easie is it to say, that if infidelity did not lurke in the hearts of men, they durst not doe as they doe; they could not doe but what they doe not? Durst they sinne if they were D E

perswaded of an hell? durst they buy a minute of pleasure with everlasting torments? Could they so sleight heaven if they beleeved it? Could they bee so loth to possesse it? Could they thinke much of a little painfull goodnesse to purchase an eternitie of happinesse? No, no, Men, fathers, and brethren; if the heart were not Infidell, whiles the face is Christian, this could not bee. Neither doth the heart of man more cunningly convey sinne into, and in it selfe, than from it; The sinne that ye saw even now openly in the hands, is so swiftly past under the boord, that it is now vanished; Looke for it in his fore-head, there it is not; looke for it under his tongue, there is none; looke for it in his conscience, yee find nothing; and all this by the Legier-de-maine of the heart: Thus Achan hath hid his wedge, and now he dares stand out to a lot; Thus Salomons Harlot hath wip't her mouth, and it was not shee: Thus Saul will lie-out his sacrilege, untill the very beasts out-bleat, and out-bellow him; Thus the swearer sweares, and when hee hath done, sweares that hee swore not; Thus the uncleane fornicator bribes off his sinne, and his shame, and now makes challenges to the world of his honesty. It cannot bee spoken how peevishly witty the heart of man is this way: neither doubt I but this wilinesse is some of the poyson that the subtile serpent infected us with in that fatall morsell: They were three cunning shifts which the Scripture recordeth of three women (as that sex hath beene ever noted for more sudden pregnancie of wit) Rachel, Rahab, and the good wife of Bahurim; The first hiding the Teraphim with a modest seat, the second, the spies with flaxe-stalkes, and the third Davids scouts with corne spred over the Well; but these are nothing to the devices that nature hath wont to use for the cloaking of sinne? God made man upright, saith Salomon, but he sought many inventions: Is Adam challenged for sinne? Behold all on the sudden it is passed from his hand, to Gods; The woman that thou gavest mee: Is Saul challenged for a covetous and disobedient remissenesse? the sinne is straight passed from the field to the Altar; I saved the fattest for a Sacrifice to the Lord thy God; So the one begins his sinne in God, and the other ends it in him: Is David bewitched with lust to abuse the Wife: the Husband must bee sent home drunke to hide it, or if not that, to his long home, in a pretended favour of his valour: Is a griping Usurer disposed to put his mony together to breed a monster? he hath a thousand quirks to cozen both law and conscience: Is a Simonaicall Patron disposed to make a good match of his peoples soules? it shall be no bargaine, but a gift: he hath a living to give, but an horse to sell. And sure I thinke in this wise age of the world, Usurers and Simonists strive who shall find the wittiest way to hell: What should I speake of the secret frauds in contracts, booties in matches, subornation of instruments, hiring of oathes, feeing of officers, equivocations of answers, and tenne thousand other tricks that the heart of man hath devised for the conveyances of sin; in all which it too well approves it selfe incomparably deceitfull.

The false semblance of the heart is yet worse; for the former is most-what for the smothering of evill; this is for the justifying of evill, or the disgrace of good; In these two doth this act of falshood chiefly consist; in making evill good, or good evill. For the first; The naturall man knowes well how filthy all his brood is, and therefore will not let them come forth, but disguised with the colours and dresses of good; so as now every one of natures birds is a Swan; Pride is handsomnesse, desperate fury valour; lavishnesse is noble munificence, drunkennesse civility, flattery complement, murderous revenge, justice; the Curtizan is bona fœmina, the Sorcerer a wise man, the oppressor a good husband; Absalom will goe pay his vowes, Herod will worship the Babe. For the second; such is the envy of nature, that where shee sees a better face than her owne, she is ready to scratch it, or cast dirt in it; and therefore knowing that all vertue hath a native beauty in it, she labours to reforme it by the fouleſt imputations. Would the Israelites be devout? they are idle; Doth David dance for joy before the Arke? he is a foole in a Morris: Doth Saint Paul discourse of his heavenly Vision? Too much learning hath made him mad. Doe the Disciples miraculously speak all the tongues of Babel? they are full of new wine: Doe they preach Christs Kingdome? they are seditious; The resurrection? they are bablers. Is a man conscionable? he is an Hypocrite: Is he conformable? he is unconscionable: Is he plaine dealing? he is rudely uncivill:

uncivill: Is he wisely insinuative? he is a flatterer: In short, such is the wicked craft of the heart, that it would let us see nothing in it owne forme; but faine would shew us evill faire, that we might be inamored of it, and vertue ugly, that we might abhorre it; and as it doth for the way, so doth it for the end; hiding from us the glory of heaven, that is laid up for over-commers, and shewing us nothing but the pleasant closure of wickednesse; making us beleeve that hell is a palace, and heaven a dungeon, that so we might be in love with death; and thus both in cunning conveyance, and false semblance, The heart of man is deceitfull above all things.

Ye have seene the fashion of this deceit; cast now your eyes upon the subject; And whom doth it then deceive? It doth deceive others, it can deceive it selfe, it would deceive Satan, yea God himselfe. Others, first: How many doe we take for honest and sound Christians, who yet are but errant hypocrites? These Apes of Satan have learned to transforme themselves into Angels of light; The heart bids the eyes look upward to heaven, when they are full of Adultery; It bids the hands to raise up themselves towards their Maker, when they are full of blood; It bids the tongue wag holily, when there is nothing in the bosome but Atheous prophaneness; It bids the knee to bow like a Camell, when the heart is stiffe as an Elephant; yea if need be it can bid a teare fall from the eye, or an almes or just action fall from the hand, and all to gull the world with a good opinion; In all which, false chapmen and horse-coursers doe not more ordinarily deceive their buyers in shops and faires, than we do one another in our conversation: Yea, so crafty is the heart, that it can deceive it selfe; By overweening his owne powers, as the proud man; by under-valuing his graces, as the modest; by mis-taking his estate, as the ignorant; How many hearts doe thus grossely beguile themselves? The first thinks he is rich, and fine, when he is beggerly and naked; so did the Angell of Laodicea: The second is poore in his one spirit, when he is rich of Gods spirit: The third thinks that he is a great favourite of heaven, when he is rather branded for an out-cast; that he is truly noble, when hee is a slave to that, which is baser than the worst of Gods creatures, sinne: Let the proud and ignorant worldling therefore know, that though others may mocke him with applauses, yet that all the world cannot make him so much a foole as his owne heart.

Yea, so cunning is the heart, that it thinks to goe beyond the devill himselfe: I can (thinks it) swallow his bait, and yet avoid his hooke; I can sinne, and live; I can repent of sinning, and defeat my punishment by repenting; I can run upon the score, and take up the sweet and rich commodities of sinfull pleasure; and when I have done, I can put my selfe under the protection of a Saviour, and escape the arrest: Oh the world of soules that perish by this fraud, fondly beguiling themselves, whiles they would beguile the Tempter.

Yet higher: Lastly, as Satan went about to deceive the Sonne of God; so this foolish consort and client of his goes about to deceive God himselfe: The first paire of hearts that ever was, were thus credulous,, to think they should now meet with a meanes of knowledge and Deifying, which God either knew not of, or grudged them, and therefore they would bee stealing it out of the side of the apple, without God, yea against him: Tush, none eye shall see us; Is there knowledge in the most high, saith the sottish Atheist? Lord have not wee heard thee preach in our streets? have not wee cast out Devils in thy name? sayes the smoothing hypocrite; as if he could fetch God over for an admission into heaven. Thou hast not lied to man, but to God, saith S. Peter to Ananias. And pettish Ionas, after he had beene cooled in the belly of the Whale, and the Sea, yet will be bearing God downe in an argument to the justifying of his idle choler, I doe well to be angry to the death. But as the greatest Polititians are oft over-taken with the grossest follies (God owes proud wits a shame) the heart of man could not possibly devise how so much to befoole it selfe, as by this wicked presumption: Oh yee fooles, when will ye understand? Hee that formed the eye, shall hee not see? Hee that teacheth man knowledge, shall not hee understand? The Lord knoweth the thoughts of man, that they are vanitie. A rod for the backe of fooles, yea a rod of iron for such presumptuous fooles, to crush them in peeces like a Potters vessell.

Psal. 94 10 11.

Ye have seen the fashion and the subject of this deceit: the sequell, or effect follows; every

A every way lamentable; For hence it comes to passe that many a one hath had his heart in keeping forty, fifty, threescore yeeres, and more, and yet is not acquainted with it; and all because this craft hath kept it at the Priscillianists locke, Tu omnes, te nemo; It affects to be a searcher of all men, no man is allowed to come aboard of it; And if a man whether out of curiosity, or conscience, be desirous to inquire into it (as it is a shame for a man to be a stranger at home; Know yee not your owne heart, saith the Apostle;) it casts it selfe, Proteus-like, into so many formes, that it is very hard to apprehend it. One while the man hath no heart, (לא לב) saith Salomon; Then he hath (לב ולב) an heart, and an heart, saith David; and one of his hearts contradicts another; and then how knowes he whether to beleeve? and what certainty, what safety can it be for a man to live unacquainted with himselfe? Of this unacquaintance, secondly, arises a dangerous mesprison of a mans selfe, in the nature and quantity of his sin, in the quality of his repentance, in his peace and intireness with God, in his right to heaven, and (in a word) B in his whole spirituall estate. Of this mes-prison, thirdly, arises a fearefull disappointment of all his hopes, and a plunging into unavoidable torments: Wherein it is miserable to see, how cunningly the traiterous hearts of many men beare them in hand all their lives long; soothing them in all their courses, promising them successe in all their waies, securing them from feare of evills, assuring them of the favour of God and possession of heaven, (as some fond Bigot would brag of his Bull, or Medall, or Agnus Dei; or as those Priests, that Gerson * taxes, who made the people beleeve that the Masse was good for the eye-sight, for the mawe, for bodily health, and preservation) till they come to their death-beds; But then when they come to call forth the comforts they must trust to, they find them like to some unfaithfull Captaine, that hath all the while in Garrison filled his purse with dead payes, and made up the number of his C companies with borrowed men; and in time of ease shewed faire; but when he is called forth by a sudden alarum, bewraies his shame and weakenesse, and failes his Generall when he hath most need of him; right thus doe the perfidious hearts of many, after all the glorious brags of their security, on the bed of their last reckoning, find nothing but a cold despaire, and a wofull horror of conscience; and therefore too justly may their hearts say to them, as the heart of Appollodorus the Tyrant seemed to say unto him; who dreamed one night that he was fleaed by the Scythians, and boyled in a Caldron; and that his heart spake to him out of the kettle (ἐγὼ σοὶ τοῦτο αἴτιος) It is I that have drawne thee to all this. Certainly never man was, or shall be frying in hell, but cries out of his owne heart, and accuses that deceitfull peece as guilty of all his torment: For let Satan be never so malicious, and all the world never so parasiticall, yet if his owne heart had beene true to him, none of these could have hurt D him. Let the rest of our enemies doe their worst, onely from the evill of our owne hearts, good Lord deliver us.

It were now time for our thoughts to dwell a little upon the meditation, and deploration of our owne danger and misery, who are every way so invironed with subtilty. If we looke at Satan; his old title is, that old Serpent; who must needs therefore now, by so long time & experience, be both more old and more Serpent. If we look at sin, it is as crafty as he; Lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulnesse of sin: If at our owne hearts, we heare (that which we may feele) that the heart is deceitfull above all things. Oh wretched men that weare, how are we beset with Impostors on all hands; If it were more seasonable for us to bewaile our estate, than to seeke the redresse of it; But since it is not so much worth our labour to know how deepe the pit is, into which we are fallen, as how to come out of it, heare rather (I beseech you) for a conclusion, E how wee may avoid the danger of the deceit of our false heart; even just so as wee would prevent the nimble feats of some cheating Jugler; Search him, watch him, Trust him not.

Looke well into his hands, pockets, boxes, sleeves; yea, under his very tongue it selfe; There is no fraud so secret, but may be descried; were our hearts as crafty as the devill himselfe, they may be found out; We are not ignorant (saith Saint Paul) of Satans devices; much more then may we know our owne; Were the hearts of men (as Salomon speakes of Kings) like unto deepe waters, they have a bottome, and may bee fathomed;

Psal. 12.

* Qui publicè volunt dogmatizare seu prædicare populo, quod si quis audit missam in illo die non erit cæcus, nec morietur morte subitanea, nec carebit sufficienti sustentatione, &c.

fathomed; Were they as darke as hell it selfe, and never so full of windings, and blind waies, and obscure turnings, doe but take the lanthorne of Gods law in your hand, and you shall easily find all the false and foule corners of them; As David saith of the Sun, nothing is hid from the light thereof; Prove your selves, saith the Apostle; It is hard if falshood be so constant to it selfe that by many questions it be not tripped; Where this duty is slackned, it is no wonder if the heart bee over-run with spirituall fraud; Often privy searches scarre away vagrant and disorderly persons; where no inquiry is made, is a fit harbour for them; If yee would not have your hearts, therefore, become the lawlesse Ordinaries of uncleane spirits, search them oft; Leave not a straw unshaken to find out these Labanish Teraphim that are stolne, and hid within us, And, when we have searched our best, if we feare there are yet some unknowne evils lurking within us (as the man after Gods owne heart praies against secret sinnes) let us call in him that cannot be deceived; and say to God with the Psalmist, Search thou me, O Lord, and trie mee; Oh let us yeeld our selves over to be ransackt by that all-seeing eye, and effectuall hand of the Almighty. All our daubing, and cogging, and packing, and shuffling lies open before him, and he only can make the heart ashamed of it selfe.

And when our hearts are once stript naked, and carefully searcht, let our eyes be ever fixedly bent upon their conveyances, and inclinations; If we search and watch not, we may be safe for the present, long we cannot; for our eye is no sooner off, than the heart is busie in some practise of falshood; It is well if it forbeare whiles we look on, for The thoughts of mans heart are only evill continually; and many a heart is like some bold and cunning theefe, that looks a man in the face, and cuts his purse: But surely, if there be any guardian of the soule, it is the eye; The wise mans eye (saith Salomon) is in his head; doubtlesse, on purpose to look into his heart: My sonne, above all keepings keepe thy heart, saith he; If we doe not dogge our hearts then in all our wayes, but suffer our selves to lose the sight of them, they run wilde, and we shall not recover them till after many slippery tricks on their parts, and much repentance on ours. Alas, how little is this regarded in the world? wherin the most take no ~~keepe~~ care of their soules, but suffer themselves to run after the wayes of their owne hearts, without observation, without controlement; What should I say of these men, but that they would faine be deceived, and perish? For after this loose licentiousnesse (without the great mercy of God) they never set eye more upon their hearts, till they see them either fearfully intoyled in the present judgements of God, or fast chained in the pit of hell, in the torments, of finall condemnation.

Thirdly, if our searches and watches should faile us, we are sure our distrust cannot; It is not possible our heart should deceive us, if we trust it not; Wee carry a remedie within us of others fraud; and why not of our owne? The Italians not unwisely pray God (in their knowne proverbe) to deliver them from whom they trust; for wee are obnoxious to those we relie upon, but nothing can leese that which it had not; Distrust therefore can never be disapointed: If our hearts then shall promise us ought (as it hath learned to profer largely, of him that said, All these will I give thee) although with vowes and oathes, aske for his assurances; if he cannot fetch them from the evidences of God, trust him not: If he shall report ought to us, aske for his witnesses; if he cannot produce them from the records of God, trust him not: If he shall advise us ought, aske for his warrant; if he cannot fetch it from the Oracles of God, trust him not; And in all things so beare our selves to our hearts, as those that thinke they live among theeves and cozeners; ever jelously and suspiciously; taking nothing of their word, scarce daring to trust our owne senses; making sure work in all matters of their transactions. I know I speake to wise men, whose counsell is wont to be asked, and followed, in matter of the assurances of estates; whose wisdome is frequently imploied in the triall, eviction, dooming of malefactors: Alas, what shall it availe you that you can advise for the prevention of others fraud, if in the meane time you suffer your selves to be cozened at home? What comfort can you find in pnblike seruice to the state against offenders, if you should carry a fraudulent and wicked heart in your owne bosomes? There is one above whom we may trust, whose word is more firme than heaven; When heaven shall passe, that shall stand; It is no trusting ought besides, any further than he gives his word for it. Mans Epithet is Homo mendax, and his best part, the hearts, deceitfull. Alas, what shall we think, or say of the condition of those men, which never follow any other advice than what they take of their owne heart? Such are the most; that make not Gods Law of their counsell; As Esay said of Israel, Abiit vagus in via cordis sui: Surely they are not more sure they have an heart, than that they shall be deceived with it, and betrayed unto death; Of them may I say, as Salomon doth of the wanton foole, that followes an harlot; Thus with her great craft she caused him to yeeld, and with her flattering lips she inticed him: And he followed her straight waies, as an Oxe that goes to the slaughter, or as a foole to the stocks for correction. Oh then, deare Christians, as ever yee desire to avoid that direfull slaughter-house of hell, those wailings, and gnashings, and gnawings, and everlasting burnings, looke carefully to your owne hearts; and what ever suggestions they shall make unto you, trust them not, till you have tried them by that unfaileable rule of righteousnesse, the royall law of your Maker, which can no more deceive you than your hearts can free you from deceit.

Esa. 57. 17.

Pro. 7. 21.

Lastly, that we may avoid not only the events, but the very enterprises of this deceit, let us countermine the subtill workings of the heart. Our Saviour hath bidden us be wise as Serpents; What should be wise but the heart? And can the heart be wiser than it selfe? Can the wisdome of the heart remedie the craft of the heart? Certainly it may. There are two men in every regenerate breast, the old and the new; And of these (as they are ever plotting against each other) we must take the better side, and labour that the new man, by being more wise in God, may out-strip the old: And how shall that be done? If we would dispossesse the strong man that keepes the house, our Saviour bids us bring in a stronger than he; and if wee would over-reach the subtilty of the old man, yea, the old Serpent, bring in a wiser than he, even the Spirit of God, the God of wisdome; If we would have Achitophels wicked counsels crossed, set up an Hushai within us: The foolishnesse of God is wiser than the wisdome of men. Could wee but settle God within us, our craftie hearts would bee out of countenance, and durst not offer to play any of their deluding tricks before him from whom nothing is hid; and if they could be so impudently presumptuous, yet they should be sosoone controlled in their first motions, that there would be more danger of their confusion, than of our deceit. As ye love your selves therefore, and your owne safty, and would be free from the perill of this secret broaker of Satan, your owne hearts, render them obediently into the hands of God; give him the keyes of these closets, of his owne making; beseech him that he will vouchsafe to dwell and reigne in them; so shall we bee sure that neither Satan shall deceive them, nor they deceive us; but both wee and they shall be kept safe and inviolable, and presented glorious to the appearance of our Lord Jesus Christ: To whom with the Father, and the holy Ghost, be all honour and glory, for ever and ever.

Amen.

SERMON PREACHED TO THE COVRT AT THEOBALDS, on Sunday, Sept. 21. 1623.

By Ios. Hall.

¶ Imprinted at London, 1634.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE WILLIAM EARLE OF PEMBROKE, LORD high Chamberlaine; CHANCELLOR of the universitie of Oxford; One of his MAIESTIES most Honourable Privie Counsell.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

Et it please you to receive from the Presse what you vouchsafed to require from my pen: Vnworthy I confesse either of the publike light, or the beames of your Honours judicious eyes; yet such as (besides the motive of common importunitie) I easily apprehended, might be not a little usefull for the times; which, if ever, require quickning: Neither is it to no purpose that the world should see in what stile we speake to the Court, not without acceptation. This, and what ever service I may bee capable of, are justly devoted to your Lordship, whom all good hearts follow with true Honour, as the great Patron of learning, the sincere friend of Religion, and rich purchaser of Truth. The God of Heaven adde to the number of such Peeres, and to the measure of your Lo: graces and happinesse.

Your Honours in all humble and faithfull observance,

IOS. HALL.

THE BEST BARGAINE.

Pro. 23. 23. Buy the Truth, and ſell it not.

THe ſubject of my Text is a Bargaine, and Sale. A Bargaine enjoyned, a ſale forbidden: and the ſubject of both bargaine and ſale, is Truth; A bargaine able to make us all rich; a ſale able to make any of us miſerable; Buy the Truth, and ſell it not; A ſentence of ſhort ſound, but large extent; the words are but ſeaven ſyllables, an eaſie load for our memories; the matter is a world of work; a long taske for our lives. And
C firſt, let me call you to this Mart, which holds both now, and ever; If yee love your ſelves, be ye cuſtomers at this ſhop of heaven; Buy the Truth.

In every bargaine there is merx, and mercatura; the commoditie, and the match; The commoditie to be bought is the Truth; The match made for this commodity, is Buying, Buy the Truth. An ill Judge may put a good Interrogatory; yet it was a queſtion too good for the mouth of a Pilate, What is Truth? The ſchooles have wearied themſelves in the ſolution; To what purpoſe ſhould I reade a Metaphyſicall Lecture to Courtiers? Truth is as Time, one in all; yet, as Time, though but one, is diſtinguiſhed into paſt, preſent, future, and every thing hath a Time of it owne; ſo is Truth variouſly diſtinguiſhed, according to the ſubjects wherein it is; This is Anſelmus, cited by Aquinas; I had rather ſay, Truth is as light: (Send forth thy Truth, and thy light, ſaith the Pſalmiſt) which (though but one in all) yet there is one light of the Sunne, another of D the Moone, another of the Starres, another of this lower ayre: There is an eſſentiall, and cauſall Truth in the Divine underſtanding, which the Schools call Primo-primam; This will not be ſold, cannot be bought; God will not part with it, the world is not worth it; This Truth is as the Light in the body of the Sunne. There is an intrinſecall or formall truth in things truly exiſting; For, Being and True are convertible; and Saint Auſten rightly defines, Verum eſt illud quod eſt; All this created Truth in things, is derived exemplarily, and cauſally, from that increated Truth of God; this the ſchools call Secundo-primam; and it is as the light of the Sun-beames, caſt upon the Moone, and Starres. There is an extrinſecall, or ſecondary truth of propoſitions following upon, and conformable to the truth of the things expreſſed: thus, Verum is no other than Eſſe declarativum, as Hilarie; And this Truth, being the thing it ſelfe ſubjectively, in words expreſſively, in the mind of man terminatively, preſuppoſeth a double conformity or E adequation; Both of the underſtanding to the matter conceived; and of the words to the underſtanding; ſo as Truth is when we ſpeak as we think, and think as it is; And this Truth is as the light diffuſed from thoſe heavenly bodies, to the Region of this lower aire; This is the Truth wee are called to Buy: But this derivative and relative Truth, whether in the mind, or in the mouth, hath much multiplicity, according to the matter either conceived, or uttered; There is a Theologicall Truth, there is a naturall, there is a morall, there is a civill; all theſe muſt bee deare bought; but the beſt at the higheſt rate, which is Theologicall, or divine; whether in the principles, or neceſſary conclusions; The principles of divine Truth are Scriptura veritatis, Dan. 10. The Law of Truth, Mal. 2. The Word of Truth, 2 Cor. 6. The necessary conclusions are they, which upon irrefragable inferences are deduced from those holy grounds: Shortly then, every parcell of Divine Truth, whether laid downe in Scripture, or drawne necessarily from Scripture, is this Mercimonium sacrum, which we are bidden to Buy; Buy the Truth. A

This is the commoditie; The match is, Buy; that is, Beat the price, and pay it. Buy it; Of whom? For what? Of whom, but of the owner, of the maker?

The owner; It is Veritas Domini, Gods Truth, Ps. 117. His stile is the Lord God of Truth, Psal. 31. The maker; The works of his hands are truth, and judgement, Psal. 111. And if any usurping spirit of error shall have made a free-booty, of Truth, and shall with-hold it in unrighteousnesse, we must redeeme it out of his hands with the highest ransome.

What is the price? That is the maine thing in buying; For, Buying is no other than pactio pretii: Else-where God proclaimes; Ho, every one that thirsteth, come, buy wine and milke without money, and without price, Esay 55. This is a Donation in forme of sale: But, here must be a price in the hand; God will give mercy, and not sell it; He will sell Truth, & not give it: For what will he sell it? First, for Labour; The Heathen Poet could say, his gods sold learning for sweat; The originall word here used is (קְנֵה) Compara; Get it any way, either labore, or pretio; yea labore et pretio. This great foreman of Gods shop tels us we cannot have it under, Pro. 24. We must seek for her as silver, and search for her as for hid Treasures; The veine of Truth lies low, it must be digged and delved for to the very center. If Truth could be bought with ease and pleasure, many a lazy Christian would bid faire for it, who now resolve rather upon want, than toile. The slothfull worldling will rather take up a falshood for Truth, than beat his braine to discerne Truth from falshood; an error of free-cost is better than an high-rated Veritie; Labour for Truth is turn'd over for the task of Church-men; no life savours to these flegmatick Spirits, but that of the Lilies, Neque laborant, neque nent; They neither labour nor spin; This dull resolution is unworthy of a Christian, yea of a reasonable soule; and if we should take up no other for the body, we should be fed with hunger, and clothed with nakednesse; the earth should be our feather-bed, and the skie our Canopie; we should abound with want, live savagely, and die miserably. It was the just Canon of the Apostle, He that labours not, let him not eat; Certainly, he can never eat of the heavenly Manna of Truth, that will not step forth to gather it: Heare this, ye delicate Courtiers, that would heare a Sermon if ye could rise out of your beds; that would lend God an houre, if ye could spare it from your pleasures; the God of heaven scornes to have his precious Truth so basely under-valued; if ye bid God lesse than labour for Truth, I can give you no comfort, but that ye may go to hell with ease. B

The markets of Truth, as of all other commodities, vary: It is the rule of Casuists; Justitia pretii non consistit in individuo; The Justice of price doth not pitch ever upon a point; Sometimes the price of Truth hath risen, it would not bee bought but for danger; sometimes, not under losse, not under disgrace, not under imprisonment, not under exile; sometimes yet dearer, not under paine; yea sometimes it hath not gone for lesse than blood. It did cost Elias danger, Michaiah disgrace, Ieremie imprisonment, the Disciples losse, John and Athanasius exile, the holy Confessors paine, the holy Martyrs death; Even the highest of these is pretium legitimum, if God call for it, how ever nature may tax it as rigorous, yea such as the franke hearts of faithfull Christians have bidden at the first word for Truth; What doe ye weeping, and breaking my heart; For I am ready not to be bound only, but to die for the name of the Lord Iesus, saith S. Paul, Act. 21. Skin for skin, yea all that a man hath will he give for his life, saith Satan: but skin, and life, and all, must a man give for Truth, and not thinke it an hard penni-worth; Neither count I my life deare unto me that I may finish my course with joy; saith the chosen vessell, to his Ephesians. Oh the heroicall spirits of our blessed fore-fathers, that stuck not to give their deerest heart-blood for but some corollaries of sacred Truth; whose burning zeale to Truth consumed them before those fires of Martyrdome, and sent up their pure and glorious soules, like Manoahs Angell, to heaven, in the flame. Blessed be God; Blessed be his Anointed, under whose gratious Scepter we have enjoied dayes as much more happie than theirs, as their hearts were more fervent than ours: We may now buy Truth C D E

A at a better hand; ſtake but our labour, we carry it with thanks; I feare there want not thoſe that would be glad to marre the market; It can be only knowne to heaven what treacheries the malice of hell may be a brewing. Had but that Powder once taken, nothing had been abated of the higheſt price of our predeceſſors; we had paid for every dram of Truth, as many ounces of blood, as ever it coſt the frankeſt Martyr; ſhould the Devill have beene ſuffered to doe his worſt, wee might not have grudged at this price of Truth, Noneſt delicata in Deum, & ſecura confeſſio; qui in me credit, debet ſuum ſanguinem fundere, ſaith Ierome. Chriſtian profeſſion is no ſecure or delicate matter, he that beleeves muſt be no niggard of his blood. But why thus deare? Not without good reaſon: Monopolies uſe to inhance the price: Ye can buy truth at no ſhop but one, In cælo præparata eſt veritas tua, Pſal. 89. 2. Thy truth is prepared in heaven. And it is a juſt Rule of Law, Quiſque in rebus ſuis eſt moderator, & arbiter; Every man may rate his
B owne: Neither is this only the ſole commodity of God, but beſides, deare to the owner. Dilexiſti veritatem; Thou haſt loved Truth, ſaith the Pſalmiſt. And it is a true rule in the Caſes of Commerce, Affectus æſtimari poteſt, Our love may be valued in the price. Yea, O God, thy love to Truth cannot be valued; It is thy ſelfe, thou that art Truth it ſelfe haſt ſaid ſo, I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life; Wee cannot therefore know how much thou loveſt thy Truth, becauſe as thy ſelfe is infinite, ſo is thy love to thy ſelfe: What ſhould we hunt for compariſons? If all the earth were gold, what were it? when even very heaven it ſelfe is traſh to thee in reſpect of truth: No marvell if thou ſet it at an high rate; it is not more precious to thee, than beneficiall to us. It frees us, Iohn 8. 32. It renewes us, Iames 1. 18. It confirmes us, Prov. 12. 19. It ſanctifies us, Iohn 17. 17. It defends us, Pſal. 91. 4. Shortly, it doth all for us that God doth; for God works by his Almighty word, and his Word is Truth, Iohn 17. Therefore buy the Truth. And if truth
C be thus precious, thus beneficiall; how comes it to paſſe that it is neglected, contemned? Some paſſe by it, and doe not ſo much as cheapen it; Others cheapen it, but bid nothing; Others bid ſomething, but under-foot; Others bid well, but ſtake it not; Others laſtly ſtake downe, but revoke it. The firſt that paſſe by and cheapen it not, are careleſſe unbeleevers; The next that cheapen it, and bid nothing, are formall Chriſtians; The third that bid ſomething but not enough, are worldly ſemi-Chriſtians; The fourth that bid well and ſtake it not, are glorious hypocrites; The laſt that ſtake downe and revoke it, are damnable Apoſtates. Take all theſe out of the ſociety of men; and how many cuſtomers hath God that care to buy the Truth? If Truth were ſome rich chattell, it would be bought; If Truth were ſome goodly Lordſhip, or the reverſion of ſome good Office, it would be bought; If Truth were ſome Benefice, or ſpirituall promotion (Oh time!) it would be bought; Yea, how deare are wee content to pay
D for our filthy luſts; we will needs purchaſe them (too oft) with ſhame, beggery, diſeaſe, damnation; only the ſaving Truth of God will not off hand. What is the reaſon of this? Firſt of all; It is but bare, ſimple, plaine, honeſt, homely Truth, without welt, without guard; It will abide none but native colours, it ſcorneth to wooe favour with farding, & licking, & counterfeiſance; it hates either bought, or borrowed beauty; and therefore like ſome native face among the painted, looks courſe, and ruſty. There are two ſhops that get away all the cuſtome from Truth, The ſhop of Vanity, the ſhop of Error; The one ſels knacks and gew-gawes, the other falſe wares, and adulterate; both of their commodities are ſo gilded, and gaudy, and glittering, that all fooles throng thither, and complaine to want elbow-roome, and ſtrive who ſhall be firſt ſerved; Whereas the ſecret work of artleſſe and unpoliſht Truth can winne no eye to view it, no tongue to aske ſo much, as, What will it coſt me? Oh yee ſonnes of E men, how long will yee love vanitie, and ſeeke after lies?

Secondly, though Truth in it ſelfe bee alwayes excellent, yet the iſſue of it is not ſeldome diſtaſtfull; Veritas odium: There is one Michaiah whom I hate: Am I become your enemy, becauſe I tell you the truth? And this is the cauſe that Frier Menot alleages, why Truth in his Time was ſo unwelcome to the Court. But if Truth be the mother of Hatred, ſhee is the daughter of Time, and Truth hath learn't this of Time, to devoure her owne brood; So that in Time, Truth ſhall conſume hatred; and at laſt, a galling Truth ſhall have more thanks, than a ſmoothing ſupparaſitation. In the meane time,

time, Veritas nihil erubeſcit præterquam abſcondi; Truth bluſheth at nothing but ſecrecy, as Tertul. A

How ever then fond, or falſe hearts value the Truth, let us, that ſhould be wiſe Chriſtians, eſteeme it as the pearle hid in the field, which the man ſold all that ever he had to purchaſe. Would it not ſet any heart on fire with an holy anger, to ſee what the enemies of Truth bid, and give for falſhood, for faction? Their liberty, their country; the life of their Soveraigne, the eternall ſtate of their ſoules hath not ſeemed too deare to caſt away upon an ill bargaine of miſ-religion; & ſhall not we bid ſo much as our zealous well-wiſhes, our effectuall endevours, our carefull obſervances for the undoubted truth of our Maker and Redeemer? What ſhall I ſay to the miſerable and ſtupid careleſneſſe of theſe thriftleſſe and godleſſe times; wherein every thing is appriſed, every thing is bought, ſave that which is moſt precious, moſt beneficiall, Truth. Yea great ones are made for precedents to the inferiour world; your example is able to bring either good or evill into faſhion; For Gods ſake, for your ſoules ſake, what ever tranſactions ye make for the world, lay your plots for the bleſſed purchaſe of Truth; Oh let not your fickle honours, your unſatisfying pleaſures, your worthleſſe profits, yea your momentany lives ſeeme deare to you in compariſon of heavenly Truth. it is no ſhame in other parts for great Peeres to bee Merchants; Mercatores tui erant Principes, ſaith the Angell concerning Babylon, Revel. 18. Thy Merchants were the Princes of the earth; And why ſhould not yee great ones bee the Merchants of Truth? Bleſſed be the God of Truth, ye are ſo. It is no proud word to ſay, that no Court under heaven hath ſo rich a ſtock of Truth, as this of Great Britaine, yet let me tell you, the very Angels knew not ſo much, but they deſired to know more, Epheſ. 3.10. And if ye had already that veſpertine knowledge of the Saints which yee ſhall once have in heaven, yet know that this Bargaine ſtands not more in the judgement, than in the affections. What ever our ſpeculations may be, if our hearts be not ſet upon Truth, we may be Brokers, wee are not Merchants; Brokers for others, not Merchants for our ſelves. As our Saviour then, when he bids us ſell all, forſake all, holds it done, when in preparation of mind we are ready to abdicate all for his name, though wee doe it not, ſo doth God hold us to buy Truth, when we beſtow our beſt thoughts, our deareſt well-wiſhes upon it, though we have it already. Oh ſtir up your languiſhing zeale, ye noble Courtiers, rouze up your drouping love to divine Truth; Give your hearts to it, ye cannot but give all for it; And if ye doe not find the ſweet gaine of this Bargaine, in this lower Region of error, and confuſion, ye ſhall once find it in thoſe eternall & empireall habitations of Truth, where the God of Truth ſhall make up the Truth of his promiſes, with the everlaſting Truth of his glorious performances; where mercy & Truth ſhall ſo meet, and embrace one another, that both of them ſhall embrace the faithfull ſoule, for ever and ever. B C D

This for the Bargaine of Truth; The forbidden ſale followeth: ſell it not. Commonly what we buy, we may ſell. Alexander, not the Great, but the good, ſold Miters, Keyes, Altars; the verſe gives the reaſon; Emerat ille prius, He bought them. So S. Auſten of Simon Magus, Volebat emere ſpiritum ſanctum, quia vendere volebat ſpiritum ſanctum; Hee would buy the Holy Ghoſt, becauſe he meant to ſell it. Give me a man that buyes a Seat of Iudicature; I dare not truſt him for not ſelling of Juſtice; hee that ſits in the chair of Symony, will not give Orders, will not ſtick to ſell ſoules. Some things we may buy to ſell, as Ioſeph did the Egyptian corne, ſome things we muſt ſell, if wee buy as an Iſraelite inheritance, Lev. 25. But here we are charged to buy what it is a ſin to ſell: Buy the Truth and ſell it not; There is many a good thing ill ſold: Eſau ſels his birth-right for pottage. Hanun and Shechem ſell their Country for love, Dalilah ſels her lover for a bribe; The Patriarks ſell their Brother for twenty ſilver rings; Haman ſels the Iewes for nought. The Gentiles ſell the Jewiſh girles for wine, Ioel. 3.3. Iſrael ſels the righteous for ſilver, and the poore for ſhooes, Amos 2.6. Their Judges ſell ſins or innocency for rewards, Eſay 5.23. Ahab ſels himſelfe to wickedneſſe; Iudas ſels his maſter; Demas ſels the Truth; All theſe make an ill market; And in all it is a ſure rule, the better the commodity is, the more pernicious is the ſale. The indefiniteneſſe of the charge implies a generality. Buy it at any price; At no price ſell it. It is the favour of God, that E

A it may bee bought for any rate; It is the Justice of God, that upon any rate it should not be sold: As buying and selling are opposites in relation; So that for which wee must not sell Truth, is opposite to that for which we may buy it. We must buy it with labour, therefore we may not sell it for ease; If need be, wee must buy it with losse, therefore we may not sell it for gaine; we must buy it with disgrace, we may not sell it for honour; we must buy it with exile or imprisonment, we may not sell it for liberty; we must buy it with paine, we may not sell it for pleasure; We must buy it with death, we may not sell it for life; Not for any, not for all of these may we sell Truth; this were damnosa mercatio, as Chrys. In every bargaine and sale there must be a proportion; now ease, gaine, honour, liberty, pleasure, life, yea worlds of all these are no way countervailable to Truth; For what shall it profit a man to win the whole world and leese his own soule? And hee cannot sell Truth, but his soule is lost: And if any thing in the world may seeme a due price of Truth, it is Peace. Oh sweet and deare name of Peace, the good newes of Angels, the joy of good men! who can but affect thee, who can but magnifie thee? The God of heaven before whom I stand, from whom I speake, knows how oft, how deeply I have mourned for the divisions of his Church, how earnestly I have set my hand on worke upon such poore thoughts of re-union, as my meanesse could reach; but when all is done, I still found we may not offer to sell Truth for peace. It is true that there be some Scholasticall and immateriall Truths (the infinite subdivision whereof have rather troubled than informed Christendome) which for the purchase of peace might be kept in, and returned into such safe generalities as minds not unreasonable might rest in; but sold out they may not be; If some Truths may be contracted into a narrower roome, none may be contracted for; Qui divinis inuutriti sunt eloquiis, as that Father said; Those that are trained up in divine Truths, may not change a syllable for a word. Tene quod habes, Hold that thou hast, is a good rule in all things; which if in temporalities it were well observed, we should not have so many gallants squander away their inheritances to live Camelion-like upon the ayre of favour; But how ever this bee too well observed in these earthly things by frugal hands, which take as if they were quick, hold as if they were dead: yet in spirituall graces it can never bee observed enough; we get Truth, wee buy it as Iacob did his birthright, to keep, to enjoy, not to sell againe: If therefore the world, if Satan shall offer to grease us in the fist for truth, let us answer him as Simon Peter did Simon the Sorcerer, Thy money perish with thee, because thou hast thought the Truth of God may be purchased with mony.

Matth 16.26.

C

What shall we say then to those pedling petty-chapmen which we meet withall in every market, that will bee bartring away the truth of God for trifles? Surely the forme of our spirituall market is contrary to the civill; In our civill markets there are more buyers than sellers; there would be but poore takings, if many did not buy of one; but in the spirituall, there are more Sellers of Truth than Buyers.

D

Many a one sels that he never had, that he should have had, the Truth of God; Here one chops away the Truth for Feare or ambition; There another lets it goe for the old shooes of a Gebeonitish pretence of Antiquity; Here one parts with it for a painted, gilded hobby-horse of an outwardly pompous magnificence of the Church; there another for the bables of childish superstition; One for the fancies of hope, another for the breath of a colloguing Impostor; Amongst them all, Diminutæ sunt veritates a filiis hominum, Ps. 12. Truth is failed from the children of men; Yea as Esay complained in his time, Corruit in platea veritas, Esay. 59. 14. Truth is fallen in the streets. What a shame it is to see, that in the clear & glorious Sun-shine of the Gospell, under the pious government of the true Defender of the Faith, there should not want some soules that should truck for the truth of God, as if it were some Cheap-side, or some Smithfield-Commoditie? Commutaverunt veritatem Dei; They have changed the Truth of God into a lie, Rom. 1. 25. And all their care is, that they may be deceived good cheap. Whose heart cannot bleed to see so many well rigg'd and hopefull Barks of our young Gentry, laden with the most precious merchandizes of Nature and Grace, hal'd in every day to these deceitfull Ports of Error, the owners partly cheated, partly robbed of Truth, despoiled of their rich fraight, and at last turn'd over-boord into a sea of Desperation? Oh foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you, that ye should not obey, that ye should not hold faſt the Truth; Where ſhall I lay the fault of this miſcarriage? Me thinks I could aske the Diſciples queſtion, Nunquid ego Domine, Is it we Lord? Are there of us that preach our ſelves and not Chriſt? Are there that preach Chriſt, and live him not? Woe to the world becauſe of offences. It muſt needs be that offences ſhould come, but woe to the man by whom the offence commeth: God forbid that wee ſhould be ſo bad that the ſeven hils ſhould not juſtifie us; But what ever we be, the Truth is ſtill, and ever it ſelfe, neither the better for our innocence, nor worſe for our guilt. If men be faulty, what hath Truth offended? Except the ſacred word of the Ever-living God can miſ-guide you, we have ſet you right. We are but duſt and Aſhes, yet, O God, give us thine humble vaſſals leave in an awfull confidence ſo far to conteſt with thee, the Lord of heaven and earth, as to ſay, if we be deceived, thou haſt deceived us. It is thou that haſt ſpoken by us to thy people; Let God be true, and every man a Lyer; Whither ſhould we goe from thee? Thou haſt the words of eternall life. Deare Chriſtians, our fore-fathers tranſmitted to us the intire inheritance of the glorious Goſpell of Jeſus Chriſt, repurchaſed by the blood of their martyrdome; Oh let not our ill husbandry impaire it; Let not poſterity once ſay, they might have beene happy, but for the unthriftineſſe of us their progenitors; Let it not bee ſaid, that the coldneſſe of us the Teachers, and profeſſors of Truth, hath dealt with Religion as Rehoboham did with his ſhields, which he found of Gold, but left of Braſſe. If Truth had no friends, wee ſhould plead for it; but now that wee have before our eyes ſo powerfull an ὑπερασπίσης of Chriſtian faith, that with his very pen hath ſo laid error upon the back, that all the world cannot raiſe it; what a ſhame were it to bee wanting to him, to Truth, to our ſelves? But perhaps now I know ſome of your thoughts; you would buy Truth (yee thinke) you would hold it, if ye could be ſure to know it; There are many ſlips amongſt the true coyne; Either of the mothers pleaded the living child to bee hers, with equall proteſtations, oaths, teares. True, yet a Salomons ſword can divide Truth from falſhood; and there is a teſt, and fire that can diſcerne true metals from adulterate; In ſpight of all counterfeiting there are certaine infallible marks, to know Truth from Error; Take but a few of many; whether in the originals, in the natures, in the ends of both. In the firſt, Truth is divine, Error is humane; what is grounded upon the divine word muſt needs bee irrefragably true; that which upon humane Traditions, either muſt, or may be erroneous. In the ſecond, Truth is one conforme ever to it ſelfe, ἀληθεία ξυμφωνεῖ, as one ſaid; Omne verum omni vero conſonat, All Truth accords with every Truth, as Gerſon; and as it is pure, ſo peaceable; Error is full of diſſonance, of crueltie: No particulars of ours diſſent from the written verity of God; We teach no man to equivocate; Our practice is not bloody with treaſons and maſſacres. In the third, Truth, as it came from God, ſo is referd to him; neither hath any other end than the glory of the God of Truth; Error hath ever ſome ſelfe-reſpects; either αἰσχροκερδίαν, or κενοδοξίαν, filthy lucre, or vaine-glory; profit, or pride; We doe not prank up nature; we aime not, either to fill the cofers, or feed the ambition of men; Let your Wiſdoms apply and infer, and now (if ye can) ſhut your eyes, that you ſhould not ſee the Truth; and if yee care not for your ſoules, when ye ſee it, ſell it: Let no falſe tongue perſwade you there is no danger in this ſale: How charitably ſoever we think of poore blinded ſoules, that live in the forced, and invincible darkneſſe of error, certainly Apoſtaſy is deadly; How ever thoſe ſpeed that are robbed of Truth, you cannot ſell Truth, and be ſaved. Have mercy therfore on your owne ſoules, for their ſakes, for the ſake of him that bought them, with the deare ranſome of his precious blood; And as God hath bleſſed you with the invaluable treaſure of Truth, ſo hoard it up in your hearts, and menage it in your lives; Oh let me be Gens juſta cuſtodiens veritatem, Eſa. 26. A juſt nation keeping faſt the Truth; So whiles ye keep the Truth, the Truth ſhall keep you, both in life, in Death, in Judgment; In life unto death, in death and judgment unto the conſummation of that endleſſe & incomprehenſible glory, which the God of Truth hath prepared for them that overcome.

To the happy poſſeſſion whereof he that hath ordained, in his good time as mercifully bring us; and that for the ſake of the Son of his Love, Jeſus Chriſt the Righteous; To whom with thee, O Father, and thy bleſſed Spirit, one infinite God, bee given all praiſe, honour, and glory, now and for ever. Amen.

LONDON,
Printed for RICHARD HAWKINS. 1634.

TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE, MY SINGVLAR GOOD Lady, the Lady ELIZABETH, Counteſſe of Exceter.

Right Honourable: this poore Sermon both preached and penned at your motion (that is to me your command) now preſents it ſelfe to your hand, and craveth a place (though unworthy) in your Cabinet, yea, in your heart. That holy zeale which deſired it, will alſo improve it. The God, whom your Ladyſhip hath thus honoured in the care and coſt of his Houſe, will not faile to honour you in yours.

For me, your Honour may juſtly challenge mee on both ſides; both by the Druryes, in the right of the firſt Patronage; and by the Cecils, in the right of my ſucceeding devotions. In either, and both, that little I have, or am, is ſincerely at your Ladiſhips ſervice, as whom you have merited to be

Your Honours in all true

obſervance and duty,

A SERMON PREACHED AT THE REEDIFIED CHAPEL OF THE RIGHT HONOVRA-ble Earle of Exceter, in his Houſe of Saint Iohns.

HAGGAI 2. 9.

C The glory of the latter houſe ſhall be greater than of the former, ſaith the Lord of Hoſts; and in this place will I give peace, ſaith the Lord of Hoſts.

AS we have Houſes of our owne, ſo God hath his; yea, as great men have more houſes than one, ſo hath the great God of Heaven much more; more, both in ſucceſſion (as here, the latter houſe, and the firſt) and in variety: He hath an houſe of fleſh, (Ye are the Temples of the living God;) An houſe of ſtone; (Salomon ſhall build me an houſe;) An houſe immateriall in the Heavens, 2. Cor. 5. 1. Wherefore then hath God an houſe? Wherefore have wee ours; but to dwell in? But doth not hee himſelfe tell David, and ſo doth Stephen the D Protomartyr (upon whoſe day we are fallen) tell the Jewes, that He dwels not in Temples made with hands? True, he dwels not in his Houſe, as we in ours, by way of comprehenſion; he dwels in it by teſtification of preſence. So doe we dwell in our houſes, that our houſes containe us, that we are only within them, and they without us. So doth he dwell in his, that yet he is elſewhere, yea every where, that his houſe is within him. Shortly, God dwells where he witneſſes his gracious preſence, that, becauſe he doth both in the Empyreall heaven, amongſt his Angels and Saints, and in his Church upon earth; therefore his dwelling is both in the higheſt heaven in perfect glory; and on Earth, in the hearts and aſſembly of his children. As of the former, our Saviour ſaith, In domo patris mei, In my fathers houſe are many Manſions: So alſo may we ſay of the latter, There is much variety and choyce in it; There was the Church of the Jewes, the Church of the Gentiles; There is a materiall, and a ſpirituall houſe. In the one,
E Salomons, Zorobabels, ſuch piles as this: In the other; ſo much multiplicitie, as there are Nations, yea, Congregations that profeſſe the Name of Chriſt. One of theſe was a figure of the other; the Materiall, under the Law, of the Spirituall, under the Goſpell. Ye ſee now the firſt houſe, and the latter, the ſubject of our Text and diſcourſe. The latter, commended to us, comparatively, poſitively. Comparatively with the former, Major gloria. Poſitively, in it ſelfe, In this place will I give peace. Both, ſet out by the ſtile of the promiſer, and avower; ſaith the Lord of Hoſts. All which challenge your Chriſtian attention.

As the firſt houſe (which was materiall) was a figure of the ſecond, which is ſpirituall: ſo the glory of that materiall, was a figure of the glory of this ſpirituall. Now becauſe all the life and glory of the ſpirituall, ſtands in Chriſt the Meſſias, the Prophet looks through the type of the materiall, at him which ſhall beautifie, yea glorifie, the ſpirituall, of whoſe exhibition the Prophet ſpeakes, Adhuc modicum, yet a little while, and I will ſhake the Heavens. This Modicum was but ſome 500. and odde yeeres; much to men, but a modicum to the Ancient of dayes, with whom 1000 yeeres are but one day. It is in and by him, that this latter houſe under the Goſpell, ſhall in glory ſurpaſſe that firſt under the law. The Prophets had ſpoken gloriouſly of the temple that ſhould be; and now, leſt when the people ſhould ſee the homely and cottage-like reedification of Zerubbabel, they ſhould be diſ-heartned and offended, the Prophet deſires to draw their eyes from the ſtone and timber, to the ſpirituall inſide of the Evangelicall Church, ſhewing the glory of this latter Houſe, to exceed the former.

Some groſſe interpreters have lookt with Jewiſh eyes upon the outward fabricke, which was threefold: Salomons, Zorobabels, Herods. Salomons, ſumptuous and magnificent: Zorobabels, meane and homely; Herods, rich and majeſticall, immodico ſumptu, incredibili ſplendore, as one ſayes. Salomons was before defaced. Now becauſe Zorobabel was ſo farr from making his Word good, that the people wept, when they ſaw the difference (which Calvin well obſerves, was not without a ſpeciall providence of the alwiſe God; elſe the Jewes would ſo have fixed their eyes upon the outward ſplendor, that they would never have looked for the ſpirituall and inward Grace of the Houſe of God:) therefore they have taken it of Herods temple; the walls and lining whereof were indeed anſwerable to this Propheſie, more glorious. But this conceit, as it is too carnall, ſo is quite diſſonant from the context, both in regard of the precedents, and ſubſequents. Of the precedents: For, how did the deſire of all nations come to that Pile of Herods? Of the ſubſequents: For, what peace was under the Herodian Temple? Firſt, the builder of it, was the chiefe oppreſſor of the Jewiſh liberty: and then, ſecondly, it gave occaſion to the perpetuall miſerie of that people. Pilate would expilate the Treaſures of it for aquæ ductæ, which denied, coſt the Jewes much bloud. Under Claudius, twenty thouſand ſlaine in a Feaſt of unleavened bread. Ionathas the Prieſt ſlaine by theeves ſuborned by Felix, in the very Temple; and ever after, it was the harbour and ſpoile of Villaines. What hills of Carcaſſes? What ſtreames of bloud was in't at the laſt vaſtation? Enough to amaze any Reader: ſo as in that 79. yeares wherein it ſtood (longer it did not,) it was no better than a ſtage of Tragedies, a ſhambles of cruelty. Of that therefore God could not ſay, Dabo pacem; it was Templum adulterinum, as one cals it juſtly, and had neither command nor promiſe: It was the Spirituall Temple, the Evangelicall Church, whoſe glory ſhall be greater than the Jewiſh, which ſhall be bleſſed with the deſire of the Nations, with the aſſurance of Peace. But why then doth the Holy Ghoſt ſpeake of Gold and Silver, the coſtly materials of an outward ſtructure? Even theſe very metals are figurative, not that God cares ſo much for them, but becauſe wee doe; becauſe our eies uſe to be dazled with this beſt parcell of Earth; Therefore when he would deſcribe a glorious Church, hee borrowes the reſemblance of Gold, Silver, precious ſtones, Eſay 60. and even by theſe doth he ſet forth his new and Heavenly Jeruſalem, Revelat. 21. Wherein then is the glory of Gods Evangelicall Houſe greater, than of the Legall? Yea, wherein is it not greater? Whether yee look to the efficient, the matter, the duration, the extent, the ſervice. The efficient, that was built by man, though directed by God: In this, God himſelfe is the Architect, not onely giving the modell, but the frame. The matter, whether of ſtructure, or ornament. The ſtructure of the one was of ſtone and wood: of the other is of living ſtones. The ornament of the one was Gold and Silver: of the other, divine Graces of Faith, Charity, Hope, Sanctity, Truth, Piety, and all other vertues, to which, Gold it ſelfe were but traſh.

The duration of the one (even that longſt-lived Temple of Salomon, though called (Beth עולם domus ſeculi) was but 430. yeares. Of the other, beyond time to eternitie. The extent of the one to be meaſured by a few poles, yea, (though ye take in the Courts, and all) by a few Acres: Of the other, univerſall, ſo far as the King of Heaven hath

A hath any Land. The ſervice in the one performed by a few men, mortall, ſinfull, the bloud of beaſts ſhed upon the Altar: In the other, performed by our eternall High-Prieſt, after that higher order of Melchiſedech; offering up his owne moſt precious bloud for our redemption. In that, Chriſt Jeſus was obſcurely figured: In this, really exhibited, borne, living, dying, riſing, aſcending, preached, beleeved, lived; Every way therefore both in efficient, matter, duration, extent, ſervice, Major gloria.

Let no man tell me now of that juſt wonder of the world, the Jewiſh Temple; white Marble without, lined with Gold within, Brazen pillars, Golden veſſels, coſtly vailes, an High-Prieſthood ſet forth with precious Stones, rich Robes, exquiſite Perfumes, curious Muſicke, and what-ever that ancient goodly inſtitution had rare and admirable; I ſay, the Clay of the Goſpell, is more worth than the marble of the Law; Evangelicall Braſſe, more worth than legall Gold; the ragges of the Evangelicall B Prieſt-hood more excellent than the robes of the Leviticall. In ſhort; the beſt of the Law is not comparable to the baſeſt of the Goſpell.

Iohn Bapt ſt was the Ianus of both Teſtaments; he was to the Churches, as Noah was to the Worlds; he ſaw both the firſt, and the latter. It is a great word that our Saviour ſaith of him, that amongſt thoſe which were borne, or rather (as ours read it better) begotten of women, there did not a greater than he ariſe: but it is a greater word that he ſpeakes of the Children of the new Teſtament, that the leaſt in the Kingdome of Heaven is greater than he. I ſtand not upon examining the compariſon, whether it be ratione ſanctitatis, or officii; it makes either way for my purpoſe, therefore was Iohn ſo great, becauſe he was the laſt of the Law, and the firſt of the Goſpell: and the old rule is minimum maximi majus eſt maximo minimi; therefore is the leaſt in this Kingdome of Grace greater than he, becauſe he is all, what Iohn was halfe; wholly under C that Evangelium Regni, which is able to advance him to a greater perfection, than that Harbinger of Chriſt. VVhat a favour then is it (Right Honourable and beloved) that God hath reſerved us to theſe better dayes of his Goſpell, wherein the helpes of ſalvation are more cleere, obvious, effectuall; wherein, as the glory of the latter Houſe exeeeded the former; ſo the meanes of that incombrehenſible glory of the houſe not made with hands, eternall in the Heavens, lie more open unto us? What ſhould we doe, but both uti, and frui, gladly uſe, and ſweetly enjoy this unſpeakeable bleſſing, which God hath kept in ſtore for us, and walke worthy of ſo incomparable a mercy. The old Jewes lived in the dawning of the day, wherein they had but a glimmering of that Sun, which would riſe. We live after the high noone of that happy day. If we walke not anſwerable to ſo great a light, what can we looke for, but utter darkneſſe?

The leaſt of the greateſt is more, than the greateſt of the leaſt. Goſpell of the Kingdome.

Ye ſhall now give me leave (Right Honourable) to carry theſe words in a meet ana- D logie to the preſent occaſion. The Temples under the Law, were both a figure, and a patterne of the Churches under the Goſpell. Within this roofe under which we now ſtand here, was both the former, and the latter houſe; and even in theſe walls doth God make his Word good, That the glory of this latter Houſe ſhall be greater, than of the former. The firſt foundation of it was, no doubt, both pious and rich. I ſhall not need to fetch the Pedegrees of it from Saint Iohn Baptiſt in Jeruſalem, nor to diſcourſe of either the devotion, or wealth of that religiouſly-military Order, for whom theſe ſtones were firſt laid. Imagine the Altar never ſo gay, the Imagery never ſo curious, the Veſtments never ſo rich, the Pillars, VValls, VVindowes, Pavement, never ſo exquiſite; yet I dare boldly ſay, this preſent glory of this Houſe in this comely whiteneſſe, and well-contrived coarctation, is greater than the former. VVhat care I? Nay, VVhat doth God care for the worke of a Lapidary, E or Painter, or Maſon? One zealous Prayer, one Orthodox Sermon, is a more glorious furniture, than all the precious rarities of Mechanique excellencies. I doe moſt willingly (as what good heart doth not?) honour the vertuous actions, and godly intentions of our worthy forefathers, which (no doubt) it hath pleaſed God in mercie to accept and crowne, but withall it muſt be yeelded, that they lived under the tyrannous injurie and uſurpation of thoſe Phariſes, who kept the keyes of knowledge at their owne girdles, and would neither draw for them, nor ſuffer them to draw for themſelves. Bleſſed be God for better conditions; the Well of life lies open to us, neither are we only allowed, but invited to thoſe heavenly liquors, Inebriamini O Chariſsimi, Drinke, yea, drinke abundantly, O beloved, Cant. 5.1. This happy libertie of the ſaving Goſpell of Jeſus Chriſt, daily and ſincerely preached to us (Noble and beloved Chriſtians) is worthy to be more worth unto us, than all the treaſures, ornaments, privileges, of this tranſitorie World; and this, ſince through the ineſtimable goodneſſe of God, yee doe, and may find in this latter Houſe; well hath God verified this word in your eyes and eares; The glory of the latter Houſe ſhall be greater than of the former.

Conſecrated by Heraclius, Patriarch of Ieruſalem.

Hitherto the comparative praiſe of the latter Houſe; the poſitive followes in the promiſe of a gracious effect; In this place will I give peace: wherein I know not whether the bleſſing doth more grace the place, or the place the bleſſing; both grace each other, and both bleſſe Gods people; In this place will I give peace. If ye looke at the bleſſing it ſelfe, it is incomparable, Peace; that whereby the Hebrewes had wont to expreſſe all welfare in their ſalutations, and well-wiſhes; the Apoſtolicall benediction dichotomizes all good things into Grace and Peace: wherein, at the narroweſt, by Grace, all ſpirituall favours were ſignified; temporall by Peace. The ſweet ſinger of Iſrael could not wiſh better to Gods Church, than Peace be within her walls: and behold, this is it which God will give, Dabo pacem: yea, our eyes ſhould ſtoop too low, if they ſhould fix here. The ſweet Quiriſters of Heaven, when they ſung that divine Caroll, to the honour of the firſt Chriſtmas, next to Gloria in excelſis Deo, ſaid, In terris pax: Yet higher the great Saviour of the World, when he would leave the moſt precious Legacie to his deare ones on earth, that they were capable of, he ſayes, My peace I give you. And what he there gives, he here promiſes, Dabo pacem, I will give it. But where? Whence? In this place. Not any where: not every where; but in his owne Houſe, in his latter Houſe, his Evangelicall Houſe; as if this bleſſing were confined to his holy walls, he ſaith, In this place will I give peace. This flower is not for every ſoile; it growes not wild, but is only to be found in the Garden of Sion. It is very pregnant which the Pſalmiſt hath, Pſal. 128.5. and 134.3. The Lord that made Heaven and Earth, bleſſe thee out of Sion. He doth not ſay, The Lord that made the earth, bleſſe thee out of heaven; nor, The Lord that made Heaven, bleſſe thee out of heaven; but, bleſſe thee out of Sion. As if hee would teach us, that all bleſſings come, as immediately and primarily from heaven, ſo mediatly and ſecondarily from Sion, where this Temple ſtood. Some Philoſophers have held the Moone to be the receptacle of all the influences of the heavenly bodies, and the conveyances of them to this inferiour world, ſo as all the vertue of the upper Orbes and Starres, are derived by her, to this elementarie Spheare. Such doth both David and Haggai repute the houſe of God; whither, as to Ioſephs Store-houſe, doth God convey the bleſſings of peace, that they may be thence tranſmitted to the ſons of men. How and why then doth God give peace in this his Houſe? Becauſe here (as Bernard well) Deus & audit, & auditur, God heares, and is heard here: audit orantes, erudit audientes; he heares his ſuppliants, and teacheth his hearers. As this place hath two uſes, it is both Oratorium, and Auditorium: ſo in reſpect of both, doth it bleſſe us with peace: our mouth procures it in the one, our eare in the other; God workes in our hearts by both. In the firſt, God ſayes, as our Saviour cites it, Domus mea Domus orationis: My Houſe ſhall be called the Houſe of prayer. And what bleſſing is it, even the beſt of Peace, that our prayers cannot inſeoffe us in? Salomon when he would conſecrate the Church he had built, ſolemnly ſues to God, that he would inveſt it with this privilege of an univerſall-gracious audience; and numbring the occaſions of diſtreſſed Suppliants, makes it ever the foot of his requeſt; (Then hearken to the prayer that thy ſervant ſhall make towards this place; Heare thou in heaven, thy dwelling place; and when thou heareſt, have mercy.) If ever therefore we would have peace outward, inward, private, publike, ſecular, ſpirituall: If we would have peace in our eſtate, peace in our Land, peace in our Church, peace in our ſoules, pray for it. And if ever we will pray for it, pray here, in Gods houſe, for in this place will I give peace. In vaine ſhall we looke for it elſewhere, if we aske it not here. It is true, we are bidden every where to lift up pure hands to God: but they cannot be pure, that are profane; and they cannot bee but profane, that contemne the holy ordinances of God. He ſaid well, In templo vis

I will give peace.

Glory to God in the higheſt heavens; in earth, peace, &c.

A vis orare, in te ora; for (Know you not, that your bodies are the Temples of the living God?) but let me as truly returne it; In te vis orare, in templo ora? Wouldest thou pray with effect at home? Pray at Church; elſe thy devotion is but the ſacrifice of fooles; for he hath ſaid it, who hath good reaſon to appoint the circumſtances of his owne beneficence, In this place will I give peace.

Will ye then ſee the reaſon why there is ſo much empty Caske in the Celler of God? Therefore are men void of grace, becauſe they are void of devotion. They ſeek not God where he may be found; and therefore it is juſt with God not to be found of them, where they pretend to ſeeke him: for In hoc loco, In this place will I give peace.

Gerſon diſtinguiſhes well in his Sermon de Angelis, that there is Duplex Cœlum, A double Heaven; Gloriæ, & Eccleſiæ; of Glory above, of the Church below; the Church is the Heaven on earth; where God is ſeene, heard, ſpoken unto: where are his Saints B (whoſe aſſemblies are here;) where are his Angels: (Let the woman have power on her head, becauſe of the Angels, 1 Cor. 11.) As the Jewes then, whileſt the Church of God was Nationall, were wont (according to command) to looke towards the Temple, if they could not come to it, in their devotions: So now that the Church is Catholike, or univerſall, and every of our Churches is equally Gods houſe, (οἶκος,) we ſhall gladly with Peter and Iohn, goe up to this Temple to pray; How can we looke for a better incouragement, than God gives us here, In this place will I give Peace.

In the latter, as it is Auditorium, ſo, I create the fruit of the lips to be peace (ſaith God.) Naturally we are all (even thoſe that applaud themſelves in the beſt opinion of their harmeleſſe and faire diſpoſition) enemies to God: Enemies both actively and paſſively. Actively, θεοστυγεῖς, God-haters, Rom. 1. Paſſively, Filii iræ, The ſons of diſpleaſure. We fell out in Adam through our owne wilfull apoſtaſie and diſobedience; C and we ſtill ſtand out in the maintenance of our inward corruption. There is no way to peace but by reconciliation; there is no way to reconciliation, but by the Goſpell of Jeſus Chriſt, which is Evangelium pacis; there is no proper element for the Goſpell of God, but the Houſe of God; Locus iſte, In this place will I give peace. It is not (I know) for every heart to apprehend, either the want of this peace, or the miſery of this want. This is one of thoſe happineſſes which is moſt bragg'd of, where it is leaſt had. The ſenſuall Securitan pleaſes himſelf in the conceit of his owne peace. All is well at home; he quarrels not with himſelfe, for he denies himſelfe nothing: God quarrels not with him, here are no checks of a chiding conſcience; no frownes of an angry Judge; nothing but Pulchritudo Pacis (as the Prophet ſpeakes.) Alas, my beloved, call not this peace, call it ſtupiditie; even Hell it ſelfe is not a Kingdome divided in it ſelfe. There is no bleſſing, which is not alſo counterfeited, Pacem veram dabo, is the D ſtile of the Prophets, Ier. 14. 13. This were a needleſſe Epithet, if there were not a falſe peace; ſuch is this of carnall hearts. That Word of eternall Truth muſt ſtand: There is no peace, ſaith my God, to the wicked. Have you ſeene a ſore ſuddenly filled up with unſound fleſh, and fairely skinned over, without all offence to the eye, which ere long will breake out againe, and bewray a ſecret, and ſo much-more-hardly-cured corruption? ſuch is a wicked mans peace. Have you ſeene a ſlave ſit quietly in the Gally, not ſtrugling with his chaine, not repining at his Oare (neceſſitas fortiter, conſuetudo facile?) Have you heard a dying man profeſſe, that he felt no paine? Such is a wicked mans peace, of which hee ſhall once ſay, though now all ſeeme ſmooth, and plauſible; In pace amaritudo mea amariſſima; In peace I had great bitterneſſe. Eſay 38. 17. Neither is the want of this peace leſſe perceived, than the miſery of this want. Men E ſee no difference in the face of Heaven, whatſoever they doe; their blaſphemies and prayers find the ſame entertainment: therefore the careleſſe man reſolves, I ſhall have peace, though I follow the wayes of mine owne heart. Oh the miſerable ſottiſhneſſe of wilfull ſinners! Sinne lyes (like a ſleeping Bandog) at the doore of their heart; they looke upon him, as if hee would never wake; or, as if though he ſhould, yet he were ſo clogged, and chained, and muzled, that there can be no danger of his hurt. Let God but rowze him up a little, he ſhall bay them to deſpaire; he ſhall flie upon them, and pull out their throats: Then ſhall their troubled heart project terrible things, and they ſhall feele what it is to live in the anger of a God. They ſhall ſee the Almighty

The Goſpell of peace.

The beauty of peace I will give true peace.

Neceſſity hath taught him to beare it ſtrongly, cuſtome eaſily.

Almighty putting himſelfe into the fearefull formes of vengeance; Who can ſtand before his indignation? And who can abide in the fiercenesſe of his anger? His fury is powred out like fire, and the rocks are throwne downe before him, Nahum 1. 6. And if his very love have drawne bloud of his deare ones: (Terrores Domini militant contra me, ſaith holy Iob: The terrours of the Lord are ſet in aray againſt me, Iob 6. 4:)and he that bore the chaſtiſements of our peace, the Sonne of his love, could ſay (My God, my God, why haſt thou forſaken me?) Oh what ſhall be the judgements of his wrath? If this be the rod of children, Oh, what ſhall be the Scorpions for his enemies? They ſhall ſee that gulfe of fire ready to receive them into everlaſting burnings. They ſhall ſee the Devils their inceſſant tormentors ready to ſeize upon their guilty ſoules. Then, O then, ſhall they know, too late, what an happineſſe it is, that God here promiſes, Dabo pacem. Would we then avoyd the unſpeakable horrour of this wofull condition? Would we find the bed of our ſickneſſe and death, comforted with the ſweet teſtimony of an heavenly peace betwixt God and our ſoules? See whence we muſt fetch it; In this place will I give peace. If ever we have it, we muſt have it from the bleſſed ordinances of God, his word and Sacraments, which this place can afford us. In vaine ſhall yee ſeeke for this (deare Chriſtians) in a licentious Taverne, in a rich Counting-houſe, in Chambers of dalliance, in full Tables, in Pompous Courts, no, not in thrones of earthly Majeſty. Alas, many of theſe are the make-bates betwixt Heaven and us, moſt of them can marre, none of them can make our peace. It is onely the deſpiſed Miniſtery of the Goſpell; the Word of reconciliation, (as it is called, 2 Cor. 5. 19.) which ſounds in Gods Houſe, that can doe it. As yee love your ſoules therefor, as you would finde peace at the laſt, and would looke with a comfortable aſſurance in the face of death and judgement; as yee would ſee a gracious Mercy-ſeat in the dreadfull Tribunall of God at the day of our laſt appearance, frequent the Houſe of God: attend reverently and concionably upon the ſacred Inſtitutions of God, yeeld your ſelves over to be wrought upon by the powerfull Goſpell of Jeſus Chriſt. Oh be not you wanting unto God, he will not be wanting unto you, but will make good this promiſe of his unfailable grace, In this place will I give peace.

It is a great word that is heere ſpoken, Dabo pacem; and therefore it is undertaken by an omnipotent Agent, I will give peace. If all the Angels of Heaven ſhould have ſaid ſo, we ſhould ſoone have replied, as Korah and his company did to Moſes and Aaron; Yee tooke to much upon you, Numbers 16. 3. This worke is not for any finite power; the ſtile of peace, is the peace of God; the ſtile of God, the Mediator betwixt God and man, is, The Prince of peace. He is the true Salomon, the other was but typicall. It is he only, that when the Diſciples were toſſed with contrary winds and threatning billowes, could command the winds and waves to a calme. It is hee onely, that when his Church is toſſed with the winds and waves of raging and impetuous enmitie, can give outward peace. It is he onely, that when the diſtreſſed ſoule is toſſed with the winds and waves of ſtrong temptation, of weake diffidence, can give inward peace. Juſtly therefore doth he challeng this act as his owne, I will give peace. We uſe to ſay, It is beſt treating of peace with a ſword in our hand. Thoſe who have the advantage of the warre may command peace: underlings muſt ſtoop to ſuch conditions, as the victor will yeeld. To ſhew us therefore how eaſily he can give peace, God ſtiles himſelfe the God of Hoſts; a title wherein he takes no ſmall delight, referring not to the being of the creature, but to their marſhalling; not to their naturall eſtate, but their militarie; neither would God be lookt at in it, as a Creator, but as a Generall. In but two of the Prophets, Eſay and Ieremie, no leſſe than an hundred and teirtie times hath hee this ſtile given him. Every thing, as it hath an exiſtence from the Maker, ſo an order from the Governour; and that order is no other than warlike, wherein it doth (militare Deo) ſerve under the colours of the Almighty. All creatures are both muſtred, and trained, and placed in Garriſon, and brought forth into the field, in the ſervice of their Creator; they are all exercitus pugnatorum. If yee looke into Heaven, there is a company of heavenly Souldiers, Luke 2. Neither was there onely the conſtruction of Idoliters, univerſa militia cæli, to which they burnt incenſe; but of Moſes himſelfe; Thus the Heaven and Earth were finiſhed, and all the

A the Hoſt of them, Gen. 2. 1. If yee looke to the Earth, not men onely, whom reaſon hath fitted for ſuch deſignes, but even the brute, yea, the baſeſt and indocibleſt of the brute creatures are ranged into arrayes: even the very Locuſts, though they have no Leader, yet Egrediuntur per turmas, They goe foorth by bands, Prov. 30. 27. And if ye looke into Egypt (where for the time was Sedes belli,) you ſhall finde a band of Frogs, that were appointed to march into the very bed chamber, the bed, the ovens, the diſhes of Pharaoh; you ſhall find an hoſt of Lice, of Flies, of Caterpillers, ſent againſt thoſe Egyptian Tyrants. Elſe-where, ye ſhall find troupes of Palmer wormes, of Locuſts, of Cankerwormes, of Caterpillers, to ſet upon Iſrael, Ioel 1. 4. Shortly, where he meanes to preſerve, the fiery Charets and Horſemen of Heaven ſhall compaſſe Dothan. Where he meanes to deſtroy, the moſt deſpicable of his creatures ſhall be armed, to the ruine of the proudeſt. Doth Goliah ſtalke forth to the defiance
B of the God of Iſrael? A pibble out of the brook ſhall ſtrew him on the ground. Doth an Herod heare his flatterers gladly ſay, Nec vox hominem ſonat? Stay but a while, God ſets his vermine upon him; all the Kings guard cannot maſter thoſe Lice. He hath Hornets for the Hivites and Canaanites, Exod. 23. Mice for the Philiſtims, 1 Sam. 6. Rats for the Covetous Prelate: A Flie for Pope Adrian: A world of creatures for either defenſive or offenſive ſervices. Quare fremuerunt gentes? Why doe the Heathen rage, and the people imagine a vaine thing? The Kings of the Earth ſet themſelves, and the Rulers take counſell together againſt the Lord, and againſt his Anointed, Preſumptuous duſt and aſhes, that dare riſe up againſt the God of Hoſts! If a ſilly Ant out of a Mole-hill ſhould march forth, and proffer to wreſtle a fall with a Gyant, there were ſome proportion in this challenge; there is none of a finite power to an infinite. Should all the C powers of Hell band themſelves with thoſe on earth, Quis reſtitit? What power have they of being, of motion, but from him whom they oppoſe? How eaſily can he blow upon their enterpriſes? How eaſily can he command theſe to the duſt, thoſe to their Chaines? Bee confounded therefore, O vaine men, whoſe breath is in your noſtrils (and that not your owne neither) when ye thinke of the power and Majeſty of the God of Hoſts.

Who hath reſiſted his will?

And why are we diſmaid with the rumours, or feares of the ſtrongeſt oppoſitions? Gebal and Ammon, and Amelec, the Philiſtims, with them that dwell at Tyre? Aſhur alſo is joyned to the inceſtuous children of Lot: (ὑπῆρξεν) O thou of little faith, why feareſt thou? The Lord of hoſts is with us, the God of Iacob is our refuge, Pſa. 46. Come, all ye Bands of wickedneſſe, and conſpire againſt the Scepter of the Kingdome (that is, the Goſpell) of Jeſus Chriſt. He hath his Armageddon, He hath a feaſt for the fowles of the aire, and the beaſt of the field, whom he hath inv ited to the fleſh
D of Captaines, and the fleſh of Kings Revel. 19. 8. I will not be afraid of ten thouſands of people that have ſet themſelves againſt me round about; Dominus ſuſcepit; The Lord hath ſuſtained me, and he is the Lord of Hoſts.

Yea, why are wee apalled, when we ſee the meaſures of the ſonnes of Anak; the ſpirituall wickedneſſes in heavenly places? If wee looke at their number, they are Legions. If to their ſtrength, they are Principalities and Powers. If to their nature, they are ſpirits that rule in the aire. We are men, fleſh and bloud, ſingle, weake, ſinfull. What ever we are, our God is in heaven, and doth whatſoever he will, he is the Lord of Hoſts, tho Cowards in our ſelves, yet in him we are more than Conquerors; he who is more than all power, than all Truth, hath ſaid it; The Gates of Hell ſhall not prevaile againſt his Church. Thanks be to God, which giveth us victory,
E through our Lord Jeſus Chriſt.

Laſtly, he is the Lord of hoſts; his undertakings are infallible: Hath he ſaid, that the glory of the Evangelicall Church ſhall exceed the Legall? Hath he ſaid, that, In this place he will give peace? How can the Church faile of glory, or the ſoule of peace? His word can be no more defective, than himſelfe impotent. Truſt God with his owne cauſes; truſt him with thy ſelfe; doe that he bids; expect what he promiſes; haunt this Houſe of his, wait on his ordinances. The Lord of Hoſts ſhall give thee that peace, which paſſeth all underſtanding; and with peace, glory, in that upper Houſe of his not made with hands, eternall in the Heavens.

To

To the poſſeſſion whereof, that God, who hath ordained us, in his good time mercifully bring us. A

And now, O Lord God of Hoſts, make good thy promiſes to this Houſe of thine. Whenſoever any Suppliant ſhall in this place offer up his praiers unto thee, heare thou in Heaven, thy dwelling place; and when thou heareſt, have mercy. What Word ſoever of thine ſhall ſound out of this place, let it be the ſavour of life unto life to every hearer. VVhat Sacrament ſoever of thine in this place ſhall be adminiſtred, let it bee effectuall to the ſalvation of every receiver.

Thou that art the God of glory, and peace, give peace and glory to thy Servants, for thy mercies ſake, for thy Sonnes ſake, even the Sonne of thy love, Ieſus Chriſt the juſt. To whom with thee, and the holy Ghoſt, one infinite God, be given all praiſe, honour, and thanksgiving now and for ever. B

TO THE WORSHIPFVLL AND REVEREND, Mr. Dr. HALL, DEANE OF WORCESTER, my worthy and much respected Friend, all happinesse, with my love in CHRIST JESUS.

REverend Sir; this Sermon, I know, is at the Presse before you expected: But I thought (as this glorious Chapell occasioned it, so) it might minister occasion of perpetuall remembrance of the Chapell, by remaining its first Monument. And although both these were confined to the private, the Chapell for the Family of my right Honourable Lord the Earle of Exceter, who hath given the materiall thereof sufficient luster: and the Copy of the Sermon to the Cabinet of my truly Noble, and vertuous Lady, his Countesse; yet both these are much and oft required to the publike, the Sermon to be an instruction, and so it is; the Chapell to be an example, and so it may be. The Sermon to teach all, to be all glorious in their soules. The Chapell to teach some, who build houses for their owne habitation, to set up another for Gods Religion. The Sermon was craved at the hands of my Honourable Ladie, that it might come to the Presse, who, of her owne pious disposition, gave forth the Copy, and for her Noble esteeme of your selfe, and of the worth of your Sermon, was willing and desirous to give it way to the Printer. And this I thought good to impart unto you, and to the courteous Reader, that you may be satisfied of the meanes how, and the cause why it comes in publike. And so praying for you, and desiring your prayers for me, I remaine

Your truly loving Friend,

H. BAGULEY.

THE TRUE PEACE-MAKER.

ESAY 32. 17.

Opus Juſtitiæ pax.

The worke of Iuſtice (or righteouſneſſe*) ſhall be peace.*

MY Text (you heare) is of Juſtice and Peace, two royall graces; and ſuch as flow from ſoveraigne Majeſty: There is a double Juſtice, Divine and humane; there is a double peace, outward in the ſtate, inward in the ſoule: accordingly there is a double ſenſe of my Text; a ſpirituall, a civill ſenſe: The ſpirituall concerning Theologicall Juſtice, and inward peace; The civill concerning humane Juſtice and outward peace. The ſpirituall thus; The Meſſias ſhall cauſe the fruit of his perfect juſtice to bee our inward peace with God, and our ſelves. The civill thus; The Magiſtrate ſhall cauſe the work of civill Juſtice in his adminiſtration, to bee our outward peace with one another: In both, or either (as Muſculus well) there is an alluſion in the Hebrew word to a field; the ſoile is the heart or the State, the ſeed is Juſtice, the fruit peace: That which was waſte ground is now a Carmell, a fruitfull field; and the fruit of this field of Juſtice is peace. As there is good reaſon, we will begin with the ſpirituall Iuſtice & Peace.

The great King of Heaven will diſforeſt that peace of the world, which he calls his Church, and put it to tillage; it ſhall be ſowne with righteouſneſſe, and ſhall yeeld a ſweet crop of peace: in this onely, not in the barren heaths of the prophane world, ſhall true peace grow.

At firſt, God and man were good friends: How ſhould there bee other than good termes betwixt Heaven and Paradiſe? God made man juſt; and juſt man (whiles hee was ſo) could not chuſe but love the juſt God that made him; ſin ſet them at odds; in one act and inſtant did man leeſe both his juſtice and peace; now the world is changed; now the ſtile of God is Fortis ultor, God the avenger, Ier. 51. 56. and the ſtile of men, Filii iræ, ſons of wrath, Epheſ. 2. 3. There is no poſſible peace to be made betwixt God and man, but by the perfect juſtice of him that was both God and man: I would there were a peace in the Church about this Juſtice; It is pitie and ſhame there is not; but there muſt be hereſies: As there are two parts of Divinity, the Law & the Goſpell; ſo each of theſe have their Juſtice; there is a Juſtice of the Law, and an Evangelicall Juſtice. The Juſtice of the Law when a meere morall man is juſtified (out of his owne powers) by the works of the Law; very Papiſts will give ſo much way to S. Paul, ſo much affront to Pelagius, as to renounce this; freely anathematizing that man who by the ſtrength of humane nature, or the doctrine of the Law, ſhall challenge juſtification; Unleſſe perhaps ſome Andradius have privilege to teach, that this Ethica juſtitia, was enough to juſtifie and ſave the old Philoſophers.

God the avenger. The ſonnes of wrath.

Morall righteouſneſſe

The Evangelicall Juſtice is not without the intervention of a Saviour; To which claime is laid in two kinds, either as imputative, or as inherent; The inherent wrought in us: the imputed wrought for us. How eaſie were it to lead you through a thicket of diſtinctions into a large field of controverſie, concerning the nature, meanes, manner o four Juſtification? No head in all Divinity yeelds either more, or more important Problemes; In ſo much as Cardinall De monte, Vice-Preſident for the time of the Councell of Trent, in an Oration made by him in the eleventh ſeſſion, profeſſes, that when they meant to diſpatch their Decree concerning Juſtification in fifteene daies, it coſt them ſeven moneths to finiſh, without one dayes intermiſſion; and when all is done, they have left the world, which was before (as Pighius ingenuouſly) intricated by the thorny queſtions of Schoolemen, rather more unſatisfied and perplexed than they found it. It is the maine care of our lives, and deaths, what ſhall give us peace & acceptation before the dreadfull Tribunall of God: What, but righteouſneſſe? What righteouſneſſe, or whoſe? Ours, or Chriſts? Ours, in the inherent graces wrought in us, in the holy works wrought by us; or Chriſts, in his moſt perfect obedience, and meritorious ſatisfaction wrought for us, applied to us? The Tridentine faction is for the former; we are for the latter; God is as direct on our ſide as his word can make him; Every where blazoning the defects of our owne righteouſneſſe, the imperfections of our beſt Graces, the deadly nature of our leaſt ſins; the radicall ſinfulneſſe of our habituall concupiſcence, the pollution of our beſt works: Every where extolling the perfect obedience of our Redeemer, the gratious application of that obedience, the ſweet comfort of that application, the aſſurance and unfailableneſſe of that comfort: and laſtly, our happy reſt in that aſſurance. I inſtance not; open the Book, ſee where your eyes can look beſide theſe. Satis aperte (ſaith their Caſſander) The Scripture is clear ours; So is all antiquity, if they beleeve that learned Arbiter; So are their more ingenuous Doctors of the laſt age; So would they all be, if they had grace to know God, themſelves, grace, ſin, heaven, hell; God perfectly juſt, themſelves miſerably weak, Grace ſenſibly imperfect, ſin unmeaſurably ſinfull; Laſtly, if they knew that heaven is for none but the pure, that hell is for the preſumptuous. O Saviour, no man is juſt through thee, but he that is ſanctified by thee; What is our inherent juſtice, but ſanctity? That we aſpire towards, we attaine not to; Woe were us if we were not more juſt in thee, than ſanctified in our ſelves; we are ſanctified, in part, according to the weakneſſe o four receit; we are juſtified thorowly, according to the perfection of thine acceptation; were we fully ſanctified here, we ſhould be more than men; were we not thorowly juſtified, we ſhould be no more than ſinners before thee; whiles we ſtand before thee as ſinners, we can have no peace; Let others truſt in the Charets and Horſes of their own ſtrength, we will remember the Name of the Lord our God; The work of thy juſtice ſhall be our peace.

Peace is a ſweet word; Every body would be glad of it; eſpecially Peace at the laſt, as the Pſalmiſt ſpeaks: How have the politickly religious held out twigs for the drowning ſoule to catch at? Due ſatisfactions, undue ſupererogations, patronages of Saints, bargaines of Indulgences, woolward pilgrimages, and at laſt (after whips and haire-clothes) leave the dying ſoule to a feare of Hell, doubt of Heaven, aſſurance of Purgatory flames; How truly may it now ſay to theſe Doctors, as Iob to his friends, miſerable comforters are ye all; Hearken, O ye deare Chriſtians, to a better voice that ſounds from heaven; Come to me all yee that labour, and are heavy laden, and I will give you reſt. Mat. 11. 28.

Is there any of you whoſe unquiet breſt boiles continually with the conſcience of anyfoule ſin? whoſe heart is dayly tyr'd upon by the vulture of his ſecret guiltineſſe? whoſe boſome is gnawed before-hand with that helliſh Worme, which can no more give over than die? It boots not to aske thee if thou wouldeſt have peace. Peace? Rather than life; Oh wherewithall ſhall I come before the Lord, and bow my ſelfe before the moſt high God? Shall I come before him with burnt offerings? Will the Lord be pleaſed with thouſands of Rams, or with ten thouſand Rivers of Oyle? Shall I give my firſt borne for my tranſgreſſion, the fruit of my body for the ſin of my ſoule? Heare, O thou diſtracted heart; what talkeſt thou of giving to the owner? The world is his: thou art not thine owne; Yea, were theſe things thine, and not his, yet know, it is not giving, but taking that muſt procure thy peace: Micah. 6.

Peace: An infinite Juſtice is offended; an infinite Juſtice hath ſatisfied, an infinite mercy hath applied it; Take thou hold by the hand of faith on that infinite mercy, and Juſtice of thy Saviour; The work of his Juſtice ſhall be thy peace.

Fly about whither thou wilt, O thou weary Dove, thorow all the wide Regions of the heaven, and waters, thou ſhalt no where find reſt for the ſoles of thy feet, but in this Arke of Chriſts perfect righteouſneſſe: In vaine ſhalt thou ſeek it in ſchooles of morality, in learned Libraries, in ſpatious fields and forreſts, in pleaſant gardens, in ſullen retiredneſſe, in witty converſation, in wanton Theaters, in drunken cellers, in tables of gluttony, in beds of luſt, cheſts of Mammon, whiffes and draughts of intoxication, ſongs of ribaldry, ſpors of recreation; No, no, the more thou ſeekeſt it in moſt of theſe, the further it flies from thee, the further thou art from finding it; and if theſe things may give ſome poore truce to thy thoughts, it ſhall ſoon end in a more direfull war. There is no peace, ſaith my God, to the wicked: Stray whither thou wilt, O thou wounded heart, thorow the Lawnds and Woods; alas, the ſhaft ſticks ſtill in thee, or if that be ſhaken out, the head; None but the ſoveraigne Dittany of thy Saviours righteouſneſſe can drive it out; and till it be out, thou canſt have no peace. In plaine termes; wouldſt thou have peace? None but Chriſt can give it thee; Hee will give it to none but the penitent, none but the faithfull; Oh ſpend thy ſelfe into the ſighes and teares of true repentance; and then raiſe thy humbled ſoule to a lively confidence in thine all-ſufficient Redeemer; Set thy Lord Jeſus betwixt God and thy ſins; God cannot ſee thy debt, but through thine acquittance; By his ſtripes we are healed, by his wounds we are ſtanched, by his death we are quickned, by his righteouſneſſe wee are diſcharged The work of his righteouſneſſe is our peace. Oh ſafe and bleſſed condition of beleevers; Let ſin, Satan, world, death, hell, doe their worſt; Who ſhall lay any thing to the charge of Gods elect? It is God that juſtifieth, who ſhall condemne? It is Chriſt that dyed, yea rather, that is riſen againe; who is alſo at the right hand of God, and maketh interceſſion for us: Our enemy is now our Father, our Judge is our Saviour, the offended our ſurety, that precious blood our ranſome, that perfect righteouſneſſe our everlaſting peace.

Thus much of our ſpirituall Juſtice, and Peace. The Civill followes: I know theſe two are wide tearmes; Juſtice compriſes all vertue, as Peace all bleſſings; For that is juſt in all kinds, which hath a meet adequation to the rule; All vertue therfore conforming us to the Law of God, which is the rule of perfection, challengeth juſtly to it ſelfe a ſtile of juſtice.

Narrower bounds will ſerve our turne: We ſpeak of Juſtice firſt as a ſingle vertue. Habits are diſtinguiſhed by their acts; acts by their objects. The object of all morall vertue is good, as of all intellectuall, is True. The object of this vertue of Juſtice is the good of men in relation to each other; Other vertues order a man in regard to himſelfe; Juſtice, in regard to another. This good being either common, or private; common of all, private of ſome; the acts and vertue of juſtice muſt be ſutable; either, as man ſtands in an habitude to the whole body, or as he ſtands to ſpeciall Limbs of the body: The former of theſe is that which Philoſophers and Caſuiſts call a legall and univerſal Juſtice. The latter is that particular Juſtice, which we uſe to diſtinguiſh by Diſtribution, and Commutation; the one conſiſting in matter of Commerce, the other in Reward, or Puniſhment: both of them according to a meet, though different, equality: An Arithmeticall equality in Commutation; a Geometricall in diſtribution; the former regarding the value, or worth of the thing; the latter, regarding the proportionable difference of the perſon. The work of all theſe three Juſtices, is Peace.

Firſt, the legall Juſtice is the apparant mother and nurſe of publike Peace: When Governors and Subjects are carefull to give each other their owne; when both conſpire to command and obey for the common good; when men frame their lives to the wholſome lawes of their Soveraignes, not more out of feare than conſcience; when reſpect to the community caries men from partiall reflections upon themſelves; As contrarily diſtractions, and private ends are the bane of any ſtate. When the head and members unite their thoughts and endevours in the center of the common good: the head to deviſe and command, the eies to ſee, the eare to heare, the palate to taſte, the heart to move, the bellowes of the lungs to blow, the liver to ſanguifie, the ſtomach to digeſt, the guts to export, the hands to execute, the tongue to talk for the good of this naturall Common-wealth of the body, all goes well and happily; but if any of theſe parts will be gathering to themſelves, and obſtructions grow within; and mutinous diſtempers ariſe in the humours, ruine is threatned to the whole: If either the Superiors miſcommand, or the inferiors diſobey, it is an affront to Peace. I need not tell you that good lawes are the wals of the City, the ſinewes of the Politick body, the rule of our life, the life of our ſtate, whithout which men would turne brute, yea monſtrous; the world were a Chaos, yea an hell. It is wiſdome that makes lawes, it is Juſtice that keeps them; Oh let this Juſtice ſtill bleſſe us with a perpetuall peace: as thoſe that doe not think the world made for us, but our ſelves made for the world, let us drive at an univerſall good: let there be ever that ſweet correſpondence betwixt Soveraignty and ſubjection, that the one may be happy in the other, both in peace. A

Secondly, the diſtributive Juſtice is not leſſe fruitfull of peace; when rewards of honours, and gracious reſpects are ſuited to the well-deſerving; when malefactors ſmart according to their crimes; This Juſtice hath ſtocks for the vagrant, whips for harlots, brands for petty larzons, ropes for felons, weights for the contumaciouſly ſilent, ſtakes for blaſphemous hereticks, gibbets for murtherers, the hurdle, and the knife, and the pole for traitors; and upon all theſe engines of Juſtice hangs the garland of peace, It was not for nothing that Maximilian the Firſt, paſſing by the gallowes, ſaluted it with Salve Juſtitia. Ye never ſee Juſtice painted without a ſword; when that ſword glitters with uſe, it is well with the publique; woe be to the Nation where it ruſts. There can be no more acceptable ſacrifice than the blood of the flagitious. Immediately after Garnets execution, Father David at Ypre, in a publike Sermon declared the miracles ſhowne thereat; Amongſt the reſt, that a ſpring of oile brake forth ſuddenly in the place where that Saint was martyred; In ſtead of a lie, let it be a parable; The blood of Traitors ſhed by the ſword of Juſtice, is a well of oyle to fatten, and refreſh the Common wealth. B

I know well how mercy befits the mouths of Gods Miniſters: The ſoft tongue of a Divine is no meet whetſtone for the edge of ſeverity; but withall, I dare ſay, that Juſtice is a noble work of mercy; neither need we wiſh to bee more charitable, than the God of mercy that ſaies, Thine eie ſhall not ſpare the murtherer, Numb. 35. 31. The Tempter to idolatry, Deut. 13. 6. The very ſonnes of Levi were appointed to win an everlaſting bleſſing, by conſecrating their hands to God in Iſraelitiſh blood: The vnjuſt favour, and plauſibility of Romiſh Doctors, towards capitall offenders, hath made their Sanctuaries (even literally) a den of theeves, an harbour of villany. It is memorable of Lewis of France, (ſtiled the Saint) that he reverſed a pardon wrought from him to a malefactor, upon reading that verſe in the Pſalme, Beati qui faciunt juſtitiam in omni tempore; Bleſſed are they that doe juſtice at all times: No marvell if one of thoſe foure things which Iſabel of Spaine was wont to ſay, ſhee loved to ſee, were, A theefe upon the Ladder; Even through his halter might ſhee ſee the proſpect of peace. Woe bee to them that either for gaine or private intereſt ingage themſelves in the ſuit of favour to maliciouſly bloody hands; that, by the dam of their bribes labour to ſtop the due courſe of punitive Juſtice; theſe, theſe are the enemies of peace; theſe ſtaine the land with that Crimſon die, that cannot be waſhed out but by many wofull lavers of revenge: Farre, far be it from any of you, generous Chriſtians, to endevour either to corrupt, or interrupt the waies of Judgement, or for a private benefit to croſſe the publike Peace: Woe be to thoſe partiall Judges, that juſtifie the wicked, and condemne the innocent; the girdle of whoſe equity ſags downe on that ſide where the purſe hangs: Laſtly, woe to thoſe unworthy ones that raiſe themſelves by fraud, bribes, ſymony, ſacrilege; therfore are theſe enemies to the State, becauſe to Peace; and therefore enemies to Peace, becauſe violaters of juſtice, And the work of juſtice is Peace. C

Pſal. 106. 3 D

Thirdly, that commutative Juſtice works Peace, needs no other proofe than that all the reall brables and ſuits amongſt men, ariſe from either true or pretended injuſtice of contracts. Let me leade you in a Terme morning to the ſpacious Hall of Juſtice: What is the cauſe of all that concourſe? that Hive-like murmure? that noiſe at the Bar, but injurious bargains, fraudulent conveyances, falſe titles, diſapointment of truſts, wrongfull detentions of money, goods, lands, coozenages, oppreſſions, extortions; E tions? Could the honesty and private justice of men prevent these enormities, silence and solitude would dwell in that wide Palace of Justice; neither would there be more Pleas than Cob-webs under that vast roofe. Every way therfore it is cleare, that the work of Justice is Peace; In so much as the Guardians of Peace are called Justicers.

This for the Common-weath; If it please you to cast your eyes upon her Sister the Church, you shall find that the outward Peace thereof also must arise from Justice. Alas; thence is our hopelessnesse: Never may they prosper that love not, that wish not peace within those sacred wals; but what possibility of Peace in the peremptory repulses of Justice? What possibility of Justice in the long vsurped tyranny of the successor of Romulus? Could we hope to see Justice once shine from those seaven hils, we would make account of peace; but, oh the miserable injustice of that imperious Sea; Injustice of claime, injustice of practice. Of claime, over Kings, Church, Scriptures, Conscience: Over Kings; there is S. Pauls super-exalted (ὑπεραίρεται;) His usuall title is Orbis Dominus; Dominus universorum in the mouths and pens of his flatterers: And lest Princes should seeme exempted; he is Rex Regum, as Paulus 4. saies of himselfe; he is super Imperatores & Reges, saith their Antoninus, Triumphus, Capistranus, and who not? How much? you know the calculation of the magnitude of the two great lights: How over them? As the master over the servant; they are the words of their Pope Nicholas; The Imperiall throne is unde nisi a nobis, saith Pope Adrian: What should I tell you of his bridle, stirrup, toe, cup, canopy? Let the booke of holy Ceremonies say the rest; These things are stale, The world hath long seene and blushed.

Lord of the world.

Over Emperor and Kings.

whence but from us?

Over the Church; There is challenged a proper head-ship, from whom all influences of life, sense, motion come; as their Bozius; why said I over? He is under the Church: For he is the foundation of the Church, saith Bellarmine; Over as the head, under as the foundation? What can Christ bee more? Thence, where are generall councels but under him, as the streame of Jesuites; Who but he is, regula fidei, as their Andradius: he alone hath infallibility and indefectibility, whether in decretis fidei, or in præceptis morum, as Bellarmine. Hee hath power to make new Creeds, and to obtrude them to the Church; the deniall whereof was one of those Articles which Leo the tenth condemned in Luther.

In decrees of faith or precepts of manners.

Over Scriptures. There is claimed a power to authorize them for such; A power to interpret them, sententialiter & Obligatorie, being such; A power to dispense with them, ex causa, though such. Over the consciences of men; In dispensing with their oaths, in allowance of their sins. It is one head of their Canon Law, A Iuramento fidelitatis absolvit, Decret. p. 2. Caus. 15. qu. 6. And in every oath is understood a reservation and exception of the Popes power, say his Parasites.

Hee absolves from the oath of Allegeance.

I am ashamed to tell, and you would blush to heare the dispensation reported to be granted by Sixtus 4. to the family of the Cardinall of S. Lucie; and by Alexander 6. to Peter Mendoza Cardinall of Valentia.

And as there is horrible injustice in these claimes; so is there no lesse in practice. Take a taste of all: What can bee more unjust than to cast out of the lap of the Church those that oppose their novelties, to condemne them to the stake, to hell for Hereticks? What more unjust than to falsifie the writings of ancient or moderne Authors, by secret expurgations, by wilfull mis-editions? What more unjust than the withholding the remedy of generall Councels, and transacting all the affaires of the Church by a pack't conclave? What more unjust than the suppression of the Scriptures, and mutilation of the Sacrament to the Laity? What more unjust than allowance of equivocation, than upholding a faction by willing falshood of rumors, than plotting the subversion of King and State, by unnaturall conspiracies? Well may we call heaven and earth to record against the unjustice of these claimes, of these practises. What then? Is it to hope for Peace, notwithstanding the continuance of all these? So the work of injustice shall be Peace: And an unjust and unsound Peace must needs bee that arises from injustice; Is it to hope they will abandon these things for Peace? Oh that the Church of God might once be so happy: That there were but any life in that possibility; In the meane time, let God and his holy Angels witnesse betwxit us, that on their part the Peace faileth; we are guiltlesse: What have we done?

What

What have we attempted? What have we innovated? Only wee have ſtood upon a juſt and modeſt negative, and have unjuſtly ſuffered. Oh that all the innocent blood we have ſhed could waſh their hands from Injuſtice, from enmity to Peace. A

That from them we may returne to our ſelves; For the publike, we enjoy an happy Peace; Bleſſed be God for Juſtice: and if in this common harmony of Peace, there bee found ſome private jarres of diſcord, whence is it but from our owne Injuſtice? The world is of another mind; whoſe wont is to cenſure him that puniſhes the fault, not him that makes it; Severity, not guiltineſſe in common opinion, breaks the Peace: Let the queſtion be who is the great make-bate of the world; begin with the family: Who troubles the houſe? Not unruly, headſtrong, debaucht, children, that are ready to throw the houſe out of the windowes, but the auſtere father, that reproves, that corrects them; would he wink at their diſorders, all would be quiet. Not careleſſe, ſlothfull, falſe, lime-fingred ſervants, but the ſtrict maſter, that obſerves and rates, and chaſtiſes them; would he hold his hands, and tongue, there would be peace. B

The like diſcourſe to this ye ſhall find in Contra. Schluſſelburgius in his preface to his thirteenth booke Catal. Hæret.

Not the peeviſh and turbulent wife, who forgetting the rib, uſurps upon the head, but the reſolute husband, that hates to leeſe his authority in his love; remembring that though the rib be neer the heart, yet the head is above the ſhoulders; Would he fall from the termes of his honour, there would be peace.

In the Country, not the oppreſſing Gentleman, that tyrannizes over his cottagers, incroches upon his neighbours inheritance, incloſes commons, depopulates villages, ſcruzes his Tenants to death, but the poore ſoules that when they are cruſhed, yeeld the juyce of teares, exhibit bils of complaint, throw open the new thornes, maintain the old mounds, would theſe men be content to be quietly racked and ſpoiled, there would be peace.

In the City; not the impure Sodomitiſh brothels, that ſell themſelves to work wickedneſſe; not the abominable Pandars, not the jugling Cheater, not the Counterfeit Vagrant, but the Marſhall that drawes theſe to correction; Not the deceitfull Merchant that ſophiſticates his commodities, inhanceth prices, ſels every inch of (what he cannot warrant) Time; Not the unconſcionable and fraudulent Artiſan, but the Promoter and the Bench. C

In the common-wealth; not the cruell robber by ſea or land, that lies in the way, like a ſpider in a window, for a booty, for blood: Not the bold night-walker that keeps ſavage houres fit for the guilty intentions of his burglaries, but the watch that takes him; Not the rank adulterer that neighs after his neighbours wife, and thirſts after onely ſtolne waters, but the ſworne men that preſent him. Not the traiterous Coyner, that in every ſtampe reads his owne conviction, whiles he ſtill renewes that face againſt which he offends, but the Sheriffe that attaches him.

Not the unreformable drunkard, that makes a God of his liquor, a beaſt of himſelfe, and raves, and ſwaggers in his cups, but the Conſtable that puniſhes him; would theſe Officers connive at all theſe villanies, there would be peace. D

In the Church, not the chaffering Patron, or perjured Chaplaine; not the ſeducing heretick, or ſeditious ſchiſmatick; not the ſcandalous Levite, not the careleſſe Queſtman, not the corrupt Officiall, but the clamorous Preacher, or the rigorous High-Commiſſion. In the world; laſtly, Not the ambitious inchrochers upon others dominions, not violaters of leagues, not uſurpers of miſ-gotten titles and dignities, not ſuborners, or abettors of conſpiracies, and traitors, but the unkind patients that will not recipere ferrum: I wis the great potentates of the world might ſee a ready way to peace.

Thus in family, countrey, city, common-wealth, church, world, the greateſt part ſeek a licencious peace in a diſordered lawleſneſſe; condemning true juſtice of cruelty, ſtripping her of the honour of peace, branding her with the cenſure of troubleſome. Fooliſh men ſpeak fooliſh things: O noble and incomparable bleſſing of peace, how injuriouſly art thou aſcribed to unjuſt neglect? Oh divine vertue of juſtice, how deſervedly have the Ancients given thee wings, and ſent thee up to heaven in a deteſtation of theſe earthly indignities; whence thou comeſt not downe at all, unleſſe it pleaſe that eſſentiall and infinite Juſtice to communicate thee to ſome choyce E favorites. It is but a juſt word, that this Iland hath beene long approved the darling of heaven; Wee have enjoyed peace, to the admiration, to the envy of neighbourhood: Would we continue it? would we traduce it to ours? Juſtice muſt doe it for us. Both Juſtice and Peace, are from the throne; Peace is the Kings peace; and juſtly deſcends from Soveraignty by commiſſion; let me have leave to ſay with the princely Prophet (a word that was too good for the frequent text of a Pope) Diligite juſtitiam qui judicatis terram. Still, O God, give thy Judgement to the King, and thy Juſtice to the Kings ſonne. And if any ſhall offer wrong to the Lords anointed in his perſon, in his ſeed, the work of that injuſtice ſhall be war; yea Bellum Domini, the Lords war; (2 Sam. 25. 28.) Then let him who is both the Lord of Hoſts, and the God of Peace, riſe up mightily for his anointed, the true King of peace; that he who hath graciouſly ſaid all this while, Da pacem, Domine, Give peace in our time, O Lord; may ſuperſcribe at the laſt his juſt Trophees, with, Bleſſed bee the Lord which teacheth my hands to warre, and my fingers to fight.

Ye have heard of the ſpirituall Juſtice and Peace; Ye have heard of the Civill; may it pleaſe you to mix both of them together: My text alone doth it; if you doe but with our moſt accurate Tranſlation, read Righteouſneſſe for Juſtice; So ſhall you ſee the ſpirituall diſpoſition of Righteouſneſſe produce the civill effect of peace: What is righteouſneſſe, but the ſincere uprightneſſe of the heart to God in all our wayes? He is perfect with God, that would be ſo.

What need I tell you that this is the way to true inward Peace, Nil conſcire, A clear heart will be a quiet one. There is no feaſt to a good conſcience; this is meat, muſick, welcome; It ſeems harder that true ſpirituall honeſty ſhould procure even outward peace: Heare wiſe Salomon; By the bleſſing of the upright, the city is exalted, Prov. 11. 11. When a mans wayes pleaſe the Lord, hee maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him, Pr. 16.7. Righteouſneſſe exalteth a nation, but ſinne is a reproach to any people, Pro. 14.24. It followes then as a juſt corollary, That the honeſteſt, and conſcionableſt man is the beſt ſubject: He may perhaps be plaine, perhaps poore, perhaps weak, but the ſtate is more beholden to his integrity, than to the ableſt purſe, than to the ſtrongeſt arme; Whereas the graceleſſe and vicious perſon, let him be never ſo plauſible a talker, never ſo carefull an Officer, never ſo valiant a Leader, never ſo officious a Courtier, never ſo deep in ſubſidies, never ſo forward in actions, is no other than an enemy to the ſtate, which he profeſſes to adore. Not to be guilty of ill.

Let no Philoſopher tell me of, malus vir bonus civis; I ſay from better authority, that a lewd man can no more be a good ſubject, than an ill ſubject can be a good man: Heare this then (whereſoever ye are) ye ſecret oppreſſors, ye prophane ſcoffers, yee foule mouth'd ſwearers, ye cloſe adulterers, ye kind drunkards, and who ever come within this black liſt of wickedneſſe, how can ye be loyall, whiles you lodge traitors in your boſomes? Proteſt what ye will; your ſinnes break the peace, and conſpire againſt the ſacred Crowne and dignitie of your Soveraigne; What care we that you draw your ſword, and vow your blood, and drink your healths to your Governors, when in the meane while you provoke God to anger, and ſet quarrels betwixt your Country and Heaven? An ill man a good ſubject.

That I may winde up this clew; It were folly to commend to you the worth of peace; we know that the excellency of Princes is expreſſed by ſerenity; what good hath the earth which God doth not couch under the name of Peace? Bleſſed be God, and his Anointed, we have long and comfortably taſted the ſweetneſſe of his bleſſing; the Lilies and Lions of our Salomon have been juſtly worded with Beati pacifici: Would wee have this happineſſe perpetuated to us, to poſterity? Oh let Prince and people meet in the ambition to be Gens juſta, a righteous nation, righteous every way; Firſt, let God have his owne; His owne dayes, his owne ſervices; his feare, his love, his all: Let Religion leade all our projects, not follow them; let our lives be led in a conſcionable obedience to all the Lawes of our Maker: Farre be all Blaſphemies, curſes, and obſcenities from our tongues, all outrages and violences from our hands; all preſumptuous and rebellious thoughts from our hearts. Let our hearts, hands, tongues, lives, bodies and ſoules bee ſincerely devoted to him. Then, for men: let us give Cæſar his owne:

owne: Tribute, feare, ſubjection, loyalty, and (if he need) our lives; Let the Nobilitie have honour, obeiſance, obſervation; Let the Clergie have their dues, and our reverence; Let the commons have truth, love, fidelity in all their tranſactions; Let there be trutinæ juſtæ, pondera juſta: Let there be no grinding of faces, no trampling on the poore (Amos 5.11.) no ſwallowing of widowes houſes, no force, no fraud, no perjury, no perfidiouſneſſe. A

Lev. 19 36. Iuſt balances, juſt weights.

Finally, for our ſelves; let every man poſſeſſe his veſſell in holineſſe and honour: framing himſelfe to all Chriſtian and heavenly temper, in all wiſdome, ſobriety, chaſtity, meekneſſe, conſtancie, moderation, patience, and ſweet contentation: ſo ſhall the work of our righteouſneſſe be peace of heart, peace of ſtate; private and publike peace; Peace with our ſelves, peace with the world, peace with God; temporall peace here, eternall peace and glory above; unto the fruition whereof, hee who hath ordained us, mercifully bring us, for the ſake of him, who is the Prince of Peace, Jeſus Chriſt the righteous. TO THE RIGHT HONOVRABLE MY SINGVLAR GOOD LORD,

EDWARD Lord DENNY, Baron of WALTHAM, all health and Happineſſe.

RIGHT HONOVRABLE,

I Might well perceive by the Author that this Sermon was never intended to bee publiſhed, in any other Language than that wherein it was firſt ſpoken: being in reſpect of the matter, in a ſort appropriate to that Auditory wherein it was delivered; But beſides the common deſire of many, finding the tranſlation attempted by divers, and performed by ſome in ſuch a manner as did not altogether ſatisfie; It pleaſed my Father herein to improve my leiſure; wherein, howſoever I may have ſomewhat failed of the firſt elegancie, yet I have not bin far ſhort of the ſenſe. I have preſumed to dedicate the ſame to your Lordſhip, in reſpect of your many favours, and my obligations, for which (beſides this officious, though unequall requitall) I ſhall ſtill vow my prayers for your Lordſhip, and remaine,

Your Lordſhips moſt humbly devoted,

NOAH'S DOVE.

YEe are here met (which I humbly wish, may prove every way prosperous, and happy to the Church of God) most Reverend Father in God, Reverend Bishops, venerable Deanes, Archdeacons, Brethren of the Clergie, by the providence of our good God, and the command of our gracious Soveraigne, to hold an holy Convocation this day.

Blessed Paul, in whose name this ancient pile doth not a little pride it selfe, salutes you by my unworthy tongue, and as if he were present, addresses himselfe to you, and exhorts you

In his former Epistle to the Corinthians, the 12 Chapter, verse 4.

There are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit; there are diversities of ministeries, but the same Lord, and there are diversities of operations, but the same God, &c.

SEe I beseech you, the meet correspondence of all things. Ye are met in one, and here is unity; Yee are many of you met from the utmost parts of this large Province, and here is manifold diversity; ye are met the floure of our English Clergie, learned and exquisite Divines, and here are diversities of gifts; Yee are met, the Lords and Commons of our sacred function, and here are diversities of ministeries; Yee are met for the holy affaires of the Church, and here are operations; Yee are met (as I verily hope, and wish) in unity of Spirit, and here is one Spirit; Yee are lastly met to consecrate your selves, your gifts, Ministeries, Operations, to the service of our Lord God; and here is that Lord, that God whom we professe to serve.

Now that same God, that same Lord Jesus Christ, that same holy Spirit, be present with us all this day; and by his blessed influences guide and governe this sacred meeting, and happily direct all our councels and endevours to the glory of his owne great name, the salvation of our soules, and the assured edification of his Church, through Jesus Christ.

See here then, Honoured Prelates, and beloved Brethren, the loope or combination of both worlds; Both the worlds of our Divinity; The greater world, God; the lesser world, Man; What is there that can so much concerne us to know, to behold? Will ye looke up to God? He is one in essence (ὁ αὐτὸς) Three in Person, The Father, Lord, Spirit. He is three in one, and one in three; The Father, Lord, Spirit, one and the same God.

Will yee caſt your eye to Man? yee ſhall ſee him not ſingle, but branched into infinite diverſitie; not bare and naked, but furniſhed with gifts; not ſuperfluous, but deſtin'd to due ſervices; not idle, but buſie in meet operations: Neither are theſe operations, ſervices, gifts, all of one kind, but diverſly diſtinguiſhed, and varied: And whence are theſe ſo manifold graces, ſo divers imployments, but from one God, the Father, Lord, Spirit? And wherefore are all theſe, but that theſe operations, miniſteries, gifts, proceeding from one God, Lord, Spirit, may be directed to one, and may end as they began, in a perfect unity? A

O marvelous conjunction of divine and humane things; O unutterable communion of heaven and earth; Wherein is laid forth unto us the intire reſpects and union of God to himſelfe by conſubſtantialitie, of God to man by munificence, of man to God by the bond of thankfulneſſe, of men to each other by the bond of charity, of gifts to miniſteries, of miniſteries to operations, of all to all. B

I ſhall not now need, neither indeed would it befit me, in ſo awfull an aſſembly of Divines to dwell upon Catecheticall points, concerning the myſtery of the ſacred Trinitie; Although this labour is well worthy of you elſewhere, my brethren, and ſuch as (if I may perſwade you) you ſhall carefully beſtow at home; This familiar kinde of teaching the word of the beginnings of Chriſt is growne out of faſhion; Like ambitious Orators, wee overlooke this popular ſtraine, and are carried to an affectation of perfection. Yee ſee how the Heron can ſoare high, yet lives, for the moſt part, in the loweſt valley; builds in the talleſt trees, yet feeds in the humble mariſhes; So doe yee, my deare fellow-labourers, not ſo much caring to ſhew your ſelves learned, as to make your people ſo.

This by the way. Such as God is, ſuch he expreſſes himſelfe to us; and ſuch as hee expreſſes himſelfe to us, ſuch he formes us to himſelfe: As the Sunne looking upon a cloud fitly diſpoſed, for that purpoſe, imprints in that moiſt glaſſe a certaine bright image of himſelfe; ſo doth God to his Church; From that Celeſtiall and divine Trinity, therefore, is here apparently deduced another Trinity, ſublunary and humane; Of gifts, miniſteries, operations; From the ſpirit are derived gifts; miniſteries from the Sonne, operations from the Father; There are diverſities of gifts, but the ſame ſpirit; of miniſteries, but the ſame Lord; of operation, but the ſame God. C

Away with all niceties of Pythagorean calculations; All numbers are alike to me, ſave thoſe which God himſelfe hath chalked out unto us; as here he hath manifeſtly done. In one word; An Unity and a Trinity make up this golden ſentence. There is a Trinity in this Unity; There is an Unity in this Trinitie; Firſt, here is a perfect (that is, a Triple) Trinity; a Trinity of diverſities, a Trinity of faculties, a Trinity of givers; For there are ſo many diverſities as faculties, and ſo many faculties as givers; The faculties are three; gifts, miniſteries, operations; The givers three, The Father the Sonne, the Spirit, which all are included in one Unity (τῷ ἑνὶ τῷ αὐτῷ) the ſame God; And yet even that Unity hath his diſtinction, whiles gifts are (as it were) by a ſpecialty aſcribed to the Spirit, miniſteries to the Sonne, to the Father operations. D

That our diſcourſe may not ſeeme too perplexed, wee will follow the foot-ſteps of our Apoſtle, and with all poſſible perſpicuity, will apply the diverſities to the faculties, the faculties to the givers; Theſe Trinities to their Unity, and (this done) draw to a briefe concluſion.

A threefold Diverſity argues multiplicitie; What meant the Ancients to dreame but of three Graces? there are a thouſand graces, gifts infinite; Looke upon all the grand-children of Adam, that ever were; amongſt ſo many thouſand millions of faces, ye ſhall eaſily obſerve ſome varietie of favours; It is a wonder to ſee what diverſitie of formes there is, in that which we call beauty; No twins are ſo like as not to bewray ſome diſſimilitude; Certainely there is not ſo great variety of faces, as of mindes; As features are to the countenance, ſo are gifts to the mind; Each one hath ſome, all have many, none have all; There are diverſities of gifts. E

Salmeron, with Cajetan, underſtands here thoſe gifts which we call Gratias gratis datas, Graces freely given; wherein he ſayes true, but not enough; For as the old word is, Favours muſt be enlarged; and thoſe gifts which make us gracious are beſt worthy

A thy of this name; It is not amiſſe that Hugo reckons up three ſorts of Gods gifts to man; Gifts of nature, of grace, of glory: By the gifts of nature we are men, by the gifts of grace we are holy, by the gifts of glory, we ſhall be bleſſed. The gifts of nature are memory, reaſon, will, wherein we excell the brute creatures; The gifts of grace are faith, hope, charity, wherein we goe beyond the Devills; The gifts of glory, eternall and true bleſſedneſſe; bleſſed and eternall truth, true and bleſſed eternitie, wherein wee are equall to the Angels; Amongſt the gifts of nature the ſame Author reckons ſome to be of the loweſt ranke, ſome of the meane, ſome of the higheſt; In the loweſt, he accounts beauty and health of body; In the meane hee accounts the faculties of the minde; In the higheſt, the vertues of the ſoule; Thus there are diverſities of gifts.

There are ſome gifts of Regeneration; there are ſome gifts of our calling; by the
B former, we are borne againe for our owne good; with the latter, wee are furniſhed, for the good of others; Theſe latter are peculiarly beſtowed upon ſeverall men, the former are by a certaine common propriety beſtowed upon all the Saints of God; For, as in the moſt wiſe diſpoſition of this univerſe, the beſt things, and thoſe which are neceſſary for the ſuſtentation of life, as aire, light, fire, water, are abundantly given to all, but thoſe things which ſerve only for ornament and pleaſure, as Gold, Pearle, Precious ſtones, are more ſparingly beſtowed upon ſome few; ſo every ſaving grace is abundantly diſpenſed to all Saints, by the liberall hand of God; Whereas tongues, prophecie, power of miracles, as alſo eloquence, skill, honour, and the reſt of this kind, are reſerved onely for ſome few receivers; And in all theſe, what ſtrang diverſity there is? They differ in reſpect of themſelves, being in nature divers from each other; They differ in reſpect of the Subject, as being diverſly given to one, and
C other; for as the blind Bard ſaw truly, God doth not give all to all; They differ in reſpect of degree, as they are more given to one, than to other. Thus every way there are diverſities of gifts.

It is the common voice of nature, that the ſame remaining the ſame cannot produce but the ſame; but, when we ſpeake of the God of Nature; that word of Bonaventure is more true; Ab uniſſimo Deo manant multiforma, ab æterno temporalia; From that moſt one God flowes multiformity of effects, and from that eternall God, temporall effects. Hugo ſaid well, In te variatur quiin ſe non mutatur; he is varied in thee, who is not changed in himſelfe: If the divine power had made onely one creature, that alonely worke of his had beene worthy of a God, and ſuch as could proceed from no leſſe than an omnipotent hand; But now he hath created many things, yea innumerable; If God had made theſe many creatures altogether uniforme and like themſelves; only diſtin-
D guiſhed in number, not in forme; the worke had beene more excellent and admirable, than the frame of any one creature alone; but now, that he hath made theſe many, theſe innumerable creatures, no leſſe different from themſelves, and ſo, as that the difference of their formes ſtrives with the praiſe of their number; O the depth of divine wiſdome! O the ſtupendious workmanſhip of omnipotencie! And yet there is no Subject wherein the power and providence of the Almighty doth ſo much magnifie it ſelfe, as in the divers Oeconomie of man; In ſo much as in this little world, there is a world of diverſities; Marvell at your ſelves, brethren, and be aſtoniſhed at your owne proſpects; Whether we looke at the faſhion of the face, or the proportion of parts, or the coloure of the skin, or the ſtature of the body, or the indowments of the minde, the degrees of faculties, the diſpoſition of nature, the meaſure of graces, the opportunities of ſtations, or laſtly the outward condition of our life; O good E God what wondrous diverſity is here; how impoſſible is it for the eye to meet twiſe with the like object, whitherſoever it roveth? Thus there are diverſities of gifts.

Away now from hence, with all haughtineſſe of pride, all mutinies of envie; Theſe two dangers will bee ſure to haunt the moſt juſt inequality; the needy is envious, the rich is proud.

Poore Iam contemned, others are ſet up; others ſhine in ſcarlet, and purple, whiles I am patching of naſty ragges; Others wallow in their wealth and exceſſe, I famiſh for hunger; hunger; others Lord it in lofty ſeats, I am trod under their foot-ſtooles; Others are eloquent, I am a ſtammerer: Others excell in the skill of Arts and Tongues, I am a ſilly ignorant; And why ſhould not I? Oh foole, theſe that thou talkeſt of, are gifts, and therefore freely beſtowed where it pleaſes the giver; What doth he owe to thee, that hath given theſe things to others? Withall, know, there are diverſities of gifts; God hath perhaps denied thee heapes of red and white earth, but hee hath given thee ſtrength of body; At how high a rate would the great ones of the world buy that bleſſing of thine? He hath denied thee eloquence, hee hath yet given thee ſharpneſſe of wit; he hath denied thee honour, but he hath given thee ſweet reſt, quiet ſecurity; he hath denied thee preferment, he hath not denied thee health. Goe then, and envie the great mans weake ſtomach, ſleepleſſe nights, racks of cares; envie, to him, if thou canſt, the ſlipperie ſtaires of the Court, and the common envie of the moſt; He wants ſomething which thou enjoyeſt, and ſomething he hath which is denied thee; He had rather make choice of thy condition, thou of his; Each of you hath his owne, neither of you ſhall have all; neither ſhall have both; There are diverſities of gifts.

Yea, and we new-blowne bladders, how eaſily are we puft up with every blaſt of gifts; I am not like other men; How baſe are the vulger of men? I ſite glorioufly impurpled, other fellowes may be glad to licke the duſt of my footſtoole; I am inriched with all liberall ſciences, this people which know not the Law, are accurſed; I have skill of tongues, others are rude Idiots; I leade the amazed hearers by the eares whither I liſt, through the power of my oratory, others freeze and languiſh in their Pulpits. Heare, O thou proud man; Theſe things whereof thou braggeſt, are not thine owne; what haſt thou that thou haſt not received? All theſe are gifts; And art thou thus happy alone? Vaine boaſter, thou knoweſt not others, thou Knoweſt not thy ſelfe; There are diverſities of gifts which thy thoughts reach not unto: Sit thou aloft, and cheare thy ſelfe with the bowed knees of thy ſuppliants, they are happier men than thy ſelfe that are glade to lie cloſe, and affect a quiet and ſafe obſcurity: Be thou more learned than another, that other perhaps is wiſer than thou; be thou more eloquent than another man, that other is perhaps more juditious; If thy tongue be richer than anothers, his minde is richer than thine.

It is reported, that in the houſe of worthy M. Luther was found written: Res & verba Philippus, Res ſine verbis Lutherus, Verba ſine re Eraſmus; Melancton was words and matter; Luther, matter without words; Eraſmus, words without matter; Every one hath his owne ſhare; Neither art thou furniſhed with all gifts; nor that other with none; Let not him envie thee; neither doe thou contemne him; Rather both, apply your ſelves to caſt in the ſhot of your contributions to the publique good: For to what end hath our bountifull God ſhowred downe theſe divers kinds of gifts from heaven upon man, but that he might hereby provide for the common profit & welfare of mankind?

Why hath the blinde man legges, and the lame man eyes, but that the one may exchange with the other, for the benefit of both? Thinkeſt thou that God meant to heape his gifts upon thee for thine owne ſake onely? Fie on this ſhamfull ſelfe-love; Surely he that made thee, made thee for a conduit-pipe to convay, not a Ciſterne to hold the water of his graces. God hath clothed you, (as ye well know, Reverend Prelats) with this ſacred purple, that you ſhould ſhine before others as conſpicuous Guides of that ſtrait and hard way of life; and that by your well-beſtowed honours you ſhould credit his Church, and be the ſervants of many.

Ye perceive now, I imagine, how unexpectedly my ſpeech is glided from Gifts to Miniſteries; The Author of theſe Gifts, the ſpirit of God, leads me by S. Pauls hand; who preſently upon the mention of gifts, ſubjoynes miniſteries, and upon the mention of miniſteries, addes operations. This moſt munificent Spirit (τὸ πνεῦμα) (that with Athanaſius we may note the force of the Article) hath enabled the moſt of you, Fathers and brethren, with an eminent meaſure of gifts: With what powers of the minde, what ſingular learning, what powerfull eloquence, with how great wiſdome, with what gravitie, with what titles of honour, with what large dignities? It is a great word that I ſhall ſpeake, and yet I muſt, and will ſay it, without all, either arrogance or flattery; Stupor mundi Clerus Britannicus; The wonder of the world is the Clergie of Britaine.

A taine. So many learned Divines, ſo many eloquent Preachers ſhall in vaine be ſought elſewhere this day, in what ever region under the cope of heaven; What ſhould I reckon up thoſe great lights of our Church, not long ſince ſet; Iuels, Humfreys, Foxes, Whitgifts, Fulkes, Whitakers, Raynolds, Bilſons, Greenams, Babingtons, Eedeſes, Hollands, Playfers, Abbotſes, Perkinſes, Fields, Hookers, Overalls, Willets, Whites, Maſons? There are now of you under this very roofe, that heare me this day, in whoſe juſt praiſes I could be content to ſpend not an houre, but a life, were it not that mutuall modeſtie injoynes me ſilence: How great ſoever yee are, yee are not your owne; All theſe gifts end in ſervices. Oh let it pleaſe you to ſtir up this grace of God in you; and faithfully to imploy all theſe your gifts to the happy advancement of your miniſteries; in the practice of your life, (as in the courſe of my ſpeech) Let the Diverſities of

B gifts bee taken up with the Diverſities of miniſteries.

There are then as differences of gifts, ſo of miniſteries; And which be they? Differences in offices, and in degrees; There were Apoſtles, Prophets, Evangeliſts; There are, were, ſhall be Biſhops, Presbyters, Deacons; Theſe are more than one ranke of Miniſters; It was part of the exploded hereſie of Ærius that tooke away theſe three ſteps of the Clergie, as the Synod of Carthage calls them. Yea, and ſomewhere, Ierome himſelfe ſmarts with the laſh of this cenſure, as if perhaps hee did more ſavour of Ærius, than of Tully; Not without open wrong in both; but I may not now ſtay upon needleſſe Apologies; There is none of you, I hope, can be ſo witleſſe as to queſtion theſe diverſities of Miniſteries; Did they ever reade Hiſtories that doubt of this point? Sure, they have never ſo much as ſeene them: Turne over all the monuments of Times, and places, ſo farre as ever Chriſtendome hath ſpred it

C ſelfe, you ſhall finde nothing more evident; I will not here ſtand to abridge the Annalls of all Ages, and Regions; Looke upon the Councells; and firſt of all, the firſt and chiefe of thoſe which are ſtiled Generall, the great Councell of Nice; You ſhall there ſee three hundred and eighteene Biſhops, ſo many as Abraham had ſouldiers in the victory over the Kings, as Ambroſe wittily alludeth. But perhaps they were then but newly inſtituted, newly received in the Church; No ſuch matter; Thoſe Fathers profeſſe it to be (ἀρχαῖα ἔθη) the ancient guiſe, that the Biſhop of Alexandria ſhould be over Egypt, Libya, Pentapolis, as the Biſhop of Rome was over his Suburbicarie Churches: Doe but heare Polycrates Biſhop of Epheſus, an old man of above threeſcore, ſolemnly proteſting that he ſucceeded his Grand-fathers, and great-grand-fathers, for ſeven ſucceſſive generations, in the ſame Epiſcopall chaire. Heare but Irenæus, Tertullian, Clement, Dorotheus, Euſebius, deſcribing and recording the Biſhops of Antioch, Alexandria, Hieruſalem, Rome, in the undoubted order of their ſucceſſions, not one-

D ly by their numbers, but by their names alſo. Certainly, never day lookt forth ſince the age of the Apoſtles, wherein the Spouſe of Chriſt wanted the attendance of theſe Bride-men: But what doe I urge this? The Sun is in the heaven, and ſhines there: Even Ierome himſelfe, though but a Presbyter, and a ſtout Champion of his owne order, yet deduceth this difference of degrees from the cradle of the firſt Schiſme, from the common decree of the firſt Church, from tradition Apoſtolicall; yea, when Saint Paul wrote this to his Corinthians, that jarring word had ſounded in the Church, I am Pauls, I am Apollos, I am Cephas, and therefore even then had theſe differences beene.

Differences perhaps in Order, you will ſay, not in Degree; Yes, both in Order, and in Power, too; There were thoſe whom S. Paul calls (ἡγουμένους καὶ ἡγεμόνας) Preſidents and Rulers; I whom Ignatius cals (κρείττονας) Governours; Dionyſius, Hierarchs; Cyprian, Overſeers; to whom Saint Paul attributes Power of reformation and correction;

E to whom the Canons of the Apoſtles give the power of ſentence or conſtitution; Ignatius, chiefety and authority; Euſebius, out of Egeſippus, the throne of Epiſcopalitie; Cyprian, the vigor and authority of the chaire; Origen, the higheſt pitch of the Church; Ierome, a peereleſſe and eminent power; The Councell of Sardis, the height of government; and laſtly, Epiphanius an order generative of Fathers. But what doe I gleaning after the harveſt of ſo great Authors as have diſcuſſed this point?

ἐπιδόσεως γενόμενα, ἀρχὴ καὶ ἐξουσία.

Oh how oft, and with what deepe ſighes hath this moſt flouriſhing and happy

Church

Church of England wisht, that she might with some of her owne blood have purchased unto her deerest Sisters abroad, the retention of this most ancient, and every way best forme of government; Which might happily also have taken place, if they had met with such a Monarchicall reformation, as (through the blessing of God) was designed unto us; Now they are faine to undergoe that administration, Provisionally onely (if we may beleeve wise and learned Fregevil) which the necessity of their condition doth for the time cast upon them: The God of heaven raise them up Queenes for their nurses, and Kings for their nursing-fathers, that they may once enjoy with us this happy blessing of the sequence and subordination of degrees; in the meane time I dare with Ignatius professe to put my soule (ἀντίψυχον &c.) in pawne for the safe observation of this excellent order; Which, if it have ever not happily succeeded to any region, or Church, it is the fault of the person, not of the institution it selfe, which cannot justly be deemed other, than wholsome, holy, divine. A B

But remember, I beseech you, in the meane while, (Reverend Fathers) that these are (διακονίαι) ministeries; a word raked out of the very dust, lest it should not imply humility enough; Yee are graced with Honours by the pious munificence of Princes; But our Lord Jesus Christ (ye know) uses to measure your honours by your services; Ye are Fathers of the Church, but Sons of the Bride-chamber; Peeres of the state, but servants of the Church; Generalls of this warfare, but with S. Paul, fellow-souldiers; Rulers in Gods house, but withall, fellow-servants: Intreat your Clergie kindly, use them familiarly, as knowing your selves to be Fathers in dignity, brethren in service; Ye know the counsell of Saint Ambrose; Let those of the Clergie, within your charge, be as limmes of your owne body: God hath called you starres and Angels; Imitate ye the Starres, which the higher they are, the lesser they are wont to appeare; Imitate ye the Angels, who though Peeres of heaven, yet are wont to approve themselves ministring spirits for the poorest of Gods Saints; No spectacle can be more odious than a proud Prelate. C

But heare mee also, O ye Laicks, take heed of contemning this sacred function: These are ministeries indeed, but glorious and honourable: To serve God, is to rule and command; And what is it even to serve you? Surely those heavenly spirits, those principalities and powers doe the very same to us continually; whom yet their love and service, hath never drawne into contempt; We beseech you brethren, that you know them which labour amongst you, and are over you in the Lord, and admonish you, and hold them deare for their works sake.

We have dispatched the Diversities of Ministeries: now followes that of Operations; God hath not ordained to himselfe idle sereices, but busie and painfull; One governs, another teaches, a third doth both teach and governe, worthy therefore of double honour, for his rule, for his labour. And he that governes, sometimes must strike with the rod, sometimes with the sword; One while hee must kindly allure, another while he must sharply punish; hee must uphold the falling, retaine the wavering, reduce the wandering; And for him that teaches, it is not onely the charge of doctrine that lies upon him, but of reproof, of correction, of instruction in righteousnesse. One while he directs with counsels, then he erects with promises; then againe he dejects with threatnings, he wounds the whole, salves the wounded, workes alwaies: The office of a Bishop is (καλὸν ἔργον) a worthy worke; Whosoever playes in this holy Chaire, shall once waile in hell: Saint Bernard said well in that famous Epistle of his, to Henricus Senonensis; Many would not so eagerly run to honours, if they could thinke them burdens; Certainly they would feare to bee crushed with this weight, neither would with so much paine and perill gape for every promotion; Thus he. But will it please you withall, to heare what that pious Censor casts in the teeth of his owne times; Sola attenditur gloria, & non pœna; Curritur in clero passim, &c. The dignity only is cared for, not the duty; Men of all Ages, and ranks in the Clergy, learned and unlearned, run to spirituall Cures, as if they might live for ever, Sine curis, when once they have gotten Cures of soules; Doe you marke well this Prophecie (for such it might seeme) of the Oracle of Clarevall? D E

Would

A Would to God this were not the very diſeaſe of our times. There be ſome delicate peeces that thruſt themſelves into fat benefices, onely that they may make much of one; and give themſelves over to their pleaſure, and eaſe; Even of thoſe mouthes which are ſacred to God, there want not ſome, which out of a wanton cuſtome ſavour of nothing but Indian ſoot; and take more pleaſure to put forth a cloud of ſmoake, than the thundrings and lightnings of the Law: ſome negligent paſtorlings there are, which have more heed to their owne hides, than to the ſoules of their people. I ſpeake plaine truth, in a plaine faſhion, nuda nudè, as that faithfull monitor profeſſes.

Howſoever, I beſeech you, brethren, ſuffer your ſelves to be ſtirred with this poore ſpeech of mine: Even ſleeping lions are wont to be awakened with the ſting of a gnat. Are theſe the Operations, the diverſities whereof call God their Father? God indeed, B but Deum ventrem; that beaſtly deity, the belly; I tremble to adde the reſt, but I muſt; whoſe glory is their ſhame, whoſe end is damnation. Is it now time for us to play, and keepe holy-day? Behold two cruell enemies are upon us, Impietie and ſuperſtition, and doe we either ſit ſtill with our hands folded, or riſe, and in a wilfull careleſneſſe open the gates to our enemie? That ſoveraigne Maſter of ours the great Houſholder of the world, when he was to goe forth into a farre Countrey, yea rather, when he was to returne to his owne everlaſting countrey and Ours, committed to every one of us one talent at the leaſt, to ſome more; and bade us, Negotiamini dum venio; Traffique till I come; Loe he bade us Negotiari, not nepotari; To trade, not to trifle, to labour, not to deboſhe. And is this the traffique which he requires, to ſeeke our owne, to take our eaſe, to ſay nothing, to doe worſe? No, theſe are theſe uncleane napkins rather, wherein we have ſlothfully hid the Talents, which we ſhould have C improved to the gaine of our Maſter, by putting them into the hands of the Exchangers. That awfull Judge of heaven and earth will be ſure upon his returne to call us to an account; which if we muſt give for our idle words, why not alſo for our idle ſilence, as Ambroſe wittily? What ſhall wee wretched creatures then anſwer for our ſelves? Where ſhall we appeare? It is a fearefull word, O evill ſervant, but more fearefull that which followes, Bring him hither, and kill him before me; Oh then, let me intreat you, let me adjure you, brethren, by the deare reſpect to your owne ſoules, by the bowels, yea by the wounds, and precious bloud of Jeſus Chriſt, by that dreadfull Tribunall, before which we muſt all, one day, ſtand, that you carefully endevour to ſet forth and accompliſh your miniſteries with all holy operations; Preach the Word, be inſtant, in ſeaſon, out of ſeaſon, reprove, exhort with all long ſuffering and doctrine. Let every of us ſtudy to approve himſelfe unto God, a labourer that D ſhall not be aſhamed, and a right divider of the Word of Truth; Oh ſweet Word, and ſuch as in compariſon whereof the very harmony of heaven ſounds harſhly, Well done good ſervant; thou haſt beene faithfull in a little, enter into thy maſters joy. Oh let it be our onely ambition, deare brethren, that we may once heare this Word; Let us worke that which God hath commanded, and God ſhall be ſure to crowne that which we have wrought.

Yea and ye (Honored Fathers) who are this day met to conſult of the weighty affaires both of Church and Common-wealth, Work now; If ever ye have wrought heretofore, if ever ye will worke hereafter, Now worke; A large doore and effectuall is opened unto you, and many adverſaries; ye ſee how audacious Will-worſhip hath of late ſet upon us; how proudly the Tridentine faith hath advanced her creſt, and hath dared to flie fiercely in the very face of the Goſpell: The Romiſh forces put E themſelves openly into array, and have dared to ſound not an alarum onely, but (which no wiſe man knowes whether he ſhould more ſtampe at or ſcorne) a victory: They preſume to erect here amongſt us an Hierarchy emulous to yours, and in the time of your life, and health, and vigor, appoint what heires ſhall ſucceed in your Seas: What wiſe ſpectator can thinke this indignity to be endured? Is this to be ſmoothered in ſilence? Is this to be any longer winked at? Rouſe vp your ſelves, O ye holy Fathers, if there be any ardor of Piety in your breſts, and deſtroy this Tyberine Monſter, (Popery, I meane) with the breath of your mouthes: and what ever grace and authority authority yee have with our Gratious King, with the Peeres, and commons of this Realme, improve it all with your beſt prayers and counſells, to the utter extermination of Idolatry, to the happy victory, and advancement of the ſincere Truth of God. A

And thus ye ſee with how ſwift a pace I have run over theſe Operations, Miniſteries, Gifts, and the diverſities of them all; One thing onely remaines to bee duly conſidered of us; and that is, That all theſe Miniſteries, Gifts, Operations, doe flow from one and the ſame, Spirit, Lord, and God; This Trinity from an Unity; Wherein yee eaſily diſcover the Emphaſis to lie not ſo much in the Author, as in the Identity; (τῷ αὐτῷ) I ſhall not therefore in the remainder of my diſcourſe proſecute, either the wonderfull wiſdome, of abſolute perfection, or the bountifull liberality of God, but rather drive my ſpeech to the conſideration of the Unity of this gratious giver of all theſe. B

Wee ſilly men, in the height of our bounty, beſtow ſome one favour upon ſome one Subject; But this one God hath beſtowed all upon all, and upon every one, ſome: Neither may we conceive of any other, whether fountaine, or Ocean of good; And why hath our Apoſtle ſo carefully beaten upon this point; urging not ſo much the beneficence, as the unity of the Giver? Surely, as Salmeron gueſſes well, ut ſchiſmatum radices evelleret, that he might pull up the roots of ſchiſmes: For if there were divers givers, there might be ſome reaſon for every ſect to ſtand for the author of his owne gift, of his owne miniſterie; But now, that one and the ſame Spirit hath given to every one theſe divers gifts, that one and the ſame Lord hath appointed to every one theſe divers miniſteries, that one and the ſame God hath diſtributed to every one theſe divers operations; Why ſhould not all theſe gifts, miniſteries, operations unanimouſly conſpire to the glory of that one giver and founder of them all? C

Certainly, every thing here ſounds of unity: The Church is an intire body (as our Apoſtle ſpeakes ſoone after) we are members of it: One man is an eye, another, an eare, a third is a tongue; One is a palate, another an hand, another a foot; yea one is a Thumbe, another a little finger, or (if lower yet) a joint of that ſmall limme; We muſt all concurre in our deſires and endevours to the conſtitution, and maintenance of this one bodie; Whoſoever he be that doth otherwiſe, hee is juſtly found guilty, not onely of the violation of the publike weale, but of Divine Unity; And now, O ye Reverend Fathers, I finde my ſelfe entred into a pleaſing and ample common place; and ſuch a one, as wherein I could wiſh with Peter to fix the Tabernacle of my abode: Would to God your leiſure could allow you to walke along with me a while thorow theſe ſweet, and flowrie Meades of Unity, and happy conſpiration of thoughts; And yet I ſhall not ſo much bend the reſidue of my ſpeech to the praiſe of unity, (to what purpoſe were that waſte?) as to the neceſſary vindication of it from the unjuſt challenges of the enemies of peace. D

It is an heavy crime, and, of all other, the moſt hainous, wherewith we are charged by the Romaniſts, That we are fallen off from the Catholick Church, that we have rent the ſeamleſſe coat of Chriſt, yea broken his bones, and torne his very body in peeces, whereof if we were indeed guilty, how unworthy were we to breath in this aire, how moſt worthy of the loweſt Hell? But we call heaven and earth to record, how unjuſtly this calumny is caſt upon us, yea, we proteſt before God and men, that the envie of this ſo foule a crimination lights moſt juſtly upon the heads of the accuſers. May it pleaſe you, to heare a ſhort Apologue; A certaine man invited to a feaſt one or two of his friends, entertained them bountifully; They ſate together lovingly, they ate together, and were merry one with another; In the ſecond E courſe (as the cuſtome is) the Maſter offereth them wine, ſets before them an apple: now a worme had ſomewhat eaten the apple, and a ſpider by chance had fallen into the cup; The gueſt ſees and balks it; The Maſter urgeth him; Why doe you not eat, quoth he, why drinke you not? I dare not, ſaith the other, t'is not ſafe to doe either; ſeeſt thou not this vermine in the cup, and that in the apple? Tuſh, ſaith the Maſter, what ſo great matter is this? It was I that ſet this before thee; It was I that began to thee in the other; Drink it, eat it, at leaſt for my ſake. But, ſuffer me firſt (replies the

A the gueſt) to take out this ſpider, to cut out this worme; the wine, the apple likes me well enough; the ſpider, the worme I cannot away with; Away with ſuch over-nice and curious companions (quoth he againe) Fy upon thee, thou ungratefull fellow, that doſt ſo little regard my friendſhip, ſo contemne my cheere; and with that in a rage, throwes the platters and pots in the very face of his gueſt, and thruſts him out of doores all wounded. Tell me now, I beſeech you, worthy Auditors, whether of theſe violates the lawes of hoſpitality? I dare ſay, you have eaſily applied it before me; There was a time when we ſate together in a familiar manner with theſe Romaniſts, and fared well; The ſpider in the cup, The worme in the apple, what elſe be they, but ſuperſtition in their worſhip, rotten and unwholſome traditions in their faith? without theſe, the Religion pleaſeth us well: But they will needs importunately thruſt theſe upon us, and we refuſing, are therefore ſcorned, ſpit upon, beaten,
B and caſt out; Had they but giveu us leave to take out this ſpider, this worme, we had ſtill eaten, and dranke together moſt gladly: They obſtinately reſiſted, and prefer'd their owne headſtrong will to our good and ſafety; nay, they repell us with reproches, ſtrike us with their thundering Anathemaes, condemne us to the ſtakes; what ſhould we doe in this caſe? Heare, oh heavens, and hearken oh earth, and thou Almighty God, the Maker and Governor of them both, ſuffer thy ſelfe, and thy glorious ſpirits to be called to the teſtimony of our innocencie; We are compelled, we are driven away from the Communion of the Church of Rome; They forced us to goe from them, who departed firſt from themſelves.

We have willingly departed from the communion of their errors, from the Communion of the Church we have not departed; Let them renounce their erroneous doctrine, we imbrace their Church; Let them but caſt away their ſoule-ſlaying Tra-
C ditions, we will communicate with them in the right of one and the ſame Church, and remaine ſo for ever.

But, alas, I muſt be forced to complaine, and that not without extreme griefe of heart, how that it cannot be determined, whether thoſe that boaſt themſelves for Catholikes, be greater enemies to Truth, or to Charity. To Truth, in that they have of late forged new errors, and forced them upon the Church; To Charity, in that they have not ſtuck to condemne the adverſe part, and to brand them with the black marke of Hereſie. I will ſpeake (if you pleaſe) more plainly; Three maner of waies doe theſe Romaniſts offend againſt Charity. Firſt; that they will not remit any thing either of their moſt convicted opinion or vicious practice: no not for peace ſake. Secondly, that for Articles of Chriſtian faith, they put upon the Church certaine opinious of their owne, falſe, doubtfull, and uncertaine, peculiar onely to the D Schooles, which doe no whit touch the foundation of Religion. And laſtly, that if they meet with any faithfull and ſound monitors, which doe never ſo little gainſay theſe new Articles, they cruelly caſt them out of the boſome of the Church, and throw them headlong into Hell: Away with theſe ſchiſmaticks, Hereticks, Atheiſts; Iwis the Proteſtants have no Church, no faith, no ſalvation. Good Lord, what fury, what frenzy diſtempers Chriſtians; that they ſhould be ſo impotently malicious againſt thoſe, who profeſſe themſelves to be redeemed by the ranſome of the ſame moſt precious bloud? At length, At length, Oyee Chriſtians, be wiſe, and acknowledge thoſe, whom the God and Father of mercies holds worthy of his armes, yea of his bowels. Let frantick error bawle what it liſt, we are Chriſtians, we are Catholicks, the undivided members of one holy, Catholick and Apoſtolick Church; Let us meet at this barre, if you pleaſe; Let who will maintaine the plea; What is it
E which maketh a Church? What is it which maketh that Church? One, holy, Catholick, Apoſtolick? Is it not one holy Catholicke Apoſtolick faith? But which is that? Is it not the ſame which was delivered by Chriſt, and the Apoſtles, to the whole world, and was alwaies and every where approved through all Ages, even unto our times? Wherefore are the Scriptures, wherefore the Creeds, wherefore were the primitive Councells, but that there might be certaine marks, whereby Catholicks might be undoubtedly diſcerned from Hereticks? You know the Epilogue of the Athanaſian Creed, This is the Catholick Faith. If we may beleeve Leo, the heads of all hereſies are quite cut off with this one ſword of the Creed; How much more then, with that two-edged ſword of the ſcriptures, and of the Fathers their Interpreters? What then? Thoſe that then were Catholicks, can they in any age be condemned for Hereticks? No: Faith is alwaies conſtant to it ſelfe, and ſo is the Church that is built upon that Faith. Did wee ever deny or make doubt of any Article, or clauſe of that Ancient Divinity? Either then Chriſt himſelfe, the Apoſtles, Councels, Fathers, erred from the Catholick truth; or we yet remaine Catholicks. What ever other opinions we meet withall, concerning Religion, neither make nor marre it; Say they be falſe, ſay they be vicious, they are but hay and ſtubble, which nothing appertaine to the foundation of this everlaſting frame. The Church may bee either more ſound, or more corrupt for them; It cannot be more or leſſe a Church; The beauty or deformity of a Church may conſiſt in them; the ſtrength, the welfare of it doth not: Surely, whoſoever willingly ſubſcribes to the Word of God ſigned in the everlaſting monuments of ſcripture, to the ancient Creeds, to the foure Generall Councels, to the common conſent of the Fathers, for ſix hundred yeares after Chriſt, which we of the reformed Church religiouſly profeſſe to doe; if he may erre in ſmall points, yet hee cannot be an Hereticke. Some particular Church may eaſily offend by imputing hereſie to an undeſerved opinion, whether perhaps true, or lightly erroneous; but neither ſoule, nor Church can greatly erre, while it treads in the ſteps of the moſt ancient and univerſall: Muſt he therefore, of neceſſity die a Romaniſt, that would die a Catholick? This is an idle fancie, and worthy of no leſſe than Bedlam.

Give me leave (ye Reverend Fathers) The bleſſed Ghoſt of the moſt holy, and lateſt Biſhop of this See, interrupts my ſpeech, and charges me not to ſuffer his aſhes ſo ſhamefully to be wronged. I can neither be ſilent for indignation, nor ſpeake for anger: It was not onely rumor'd, but bookes were caſt abroad over the world, concerning the revolt of this worthy and excellent Prelat, reporting, that at his death, hee reconciled himſelfe to the Church of Rome, and with many ſighes, renounced the Hereſies of the Church of Enzland: and at laſt being abſolved by a Popiſh Prieſt, ſweetly ſlept in the faith of the Church of Rome; Neither did his departed ſoule want, ſomewhere (as is reported) ſuffrages and oblations of Maſſmongers in this behalfe; Oh immortall God! what blaſphemie is here? Can impudencie it ſelfe, ſo caſt off all ſhame, as to raiſe ſo ſlanderous a lie, thus boldly, againſt the credit of ſo many witneſſes, againſt the ſolemne deteſtation of their owne Prieſt, againſt the religious oathes of his neereſt friends, and domeſticke ſervants? againſt the Sermon, and publike writings of his learned Son? a ſonne well worthy of ſuch a Father? Other lies have ſome colour to plead for their credit; This (beſides boldneſſe) hath none at all. How many of us ſate by that faithfull Paſtor of ours then breathing toward his laſt, and received from his dying lips, words of moſt conſtant piety: And ſome of you (reverend Fathers) devoutly received with him, that ſacred Viaticum, the laſt bread that ever he taſted, even the bread of the Lord; and were witneſſes of the laſt motions of his ſoule, then ready to depart, and breathing toward his heaven. Ours he lived, Ours he died, and now, as ours, is crowned in heaven. Goe on now, yee miſ-zealous ſpirits; goe on to lie ſtoutly; ſomewhat will alwais ſtick faſt to the accuſers; but in the meane time, it cannot bee truth, that needs the props of lies. Onely this by the way.

Let the boldeſt Sophiſter of the Romiſh Schoole, come forth now, and if he can, for ſhame, let him undertake to prove that thoſe moſt noted additions of the Tridentine Faith, which only we reject, were received of all the Church, in all Ages, for neceſſary heads of Religion: or let him confeſſe (as he needs muſt) that we have ſtill conſtantly perſiſted in the Communion of One, Holy, Catholick Church and faith; Hee ſhall eaſily bewray his owne novelty, but never ſhall evince any Hereſie of ours. It is a golden ſaying of Cardinall Contarenus; Hearken I beſeech you, if any ingenuous ſpirit of you all, be a friend to Rome, Non opus eſt concilio, non ſyllogiſmis ad ſedandas haſce Lutheranorum turbas, &c. There needs no Councell, (ſaith he) no Syllogiſmes to allay theſe broyles of the Lutherans, but onely charity, humility, and a ſincere minde, that being void

A void of all ſelfe-love, we may be perſwaded to correct and reform thoſe things wherein we have manifeſtly tranſgreſſed. Thus he. Thou art wiſe indeed (O Contarenus) would to God thy fellowes were ſo alſo. But we (forſooth) are the diſobedient and rebellious children of our mother the Church, whoſe commands while we diſdaine to receive, and obey and reverence her decrees, we are enwrapped in a ſhamefull ſchiſme, and ſtricken with the curſes of an angry Mother. Surely this were an odious contumely. But for us; wee have not acknowledg'd her a Mother, a Siſter wee have: But grant we were Sons, yet we are no ſlaves. To forge a new faith, and imperiouſly thruſt it upon her owne, is not the part of an indulgent parent, but of a Tyrant; This lawleſſe liberty (we confeſſe) we could never endure, and therefore are wee openly thunder-ſtricken with more than one Anathema. Neither have they otherwiſe dealt with us, than that fooliſh fellow in Gerſon, who being very buſie to drive away a flie
B from his neighbours forehead, braind the man.

But lament ye with me (my brethren) the wofull caſe of that Church, that hath learned to fit her faith to the Times, and is more impatient of a remedy, than of the diſeaſe. Whilſt they ſo eagerly perſecute us, let us heartily pity them: And let us ſtill wiſh to them, (that which they envie and denie to us) Salvation; Father forgive them, for they know not what they doe.

Our prayers, our teares, our admonitions muſt not bee wanting: Returne to your ſelves now at laſt (oh ye Chriſtian ſoules) Returne, from whence you have ſenſibly declined; Recover your firſt love, your firſt works. Suffer not your ſelves any longer to be mocked with the glorious title of a Church. Frame your ſelves to that holy Unity which hitherto you have ſo ſtifly reſiſted, which if once we might live to ſee effected, you ſhould well find (as it runs in the law of the twelve Tables) that the re-
C covered ſhould with us have the ſame privileges with the healthfull. Behold we are ready (as our gracious and peaceable King Iames piouſly undertooke) to meet you halfe way.

But if they ſhall ſtill obſtinately caſt off all hope of Unity, and being ſet on fire with the hatred of peace, ſhall goe on to delight themſelves onely, in the alarum of their ſacred Trumpet (as they call it) why ſhould not wee, religiouſly and entirely keepe peace among our ſelves? I ſpeake to all the Sonnes of the purer Church whereſoever diſperſed, we profeſſe this Church of ours by Gods grace reformed: Reformed (I ſay) not new made, as ſome emulous ſpirits ſpightfully ſlander us. For me; I am ready to ſinke to the very ground, when I heare that hedge-row reproach, Where was your Religion before Luther? Where was your Church? Heare, oh ye ignorant, Heare, oh ye envious Cavillers, we deſired the reformation of an old Religion, not the formati-
D on of a new. The Church accordingly was reform'd, not new wrought. It remaines therefore the ſame Church it was before, but onely purged from ſome ſuperfluous and pernicious additaments of error. Is it a new face that was lately waſhed? a new garment that is but mended? a new houſe that is repaired? Bluſh, if yee have any ſhame, who thus ignorantly, and maliciouſly caſt this in our teeth.

Goe to now (my brethren) we are by Gods grace reformed, let us take heed leſt we be deformed againe by mutuall diſſentions; This is that which weakens, and lames us, and which laies us open to the inſulting triumphs of our Adverſaries. Yet (leſt wee ſhould ſeeme to give too much way to a ſpightfull ſlander) theſe jarres of ours are not ſo great, as our enemies either deſire, or clamour. Certainly, what diſcords ſoever hitherto have troubled us, wee are beholding to none other for them, but to theſe our kinde enemies, who upbraid us with them: For if they had but reacht forth
E unto us an helping hand in due time, and joyntly conferd their endevours (which then behooved them) for the reforming of the Church, all had runne ſquarely on; There had been no jarres, no grudgings, no parts takings: But they ſtifly refuſed and by their frowardneſſe, and pertinacie, cauſed this ſo weighty a taske to be caſt upon ſome few: and thoſe both weake, unable, and altogether unfit for ſuch a charge. It could not therfore be otherwiſe, but that the opinions of ſome ſingle men, not conferd together, in ſuch a buſineſſe, muſt needs ſomewhat differ. But thanks be to thee, O bleſſed God, the Author of peace, that haſt vouchſafed by thy ſpirit ſo to bridle the diſtemperate affections of men, that their buſie ſpirits being ſtirred up have not boyled forth into more fearefull diviſions. A

But what are theſe ſo great diſſentions, and blowes of bloudy warre, which our adverſaries ſo cry out upon? Forſooth, rather than want, they can faine names of ſects to themſelves; And where they can finde the leaſt difference in the paper of any obſcure Author of ours, preſently they cry out, new ſchiſmes, new ſects; What malice is this? what eager deſire of multiplying quarrells? If it had beene ſo of old, ſo ſmall hides had not ſerved to containe the Volumes of Auguſtine, Epiphanius, Philaſtrius: there had not beene fewer ſects, than teachers ſince the publiſhing of the Goſpell. But let us paſſe over the number, and come to the weight. Let the malicious prattle what they will; With ſome of ours, the controverſie is not about any ſolid lims of Chriſtian Faith, but onely of the very skin; with ſome others, not about the skin, but the garment rather, nor about the garment it ſelfe neither, but of B the very hem. There are certaine ſcholaſticall opinions of a middle ranke, meere Theologicall Corollaries, or perhaps ſome outward ceremonies, wherein we diſſent: Principles of Chriſtian Religion there are not. And withall theſe controverſies are but ſuch, as that when the heat whether of zeale, or anger, ſhall abate, and either part ſhall well underſtand each other, they will eaſily admit of a Reconciliation. Neither have theſe very Romaniſts leſſer quarrells amongſt themſelves; They can more hide their enmities, not exerciſe them leſſe. If they bee more wiſe, they are not more accordant. Neither is there (I dare ſay) any head of Religion, wherein they doe at once differ from us, and agree all with one another. Finally, our differences are no greater, than were thoſe of old, among the holy Fathers of the Church, whoſe quarrels notwithſtanding are not ſo odiouſly blazoned by poſterity. I let paſſe the private ſcoldings of the Ancients, not without ſome unpleaſing (I had almoſt ſaid misbeſeeming) tartneſſe. I had rather ſet before your eyes (for good lucke ſake) thoſe publique altercations of the Churches and Fathers, which afterward ſhut up in a bleſſed concord. What quarrells aroſe at the Councell of Epheſus, betweene Cyril of Alexandria, and Iohn of Antioch? The Churches under both, ſtuck not to counterthunder Anathemaes one againſt another; Thereupon Theodoret thruſt in his ſickle into this harveſt; againſt whom Cyrillus (by Evoptius inſtigation) makes as ſtrong oppoſition: Theodoret accuſeth Cyril of Apollinariſme; Cyril accuſes Theodoret of Neſtorianiſme; The flame of their rage brake out more and more, and almoſt drew the Chriſtian world to parties; ſo that afterwards when Theodoret would have entred the Councell of Chalcedon, the Egyptian, and other reverend Biſhops cryed out, Wee muſt caſt out Cyril, if we take in Theodoret: The very Canons caſt him forth: God abhors him. The like was done afterwards in the eighth Action; The Biſhops openly proclaiming, D He is an Hereticke, a Neſtorian; Away with the Heretick. But when the matter was well ſcand, and it was found that he willingly ſubſcrib'd to the Orthodox Creeds, and the Epiſtles of Leo; The whole Synod with one accord cried out, Theodoret is well worthy of a See in the Church, Let the Church receive her Orthodox Paſtor.

It is worthy of immortality, that which Gregory Nazianzen recordeth of holy Athanaſius: The Romans ſeem'd to the Eaſterne Churches to follow the hereſies of Sabellius, in denying three Hypoſtaſes; The Eaſterne likewiſe ſeemed to the Romans, to ſavour too much of Arrius, in denying three Perſons; the quarrell grew hot; Then came that great diſpenſer of ſoules, and having meekly and mildly calld forth both ſides before him, he ſo handled the buſineſſe, that granting them the free uſe of their termes, he tied them cloſe to the matter, and ſhewed them a light, whereby they might behold one another: upon this, whithout more adoe, finding themſelves, E both, in the right, they fall to mutuall embracements. Neither would it ſpeed otherwiſe with us, Brethren, (as I doe verily beleeve) if ſome Athanaſius from Heaven would but joyne our hands together.

Oh if once the gates of inteſtine and horrid warres were ſhut up, and the Religious Princes, which are the Nurſing-fathers of the reformed Churches, would command by vertue of their authority a Synod to be aſſembled (as generall as it might) wherein both parts freely and modeſtly might lay forth their opinions, and ſuch common termes

A termes might be agreed upon, as wherein both parts might freely reſt without prejudice to either: How eaſily then, how happily might theſe grievous ſtirs be quietly pacified? Let us pray for this (my Brethren) let us pray devoutly. In the meane while let us all ſweetly incline our hearts to peace, and unity. Let there be amongſt us (as S. Auguſtine to Ierome) pure brotherhood; Neither let us ſuffer our ſelves, upon every ſlight quirke of opinion, to be diſtracted, or torne aſunder. Let us forget that there were ever any ſuch (in reſpect of the devotion of a Sect) as Luther, Melanction, Calvin, Zuinglius, Arminius, or if any other mortall name, for what have we to doe with man? Let us breathe nothing, let us affect nothing, but Jeſus Chriſt.

We Divines are Pleyades, (as Gregory ſaith wittily) Let us therefore ſhine ſtill together, though not without ſome difference of place. In a Pomegranate are many graines under one rinde; You know the myſtery. Let us joyne theſe pomegranates
B to our Bels; Let us be loud, but conſorted. Les us devote for ever, with one heart, all our operations, miniſteries, gifts, to one God, the Father, Sonne, and holy Ghoſt; to one Head, Chriſt; one body, the Church; that being waſhed with one Baptiſme, ranſomed with one price, profeſſing one Faith, and holding the unity of the ſpirit in the bond of Peace, we may at laſt happily enjoy one, and the ſame Heaven, through Jeſus Chriſt our Lord: To whom with the Father, and the holy Spirit, be aſcribed all honour and glory for evermore. Amen.

TO OVR
GRATIOUS AND BLESSED MOTHER, THE Church of England;

THE MEANEST OF HER CHILDREN DEDICATES THIS HER APOLOGIE, AND WISHETH ALL PEACE AND HAPPINESSE.

NO leſſe than a yeare and a halfe is paſt (Reverend, Deare, and Holy Mother) ſince I wrote a loving monitory Letter to * two of thine unworthy Sons; which (I heard) were fled from thee in perſon, in affection, and ſomewhat in opinion: Supposing them yet thine in the maine ſubſtance, though in ſome circumſtances their owne. Since which, one of them hath waſht off thy Font-water as uncleane, and hath written deſperately both againſt Thee and his owne fellowes: From the other, I received (not two moneths ſince) a ſtomack-full Pamphlet; beſides the private injuries to the Monitor, caſting upon thine honourable Name blaſphemous imputations of Apoſtaſie, Antichriſtianiſme, Whoredome, Rebellion: Mine owne wrongs wrongs I could have contemned in silence; but, For Sions sake, I cannot hold my peace: If I remember not thee, O Jerusalem, let my tongue cleave to the roofe of my mouth. It were a shame and sinne for me, that my zeale should be lesse hot for thine innocencie, than theirs to thy false disgrace. How have I hastened therefore to let the World see thy sincere Truth, and their perverse slanders! Unto thy sacred Name then (whereto I have in all piety devoted my selfe) I humbly present this my speedie and dutifull labour: whereby I hope thy weake Sonnes may bee confirmed, the strong encouraged, the rebellious shamed: And if any shall still obstinately accurse thee, I refer their revenge unto thy Glorious Head, who hath espoused thee to himselfe, in Truth and righteousnesse: Let him whose thou art, right thee: In the meane time, we thy true sonnes shall not onely defend, but magnifie thee: Thou maist be black, but thou art comely: the Daughters have seene thee, and counted thee blessed; even the Queene, and the Concubines, and they have praised thee: thou art thy Welbeloveds, and his desire is towards thee. So let it be, and so let thine be towards him for ever; and mine towards you both, who am the least of all thy little Ones.

A COMMON APOLOGIE AGAINST THE BROWNISTS.

SECTION I.

IF Truth and Peace (Zacharies two Companions) had met in our love, this Controverſie had never bin; the ſevering of theſe two hath cauſed this ſeparation: for while ſome unquiet minds have ſought Truth without Peace, they have at once loſt Truth, Peace, Love, us and themſelves. God knowes how unwillingly I put my hand to this unkinde quarrell: Nothing ſo much abates the courage of a Chriſtian, as to call his Brother Adverſarie: We muſt doe it; woe be the men by whom this offence commeth: Yet by how much the inſultation of a brotherly enemie is more intolerable; and the griefe of our bleſſed mother greater for the wrong of her owne; So much more cauſe I ſee to breake this ſilence: If they will have the laſt words, they may not have all. For our carriage to them: They ſay, when Fire, the God of the Chaldees had devoured all the other woodden Deities, that Canopis ſet upon him a Caldron full of water, whoſe bottome was deviſed with holes ſtopt with wax; which no ſooner felt the flame, but gave way to the quenching of that furious Idoll. If the fire of inordinate zeale, conceit, contention, have conſumed all other parts in the ſeparation, and caſt forth (more than Nebuchadnezzars Furnace) from their Amſterdam hither; it were well if the waters of our moderation and reaſon could vanquiſh, yea abate it: This little Hin of mine ſhall be ſpent that way: we may try and wiſh, but not hope it: the ſpirits of theſe men are too well knowne, to admit any expectation of yeeldance. Since yet both for prevention and neceſſary defence, this task muſt be undertaken, I crave nothing of my Reader but patience and juſtice; of God, victory to the Truth: as for favour, I wiſh no more than an enemie would give againſt himſelfe: With this confidence I enter into theſe liſts, and turne my pen to an Adverſary, God knowes whether more proud or weake.

It is an hard thing even for ſober-minded men in caſes of controverſie to uſe ſoberly the advantages of the times: upon which whileſt men are mounted on high, they uſe to behold behold such as they oppose too ouerlie, and not without contempt; and so are oft-times emboldned to roule upon them as from aloft very weake and weightlesse discourses, thinking any sleight and slender opposition sufficient to oppresse those underlings, whom they have (as they suppose) at so great an advantage. Vpon this very presumption it commeth to passe, that this Author undertaketh thus solemnly and severely to censure a cause, whereof (as appeareth in the sequele of the discourse) he is utterly ignorant: which had he been but halfe so carefull to have understood, as he hath been forward to censure, he would either have beene (I doubt not) more equall towards it, or more weighty against it.

As this Epistle is come to mine hands, so I wish the answer of it may come to the hands of him that occasioned it: Intreating the Christian Reader, in the name of the Lord, unpartially to behold without either prejudice of cause, or respect of person, what is written on both sides, and so from the Court of a sound Conscience to give just judgement.

Section II.

The answerers Preamble retorted, confuted.

IT is an hard thing even for those that would seeme sober-minded men in cases of Controversie, to use soberly the frownes and disadvantages of causes and times: whereby whiles men are dejected and trodden downe, they use to behold their opposites mounted on high, too repiningly, and not without desperate envie: and so are oft-times moved to shoot up at them, as from below, the bitter arrowes of spightfull and spleenish discourses; thinking any hatefull opposition sufficiently charitable, to oppugne those adversaries, which have them (as they feele) at so great an advantage: upon this impotent maliciousnesse, it commeth to passe, that this Answerer undertaketh thus severely & peremptorily, to censure that charitable censure, of ignorance, which (as shall appeare in the sequell) he either simply or willingly understood not: and to brand a deare Church of Christ with Apostasie, Rebellion, Antichristianisme: What can be more easie than to returne accusations?

Your Preamble (with a grave bitternesse) charges me with, First, Presumption upon advantages; Secondly, weake and weightlesse discourse; Thirdly, Ignorance of the cause censured: It had beene madnesse in mee to write, if I had not presumed upon advantages; but of the cause of the truth, not of the times: Though (blessed be God) the times favour the truth, and us: if you scorne them and their favours, complaine not to be an underling: thinke that the times are wiser than to bestow their favours upon wilfull adversaries; but in spight of times, you are not more under us in estate, than in conceit above us: so we say, The Sunne is under a Cloud, wee konw it is above it. *Would God overlinesse and contempt were not yours, even to them which are mounted highest upon best desert; and now you that have not learned sobriety in just disadvantages, tax us, not to use soberly the advantages of time: there was no gall in my pen, no insultation, I wrote to you as brethren, and wisht you companions: there was more danger of flatterie in my stile, than bitternesse: wherein used I not my advantages soberly? Not in that I said too much, but not enough; Not in that I was too sharpe, but not weighty enough; My opposition was not too vehement, but too slight and slender: So, strong Champions blame their adversarie for striking too easily: you might have forborne this fault, it was my favour that I did not my worst: you are worthy of more weight, that complaine of ease. The discourse that I roll'd downe upon you, was weake and weightlesse: you shall well finde, this was my lenitie, not my impotence. The fault hereof is partly in your expectation, not in my letter: I meant but a short Epistle, you look't belike for a volume, or nothing; I meant only a generall monition; you look't for a solid prosecution of particulars: It is not for you to give taskes to others pens. By what Law, must we write nothing but large Scholasticall Discourses? Such Tomes as yours: May we not touch your sore, unlesse wee will launce and search it? I wasnot enough your enemie; forgive me this error, and you shall smart more: But not onely my omissions were of ignorance, but my censures, though severe and solemne: An easie imputation from so great a controuler: I pardon you, and take this as the common lot of enemies. I never yet could see any Scribler so

A ſo unlearned, as that he durſt not charge his oppoſite with ignorance. If Dr Whitaker Mr Perkins, Mr Gyfford, and that Oracle of our preſent times, Dr Andrewes, went away content with this livery from yours; how can I repine? If I have cenſured what cauſe I knew not, let me be cenſured for more than ignorance, impudencie: but if you know not what I cenſured (let all my truſt lye on this iſſue) take both ignorance, boldneſſe, and malice to your ſelfe: Is your cauſe ſo myſticall, that you can feare any mans ignorance? What Cobler or Spinſter hath not heard of the maine holds of Browniſme? Am I onely a ſtranger in Hieruſalem? If I know not all your opinions, pardon me: your owne have not received this illumination; I ſpeake boldly, not your ſelfe; Every day brings new conceits, and not one day teaches, but corrects another: you muſt be more conſtant to your ſelves, ere you can upbraid ignorance, or avoid it. But whether I knew your prime fancies, appeares ſufficiently by a particular diſcourſe;
B which above a yeare ſince was in the hands of ſome of your Clyents, and I wonder if not in yours: Shortly; am I ignorant? If I were obſtinate too, you might hope (with the next gale) for me, your more equall adverſary, at Amſterdam. As I am; my want of care and skill, ſhall (I hope) loſe nothing of the truth by you, nor ſuffer any of your foule aſperſions upon the face of Gods Church and ours.

But whiles we ſtrive, who ſhall be our Judge? The Chriſtian Readers: who are thoſe? Preſume not, ye more zealous and forward Countreymen, that you are admitted to this Bench: ſo farre are we meere Engliſh, from being allowed Judges of them, that they have already judged us to be no * Chriſtians; We are Goats and Swine, no ſheep of God: ſince then none but your Parlour in the Weſt, and Amſterdam, muſt be our Judges, who (I beſeech you) ſhall be our adverſaries? God be Judge betwixt you and us, and correct this your unchriſtian uncharitableneſſe.

SEP.

The crime here objected is ſeparation, a thing very odious in the eyes of all them from whom it is made: as evermore caſting upon them the imputation of evill, whereof all men are impatient: And hence it commeth to paſſe, that the Church of England can better brooke the vileſt perſons continuing communion with it, than any whomſoever ſeparating from it, though upon never ſo juſt and well grounded reaſons.

SECTION III.

D I Wrote not to * you alone: what is become of your partner, yea, your Guide? Woe is me, he hath renounced our Chriſtendome with our Church: and hath waſht off his former water, with new: and now condemnes you all, for not ſeparating further, no leſſe than wee condemne you for ſeparating ſo farre. As if you could not bee enough out of Babylon, unleſſe you be out of your ſelves. Alas, miſerable Countreymen, whither run you? Religion hath but his height, beyond which is error and madneſſe: hee tels you true, your ſtation is unſafe; either you muſt forward to him, or back to us.

I objected ſeparation to you: yet not ſo extreme as your anſwer bewrayes: a late ſeparation, not the firſt; my charity hoped you leſſe ill, than you will needs deſerve: you grant it odious, becauſe it caſts imputation of evil upon the forſaken: Of evil? yea of the worſt, an eſtate incurable & deſperate. He is an ill Phyſitian, that will leave his Patient upon every diſtemper: his departure argues the diſeaſe helpleſſe; we are but faulty, as your Land-Lord Churches, your own rules would not abide you [illegible] *Vid. E Separatiſts with the vileſt perſons. God himſelfe doth ſo: who are more vile than patrons of evill? yet no greater woe is to them that ſpeake good of evill, than thoſe that ſpeak evill of good: So wiſe Generals puniſh mutinous perſons, worſe than Robbers or Adulterers: So [a] Corah and his company (a Story cunningly turned upon us by your Martyr) for their oppoſition to [b] Moſes, were more fearfully plagued, than the Idolatrous Iſraelites. Theſe ſins are more directly againſt common ſociety, the other more perſonal: & if both have like iniquity; yet the former have both more offence, & more danger: And if not ſo, yet who cannot rather brook a lewd ſervant, than an undutifull

And yet separation from the World, and so from the men of the World, and so from the Prince of the World that reigneth in them, and so from whatsoever is contrary to God, is the first step to our communion with God, and Angels, and good men; as the first step to a ladder is to leave the earth. B

SECTION IV.

The kinds of the Separation, and which is just. ἀκκλησία.

YEt there is a commendable and happy separation from the World, from the Prince and men of the World, and whatsoever is contrary to God: who doubts it? There were no Heaven for us without this, no Church; which hath her name given by her Father and Husband, of calling out from other. Out of the Ægypt of the World doth God call his sonnes: But this separation is into the visible Church from the World; not (as yours) out of the Church, because of some particular mixtures with the World: or (if you had rather take it of profession) out of the World of Pagans and Infidels, into the visible Church; not out of the World of true (though faulty) Christians, into a purer Church. That I may here at once for all give light to this point of separation: wee find in Scripture a separation either to good, or from evill: To good; so the Levites were separated from among the children of Israel, to beare the Arke, and to minister: so the first borne, first fruits, and Cities of refuge: So Paul was (ἀφωρισμένος) separated, which some would have allude to his Pharisaisme, but hath plaine reference to Gods owne words (Acts 13. 2.) Separate mee Barnabas and Saul: Though this is rather a destination to some worthy purpose, than properly called separation. C

Num. 18. 14. Num. 16 9. Deut. 10. 1. Exod 13. 12. Levit. 15. 21. Deut. 4. 41. Rom. 1. 1. ἀφωρίσατε δη μοι Σαυλον.

From evill, whether sin or sinners: From sinne; so every soule must eschew evill, whether of doctrine or manners, and disclaime all fellowship with the unfruitfull works of darknesse, whether in himselfe or others. So S. Paul charges us to hold that which is good, and abstaine from all appearance of evill: so Ieremy is charged to separate the precious (doctrine or practice) from the vile. From sinners, not only practised by God himselfe (to omit his eternall and secret Decree, whereby the Elect are separated from the Reprobate) both in his gracious vocation, sequestring them from nature and sin, as also in his execution of judgement, whether particular, as of the Israelites from the Tabernacles of Corah; or universall and finall, of the Sheepe from the Goats; But also enjoyned from God to men, in respect either of our affection, or of our yoke, and familiar society, whereof Saint Paul: Be not unequally yoked with Infidels, Come out from among them, and separate your selves. In all this we agree: In the latitude of this last only we differ: I find you call for a double separation. A first separation in the gathering of the Church: A second in the menaging of it: The first at our entrance into the Church, the second in our continuance: The first of the Church, from Pagans and Worldlings, an initiatory profession; The second of lewd men from the Church by just censures; You speake confusedly of your owne separation; one while of both, another while of either single. For the first, either confesse it done by our Baptisme, or else you shall be forced to hold, wee must rebaptize: But of this Constitutive separation anon. For the second of sinners, whether in judgement, or life, some are more grosse, hainous, incorrigible: others lesse notorious, and more tractable: those other must be separated by just censures; not these. Which censures if they be neglected, the Church is foule, and (in your Pastors word) faulty, and therfore cals for our teares, not for our flight. Now of Churches faulty and corrupted, some raze the foundation, D E

Certainly, if you could thorowly ſeparate the World from you, you would never thus ſeparate your ſelves from us: Begin at home, ſeparate all ſelfe-love, and ſelfe-will, and uncharitableneſſe from your hearts, and you cannot but joyne with that Church, from which you have ſeparated: Your Doctor would perſwade us, you ſeparate from nothing but our corruptions: you are honeſter, and grant it from our Church: it were happy for you, if he lied not; who in the next page confutes himſelfe, ſhewing that you ſeparate from us, as Chriſt from the Samaritans, namely from the Church, not the corruptions onely; and not as hee did

The ſeparation we have made in reſpect of our knowledge, and obedience, is in deed late, and new: yet is it in the nature and cauſes thereof as ancient as the Goſpell, which was firſt founded in the enmity which God himſelfe put betwixt the ſeed of the Woman, and the ſeed of the Serpent, Gen. 3.15. which enmity hath not only beene ſucceſſively continued, but alſo viſibly manifeſted by the actuall ſeparation of all true Churches, from the world in their collection and conſtitution, before the Law, under the Law, and under the Goſpell, Gen. 4.13,14. 16. & 6. 1,2. & 7.1.7. with 1 Pet. 3.20. 12. & 12.2. D SECTION V.

YEt, if not equity, it were well you could plead age: This your ſeparation in the nature and cauſes of it (you ſay) is no leſſe ancient than the firſt inſtitution of enmity betwixt the two ſeeds: you might have gone a little higher, and have ſaid, than our firſt Parents running from God in the Garden, or their ſeparation from God by their ſinne: But we take your time, & eaſily beleeve that this your late ſeparation was founded upon that ancient enmity of the ſeed of the Serpent with the Womans. That ſubtill devil, when he ſaw the Church breath from the perſecutions of Tyrants, vexed her no leſſe with her owne diviſions; ſeeking that by fraud, which by violence he could not effect. Hence all the fearfull Schiſmes of the Church, whereof yours is part. This enmity hath not only beene ſucceſſively continued, but alſo too
E viſibly manifeſted by the actuall (but wilfull) ſeparation of Heretikes and Sectaries from the Church in all ages: But I miſtake you; yours is as ancient as the Goſpell: What? that Evangelium æternum of the Friers? whoſe name they accurſedly borrowed from Revel. 14.6. Or that Evangelium Regni of the Familiſts? Or that Evangelium aliud, wherof Saint Paul taxeth his Galatians? None of all theſe, you ſay; but as that Goſpell of Peace, of Truth, of Glory; ſo ancient, and never knowne till Bolton, Barrow, and Browne? Could it eſcape all the holy Prophets, Apoſtles, Doctors of the old, middle, and latter world, and light only upon theſe your three Patriarchs? Perhaps, Novatus or Donatus (thoſe Saints with their Schooles) had ſome little glimpſe of it; but this perfection of knowledge is but late and new: So many rich Mines have lien long unknowne, and great parts of the World have been diſcovered by late Venturers. If this courſe have come late to your knowledge and obedience, not ſo to others: For loe, it was practiſed ſucceſſively in the conſtitution and collection of all true Churches, through all times, before the Law, under the Law, after it: We have acknowledged many ſeparations: but as ſoone ſhall you find the time paſt in the preſent, as your late ſeparation, in the ancient and approved. You quote Scriptures, though (to your praiſe) more dainty indeed than your fellowes. Who cannot doe ſo? Who hath not? Even Satan himſelfe cites the word againſt him which was the word of his Father. Let us not number, but weigh your texts: The rather, for that I find theſe as your Maſter-proofes, ſet as Challengers in every of your defences: In *Gen.*4.13. Cain a bloody Fratricide is excommunicated: In *Gen.*6.1,2. The ſonnes of God maried the daughters of men: In *Gen.*7.1.& 7. Noah is approved as righteous and enters the Arke: In 1 Pet. 3. 20, 21. The reſt in Noahs time were diſobedient, and periſhed: What of all this? Alas, what mockage is this of the Reader, and Scriptures? Surely, you even joyne Scriptures, as you ſeparate your ſelves: This is right as your Paſtor, to prove all members of the viſible Church, elect and precious ſtones, cites, 1 *King.*7.9. where is ſpeech only of Salomons houſe in the Forreſt of Lebanon, his Porch for his Throne, his Hall, his Palace for Phoraohs daughter, and when he comes to deſcribe the office of his imaginary Doctor, thwacks fourteene Scriptures into the margent, whereof not any one hath any juſt colour of inference to his purpoſe: and in this diſcourſe of the power of the Church (that he might ſeeme to honour his margent with ſhew of texts) hath repeated ſix places twice over in the ſpace of ſix lines. For theſe of yours: you might object the firſt to the Cainites, not to us: Cain was caſt out worthily. Do we either deny, or utterly forbeare this cenſure? Take heed you follow him not, in your voluntary exile, to the land of Nod. The ſecond you might object to thoſe mungrell Chriſtians that match with Turkes and Pagans. There are ſonnes of God, that is, members of the viſible Church; and daughters of men which are without the bounds, meere Infidels; it is ſinne for thoſe ſons to yoke themſelves with thoſe daughters. What is this to us? Noah was righteous, the multitude diſobedient: Who denies it? yet Noah ſeparated not from the corrupted Church, till the floud ſeparated him from the earth, but continued an ancient Preacher of righteouſneſſe, even to that perverſe and rebellious generation. But it ſufficeth you, that Cain and the Giants were ſeparated from the reſt: We yeeld it: what will follow hence, ſave onely that notorious Malefactors muſt bee caſt out, and profeſſed Heathen not let into the Church? We hold and wiſh no leſſe: your places evince no more. Theſe before the Law: In *Levit.*20.24,26. God choſe out Iſrael from other people: This was Gods act, not theirs: a ſequeſtring of his Iſraelites from the Gentiles, not of Iſrael from it ſelfe: yours is your owne, and from men, in all maine points, of your owne profeſſion: But therefore Iſrael muſt be holy: If any man deny holineſſe to be required of every Chriſtian, let him feele your Maranatha. In *Neh.*9.2. The Iſraelites ſeparated themſelves from the ſtrangers, which were Infidels: whether in their marriage, or devotion: Neither Gods ſervice, nor an Iſraelites bed was for Heathens. This was not the conſtituting of a new Church, but reforming of the old; If therefore you can parallel us with Pagans, and your ſelves will be Jews, this place fits you. Laſtly, what if there be an hatred betwixt the World and Chriſts true Diſciples, *Ioh.*17.14.16? what if Peter charged his Auditors to ſave themſelves from the errors and practice of that froward Generation, whoſe hands were yet freſhly imbrewed with the bloud of Chriſt, *Act.*2.40? What if the ſame which Peter taught, Paul practiſed, in ſeparating his followers from hearing ſome obſtinate and blaſphemous Jewes, *Act.*19.9? what if the Church of Corinth were Saints by calling, 1 *Cor.*1.2? and therefore muſt be ſeparated from the yoke of infidels, 2.6.17? Are theſe your patternes? Are theſe fit matches for your brethren, baptized in the ſame water and name, profeſſing every point of the ſame true faith, uſing (for ſubſtance) the ſame worſhip with you? Hee that ſaith hee is in the light and hateth his brother, is in darkneſſe, 1 Iohn 2.9.

Which separation the Church of England neither hath made, nor doth make, but stands actually one with all that part of the World within the Kingdome, without separation: for which cause, amongst others, we have chosen by the grace of God, rather to separate our selves to the Lord from it, than with it from him, in the visible constitution of it.

Section VI.

B

But all these examples, perhaps are not so much to warrant what you have done, as to condemne the Church of England for what she hath not done: for such a separation shee neither hath made nor doth make, but stands actually one with all that part of the World within the Kingdome without separation. Loe, here the maine ground of this Schisme, which your Proto-Martyr Barrow hammers upon in every page; an ill constitution: Thus he comments upon your words: For where such prophane confuse multitudes, without any exception, separation or choice, were all of them from publike Idolatrie, at one instant received or rather compelled to be members of the Church, in some parish or other, where they inhabited, without any due calling to the faith, by the preaching of the Gospell going before, or orderly joyning together in the faith, there being no voluntary or particular confession of their owne faith and duties made or required of any, and lastly, no holy walking in the faith amongst them; who can say that these Churches consisting of this people, were ever rightly gathered or built according to the rule of Christs Testament? In his words and yours I finde both a miscollection, and a wrong charge. For the former: the want of noting one poore distinction, breeds all this confusion of Doctrine, and separation of men: for there is one case of a new Church to be called from Heathenisme to Christianity, another of a former Church to be reformed from errors, to more sincere Christianitie. In the first of these is required indeed a solemne initiation by Baptisme; and before that, a voluntary and particular confession of faith, and therefore a cleare separation, and exception of the Christian, from the infidell: In the latter, neither is new Baptisme lawfull (though some of you belike of old were in hand with a rebaptization: which not then speeding, succeedeth now to your shame) nor a new voluntarie and particular confession of Faith, besides that in baptisme (though very commendable) will ever be proved simply necessary to the being of a Church; so long as the erring parties doe actually renounce their doctrines, and in open profession embrace the truth; and (as generally in the publike confession) so particularly upon good occasion give just testimonies of their repentance: This is our case, we did not make a new Church, but mended an old: your Clifton is driven to this hold by necessitie of Argument; Otherwise he sees there is no avoiding of Anabaptisme: Mended, saith your Doctor, and yet admitted the miscelne rabble of the prophane? Say now, that such separation were not made: Let some few be holy, and the more part prophane: Shall the lewdnesse of some disanull Gods Covenant with others? This is your mercy; Gods is more: who still held Israel for his, when but few held his pure service: Let that Divine Psalmist teach you how full the Tents of Israel were of mutinous Rebels in the Desart; yet the Pillar by day and night forsooke them not; and Moses was so farre from rejecting them, that he would not endure God should reject them to his owne advantage: Looke into the blacke censures, and bitter complaints of all the Prophets, and wonder that they separated not: Looke into the increased masse of corruptions, in that declined Church; whereof the blessed eyes of our Saviour were witnesses, and marvell at his silent and sociable incuriousnesse: yea, his charge of not separating; Ye know not of what spirit you are: Now you flie to constitution, as if notorious evils were more tolerable in continuance, than in the collection of Assemblies: Sardi had but a few names that had not defiled their garments; God praises these, bids them not separate from the rest. Thyatira suffers a false propheteesse: the rest that have not this learning, yet are bidden but to hold their owne; not to separate from the Angell, which hath not separated Iezabel from the Church.

What separation the Church of England hath made. Bar. p. 1. & 55 Fol. hors. against M. H. Act. & Mon. passim.

YOur charge is no lesse injurious; that the Church of England hath made no separation: Concerning which you have learned of your Martyr, and overseers so to speake, as if before her late disclamation of popery, in Queene Elizabeths time, shee had not beene. Her monuments could have taught you better, and have lead you to her ancient Pedigree not much below the Apostolike dayes, and in many descents have shewed you not a few worthy witnesses and patrons of Truth; all which, with their holy and constant off-spring, it might have pleased you to have separated from this imputation of not separating: Will you know therefore how the Church of England hath separated? In her first conversion shee separated her selfe from Pagans: in her continuance she separated her selfe from grosse heretiques, and sealed her separation with bloud: in her reformation she separated her selfe from wilfull Papists, by her publike profession of Truth, and proclaimed hatred of error? and shee daily doth separate the notoriously evill, by suspensions, by excommunications, though not so many as yours; Besides the particular separations of many from the acknowledged corruptions, in judgement, profession, practice. All these will be avowed in spight of all contradiction: with what forehead then can you say; The whole Church of England hath not at all separated?

Trenbl. & excom. pag. 191. M. Spr. pag. 1.

After all your shifts and idle tales of constitution, you have separated from this Church against the Lord; not with the Lord, from it: If there be Christ with us, if the Spirit of God in us, if Assemblies, if calling by the word: whatsoever is, or is not else in the Constitution, there is whatsoever is required to the essence of a Church. No corruption either in gathering or continuance can destroy the truth of being, but the grace of being well: If Christ have taken away his Word and Spirit, you have justly subduced; else you have gone from him in us.

Fr. Iun. lib. de Eccles.

And when you have all done, the Separatists Idoll, visible Constitution, will prove but an appendance of an externall forme, no part of the essence of a true Church: and therefore your separation no lesse vaine than the ground, than the Authors. Lastly, if our bounty should (which it cannot) grant, that our collection was at first deeply faultie: cannot the Ratihabition (as the Lawyers speake) be drawne backe? may not an after-allowance rectifie and confirme it? In contracts (your owne similitude) a following consent justifies an act done before consent: and why not in the contract betwixt God, and his visible Church? Loe, he hath confirmed it by his gracious benedictions, and as much as may be in silence given us abundant proofes of his acceptation: That after-act, which makes your Baptisme lawfull, why can it not make our Church?

Constitution of a Church.

BUt for as much as Constitution is the very state of Brownisme, Let us (I beseech you) inquire a little into the complexion of your Constitution: Whether Physicke, or Law, or Architecture have lent you it: sure I am, it is in this use, Apocryphall: Never man used it thus scrupulously till your times: Though, what need you the helpe of Fathers or Schooles: new words must expresse new Paradoxes. It is no treason to coine termes: What then is Constitution? Your Doctor can best tell us: As the Constitution of a Common-wealth, or of a Citie, is a gathering or uniting of a people together into a civill Politie: So (saith he) the Constitution of the Common wealth of Israel, and of the City of God, the new Ierusalem, is a gathering and uniting of people into a divine Politie. The forme of which Polity, is Order: which order is requisite in all actions, and Administrations of the Church, as the Apostle sheweth, and specially in the Constitution thereof: so that next unto faith in God, it is to be esteemed most necessary for all holy societies. Hence Paul rejoyced in the Colossians Order and Faith: To this Constitution therefore, belong a people, as the matter; secondly, a calling, or gathering together, as the forme, whereof the Church consisteth. The Constitution of the Church of England is false in both: Why so? Have we not a people? Are not those people called together? To prevent this, you say our Constitution is false, not none Why false? cause

A cause those people have neither Faith, nor Order. For Faith first: Who are you that dare thus boldly breake into the closets of God, the hearts of men? and condemne them to want that, which cannot be seene by any but divine eyes? How dare you intrude thus into the Throne of your Maker? Consider, and conferre seriously: What faith is it, that is thus necessarily required to each member in this Constitution? Your owne Doctor shall define it: Faith required to the receiving in of members, is the knowledge of the Doctrine of salvation by Christ, 1 Cor. 12. 9. Gal. 3. 2. Now I beseech you in the feare of God, lay by a while all unchristian prejudice, and peremptory verdicts of those soules, which cost Christ as much blood as your owne: and tell me ingenuously, whether you dare say, that not only your Christian brethren with whom you lately conversed, but even your fore-fathers which lived under Queene Elizabeths first confused Reformation, knew not the Doctrine of salvation by Christ: if you say they did not, your rash judgement shall be punished feare-
B fully, by him whose office you usurpe. As you look to answer before him that would not breake the bruised Reed, nor quench the smoaking Flax; presume not thus, above men and Angels. If they did, then had they sufficient claime both to true Constitution and Church: But this faith must be testified by obedience; so it was. If you thinke not so, yours is not testified by love: both were weake, both were true: Weakenesse in any grace or worke, takes not away truth: Their sinnes of ignorance could no more disanull Gods Covenant with them, than multiplicity of wives with the Patriarchs.

Section IX.

C WHat wanted they then? Nothing but Order; and not all Order, but yours: Order, a thing requisite and excellent; but let the world judge whether essentiall. Consider now, I beseech you in the bowels of Christ Jesus, whether this be a matter for which heaven and earth should be mixed: whether for want of your Order, all the world must be put out of all order, and the Church out of life and being. Nothing (say wee) can bee more disorderly, than the confusion of your Democracy, or popular state (if not Anarchie:) Where all (in a sort) ordaine and excommunicate; We condemne you not for no true members of the Church: what can be more orderlesse (by your owne confessions) than the Trinune Church at Amsterdam? which yet you grant but faulty. If there be disproportion and dislocation of some parts, is it no true humane body? Will you rise from the feast, unlesse the dishes bee set on in your owne fashion? Is it no City, if there bee mud-wals halfe broken, low Cottages unequally built, no State-house? But your
D order hath more essence than you can expresse; and is the same which Politicians in their trade call (τάξιν τῆς πολεως) an incorporating into one common civill body, by a voluntary union, and that under a lawfull government: Our Church wants both: wherein there is both constraint, and false office. Take your owne resemblance and your owne asking: Say that some Tyrant (as Basilius of Russia) shall forcibly compell a certaine number of Subjects into Mosco, and shall hold them in by an awfull Garrison, forcing them to new lawes and Magistrates, perhaps hard and bloudy: They yeeld; and making the best of all, live together in a cheerefull communion, with due commerce, loving conversation, submisslive execution of the enjoyned lawes: In such case, Whether is Mosco a true City, or not? Since your Doctor cites Aristotle, let it not irke him to learne of that Philosopher, who can teach him, that when Calisthe-
E nes had driven out the Tyrant from Athens, and set up a new Government, and received many strangers, and bondmen into the Tribes, it was doubted, not which of them were Citizens, but whether they were made Citizens unjustly. If you should find a company of true Christians in utmost India, would you stand upon termes, and inquire how they became so? whiles they have what is necessary for that heavenly profession; what need your curiosity trouble it selfe with the meanes?

Quod volumus sanctum est.*

YOu see then what an idle plea constraint is in the constitution of a City, the ground of all your exception: But it is otherwise in Gods city, the Church; why then doth his Doctorship parallel these two? And why may not even constraint it selfe have place in the lawfull constitution or reformation of a Church? Did not Manasses after his comming home to God, charge and command Iuda to serve the Lord God of Israel? Did not worthy Iosiah, when he had made a covenant before the Lord, cause all that were found in Ierusalem, and Benjamin, to stand to it, and compelled all that were found in Israel, to serve the Lord their God? What have Queene Elizabeth, or King Iames done more? Or what other? did not Asa upon Obeds prophecie, gather both Iuda and Benjamin, and all the strangers from Ephraim, Manasses, and Simeon, and enact with them, that whosoever would not seeke the Lord God, should bee slaine? What meanes this perverseneſſe? You that teach wee may not stay Princes leisure to reforme, will you not allow Princes to urge others to reforme? What crime is this, that men were not suffered to bee open Idolaters, that they were forced to yeeld submission to Gods ordinances? Even your owne teach, that Magistrates may compell Infidels to heare the doctrine of the Church; and Papists, you say else-where (though too roughly) are Infidels: But you say, not to be members of the Church: Gods people are of the willing sort: True, Neither did they compell them to this: They were before entred into the visible Church by true Baptisme, though miserably corrupted: They were not now initiated, but purged: Your subtill Doctor can tell us from Bernard, that faith is to be perswaded, not to be compelled: yet let him remember that the guests must be compelled to come in, though not to eat when they are come. Compelled, not by perswasions; for these were the first invitations; therefore by further meanes; Though this conceit hath no place with us, where men are urged not to receive a new faith, but to performe the old; to abandon that wicked Idolatry which had defiled them, and to entertaine but that truth, which the very power of their Baptisme challenged at their hand: but this was the old song of the Donatists; Farre be it from our conscience, to compell any man to the faith. If God did not draw us, and by a sweet violence bend our wils to his, when should we follow him? Either you have not read, or not cared for the practice of the ancient Church, and Augustines resolution concerning the sharp penalties imposed upon the Donatists (would God none of your kindred) in his time; with his excellent defences of these proceedings.

Constitution of the Church of England. Barrow and Greenw. passim.

BUt tell us then, what should have beene done? The Gospell should have beene every where preached; All converts should have beene singled out, and have given a voluntary and particular confession of their Faith, and Repentance: I answer you: The Gospell was long and worthily preached in the dayes of King Edward; enough to yeeld both Martyrs to the stake, and Professors to the succeeding times. Were their holy Sermons, their learned writings, and their precious bloud (which was no lesse vocall) of no force? Afterwards in the beginning of Famous Queene Elizabeths reparation, what confluence was there of zealous Confessors returning now from their late exile? How painfully and divinely did they labour in this Vineyard of God? How did they (with their many holy Partners, which had shrowded themselves during that storme of persecution, in a dangerous secrecie) spread themselves over this Land, and each-where drew flockes of hearers to them, and with them? Is all this nothing to their ingratefull Posteritie? If you murmure that there were no more, take heed lest you forget there were so many: for us, we doe seriously blesse God for these, and triumph in them.

All this premised; now comes a Christian Edict from the State, that every man shall yeeld obedience to this Truth, wherin they had beene thus instructed: It was performed

A med by the most; whose submission, what was it but an actuall profession of their faith, and repentance? And since such was their face, who dares judge of their hearts? More than this, if ever can bee shewed absolutely necessary in such a State of the Church to the very constitution, and repaired being thereof, I doe here vow never to take the Church of England for my Mother.

We know, and grieve to see how scornfully your whole Sect, and amongst the rest your resolute Doctor turnes over these gracious entrances and proceedings of these two Royall and blessed Reformers; and whom should he finde to raise his scoffes upon, but that Saint-like Historian M. Fox? Now (sayes M. Fox) a new face of things began to appeare, as it were in a Stage, new Players comming in, the old thrust out: Now (saith your Doctors Comment) new Bishops came in, as players upon the old stage of the Popish Church, as if the Church were no whit altered, but the B men: Shall we say, this is too much malice, or too little wit, and conscience? Even in the Lord Protectors daies, that holy man reports, that after the Scriptures restored, and Masses abolished, greater things followed these softer beginnings, in the reformation of the Churches: Learned and godly Divines were called for from forren parts, a separation was made (though not so much willing, as wilfull) of open and manifest Adversaries from Professors, whether true or dissembled: Commissioners were appointed to visit every severall Dioceese. Every Bench of them had severall godly and learned Preachers to instruct the people in the truth, and to dissuade them from Idolatrie and Superstition. The Popes Supremacy not thrust, but taught downe: All wil-worship whatsoever, oppugned by publike Sermons: Images destroyed, Pilgrimages forbidden, the Sacraments injoyned to be reverently and holily ministred, Ecclesiasticall persons reformed in life, in Doctrine: Processions laid C downe, Presence and attendance upon Gods word commanded, the holy expending of Sabbath daies appointed, due preparation to Gods table called for, set times of teaching injoyned to Bishops, and other Ministers, all Shrines and Monuments of Idolatry required to bee utterly taken from publike and private houses: All this, before his Parliament: By that, all bloudy lawes against Gods truth were repealed, zealous Preachers encouraged, so as (saith that worthy Historian) God was much glorified, and the people in many places greatly edified. What need I goe further than this first yeere? Heare this and be ashamed, and assure your selves, that no man can ever reade those holy Monuments of the Church, but must needs spet at your separation. After that sweet and hopefull Prince, what his Renowned Sister Queene Elizabeth did, the present times doe speake, and the future shall speake, when all these Murmurers shall sleepe in the dust. The publike Disputations, zealous preachings, re- D staurations of banished Religion and men, Extirpations of Idolatry, Christian Lawes, wise and holy proceedings, and renewed covenants with God, are still fresh in the memories of some, and in the eares of all; so as all the World will justly say, you have lost shame with Truth, in denying it: Yea, to fetch the matter yet further, If the Reader shall looke back to the dayes of their puissant Father King Henry the Eighth, he cannot but acknowledge (especially during the time of Queene Anne, and before those six bloudy Articles) a true face of a Church (though over-spred with some Morphue of corruptions) and some commendable forwardnesse of Reformation: for both the Popes Supremacie was abrogated, the true Doctrine of justification commonly taught, confidence in Saints untaught, the vanity of Pardons declared, worship of Images and Pilgrimages forbidden, learned and godly Ministers required, their absences and mis-demeanors inhibited, the Scriptures translated, publikely and E privately enjoyned to be read and received, the Word of God commanded to be sincerely and carefully preached: and to all this, Holy Master Fox addeth for my conclusion, such a vigilant care was then in the King and his councell, how by all wayes and meanes to redresse Religion, to reforme errours, to correct corrupt customes, to helpe ignorance, and to reduce the mis-leading of Christs Flocke, drowned in blind Popery, Superstitious Customes, and Idolatry, to some better forme of Reformation, whereunto he provided not only these Articles, Precepts, Injunctions above specified, to informe the rude people, but also procured the Bishops to helpe forward the the ſame cauſe of decayed Doctrine, with their diligent preaching, and teaching of the people. Goe now and ſay, that ſuddenly in one day, by Queene Elizabeths Trumpet, or by the ſound of a Bell, in the name of Antichriſt, all were called to the Church: Goe, ſay with your Patriarch, that we erect Religions by Proclamations, and Parliaments.

Upon theſe premiſes I dare conclude, and doubt not to maintaine againſt all Separatiſts in the World, that England (to goe no higher) had in the dayes of King Henry the Eighth, a true viſible Church of God: and ſo by conſequent their ſucceeding ſeed was by true Baptiſme juſtly admitted into the boſome thereof; and therefore that even of them, without any further profeſſion, Gods Church was truly conſtituted. If you ſhall ſay, that the following idolatry of ſome of them in Queene Maries dayes excluded them: Conſider, how hard it will be to prove, that Gods covenant with any people, is preſently diſanulled by the ſinnes of the moſt, whether of ignorance, or weakneſſe; and if they had herein renounced God, yet that God alſo mutually renounced them. To ſhut up your conſtitution then: There is no remedy: Either you muſt goe forward to Anabaptiſme, or come backe to us. All your Rabbins cannot anſwer that charge of your rebaptized brother: If we be a true Church, you muſt returne; if we be not (as a falſe Church is no Church of God) you muſt rebaptize: If our Baptiſme be good, then is our conſtitution good. Thus your owne principles teach. The outward part of a true viſible Church is a Vow, Promiſe, Oath, or Covenant betwixt God and the Saints: Now I aske, Is this made by us in baptiſme, or no? If it be, then we have, by your confeſſion (for ſo much as is outwardly required) a true viſible Church: ſo your ſeparation is unjuſt: If it be not, then you muſt rebaptize; for the firſt Baptiſme is a nullity: and (if ours be not) you were never thereby as yet entred into any viſible Church.

To the title of a Ring-leader, wherewith it pleaſeth this Piſtler to ſtile me, I anſwer that if the thing I have done be good, it is good and commendable to have beene forward in it; if it be evill, let it be reproved by the light of Gods Word, and that God, to whom I have done that I have done, will (I doubt not) give me both to ſee, and to heale mine errour by ſpeedie repentance: if I have fled away on foot, I ſhall returne on Horſe-backe: But as I durſt never ſet foot into this way, but upon a moſt ſound and unreſiſtable conviction of conſcience by the word of God: (as I was perſwaded) ſo muſt my retiring be wrought by more ſolid reaſons from the ſame word, than are to be found in a thouſand ſuch prettie Pamphlets, and formall flouriſhes as this is.

If either, or both, or neither, If he will goe alone: Woe unto the fooliſh Prophets (ſaith the Lord) which follow their owne ſpirits, and have ſeene nothing. Howſoever, your evill ſhall be reproved by the light of Gods word: Your conjunction I cannot promiſe, your reproofe I dare; If thereupon you finde grace to ſee and heale your errours, we ſhould with all brotherly humbleneſſe attend on foot upon your returne on Horſe-backe; but if the ſway of your miſ-reſolved conſcience be headie and unreſiſtable, and your retiring hopeleſſe; theſe not ſolid reaſons, theſe pretty Pamphlets, theſe formall flouriſhes ſhall one day be fearefull and materiall evidences againſt you before that awfull Judge, which hath already ſaid, That judgements are prepared for the Scorners, and ſtripes for the backe of Fooles.

Your pitying of us and ſorrowing for us, eſpecially for the wrong done by us, were in you commendable affections, if by us juſtly occaſioned; but if your Church be deepely drencht in Apoſtaſie and you cry, Peace, Peace, when ſodaine and certaine deſolation is at hand, it is you that doe wrong, though you make the complaint: and ſo being cruell towards your ſelves, and your owne, whom you flatter, you cannot be truly pitifull towards others whom you bewaile. But I will not diſcourage you in this affection, leſt we finde few in the ſame fault: the moſt in ſtead of pity and compaſſion, affording us nothing but fury and indignation.

SECTION XIII.

B I Profeſſed to beſtow pity and ſorrow upon you and your wrong: You entertaine both harſhly, and with a churliſh repulſe: What ſhould a man doe with ſuch diſpoſitions? Let him ſtroke them on the backe, they ſnarle at him, and ſhew their teeth: Let him ſhew them a Cudgell, they fly in his face: you allow not our actions, and returne our wrong; Ours is both the injury and complaint: How can this be? You are the agents, we ſit ſtil, and ſuffer in this rent: Yet (ſince the cauſe makes the Schiſme) let us inquire, not whoſe the action is, but whoſe the deſert: Our Church is deepe drencht in Apoſtaſie; and we cry Peace, Peace: No leſſe than a whole Church at once, and that not ſprinkled, or wetſhod, but drencht in Apoſtaſie; What, did we fall off from you, or you from us? Tell me, were we ever the true Church of God? and were wee then yours? Wee cannot fall, unleſſe wee once ſtood: Was your Church before this Apoſtaſie? Shew us your Anceſtors in opinion: Name me but one that ever taught as you doe, and I vow to ſeparate: Was it not? Then wee fell not
C from you: Every Apoſtaſie of the Church muſt needs be from the true Church. A true Church, and not yours? And yet can there be but one true; See now whether in branding us with Apoſtaſie, you have not proved yours to be no true Church: Still I am ignorant: Queene Maries dayes (you ſay) had a true Church, which ſeparated from Popery, choſe them Miniſters, ſerved God holily, from thence was our Apoſtaſie: But, were not the ſame alſo (for the moſt part) Chriſtians in King Edwards dayes? Did they then, in that confuſed allowance of the Goſpell, ſeparate? Or (I pray you) were Cranmer, Latimer, Ridley, Hooper, and the reſt, parts of that Church, or no? Was there any other ordination of Miniſters than from them? Reject theſe, and all the world will hiſſe at you; Receive them, and where is our Apoſtaſie? what Antichriſtianiſme have we, wherof theſe were freed? But you leape back (if I urge you farre) from hence
D to the Apoſtles times, to fetch our once true Church from farre, that it might be deare: you ſhall not carve for us, we like not theſe bold over-leapes of ſo many Centuries: I ſpeake boldly, you dare not ſtand to the triall of any Church, ſince theirs: Now, I heare your Doctor ſay, this Challenge ſavours of Rome: Antiquity is with you, a Popiſh plea: we have willingly taken up our Adverſaries, at this (by pretence, their owne) weapon: You debar it in the conſcience of your own novell ſingularity: Yet your Paſtor can be content to make uſe of Tertullian alone againſt all Fathers; That ſuch things are juſtly to be charged with vanity, as are done without any precept, either of the Lord, or of the Apoſtles: And the Apoſtles did faithfully deliver to the Nations the Diſcipline they received of Chriſt, which we muſt beleeve to be the tumultuary Diſcipline of the refined houſefull at Amſterdam: What? all in all Ages, and places till now Apoſtates? Say if you can, that thoſe famous Churches, wherein Cyprian, Athanaſius, Ambroſe, Hierome, Auſten, Chryſoſtome, and the reſt of thoſe bleſſed
E Lights lived, were leſſe deepe in this Apoſtaſie than ours? O Apoſtaticall Fathers, that ſeparated not! yea, ſay if you dare, that other reformed Churches are not over the Ankles with us in this Apoſtaſie: What hard news is this to us, when as your Oracle dare ſay not much leſſe, of the reformed Churches of Netherlands, with whom you live? Thus he writes: For not hearing of them in other Congregations in theſe Countries; this I anſwer, That ſeeing by the mercy of God, we have ſeen and forſaken the corruptions, yet remaining in the publike miniſtration, and condition of theſe Churches, (if they be all like to theſe of this City) we cannot therefore partake with them, in such case, without declining, & Apostasie from the truth, which we have our selves already received and professed. See here, to partake with them in Gods service is Apostasie; If so in the accessories, alas, what crime is in the principall? It were but apostasie to heare an English sermon; a Dutch is no lesse: Wo is you that you dwell still in Meshech: Good men; it were not more happy for you than the Church, that you were well in Heaven. No lesse than Apostasie? Let no Reader be appalled at so fearfull a word; this is one of the termes of Art, familiar to this way: Find but any one page of a Dutch printed Volume without Apostasie, Excommunication, Commingling, Constitution, & suspect it not theirs: Heresie is not more frequent at Rome, than Apostasie at Amsterdam; nor Indulgences more ordinary there, than here Excommunications. Common use makes terrible things easie: Their owne Mr. Sl. for holding with the Dutch Baptisme, and Read-prayers, is acknowledged to be cast out for an Apostate: yea, their Doctor Master Ainsworth is noted with this marke from themselves: There is much latitude (as happie is) in their Apostasie: For when Stanshal, Mercer, and Iacob Iohnson were to be chosen Officers in their Church, and exception was taken by some at their Apostasie, answer was made, It was not such Apostasie as debarred them from Office, it was but a slip. Iohn Marke (whether, as Ischius and Theophylact thinke, the blessed Evangelist, or some other holy Minister) is by the whole Parlour at Amsterdam, branded with this lame Apostasie; who departed indeed, but from Paul in his journey, not from Christ in his faith, and therefore his (ἀποστασία) is expounded by (μὴ συνέλθουσα) Act. 15.38. why doe we thinke much to drinke of an Evangelists Cup? Yet let this ignorant Epistler teach his censorious Answerer one point of his owne (that is the Separatists) skill: and tell him that he objects two crimes to one poore Church, which are incompatible; want of Constitution, and Apostasie. Thus writes your Master of us: If it were admitted, (which can never be proved) that they sometimes had beene true established Churches. Loe here, we never had true Constitution, therefore we are not capable of Apostasie: If we once had it, and so were true Churches, heare what your Pastor saith: As Christ giveth to all true Churches their being, so we must leave it unto him to take it away, when, and as he pleaseth. And therefore since he hath not removed his Candlesticke, nor taken away his Kingdome, in spight of all objected Apostasies, wee still continue so: and by consequent your separation upon this ground is most unjust. An Apostate had wont to be the fearfull surname of damned Iulian: Tortus was an easie accuser, to whom yet, we may say with Elihu, Num dicis Regi, Apostata? Behold, now so many Apostataes as men: Holy Cyprian describes him by forsaking Christs colours, and taking up Armes for Gentilisme in life, or heresie in judgement: And Austen tells us, there cannot be a greater sinne than Apostasie; making else-where this sinner worse than the Infidell. And the old vulgar can give no worse terme to (בליעל) where he finds it, yea to (המורדים) Rebels themselves. What doth this brand to a Church, not Christian only, (though you deny it) but famous: Of whom is truly verified (after all your spleene) that which the Spirit writes to the Angell of Ephesus: Laborasti & non Defecisti: Say if you can, what Article of the Christian and Apostolike faith have we renounced? What Heresie maintaine we? Wherein have we run from the Tents of Christ? What hold we that may not stand with life in Christ, and salvation? We challenge all men and Devils in this point, for our innocence: Distinguish for starke shame, of so foule a word; or (which is better) eat it whole; and let not this blemish bee left upon your soule and name in the Records of God, and the world; that you once said of a Church too good for yours, Drencht in Apostasie. If we crie Peace, whiles you crie Apostasie; surely we flatter, whiles you raile: betwixt these two dangerous extremes, we know an wholsome meane, so to approve, that we foster not securitie: so to censure, that we neither revile, nor separate: and in one word, to doe that which your Pastor could exhort the Separators from your Separation (for even this Schisme hath Schismes) If wee should mislike, yet to rest in our differences of judgement, and notwithstanding peaceably to continue with the Church: Had you taken this course, you should neither have needed to expect our pity, nor to complaine of our cruelty. Surely, whether our love bee cruell, or not, your hatred is: whereof, take heed lest you heare

B The first action laid against us, is of unnaturalnesse and ingratitude towards our Mother the Church of England, for our causelesse separation from her: to which unjust accusation, and trivial querimony, our most just defence hath beene, and is, that to our knowledge we have done her no wrong, we doe freely, and with all thankfulnesse acknowledge every good thing shee hath, and which our selves have there received.

SECTION XIV.

INgratitude and unnaturalnesse to your Mother is objected, in that you flie from her, yea now (woe is me) that you spet in her face, and marke her for an Harlot: Would God the accusation were as far from being just, as from being triviall: Yet perhaps you intend it not in the lightnesse of this charge, but the commonnesse: you have caused me to smart for my charity, yet I forbeare it not: What is your defence? C That you have done her no wrong, to your knowledge. Modestly spoken, but doubtfully: we know your wrong, but we know not your knowledge. It is well, if your wrong be not wilfull: an ignorant wrong is both in more hope of amends, and of mercie: But is not this caution added, rather for that you thinke no hard measure can possibly be a wrong to so vile a Church? I aske, and would be denied: No, you doe freely, and with all thankfulnesse acknowledge every good thing she hath: Whatsoever you doe to us, I will not any more in favour of you, wilfully wrong my selfe: you have bidden me now to take you as a compleat Separatist: and speake this for your selfe and yours; Let the Reader now judge whether the wrong of your Sect be wilfull; and acknowledgement of our good, free and thankfull. Your first false named Martyr shall give the first witnesse of the titles of our Church: Who (saith he) D that were not drunke and intoxicate with the Whores Cup, could affirme this confuse Babel, these cages of uncleane Birds, these Prisons of foule and hatefull spirits, to be the Spouse of Christ? And else-where, he cals the people of our Church, Goats and Swine. Is this any wrong to your knowledge? The same Author: They have not (saith he) in their Churches any one thing in their practice and proceedings, not one pin, naile, or hook according to the true patterne: Do you not now freely and thankfully acknowledge our Churches good things? What is more ordinary with him, and his brother in evill, Iohn Greenwood, than to call our Ministers Baals Priests, Cainites, the marked servants of Antichrist, Sellers of the Whores wares, Worshippers of the Beast? Is this yet any wrong to your knowledge? Pastor Iohnson stickes not to say, that the Ministery and Worship of the Church of England were taken out of the Whores Cup; and plainly stiles our Church (as which of you doe not?) Daughter of the great Babylon, that mother of Whoredomes and abominations of the earth: E yet more; That Hierarchie, Worship, Constitution, and Government, which they professe and practise, being directly Antichristian, doe utterly destroy true Christianity, so as their people and Churches cannot in that estate bee judged true Christians: Doe you not now freely and thankfully acknowledge our good things? What can any Devill of Hell say worse against us than this, That wee are no Christians? Or what good can there bee in us, if no true Christianity? If wee denied every Article of the Christian Creed: if wee were Mahumetans (as your good Pastor stickes not to compare us) if the most damned Heretikes under Heaven, what could he say, but no Christians? Your Teacher and Pastor (which is a wonder) agree: For your Doctor Ainsworth makes this one head of his poysonous Counterpoyson, that Christ is not the Head, Mediator, Prophet, Priest, King of the Church of England: You, their Disciple, are not yet promoted to this height of immodesty; yet what are your good things? Yea, that your uncharitablenesse may be, above all examples, monstrous; You do not onely deny us any interest in the Church of Christ, but exclude us (what you may) from all hope and possibility of attaining the honour of Christendome: For when a godly Minister protested to Master Barrow, the truth of his Ministery; upon the approbation also of his people, he received this answer from him: Though you had such allowance, it could nothing availe, but rather overthrow your Ministery, they being as yet ungathered to Christ, and therefore neither may not in this estate chuse them a Minister, nor any exercise a Ministery unto them, without hainous sacrilege. O desperate judgement; we neither are Christians, nor can be! No Christianity without Faith, no Faith without the Ministery of the Word, no Word to us without Sacrilege: What are we, that the very offer of bringing us to God should be criminall? These are your acknowledgements of our good; who have learned of your Pastor to kisse and kill all at once; to blesse and curse with one breath: your mercies are cruell.

Section XV.

BUt who can wonder at your unnaturalnesse to the Church, that heares what measure you mete to your owne? Errour is commonly joyned with cruelty: The outragious demenors of the Circumcelliones in Augustines time, and more than barbarous tyranny of the Arrians before him, are well knowne by all Histories, and not enough by any: God forbid, that I should compare you to these. Heare rather of Novatus, the Father of a not unlike Sect, of whom Cyprian reports, that hee would neither bestow bread on his father alive, nor buriall on him dead, but suffered him both to starve and stinke in the street: and for his wife (lest he should be mercifull to any) he spurned her with his heele: and slew his owne childe in her body: What need I seeke so farre? I grieve to thinke and report, that your owne Pastor hath paralleld this cruelty: His owne brother (which is no lesse savage) though one of your Sect, is the publike accuser and condemner of him in this crime to all the world: who after a pitifull relation of his eight yeeres quarrells with him, and foure yeeres Excommunication, in his Epistle before a large Volume to this purpose, writes thus:

The unnaturalnesse of some principall Separatists. Ruffin lib. 2. Eccles. Hist. cap. 3. Aug. ep. & Possid. in vita Aug. Euseb. Hist. Eccl. Damnis gravissimis & cædibus afficiebant, armati diversis telis. *Socrat. l. 2. c. 22. & 30. Cyprian. l. 2. Epist. 8. Novati pater in vico fame mortuus, nec postea ab illo sepultus. After all these, hath not our kind, carefull, and old Father come along journey to make Peace? Hath hee not laboured with you, the Elders and the Church, to bring you to peace? Hath hee not used the helpe and counsell of the reformed Churches herein? Yet will you not bee reclaimed; but adding that sinne above all, have also monstrously excommunicated your Father the Peace-seeker, &c. And straight; How oft desired he you, (as if he had beene the sonne, and you the father) even with teares, that you would repent? In a word, how came hee and I to your doore, shewing you that it might be (upon his departing) you should see his face no more? &c. Yet you forced him by your ill dealing, still to leave upon you his Curse, and all the Curses written in Gods Booke against unthankfull and disobedient children. Thus farre a brother concerning a brother, against father and brother. Other strangely-unkinde usages of both, I had rather leave to the discovery of Master White, and this miserable Plaintife, who have written enough to make an enemie ashamed. But whereupon was all this fearefull broyle in a pure Church? For nothing but a little lace, and Whale-bone in his wives sleeve. The Trojane warre could not bee slandered with so weighty a beginning. As for your Elder, Daniel Studly (whom your Pastor so much extolleth) if Master Whites Apostasie may bee your shift against his Relation; let him speake, who should have beene a Fellow Elder with him, banished for your truth, though ejected by your censure: Marke (saith *G. IF then ſuch be the good things of our Church; What good can you acknowledge to have received from her? Nothing gives what it hath not: A Baptiſme perhaps; Alas, but no true Sacrament, you ſay: yea, the ſeale of graceleſneſſe and miſchiefe; As little are you beholden to the Church for that, as the Church to you, for your good acceptation: Why are you not baptized? You that cannot abide a falſe Church, why doe you content your ſelves with a falſe Sacrament? eſpecially, ſince our Church, being not yet gathered to Chriſt, is no Church, and therefore her baptiſme a nullity.

C What elſe doe you owe to the liberality of this ſtep-dame? You are cloſe; your Paſtor is laviſh for you both; who thus ſpeaks of himſelfe, and you, and us: I confeſſe that whiles I was Miniſter in your Church of England, I ſtood in an Antichriſtian eſtate; yet doubt I not, but even then, being of the Elect of God, I was partaker through faith, of the mercy of God in Chriſt to ſalvation: but as for you (M. Iacob and his fellow-Chriſtians) whiles you thus remaine, you cannot in that eſtate approve your ſelves to have the promiſe of ſalvation. Behold here, the Church of England gave you but an Antichriſtian eſtate; if God give ſecret mercy, what is that to her?

Bar. ſupra Fr. Iohn againſt M. Iacob p. 41. Exc. 2.

Gods ſuperabundant grace doth neither abate ought of her Antichriſtianiſme, nor move you to follow him in covering, and paſſing by the manifold enormities in our Church, wherewith thoſe good things are inſeparably commingled: Your owne
D mouth ſhall condemne you: Doth God paſſe over our enormities, and doe you ſticke, yea, ſeparate? Doth his grace cover them, and doe you diſplay them? Have you learned to be more juſt than your Maker? Or if you be not above his juſtice, why are you againſt his mercy? God hath not diſclaimed us, by your owne confeſſion; you have prevented him. If Princes leaſures may not bee ſtayed in reforming, yet ſhall not Gods in rejecting? Your ignorance enwrapped you in your errours: his infinite wiſdome ſees them, and yet his infinite mercy forbeares them: ſo might you at once have ſeene, diſliked, ſtayed; if you did not herein goe contrary to the courſes of our common God, how happy ſhould both ſides have beene? yea, how ſhould there bee no ſides? How ſhould wee bee more inſeparably commingled, than our good and evill?

But ſhould you have continued ſtill in ſinne that grace might have abounded?
E God forbid: you might have continued here without ſin, (ſave your owne) and then grace would no leſſe have abounded to you, than now your ſinne abounds in not continuing: What need you to ſurfet of another mans Trencher? Others ſinnes need no more to infect you, than your graces can ſanctifie them. As for your further light, ſuſpect it not of God: ſuſpect it to bee meere darkneſſe: and if the light in you bee darkneſſe, how great is that darkneſſe? What? ſo true and glorious a light of God, and never ſeene till now? No Worlds, Times, Churches, Patriarchs, Prophets, Apoſtles, Martyrs, Fathers, Doctors, Chriſtians, ever ſaw this truth looke forth beſides you untill you? Externall light was Gods first creature, and shall this spirituall light, whereby all Churches should be discerned, come thus late? Mistrust therefore your eyes, and your light: and feare Esayes woe, and the Jewes miserable disappointment: wee wait for light, but loe, it is darkneſſe: for brightneſſe, but we walke in obscurity.

But the Church of England (say you) is our Mother, and so ought not to be avoided: But say I, we must not so cleave to holy Mother Church, as we neglect our Heavenly Father, and his commandements, which we know in that estate we could not but transgresse, and that hainously, and against our consciences, not onely in the want of many Christian Ordinances, to which wee are most straightly bound both by Gods Word and our owne necessities.

SECTION XVII.

THe Church of England is your Mother, to her small comfort; she hath borne you, and repented. Alas, you have given her cause to powre out Iobs curses upon your Birth day, by your not onely forsaking but cursing her: Stand not upon her faults, which you shall never prove capitall: Not onely the best Parent might have brought forth a rebellious sonne to be stoned. What then? Doe we prefer duty to piety, and so plead for our holy Mother Church, that we neglect our Heavenly Father, yea, offend him? See what you say: it must needs be an Holy Mother that cannot be pleased without the displeasure of God: A good wife, that opposes such an husband: a good sonne that upbraids this unjustly: Therefore is she a Church, your Mother, holy, because shee bred you to God, cleaves to him, obeyes his commandements, and commands them. And so farre is shee from this desperate contradiction, that she voweth not to hold you for her sonne, unlesse you honour God as a Father. It is a wilfull slander that you could not but hainously transgresse under her: I dare take it upon my soule, that all your transgression which you should necessarily have incurred by her obedience, is nothing so hainous, as your uncharitablenesse in your censures and disobedience. Conscience is a common plea, even to those you hate: we inquire not how strong it is, but how well informed: not whether it suggest this, but whereupon. To goe against the conscience is sinne, to follow a mis-informed conscience is sinne also: If you doe not the first, we know you are faulty in the second: He that is greater than the conscience, will not take this for an excuse: But wherein should have beene this transgression; so unavoydable, hainous, against conscience? First, in the want of many ordinances, to which we are most strictly bound, both by Gods Word, and our owne necessities.

SECTION XVIII.

CAn you thinke this hangs well together? You should here want many of Gods Ordinances: why should you want them? Because you are not suffered to enjoy them: who hinders it? Superiour powers: Did ever man wilfully and hainously offend, for wanting of that which he could not have? What hath conscience to doe with that which is out of our power? Is necessity with you become a sinne, and that hainous? David is driven to lurke in the wildernesse, and forced to want the use of many divine Ordinances: It was his sorrow, not his transgression: He complaines of this, but doth he accuse himselfe of sinne? Not to desire them had beene sin, no sinne to be debarred them: Well might this be Sauls sinne, but not his. Have you not sins enow of your owne, that you must needs borrow of others? But I see your ground: You are bound to have these Ordinances; and therefore without Princes, yea against them: so it is your transgression to want them in spight of Magistrates: Gaudentius the Donatist taught you this of old; and this is one of the Hebrew Songs which Mr. Barrow sings to us in Babylon, that we care not to make Christ attend upon Princes, and to bee subject to their Lawes and Government: and his Predecessor (the root of your Sect) tels us in this sense the Kingdome of Heaven must suffer violence, and that it comes not with observation: that men may say, Loe the Parliament, or loe, the Bishops decrees: and in the same Treatise; The Lords Kingdome must wait on your

A your policy, forſooth; and his Church muſt bee framed your civill State, &c. Juſt as that Donatiſt of old, in Auguſtine, Quid vobis, &c. What have you to doe with worldly Emperours? and as that other in Optatus: Quid Imperatori cum Eccleſia? What hath the Emperour to doe with the Church? Yea, your Martyr feares not to teach us, that Gods ſervants being as yet private men, may and muſt together build his Church, though all the Princes of the world ſhould prohibit the ſame upon paine of death: Belike then you ſhould ſin hainouſly, if you ſhould not bee Rebels. The queſtion is not, whether we ſhould aske leave of Princes to be Chriſtians; but whether of Chriſtian Princes we ſhould aske leave to eſtabliſh circumſtances of Government: God muſt be ſerved though we ſuffer; our blood is well beſtowed upon our Maker: but in patience, not in violence. Private profeſſion is one thing; Publike Reformation and Injunction is another; Every man muſt doe that in the maine: none may doe this, B but they of whom God ſayes, I have ſaid, Ye are Gods: and of them, There is difference betwixt Chriſtian and Heathen Princes: If (at leaſt) all Princes were not to you Heathen: If theſe ſhould have beene altogether ſtayed for, Religion had come late: If the other ſhould not bee ſtayed for, Religion would ſoone be over-laid with confuſion: Laſtly, the body of Religion is one thing, the skirts of outward Government another: that may not depend on men to be embraced, or (with loyalty) proſecuted: theſe (upon thoſe generall rules Chriſt) both may, and do, and muſt: If you cut off but one lap of theſe with David, you ſhall bee touched: To deny this power to Gods Deputies on Earth, what is it, but ye take too much upon you, Moſes and Aaron, all the Congregation is holy: wherefore lift ye your ſelves above the Congregation of the Lord? See, if herein you come not too neere the wals of that Rome, which ye ſo abhorre and accurſe, in aſcribing ſuch power to the Church, none to Princes. Let C your Doctor tell you, whether the beſt Iſraelites in the times of Abiiah, Aſa, Iehoſaphat, Ezekiah, Ioſiah, tooke upon them to reforme without, or before, or againſt their Princes? Yea, did Nehemiah himſelfe without Artahſhat (though an Heathen King) ſet upon the walls of Gods City? Or what did Zerubbabel, and Ieſhua without Cyrus? In whoſe time Haggai and Zechariah propheſied indeed, but built not: And when contrary Letters came from above, they laid by both Trowels and Swords: They would be Jewes ſtill, they would not be Rebels for God: Had thoſe letters injoyned Swines fleſh, or Idolatry, or forbidden the uſe of the Law, thoſe which now yeelded, had ſuffered, and at once teſtified their obedience to authority, and piety to him that ſits in the aſſembly of theſe earthen gods. I urge no more: Perhaps you are more wiſe, or leſſe mutinous: you might eaſily therefore purge your conſcience from this ſinne, of wanting what you might not perforce enjoy.

D Say that your Church ſhould employ you backe to this our Babylon, for the calling out of more Proſelytes: you are intercepted, impriſoned: Shall it be ſinne in you not to heare the Propheſies at Amſterdam? The Clink is a lawfull excuſe: If your feet be bound, your conſcience is not bound. In theſe Negatives, outward force takes away both ſinne and blame, and alters them from the patient to the actor: ſo that now you ſee your ſtraight bonds (if they were ſuch) looſed by obedience, and over-ruling power.

Section XIX.

E But what [a] bonds were theſe ſtraight ones? Gods Word and your owne neceſſitie: Both ſtrong and indiſſoluble.

Where God hath bidden, God forbid that wee ſhould care for the forbiddance of men: I reverence from my ſoule (ſo doth our Church, their deare ſiſter) thoſe worthy forraine Churches which have choſen and followed thoſe formes of outward Government that are every way fitteſt for their owne condition. It is enough for your Sect to cenſure them: I touch nothing common to them with you: *While the world ſtandeth, where will it ever be ſhewed out of the Sacred Booke of God, that he hath charged, Let there be perpetuall Lay-Elders in every Congregation: Let every Aſſembly have a Paſtor and Doctor, diſtinct in their charge and offices: Let all Deciſi-

The neceſſity of their pretended ordinance.

THe firſt of theſe then, is eaſily untwiſted: your ſecond is neceſſitie: Than which what can be ſtronger? what law, or what remedy is againſt neceſſitie? What we muſt have we cannot want: Oppoſe but the publike neceſſitie to yours: your neceſſitie of having, to the publike neceſſitie of withholding: and let one of theſe neceſſities (like two nailes) drive out another: So they have done, and your owne neceſſitie (as the ſtronger) hath prevailed; for that other neceſſitie might be eluded by flight: you have ſought and found elſe-where what the neceſſitie of our lawes denied, and the neceſſitie of your conſcience required. Beware leſt unjuſtly: Sinne is as ſtrong bond to a good heart as impoſſibilitie; Chriſtians cannot doe what they ought not: contrary to the lawes of your Prince and Countrey: you have fled not only from us, but from our Communion. Either is diſobedience no ſin, or might you doe this evill, that good may come of it? But what neceſſity is this? ſimple and abſolute, or conditionall? Is there no remedie but you muſt needs have ſuch Elders, Paſtors, Doctors, Releevers, ſuch offices, ſuch executions? Can there be no Church, no Chriſtians without them? What ſhall we ſay of the families of the patriarkes, of the Jewiſh congregations under the Law, yea, of Chriſt and his Apoſtles? Either deny them to have beene viſible Churches, or ſhew us your diſtinct offices amongſt them: But as yet (you ſay) they were not: Therefore God hath had a true Church (thouſands of yeeres) without them: Therefore they are not of the eſſence of the Church: You call mee to the times ſince Chriſt: I demand then, was there not a worthy Church of God in Jeruſalem from the time of Chriſts Aſcenſion, till the election of the ſeven Deacons. Afterwards when Deacons were ordained, yet what newes is there of Elders, till Act. 11? yet that of Jeruſalem was more forward than the reſt: We will not (as you are wont) argue from Scriptures negatively: no proofe, yet much probabilitie is in S.Pauls ſilence: Hee writes to Rome, Corinth, and other Churches: thoſe his Divine letters in a ſweet Chriſtian civility ſalute even ordinary Chriſtians: And would he have utterly paſſed by all mention of theſe Church-officers, amongſt his ſo preciſe acknowledgement of leſſer titles in others, if they had beene ere this ordained? yet all theſe more than true Churches, famous ſome of them, rich, forward and exemplary. Heare then what we ſay both to you and them, our enemies both: and yet the enemies of our enemies: Firſt, wee diſclaime, and defie your Pedegree and theirs. The Church of Rome was never our Mothers Mother: Our Chriſtian faith came not from the ſeven-hilles: Neither was derived either from Auguſtine the Monke, or Pope Gregory. Britany had a worthy Church before either of them lookt into the world: It is true that the ancient Romane Church was ſiſter to ours: here was neere kindred, no dependance: And not more conſanguinitie, than (while ſhe continued faithfull) Chriſtian love: Now ſhe is gone a whoring, her chaſte ſiſter juſtly ſpitteth at her: yet even ſtill (if you diſtinguiſh, as your learned Antagoniſt hath taught you, betwixt the Church and Papacie) ſhe acknowledges her Siſterhood, though ſhe refraines her converſation: as ſhe hath many flaviſh and factious abettors of her knowne and groſſe errours (to whom we deny this title) affirming them the body, whereof Antichriſt is the head, the great Whore, and Mother of abominations; ſo againe how many thouſands hath ſhe, which retaining the foundation according to their knowledge, (as our learned Whitakers had wont to ſay of Bernard) follow Abſolom with a ſimple heart: all which to reject from Gods Church, were no better than preſumptuous cruelty. It were well for you before God and the world, if you could as eaſily waſh your hands of unnaturall impietie, and trecherouſneſſe, as we of Baſtardy and unjuſt ſequeſtration. There can be no Baſtardie, where was never any Motherhood, wee were nephewes to that Church, never ſonnes: unleſſe as Rome was the mother Citie of the world, ſo by humane inſtitution, we ſuffered our ſelves to be ranged under her Patriarchall authority, as being the moſt famous Church of the Weſt: a matter of courteſie, and pretended Order; no neceſſity, no ſpirituall obligation. As for our ſequeſtration, your mouth and theirs may be ſtopt with this Anſwer: As all corrupted Churches, ſo ſome things the Church of Rome ſtill holds aright; a true God in three perſons, true Scriptures, though with addition, a true Chriſt, though mangled with foule and erroneous conſequences; true Baptiſme, though ſhamefully deformed with rotten Traditions; and many other undeniable truths of God: ſome other things (and too many) her wicked Apoſtaſie hath deviſed and maintained abominably amiſſe; the body of her Antichriſtianiſme, groſſe errours, and (by juſt ſequell) hereſies; their Popes Supremacie, infallibilitie, Illimitation, Tranſubſtantiation, Idolatrous and ſuper-

A superstitious worship, and a thousand other of this branne: in regard of all these latter, we professe to the world a just and ancient separation from this false faith and devotion of the Romish Church; which neither you will say, nor they shall ever prove faultie: yea rather they have in all these separated from us, who still irrefragably professe to hold with the ancient, from whom they are departed. In regard of the other wee are still with them, holding and embracing with them what they hold with Christ: neither will you (I thinke) ever prove that in these we should differ. As for our communion, they have separated us by their proud and foolish excommunications: if they had not, wee would justly have begun: from their Tyrannie and Antichristianisme, from their miserable Idolatrie: but as for the body of their poore seduced Christians, which remaine amongst them upon the true foundation (as doubtlesse there are thousands of them which laugh at their Pardons, Miracles, Superstitions, and their trust in merits reposing only upon Christ) wee adhere to them in love and pitie, and have testified our affection by our bloud, ready upon any just call to doe it more; neither would feare to joyne with them in any true service of our common God: But the full discourse of this point, that honourable and learned Plesses hath so forestalled, that whatsoever I say, would seeme but borrowed. Unto his rich Treatise I referre my Reader, for full satisfaction: Would God this point were thorowly knowne, and well weighed on all parts. The neglect or ignorance whereof hath both bred and nursed your separation, and driven the weake and inconsiderate into strange extremities.

Phil Morn. du Plesses Lib. de Eccle. cap. 10.

This say we of our selves in no more Charitie than Truth: But for you; how dare you make this shamelesse comparison? Can your heart suffer your tongue to say, that there is no more difference betwixt Rome and us, than there is betwixt us and you? How many hundred errours, how many damnable heresies have we evinced with you, in that (so compounded) Church? shew us but one mis-opinion in our Church that you can prove within the ken of the foundation: Let not zeale make you impudent: Your Doctor could say (ingenuously sure) that in the Doctrines which she professeth, she is farre better and purer than the Whore Mother of Rome, and your last Martyr, yet better: If you meane (saith he) by a Church (as the most doe) that publike profession whereby men doe professe salvation to be had by the death and righteousnesse of Jesus Christ, I am free from denying any Church of Christ to be in this Land: for I know the Doctrine touching the holy Trinity, the natures and offices of the Lord Jesus, free justification by him; both the Sacraments, &c. published by her Majesties authoritie, and commanded by her lawes, to be the Lords blessed and undoubted Truths, without the knowledge and profession whereof no salvation is to be had: Thus hee with some honestie, though little sense. If therefore your will doe not stand in your light, you may well see, why wee should thus forsake their communion, and yet not you ours. Yet though their corruptions be incomparably more, we have not dared to separate so farre from them, as you have done from us for lesse: Still we hold them even a visible Church, but unsound, sicke, dying; sicke, not of a consumption onely, but of a leprosie or plague (so is the Papacie to the Church) diseases, not more deadly than infectious: If they be not rather in Sardies taking; of whom the spirit of God saith, thou hast a name that thou livest, but thou art dead; and yet in the next words bids them awake, and strengthen the things which are ready to die. And though our judgement and practice have forsaken their erroneous doctrines and service, yet our charitie (if you take that former distinction) hath not utterly forsaken and condemned their persons. This is not our coolenesse, but equalitie: your reprobation of us for them hath not more zeale than headstrong uncharitableneſſe.

And were not Luther, Zuinglius, Cranmer, Latimer, and the rest begot to the Lord in the Wombe of the Romish Church? did they not receive the knowledge of his Truth when they stood actuall members of it? whom notwithstanding afterwards they forsooke, and that justly for her fornication.

The ſeparation made by our holy Martyrs.

BUt how could you without bluſhing once name Cranmer, Latimer, and thoſe other holy Martyrs, which have beene ſo oft objected to the conviction of your Schiſme? Thoſe Saints ſo forſooke the Romiſh Church, as we have done, died witneſſes of Gods truth in that Church, from which you are ſeparated: lived, preached, governed, ſhed their bloud in the communion of the Church of England, which you diſclaime and condemne as no Church of God, as meerly Antichriſtian: Either of neceſſity they were no Martyrs, yea, no Chriſtians, or elſe your Separations and Cenſures of us are wicked. Chuſe whether you will; They were in the ſame caſe with us; we are in the ſame caſe with them; no difference but in the time: either their bloud will be upon your heads, or your owne: this Church had then the ſame conſtitution, the ſame confuſion, the ſame worſhip, the ſame miniſtery, the ſame government (which you brand with Antichriſtianiſme) ſwayed by the holy hands of theſe men of God; condemne them, or allow us. For their Separation: They found many maine errours of Doctrine in the Church of Rome (in the Papacy nothing but errors) worth dying for: ſhew us one ſuch in ours, and we will not only approve your Separation, but imitate it.

But here in the name of the Church of England, you waſh your hands of all Babyloniſh abominations, which you pretend you have forſaken, and her for them. And in this regard you ſpeak thus: The Reformation you have made of the many and waine corruptions of the Romiſh Church, we doe ingennouſly acknowledge, and doe withall embrace with you all the truths which to our knowledge you have received inſtead of them. But Rome was not built all in a day. The myſtery of iniquity did advance it ſelfe by degrees: and as the riſe was, ſo muſt the fall be. That Man of Sinne, and Lawleſſe man, muſt languiſh and die away of a conſumption, 2 Theſſ. 2. 8. And what though many of the higheſt Towers of Babel, and of the ſtrongeſt Pillars alſo be demoliſhed, and pulled downe, yet may the building ſtand ſtill, though tottering to and fro (as it doth) and only underpropped and upheld with the ſhoulder and arme of fleſh, without which in a very moment it would fall flat upon, and lie levell with the earth.

Section XXV.

What ſeparation England hath made.

THe Church of England doth not now waſh her hands of Babyloniſh abominations, but rather ſhewes they are cleane. Would God they were no more foule with your ſlander than her owne Antichriſtianiſme. Here will be found not pretences, but proofes of our forſaking Babylon; of your forſaking us, not ſo much as well-coloured pretences: You begin to be ingenuous; while you confeſſe a reformation in the Church of England: not of ſome corruptions, but many; and thoſe many not ſlight, but maine.

The gifts of Adverſaries are thankleſſe: As Ierome ſaid of his Ruffinus; ſo may we of you, that you wrong us with praiſes: This is no more praiſe than your next page gives to Antichriſt himſelfe. Leave out many, and though your commendations be more uncertaine, we ſhall accept it: ſo your indefinite propoſition ſhall ſound to us as generall, That wee have reformed the maine corruptions of the Romiſh Church: None therefore remaine upon us, but ſlight and ſuperficiall blemiſhes. So you have forſaken a Church of foule skin, but of a ſound heart; for want of beautie, not of truth.

But you ſay many, not All, that if you can picke a quarrell with one, you might reject all: yet ſhew us that one maine and ſubſtantiall errour, which we have not reformed: and you doe not more embrace thoſe truths with us which we have received, than we will condemne that falſhood which you have rejected, and embrace the truth of that Separation which you have practiſed.

The degrees whereby that ſtrumpet of Babylon got on horſeback you have learned of us, who have both learned and taught, that as Chriſt came not abruptly into the world, but with many preſages, and prefigurations, (The day was long dawning ere this Sunne aroſe) ſo his adverſary (that Antichriſt) breakes not ſuddenly upon the Church,

A Church, but comes with much preparation and long expectance: and as his rise, so his fall must be graduall, and leisurely: Why say you then, that the whole Church every where, must at once utterly fall off from that Church where that Man of Sinne sitteth? His fall depends on the fall of others, or rather their rising from under him: If neither of these must be sudden, why is your haste? But this must not be, yet ought: as there must be heresies, yet there ought not: It is one thing what God hath secretly decreed, another what must be desired of us: If we could pull that Harlot from her seat, and put her to Iezabels death, it were happy: Have we not endevoured it? What speake you of the highest Towers, and strongest pillars, or tottering remainders of Babylon? we shew you all her rooses bare, her walls razed, her vaults digged up, her monuments defaced, her Altars sacrificed to desolation: Shortly, all her buildings demolished, not a stone upon a stone, save in rude heapes, to tell that here once was Babylon: Your strife goes about to build againe that her Tower of confusion. God divides your languages: It will be well; if yet you build not more than we have reserved.

If I may be freely allowed to be a true professed Christian, what care I under whose hands? But why is our Prelacy hatefull? Actively to you, or passively from you? In that it hates you? Would God you were not more your owne enemies: Or rather because you hate it? your hatred is neither any newes, nor paine: Who or what of ours is not hatefull to you? Our Churches, Bels, Cloathes, D Sacraments, Preachings, Prayers, Singings, Catechismes, Courts, Meetings, Burials, Mariages: it is marvell that our aire infects not: and that our heaven and earth (as Optatus said of the Donatists) escape your hatred: not the forwardest of our Preachers (as you terme them) have found any other entertainment; no enemie could be more spightfull; I speake it to your shame. Rome it selfe in divers controversary discourses hath bewrayed lesse gall, than Amsterdam: the better they are to others, you professe they are the worse: yea, would to God that of Paul were not verified of you; hatefull, and hating one another: but we have learned, that of wise Christians, not the measure of hatred should be respected, but the desert: David is hated for no cause, Michaiah for a good cause: Your causes shall be examined in their places onwards. It were happy, if you hated your owne sinnes more, and peace lesse: our Prelacie would trouble you lesse, and you the Church. E diviſion of the Word, committed a charge to us; followed our Miniſtery with power, and bleſſed our labours with gracious ſucceſſe, even in the hearts of thoſe whoſe tongues are thus buſie to deny the truth of our vocation: Behold here the deviſed Office of our Miniſtery: What can you deviſe againſt this? Your Paſtor, who (as his brother writes) hopes to worke wonders by his logicall skill, hath killed us with ſeven Arguments, which he profeſſeth the quinteſſence of his owne, and Penries extractions, whereto your Doctor refers us as abſolute. I would it were not tedious, or worth a Readers labour to ſee them ſcanned. I proteſt before God and the world, I never read more groſſe ſtuffe ſo boldly and peremptorily faced out: ſo full of Tautologies and beggings of the Queſtion never to be yeelded. Let me mention the maine heads of them, and for the reſt be ſorry that I may not be endleſſe. A Certaine Arg. againſt the Miniſt. of England. Counterpoyſe.

To prove therefore that no communion may be had with the Miniſtery of the Church of England, he uſes theſe ſeven demonſtrations; First, Becauſe it is not that Miniſtery which Chriſt gave, and ſet in his Church. Secondly, Becauſe it is the Miniſtery of Antichriſts Apoſtaſie. Thirdly, Becauſe none can communicate with the Miniſtery of England, but he worſhips the beaſts image, and yeeldeth ſpirituall ſubjection to Antichriſt. Fourthly, Becauſe this Miniſtery deriveth not their power and function from Chriſt. Fiftly, Becauſe they miniſter the holy things of God by vertue of a falſe ſpirituall calling. Sixtly, Becauſe it is a ſtrange Miniſtery, not appointed by God in his word. Seventhly, Becauſe it is not from Heaven, but from Men. B

Now I beſeech thee Chriſtian Reader, judge whether that which this man was wont ſo oft to object to his brother (a crackt braine) appeare not plainely in this goodly equipage of reaſons? For what is all this, but one and the ſame thing tumbled ſeven times over? which yet with ſeven-thouſand times babbling ſhall never be the more probable. That our Miniſtery was not given and ſet in the Church by Chriſt, but Antichriſtian, what is it elſe to be from men, to be ſtrange, to be a falſe ſpirituall calling, not to be derived from Chriſt, to worſhip the image of the Beaſt? So this great challenger that hath abridged his nine arguments to ſeven, might aſwell have abridged his ſeven to one and a halfe. Here would have been as much ſubſtance, but leſſe glory: As for his maine defence: Firſt, we may not either have, or expect now in the Church that Miniſtery which Chriſt ſet: Where are our Apoſtles, Prophets, Euangeliſts? If we muſt allwayes looke for the very ſame adminiſtration of the Church which our Saviour left, why doe we not challenge theſe extraordinary functions? Doe we not rather thinke, ſince it pleaſed him to begin with thoſe Offices which ſhould not continue, that herein he purpoſely intended to teach us, that if we have the ſame heavenly buſineſſe done, we ſhould not be curious in the circumſtances of the perſons? But for thoſe ordinarie callings of Paſtors and Doctors (intended to perpetuity) with what forehead can he deny them to be in our Church? How many have we that conſcionably teach and feed, or rather feed by teaching? Call them what you pleaſe, Superintendents (that is) Biſhops, Prelates, Prieſts, Lecturers, Parſons, Vicars, &c. If they preach Chriſt truly, upon true inward abilities, upon a ſufficient (if not perfect) outward vocation: ſuch a one (let all hiſtories witneſſe) for the ſubſtance, as hath been ever in the Church ſince the Apoſtles times: they are Paſtors and Doctors allowed by Chriſt: We ſtand not upon circumſtances and appendances of the faſhions of ordination, manner of choice, attire, titles, maintenance: but if for ſubſtance theſe be not true Paſtors and Doctors, Chriſt had never any in his Church, ſince the Apoſtles left the earth. All the difficultie is in our outward calling: Let the Reader grant our grave and learned Biſhops to be but Chriſtians, and this will eaſily bee evinced lawfull, even by their rules: For, if with them every plebeian Artificer hath power to elect and ordaine by vertue of his Chriſtian profeſſion (the act of the worthieſt ſtanding for all) how can they deny this right to perſons qualified (beſides common graces) with wiſdome, learning, experience, authority? Either their Biſhoprick makes them no Chriſtians (a poſition which of all the world beſides this Sect, would be hiſſed at) or elſe their hands impoſed are thus farre (by the rules of Separatiſts) effectuall. Now your beſt courſe is (like to an Hare that runnes backe from whence ſhee was ſtarted) to flie to your firſt hold: No Church, therefore no Miniſtery: So now, not the C D E

Church

A Church hath deviſed the Miniſtery, but the Miniſtery hath deviſed the Church: I follow you not in that idle circle: Thence you have beene hunted already: But now, ſince I have given account of ours; I pray you tell me ſeriouſly, Who deviſed your Office of Miniſtery; I dare ſay, not Chriſt, not his Apoſtles, not their Succeſſors: What Church ever in the world can be produced (unleſſe in caſe of extremity for one turne) whoſe conſpiring multitude made themſelves Miniſters at pleaſure? what rule of Chriſt preſcribes it? What reformed Church ever did, or doth practiſe it? what example warrants it? where have the inferiours laid hands upon their Superiours? What congregation of Chriſtendome in all records afforded you the neceſſary patterne of an unteaching Paſtor, or an unfeeding Teacher?

It is an old policy of the faulty, to complaine firſt: Certainly, there was never Popiſh Legend a more errand device of man than ſome parts of this Miniſtery of B yours, ſo much gloried in for ſincere correſpondence to the firſt Inſtitution.

Section XXVIII.

YOur ſcornfull exception at the confuſed communion of the profane multitude, ſavours ſtrong of Phariſee, who thought it ſinne to converſe (cum terræ filiis) the baſe vulgar, and whoſe very Phylacteries did ſay, Touch me not, for I am cleaner than thou. This multitude is prophane (you ſay) and this communion confuſed: If ſome be profane, yet not all; for then could be no confuſion in the mixture; If ſome be not profane, why do you not love them as much as you hate the other? If all maine truths be taught amongſt ſome godly, ſome profane; why will you more ſhun thoſe profane, than cleave to thoſe Truths, and thoſe godly? If you have duly admoniſhed him, and deteſt and bewailed his ſin; what is another mans profaneneſſe C to you? If profaneneſſe be not puniſhed, or confuſion be tolerated, it is their ſin, whom it concerneth to redreſſe them: If the Officers ſin, muſt we run from the Church? It is a famous and pregnant proteſtation of God by Ezekiel: The righteouſnes of the righteous ſhall be upon him, and the wickednes of the wicked ſhall be upon himſelfe. And if the Fathers ſowre Grapes cannot hurt the childrens teeth, how much leſſe ſhall the neighbours? But whither will you run from this Communion of the profane? The ſame fault you finde with the Dutch and French; yea, in your owne. HOw many and grievous errors are mingled with our Truths, ſhall appeare ſufficiently in the ſequell; If any want, let it be the fault of the accuſer. It is enough for the Church of Amſterdam to have no errors. But ours are grievous: Name them, that our ſhame may be ſequell to your griefe: So many they are, and ſo grievous, that your Martyr, when he was urged to inſtance, could find none but our opinion concerning Chriſts deſcent into Hell; & except he had over-reached, not that.

Our errors intermingled with Truth.
Barr. Confer. with M. Hutchinſ. &c. and D. Andr.

Call you our Doctrines some generall truths? Look into our Confessions, Apologies, Articles, and compare them with any, with all other Churches; and if you finde a more particular, sound, Christian, absolute profession of all fundamentall truths in any Church, since Christ ascended into Heaven, renounce us as you do, and we will separate unto you: But these truths are not soundly practised: Let your Pastor teach you, that if errors of practice should be stood upon, there could be no true Church upon earth: Pull out your owne beame first: we willingly yeeld this to be one of your truths, that no truth can sanctifie error: That one heresie makes an Hereticke: but learne withall that every error doth not pollute all truths: That there is hay and stubble, which may burne, yet both the foundation stand, and the builder be saved: Such is ours at the worst, why doe you condemne where God will save? No Scripture is more worne with your Tongues and Pens, than that of the Leaven, 1 Cor. 5. 6. If you would compare Christs Leaven with Pauls, you should satisfie your selfe. Christ sayes, the Kingdome of heaven is as Leaven; Paul sayes, A grosse sinne is Leaven: Both leavens the whole lumpe: neither may be taken precisely, but in resemblance: not of equalitie (as he said well) but of quality: For notwithstanding the leaven of the Kingdome, some part you grant is unsanctified; So notwithstanding the Leaven of sin, some (which have striven against it to their utmost) are not sowred: The leavening in both places must extend onely to whom it is extended: the subjects of regeneration in the one; the partners of sin in the other: So our Saviour saith, Ye are the salt of the earth; yet too much of the earth is unseasoned: The truth of the effect must bee regarded in these speeches, not the quantity: It was enough for S. Paul to shew them by this similitude, that grosse sins where they are tolerated, have a power to infect others: whether it be (as Hierome interprets it) by ill example, or by procurement of judgements: and thereupon the incestuous must be cast out: All this tends to the excommunicating of the evill, not to the separating of the good: Did ever Paul say, If the incestuous be not cast out, separate from the Church? Shew us this, and we are yours: Else it is a shame for you that you are not ours: If Antichrist hold many truths, and we but many, we must needs be proud of your praises: We hold all his truths, and have shewed you, how we hate all his forgeries, no lesse than you hate us: Yet the mysterie of iniquitie is still spun in the Church of England; but with a finer thread: So fine, that the very eyes of your malice cannot see it; yet none of our least Lots have escaped you: Thanks be to our good God, we have the great mystery of godlinesse so fairely and happily spunne amongst us, as all, but you, blesse God with us, and for us: As soone shall yee finde Charity and Peace in your English Church, as heresie in our Church of England.

A Towers of that Babel: You aske therefore whether the Office of Archbishops, Bishops, and the rest of that ranke, were not in Queene Maries dayes, parts of that accursed Hierarchie, and members of that man of sinne. Doubtlesse they were: Who can denie it? But now (say you) they have the same Ecclesiasticall Jurisdiction continued: This is your miserable Sophistrie: Those Popish Archbishops, Bishops, and Clergie were members of Antichrist: not as Church-Governours, but as Popish; while they swore subjection to him, while they defended him, whiles they worshipt him above all that is called God, and extorted this homage from others, how could they be other but limmes of that Man of sinne? shall others therefore which defie him, resist, trample upon him, spend their lives and labours in oppugnation of him, be necessarily in the same case, because in the same roome? Let me helpe your Anabaptists with a sound Argument: The Princes, Peeres, and Magistrates of the Land in
B Queene Maries dayes were shoulders and armes of Antichrist; their calling is still the same; therefore now they are such: Your Master Smith upon no other ground, disclaimeth Infants Baptisme, crying out that this is the maine relique of Antichristianisme: But see how like a wise Master you confute your selfe: They are still members of the body, though the head (the Pope) be cut off: The head is Antichrist, therefore the body without the head is no part of Antichrist: He that is without the head Christ, is no member of Christ: so contrarily; I heare you say, the very Jurisdiction and Office is here Antichristian, not the abuse: What? in them, and not in all Bishops since, and in the Apostles times? Alas, who are you that you should oppose all Churches and times? Ignorance of Church-storie, and not distinguishing betwixt substances and appendances, personall abuses, and callings, hath led you to this errour: Yet since you have reckoned up so many Popes, let me helpe you with
C more: Was there not one in Lambeth, when Doctor Cranmer was there? One in Fulham, when Ridley was there? One in Worcester, when Latimer was there? One at Winchester, when Philpot was there? We will goe higher; Was not Hilarius at Arles, Paulinus at Nola, Primasius at Utica, Eucherius at Lyons, Cyril at Alexandria, Chrysostome at Constantinople, Augustine at Hippo, Ambrose at Millaine? What should I be infinite? Was not Cyprian at Carthage, Evodius, and after him Ignatius in Saint Iohns time at Antioch, Polycarpus at Smyrna, Philip at Cæsarea, Iames and Simeon and Cleophas at Hierusalem, and (by much consent of Antiquitie) Titus in Creet, Timothy at Ephesus, Marke at Alexandria: yea, to bee short, was there not every where in all Ages, an allowed Superioritie of Church-Governours under this title? Looke into the frequent Subscriptions of all Councels, and their Canons: Looke into the Registers of all times, and finde your selfe answered; Let Reverend * Calvin bee our Advocate: I
D would desire no other words to confute you, but his: Hee shall tell you that even in the primitive Church, the Presbyters chose one out of their number in every Citie, whom they titled their Bishop, lest dissention should arise from equality. Let Hemingius teach you that this was the practice of the purest Church: Thus it was ever; and if Princes have pleased to annex either large maintenances, or stiles of higher dignitie, and respect unto these, doe their additions annihilate them? Hath their double honour made voyd their callings? Why, more than extreme needinesse? If Aristotle would not allow a Priest to be a Tradesman, yet Paul could yeeld to homely Tent-making: if your Elders grow rich or noble, doe they cease to be, or begin to be unlawfull? But in how many Volumes hath this point beene fully discussed? I list not to gleane after their full carts.

The judgement and practice of other reformed Churches.

FRom your owne verdict you deſcend to the teſtimonies of all Reformed Churches: I bluſh to ſee ſo wilfull a ſlander fall from the pen of a Chriſtian. That all Reformed Churches renounce our prelacie as Antichriſtian, what one hath done it? Yea, what one forraine Divine of note, hath not given to our Clergie the right hand of Fellowſhip? ſo farre is it from this, that I. Alaſco was the allowed Biſhop of our firſt Reformed ſtrangers in this land; ſo far, that when your Doctor found himſelfe urged (by M. Spr.) with a cloud of witneſſes for our Church & Miniſtery, as Bucer, Martyr, Fagius, Alaſco, Calvin, Beza, Bullinger, Gualter, Simler, Zanchius, Iunius, Rollocus, and others, he had nothing to ſay for himſelfe, but, Though you come againſt us with Horſe-men and Chariots, yet we will remember the name of the Lord our God; and turnes it off with the accuſation of a Popiſh plea and reference to the practice of the Reformed: And if therfore they have ſo renounced it, becauſe their practice receives it not; Why, like a true Make-bate do you not ſay, that our Churches have ſo renounced their Government? Theſe ſiſters have learned to differ, and yet to love and reverence each other: and in theſe caſes to enjoy their owne formes, without preſcription of neceſſitie or cenſure. Let Reverend Beza be the Trumpet of all the reſt, who tells you that the Reformed Engliſh Churches continue, upheld by the authoritie of Biſhops, and Archbiſhops, that they have had men of that Ranke, both famous Martyrs, and worthy Paſtors and Doctors: and laſtly, congratulates this bleſſing to our Church: or let Hemingius tell you the judgement of the Daniſh Church: Iudicat cæteros Miniſtros, &c. It judgeth, ſaith he, that other Miniſters ſhould obey their Biſhops in all things, which make to the edification of the Church, &c. But what doe I oppoſe any to his nameleſſe All? his owne ſilence confutes him enough in my ſilence.

It ſeemes, the ſacred (ſo called) Synod aſſumeth littleleſſe unto her ſelfe in her determinations: otherwiſe, how durſt ſhee decree ſo abſolutely, as ſhe doth, touching things reputed indifferent, viz. that all men in all places muſt ſubmit unto them without exception, or limitation? Except ſhee could infallibly determine, that theſe her Ceremonies thus abſolutely impoſed, ſhould edifie all men at all times, how durſt ſhe thus impoſe them? To exact obedience in and unto them, whether they offend or offend not, whether they edifie or deſtroy, were intolerable preſumption.

Our Synods determination of things indifferent. Article 21.

THere was never a more idle and beggerly cavill than your next: your Chriſtian Reader muſt needs think you hard driven for quarrels, when you are faine to fetch the Popes infallibility, out of our Synod, whoſe flat Decree it was of old; That even generall Councels may erre, and have erred. But wherein doth our ſacred Synod aſſume this infallibility, in her determinations? Wherefore is a Synod, if not to determine? But of things reputed indifferent? What elſe are ſubject to the conſtitutions of men? Good and evill are either directly, or by neceſſarie ſequell ordred by God; theſe are above humane power: What have men to doe, if not with things indifferent? All neceſſary things are determined by God, indifferent by men from God, which are as ſo many particulars, extracts from the generals of God: Theſe things (ſaith learned Calvin) are indifferent, and in the power of the Church: Either you muſt allow the Church this, or nothing. But theſe decrees are abſolute, what lawes can be without a command? The law that tyes not is no law: No more than that (ſaith Auſtin) which ties us to evill. But for all men, and all times? How for all? For none (I hope) but our owne. And why not for them? but without exception and limitation: Doe not thus wrong our Church: our late Arch-biſhop (if it were not piacular for you to read ought of his) could have taught you in his publike writings, theſe five limitations of injoyned ceremonies: Firſt, that they be not againſt the Word of God: Secondly, that Juſtification or Remiſſion of ſins be not attributed to them: Thirdly, that the Church be not troubled with their multitude: Fourthly, that they be not decreed as neceſſarie, and not to be changed; And laſtly, that men be not ſo tied to them, but that by occaſion they may be omitted, ſo it be without offence and contempt; you

A see our limits: but your feare is in this last, contrary to his. He stands upon offence in omitting, you in using: As if it were a just offence to displease a beholder, no offence to displease and violate authority: What Law could ever bee made to offend none? Wise Cato might have taught you this, in Livie, that no Law can bee commodious to all: Those lips which preserve knowledge, must impart so much of it to their hearers, as to prevent their offence: Neither must Law-givers ever fore-see what constructions will be of their Lawes, but what ought to be: Those things which your Consistory imposes, may you keepe them if you list? Is not the willing neglect of your owne Parlour-Decrees punished with Excommunication? And now what is all this to infallibility? The sacred Synod determines these indifferent Rites, for decency and comlinesse to be used of those whom it concernes, therefore it arrogates to it selfe infallibility: A conclusion fit for a Separatist.

B You stumble at the Title of Sacred: every straw lies in your way; your Calepine could have taught you, that Houses, Castles, Religious businesses, old age it selfe, have this stile given them: and Virgil (vittaque resolvit Sacrati capitis:) no Epithete is more ordinary to Councels and Synods: The reason whereof may be fetched from that Inscription of the Elibertine Synod; of those nineteene Bishops is said: when the holy and Religious Bishops were set: How few Councels have not had this Title? To omit the late; The holy Synod of Carthage, under Anastasius: The holy and peaceable Synod at Antioch: The holy Synod of God, and Apostolicall, at Rome under Iulius. The Holy and great Synod at Nice: and not to be endlesse: The holy Synod of Laodicea (though but provinciall.) What doe these idle exceptions argue but want of greater?

Sinnes sold in our Courts.

SOme great men, when they have done ill, out-face their shame with enacting Lawes to make their sins lawfull. While you thus charge our practice, you bewray your owne: Who having separated from Gods Church, devise slanders to colour your sinne: We must be shamefull, that you may be innocent: You load our Ecclesiasticall Consistories with a shamlesse reproach: Farre be it from us to justifie any mans personall sinnes; yet it is safer sinning to the better part: Fie on these odious comparisons: sinnes as saleable as at Rome? Who knowes not that to be the Mart of all the World? Periuries, Murders, Treasons are there bought, and sold: when ever in ours? The Popes coffers can easily confute you alone: What tell you us of these? let me tell you: Mony is as fit an advocate in a Consistorie, as favour or malice:

E These, some of yours have complained of, as bitterly as you of ours: As if we liked the abuses in Courts: as if corrupt executions of wholsome Lawes must bee imputed to the Church, whose wrongs they are. No lesse hainous, nor more true is that which followeth. True Elders (not yours) should be indeed, ἀδιάπτωτοι. This wee call for as vehemently (not so tumultuously) as your selves.

G. Iohns Trouble and Excommunication at Amsterdam.

you: That Patrons present, Bishops institute, Arch-Deacons induct some, which are unable, we grant and bewaile. But that our Church-Lawes justifie them, we deny, and you slander: For our Law (if you know not) requires, that every one to be admitted to the Ministery, should understand the Articles of Religion, not only as they are compendiously set downe in the Creed, but as they are at large in our Booke of Articles, neither understand them onely, but be able to prove them sufficiently out of the Scripture, and that not in English onely, but in Latine also: This competency would prove him (for knowledge δεξιωσον: If this be not performed, blame the persons) cleere the Law. Profound Master Hooker tels you, that both Arguments from light of Nature; Lawes, and Statutes of Scripture, the Canons that are taken out of ancient Synods, the Decrees and Constitutions of sincerest times, the sentences of all antiquity, and in aword, every mans full consent and conscience, is against ignorance in them that have charge and cure of soules. And in the same booke; Did any thing more aggravate the crime of Ieroboams Apostasie, than that he chose to have his Clergie the scumme and refuse of his whole Land? Let no man spare to tell it them, they are not faithfull towards God, that burden wilfully his Church, with such swarmes of unworthy Creatures. Neither is it long, since a zealous and learned Sermon dedicated to our present Lord Archbishop by his owne Chaplaine, hath no lesse taxed this abuse, whether of insufficiencie, or negligence (though with more discretion) than can bee expected from your malicious Pen. Learne henceforth not to diffuse crimes to the innocent.

For the rest: your Baal, in our Dispensations for Pluralities, would thus plead for himselfe: First, he would bid you learne of your Doctor to distinguish of sinnes: Sin (saith hee) are either controvertible, or manifest: if controvertible or doubtfull, men ought to beare one with anothers different judgment; if they doe not, &c. they sin: such is this: if some be resolved, others doubt; and in whole Volumes plead, whether conuenience, or necessity: how could your charitie compare these with sinnes evicted? Secondly, hee would tell you that these Dispensations are intended and directed, not against the offence of God, but the danger of Humane Lawes: not securing from sinne, but from losse: But, for both these points of Non-residence and sufficiencie, if you sought not rather strife than satisfaction; his Majesties Speech in the Conference at Hampton Court, might have stayed the course of your quarrellous Pen: No reasonable mind, but would rest in that Gratious and royall determination. Lastly Why looke you not to your owne Elders at home? even your handfull hath not avoided this crime of Non-residency: What wonder is it, if our world of men have not escaped?

You are wiser; and I hope honester than thus to attempt; though that received Maxime amongst you (No Ceremony, no Bishop; no Bishop, no King) savours too strongly of that Weed. But what though you be loyall to earthly Kings and their Crownes and Kingdomes, yet if you bee Traytors and Rebels against the king of his Church Iesus Christ, and the Scepter of his kingdome, not suffering him by his Lawes and officers to reigne over you, but instead of them do stoop to Antichrist in his Offices and Ordinances: shall your loyaltie towards men, excuse your Treasons against the Lord? though you now cry never so loud, Wee have no King but Cæsar, Iohn. 19. 15. yet is there an other King, one Iesus, which shall returne and passe a heavy doome upon the rebellious, Luke 19. 27. These enemies, which would not have me reigne over them, bring them and slay them before me.

Section XXXIIII.

YOu that confesse our wisdome and honesty, must now plead for your owne: your hope is not more of us, than our feare of you. To depose Kings, and dispose Kingdomes is a proud worke: you want power, but what is your will? For Excommunication it is cleare enough: While you fully hold that every private man hath as much power in this censure, as the Pastor; and that Princes must be equally subject with them to these their censures. Let any man now devise if the Brownists could have

Our Loyalty to Princes cleered theirs questioned Bar. against Gyfford. Inconst. of Brown. pa. 13.

A a King, how that King could ſtand one day unexcommunicated? Or if this cenſure meddle onely with his ſoule, not with his Scepter: How more than credible is it, that ſome of your Aſſemblies in Queene Elizabeths dayes concluded, that ſhee was not (even in our ſence) Supreme Head of the Church, neither had authority to make Lawes Eccleſiaſticall in the Church? It is well if you will diſclaime it: But you know your received poſition; That no one Church is ſuperiour to other: No authoritie therefore can reverſe this Decree; your will may doe it: yea, what better than Rebellion appeares in your next clauſe? While you accuſe our Loyaltie to an earthly King, as treaſonable to the King of the Church, Chriſt Jeſus; If our Loyalty be a ſinne, where is yours? If we be Traytors in our obedience, what doe you make of him that commands it? Whether you would have us each man to play the Rex, and erect a new Government, or whether you would have accuſe us as Rebels to Chriſt in obeying the old: God bleſſ King Iames from ſuch Subjects. But whoſe is that ſo unfavourie weed: No Biſhop, no King? Know you whom you accuſe? let me ſhew you your Adverſarie: it is King Iames him-ſelfe in his Hampton Conference: is there not now ſuſpition in the word? ſurely you had cauſe to feare that the King would prove no good ſubject: Belike, not to Chriſt: What doe you elſe in the next but proclaime his oppoſition to the King of Kings? or ours in not oppoſing his? As if we might ſay with the Iſraelites, O Lord our God, other Lords beſides thee have ruled us: If we would admit each of your Elders so be ſo many Kings in the Church, we ſhould ſtoope under Chriſts Ordinances: Shew us your commiſſion, and let it appeare whether we be Enemies, or you Vſurpers; Alas, you both refuſe the rule of this true Deputie, and ſet up falſe: Let this fearefull doome of Chriſt light where it is moſt due: Even ſo let thine enemies periſh O Lord.

Word read or preached, why ſhould ſuch ſolemne kneeling be ſo ſeverely preſſed at that time, rather than upon the other occaſions? And well and truly have your owne men affirmed that it were farre leſſe ſinne, and appearance of an Idolatrie that is nothing ſo groſſe, to tie men in their Prayers, to kneele before a Crucifix, than before the Bread and Wine: and the reaſon followeth, for that, Papiſts commit an Idolatrie far more groſſe and odious in worſhiping the Bread, than in worſhiping any other of their Images or Idols whatſoever. Kneeling at the Sacrament of the Lords Supper.
De conſecr. d. 2. Ego Berengarius. Apol.

OUr kneeling you derive (like a good Herald) from the errour of Tranſubſtantiation: but to ſet downe the deſcent of this pedigree, will trouble you: we doe utterly denie it, and challeng your proofe. How new a fiction Tranſubſtantiation is, appeares out of Berengaries Recantation to Pope Nicolas: The error was then ſo young, it had not learned to ſpeak; ſhew us the ſame noveltie in our kneeling. Till of lat, men held not the Bread to be God; of old, they have held it ſacred: This is the geſture of reverence in our Prayer at the receit, as Maſter Burgeſſe well interpreted it, not of Idolatrous adoration of the Bread. This was moſt-what in the elevation: the aboliſhing whereof cleares us of this imputation: you know wee hate this conceit, why doe you thus force wrongs upon the innocent? Neither are we alone in this uſe: The Church of Bohemy allowes and practiſes it: and why is this error leſſe palpable in the wafers of Geneva? If the King ſhould offer us his hand to kiſſe, we take it upon our knees: how much more when the King of Heaven gives us his Sonne in theſe pledges? But if there were not ſomething more than juſt reverence, why doe we ſolemnly kneele at the Communion, not at Baptiſme? Can you finde no defference? In this (beſides that there is both a more lively and feeling ſignification of the thing repreſented) we are the parties, but in the other witneſſes: This therefore I dare boldly ſay, that if your partner M. Smith ſhould ever (which God forbid) perſwade you to rebaptize, your fitteſt geſture (or any others at full age) would be to receive that Sacramentall water, kneeling: How glad you are to take all ſcraps, that fall from any of ours for your advantage? Would to God this obſervation of your malicious gathering, would make all our reverend Brethren wary of their cenſures: Surely, no idolatry can be worſe than that Popiſh ἀτοπλαστια. The Bread, and the Crucifix ſtrive for the higher place: if we ſhould therefore be ſo tied to kneele before the Bread, as they are tied to kneele before the Crucifix, theire ſentence were juſt: They adore the Crucifix, not we the Bread: they pray to the Crucifix, not we to the Bread: they direct their devotions (at the beſt) by the Crucifix to their Saviour, we doe not ſo by the Bread, we kneele no more to the Bread, than to the Pulpit when we joyne our praiers with the Miniſters: But our quarrell is not with them; you that can approve their judgements in diſlike, might learne to follow them in approbation, and peaceable Communion with the Church: if there be a galled place, you will be ſure to light upon that. Your charity is good; whatſoever your wiſdome be.

Sep.

To let paſſe your devout kneeling unto your Ordinary when you take the Oath of Canonicall obedience, or receive abſolution at his hands, which (as the maine actions are religious) muſt needs be religious adoration, what is the adoring of your truly humane (though called Divine) Service booke in and by which you worſhip God, as the Papiſts doe by their Images? If the Lord Ieſus in his Teſtament have not commanded any ſuch Booke, it is accurſed and abominable: if you thinke he have, ſhew us the place where, that we may know it with you; or manifeſt unto us that ever the Apoſtles uſed themſelves, or commended to the Churches after them any ſuch Service booke. Was not the Lord in the Apoſtles time, and Apoſtolike Churches, purely and perfectly worſhipped, when the Officers of the Church in their miniſtration manifeſted the ſpirite of prayer which they had received according to the preſent neceſſities and occaſions of the Church before the leaſt parcell of this patchery came into the World? And might not the Lord now be alſo purely and perfectly worſhipped, though this printed image, with the painted and carved Images, were ſent backe to Rome, yea, or caſt to Hell, from whence both they and it came? Speake in your

ſelfe,

A selfe, might not the Lord be intirely worshipped with pure and holy worship, though none other Booke but the holy Scriptures were brought into the Church? If yea (as who can deny it that knowes what the worship of God meaneth) what then doth your Service booke there? The Word of God is perfect, and admitteth of none addition. Cursed be he that addeth to the Word of the Lord, and cursed be that which is added, and so be your great Idoll the Communion-booke, though like Nabuchadnezzars Image some part of the matter be Gold and Silver, which is also so much the more detestable, by how much it is the more highly advanced amongst you.

Section XXXVII.

YEt more Idolatry? And which is more, New, and strange; such (I dare say) as will never be found in the two first Commandements. Behold, here two new Idols, Our Ordinary, and our Service-booke, a speaking Idoll, and a writ-

B ten Idoll. Calecute hath one strange Deitie the Devill, Sileria many, whose people worship every day what they see first. Rome hath many merry Saints: but Saint Ordinary, and Saint Service-booke were never heard of till your Canonization. In earnest, doe you thinke we make our Ordinary an Idoll? What else? you kneele devoutly to him when you receive either the Oath or Absolution. This must needs be religious adoration: is there no remedy? You have twice kneeled to our Vice-Chancellor, when you were admitted to your degree; you have oft kneeled to your Parents, and God-fathers, to receive a blessing; did you make Idols of them? the party to be ordained, kneels under the hand of the Presbyterie: doth he religiously adore them? of old they were wont to kisse the hands of their Bishops, so they did to Baal: God and our Superiours have had ever one and the same outward gesture: Though here, not the Agent is so much regarded, as the Action: if your Ordinary would have suffered you

C to have done this peece of Idolatry, you had never separated.

But the true God Bel, and Dragon of England is the humane-Divine-Service-Book: Let us see what ashes or lumpes of pitch this Daniel brings: We worship God in, and by it, as Papists doe by their Images: Indeed, we worship God in, and by prayers contained in it: Why should we not? Tell me, why is it more Idolatry for a man to worship God in, and by a prayer read, or got by heart, than by a prayer conceived? I utter both, they are both mine: if the heart speak them both, feelingly and devoutly, where lies the Idoll? In a conceived prayer, is it not possible for a mans thought to stray from his tongue? in a prayer, learned by heart, or read, is it not possible for the heart to joyne with the tongue? If I pray therefore in spirit, and heartily utter my desires to God, whether in mine owne words, or borrowed (and so made mine) what is the offence? But (say you) if the Lord Jesus in his Testament have not commanded any

D such Booke, it is accursed and abominable: But say I, if the Lord Jesus hath not any where forbidden such a Booke, it is not accursed nor abominable: Shew us the place where, that we may know it with you: Nay but I must shew you where the Apostles used any such Service-booke: shew you me, where the Apostles baptized in a Basin: or where they received women to the Lords table: (for your ὡ ἀνδρωπῳ, 1 Cor. 11. will not serve) shew me that the Bible was distinguished into Chapters and Verses in the Apostles time: shew me that they ever celebrated the Sacrament of the Supper at any other time than evening, as your Anabaptists now doe: shew me that they used one prayer before their Sermons alwaies, another after; that they preached ever upon a Text: where they preached over a Table: or lastly, shew me where the Apostles used that prayer which you made before your last prophecie; and a thousand such circumstances. What an idle plea is this from the Apostolike times? And if I should tell you

E that Saint Peter celebrated with the Lords Prayer, you will not beleeve it: yet you know the Historie. But let the Reader know that your quarrell is not against the matter, but against the Booke; not as they are prayers, but as stinted, or prescribed: Wherein all the world besides your selves are Idolaters: Behold, all Churches that were, or are, are partners with us in this crime. Oh idolatrous Geneva, and all French, Scottish, Danish, Dutch, Churches! All which both have their set prayers with us, and approve them. Quod ad formulam, &c. As concerning a forme of Prayers and Rites Ecclesiasticall (saith Reverend Calvin) I doe greatly allow that it should be set and and certaine, from which it ſhould not be lawfull for Paſtors in their function to depart. Judge now of the ſpirit of theſe bold Controllers, that dare thus condemne all Gods Churches through the world, as idolatrous. But ſince you call for Apoſtolike examples, did not the Apoſtle Paul uſe one ſet forme of apprecations, of benedictions? What were theſe but leſſer Prayers? The quantitie varies not the kinde: Will you have yet ancienter precedents? The Prieſt was appointed of old to uſe a ſet forme under the Law, Num. 6.23. ſo the people, Deu. 26.3.4.5. &c. 15. Both of them a ſtinted Pſalme for the Sabbath, Pſal. 92. What ſaith your Doctor to theſe? Becauſe the Lord (ſaith he) gave formes of Prayers and Pſalmes, therefore the Prelates may? Can we think that Ieroboam had ſo ſlender a reaſon for his calves? Marke (good Reader) the ſhifts of theſe men: This Anſwerer cals for examples, and will abide no ſtinting of Prayers, becauſe we ſhew no patterns from Scripture. We doe ſhew patterns from Scripture, and now their Doctor ſaith, God appointed it to them of old, muſt wee therefore doe it? So, whether we bring examples or none, we are condemned: But Maſter Doctor, whom, I beſeech you, ſhould we follow, but God in his owne ſervices? If God have not appointed it, you cry out upon inventions: if God have appointed it, you cry, We may not follow it: ſhew then where God ever injoyned an ordinary ſervice to himſelfe, that was not ceremoniall (as this plainly is not:) which ſhould not be a direction for us? But if ſtinting our prayers be a fault (for as yet you meddle not with our blaſphemous Collects) it is well that the Lords prayer it ſelfe beareth us companie, and is no ſmall part of our Idolatry: Which, though it were given principally as a rule to our prayers, yet ſince the matter is ſo heavenly, and moſt wiſely framed to the neceſſitie of all Chriſtian hearts; to deny that it may be uſed intirely in our Saviours words, is no better than a fanaticall curiouſneſſe: yeeld one and all, for if the matter be more divine, yet this ſtint is no leſſe faultie: This is not the leaſt part of our patchery: except you unrip this, the reſt you cannot. But might not God be purely and perfectly worſhipped without it? Tell me, might not God be purely and perfectly worſhiped without Churches, without houſes, without garments, yea, without hands or feet? In a word, could not God be purely worſhipped, if you were not? Yet would you not ſeeme a ſuperfluous creature: ſpeake in your ſelfe: Might not God bee intirely worſhipped with pure and holy worſhip, though there were no other Bookes in the world, but the Scripture? If yea, as who can denie it, that knowes what the worſhip of God meaneth? What then doe the Fathers and Doctors and learned Interpreters? To the fire with all thoſe curious Arts and Volumes, as your Predeceſſors called them: Yea, let me put you in minde, that God was purely and perfectly worſhipped by the Apoſtolike Church, before ever the New Teſtament was written. See therefore the idleneſſe of your proofes; God may be ſerved without a preſcription of Prayer, but (if all Reformed Churches in Chriſtendome erre not) better with it: The Word of God is perfect, and admits no addition: curſed were we, if we ſhould adde ought to it: curſed were that which ſhould be added: But curſed be they that take ought from it, and dare ſay, Ye ſhall not pray thus, Our Father, &c. Doe wee offer to make our Prayers Canonicall? doe we obtrude them as parts of Gods Word? why cavill you thus? why doth the ſame Prayer written adde to the Word, which ſpoken addeth not? Becauſe conceived Prayer is commanded, not the other: But firſt, not your particular Prayer: Secondly, without mention either of conception, or memorie, God commands us to pray in ſpirit, and with the heart: Theſe circumſtances, only as they are deduced from his Generals, ſo are ours. But whence ſoever it pleaſe you to fetch our Booke of publike Prayer, from Rome or Hell; or to what Image ſoever you pleaſe to reſemble it; Let moderate ſpirits heare what the precious Iewel of England ſaith of it: We have come as neare as we could to the Church of the Apoſtles, &c. neither onely have wee framed our Doctrine, but alſo our Sacraments, and the forme of publike Prayers according to their Rites and inſtitutions. Let no Jew now object Swines fleſh to us: He is no judicious man (that I may omit the mention of Cranmer, Bucer, Ridley, Taylor, &c. ſome of whoſe hands were in it, all whoſe voyces were for it) with whom one Iewel will not over-weigh ten thouſand Separatiſts.

The number of Sacraments ſeemes greater amongſt you by one at the leaſt, than Chriſt hath left in his Teſtament, and that is Marriage; which howſoever you doe not in expreſſe termes call a Sacrament (no more did Chriſt and the Apoſtles call Baptiſme and the Supper Sacraments,) yet doe you in truth create it a Sacrament, in the adminiſtration and uſe of it. There are the parties to bee married and their marriage, repreſenting Chriſt and his Church, and their ſpirituall union: to which myſtery, ſaith the Oracle of your Service-Booke, expreſly, God hath conſecrated them: there is the Ring hallowed by the ſaid Service-Booke, (wheron it muſt bee laid) for the Element; there are the words of conſecration; In the name of the Father, and of the Sonne, and of the Holy Ghoſt: there is the place, the Church; the time uſually, the Lords day: the Miniſter, the Pariſh-Prieſt. And being made as it is a part of Gods worſhip, and of

B the Miniſters office, what is it if it be not a Sacrament? It is no part of prayer, or preaching, and with a Sacrament it hath the greateſt conſimilitude: but an Idoll I am ſure it is in the celebration of it, being made a Miniſteriall duty and part of Gods worſhip, without warrant, call it by what name you will.

Section XXXVIII.

HOw did Confirmation eſcape this number? how did Ordination? it was your over-ſight, I feare, not your charity: ſome things ſeeme, and are not: ſuch is this your number of our Sacraments: you will needs have us take in marriage into this ranke: why ſo? we doe not (you confeſſe) call it a Sacrament as the vulgar, miſinterpreting Pauls Myſterium, Eph. 5. why ſhould we not if we ſo eſteemed it? wherefore ſerve names, but to denotate the nature of things? if we were not

C aſhamed of the opinion, we could not be aſhamed of the word: No more (ſay you) did Chriſt and his Apoſtles call Baptiſme and the Supper, Sacraments; but we doe, and you with us: See now whether this clauſe doe not confute your laſt: where hath Chriſt ever ſaid, There are two Sacraments? Yet you dare ſay ſo: what is this but in your ſenſe an addition to the word? yea, we ſay flatly, there are but two: yet we doe (ſay you) in truth create it a Sacrament: how oft, and how reſolutely hath our Church maintained againſt Rome, that none but Chriſt immediately can create Sacraments? If they had this advantage againſt us, how could we ſtand? How wrongfull is this force, to faſten an opinion upon our Church which ſhe hath condemned? But wherein ſtands this our creation? It is true, the parties to bee married, and their marriage repreſent Chriſt, and his Church, and their ſpirituall union: Beware, leſt you ſtrike God through our ſides: what hath Gods Spirit ſaid, either leſſe, or other

D than this? Eph. 5. 25, 26, 27, & 32. Doth he not make Chriſt the husband, the Church his Spouſe? Doth he not from that ſweet conjunction, and the effects of it, argue the deare reſpects that ſhould be in mariage? Or what doth the Apoſtle allude elſewhere unto, when he ſayes (as Moſes of Eve) wee are the fleſh of Chriſts fleſh, and bone of his bone? And how famous amongſt the ancient is that reſemblance of Eve taken out of Adams ſide ſleeping, to the Church taken out of Chriſts ſide ſleeping on the Croſſe; Since marriage therefore ſo clearely repreſents this myſterie, and this uſe is holy and ſacred: what error is it, to ſay that marriage is conſecrated to this myſterie? But what is the Element? the Ring; Theſe things agree not; you had before made the two parties to be the matter of this ſacrament: What is the matter of the Sacrament, but Element? If they be the matter, they are the Element, and ſo not the Ring; both cannot be: if you will make the two parties to be but the receivers; how

E doth all the myſtery lie in their repreſentation? Or if the Ring be the Element, then all the myſtery muſt be in the Ring, not in the parties: Labour to bee more perfect, ere you make any more new Sacraments: but this Ring is laid upon the Service book: why not? For readineſſe, not for holineſſe: Nay but it is hallowed (you ſay) by the booke: If it bee a Sacramentall Element, it rather hallowes the booke, than the booke it; you are not mindfull enough for this trade: But what exorciſmes are uſed in this hallowing? Or who ever held it any other than a civill pledge of fidelity? Then follow the words of Conſecration: I pray you what difference is there betwixt hallowing, and and conſecration? The Ring was hallowed before the booke, now it muſt be conſecrated: How idly? By what words? In the name of the Father, &c. Theſe words you know are ſpoken after the Ring is put on: was it ever heard of, that a Sacramentall Element was conſecrated after it was applied? See how ill your ſlanders are digeſted by you: The place is the Church, the time is the Lords day, the Miniſter is the actor; and is it not thus in all other reformed Churches as well as ours? Behold we are not alone: all Churches in the world (if this will doe it) are guilty of three Sacraments: Tell me, would you not have marriage ſolemnized publikely? You cannot miſlike: though your founder ſeemes to require nothing here but notice given to witneſſes, and then to bed: Well, if publike, you account it withall, a grave and weighty buſineſſe: therefore ſuch, as muſt be ſanctified by publike praier: What place is fitter for publike praier than the Church? Who is fitter to offer up the publike praier, than the Miniſter? who ſhould rather joyne the parties in Marriage, than the publike deputie of that God, who ſolemnly joyned the firſt couple? who rather than he which in the name of God may bleſſe them? The prayers which accompany this ſolemnitie, are parts of Gods worſhip, not the contract it ſelfe: This is a mixt action, therefore, compounded of Eccleſiaſticall and civill: impoſed on the Miniſter, not upon neceſſity, but expedience: neither eſſentiall to him, but accidentally annexed, for greater convenience. Theſe two frivolous grounds have made your cavill either very ſimple, or very wilfull.

Commutation of Penance in our Church.

SEE if this man be not hard driven for accuſations, when hee is faine to repeat over the very ſame crime which he had largely urged before: All the world will know that you want variety, when you ſend in theſe twice-ſod Coleworts: Somewhat yet we finde new, Commutation of Penance. Our Courts would tell you, that here is nothing diſpenſed with, but ſome ceremony of ſhame in the confeſſion: which in the greater ſort is exchanged (for a common benefit of the poore) into a pecuniary mulct; yet (ſay they) not ſo as to abridge the Church of her ſatisfaction, by the confeſſion of the offender: and if you grant the Ceremony deviſed by them, why doe you finde fault that it is altered, or commuted by them? As for Abſolution, you have a ſpite at it, becauſe you ſought it, and were repulſed: If the cenſures be but their owne (ſo you hold) why blame you the menaging of them in what manner ſeemes beſt to the authors? This power is no more a limme of the Prelacy, than our Prelacy is that Beaſt in the Revelation: and our Prelacie holds it ſelfe no more S. Iohns beaſt, than it holds you *S. Even in others alſo oaths are urged, (not onely ex officio mercenario, but nobili:) The honourableſt Court of Star-chamber gives an oath in a criminall caſe to the defendant; So doth the Chancery, and Court of Requeſts: Shortly, to omit forraine examples, how many inſtances have you of this like proceeding in the common common Lawes of this Land? But with all you might learne, that no Enquiry Ex officio may bee thus made but upon good grounds, as Fame, Scandall, vehement presumption, &c. going before, and giving just cause of suspicion: Secondly, that this proceeding is not allowed in any case of crime, whereby the life, or lims of the examined party, may bee indangered: nor yet where there is a just suspition of future perjury upon such enforcement. Thus is the suspected wife urged to cleare her honesty by oath: Thus the Master of the house must cleare his truth, Exod. 22.8. Thus Achan and Jonathan were urged to be their owne accusers, though not by oath: But if perhaps any sinister course be taken by any corrupt Justicer in their proceedings; must this be imputed to the Church? Looke you to your petty-Courts at home: which some of your owne have compared to these courses, not onely to the Commission-Court of England, but to the inquisition of Spaine: See there your Pastor defending himselfe to be both an accuser and Judge in the same cause: See their proceedings Ex officio without commission: and if your prisons cannot witnesse it, your excommunications may.

Though you have lost the Shrines of Saints, yet you retaine their dayes, and those holy as the Lords day, and that with good profit to your spirituall carnall Courts, from such as profane them with the least and most lawfull labour, notwithstanding the liberty of the six dayes labour, which the Lord hath given: and as much would the Masters of these Courts bee stirred at the casting of these Saints dayes out of the Calendar, as were the Masters of the possessed maid, when the Spirit of divination was cast out of her, Act. 16. 19.

SECTION XLI.

WEe have not lost, but cast away the Idolatrous shrines of Saints: their daies we retaine; theirs, not for worship of them, which our Church condemneth, but partly for commemoration of their high deserts, and excellent examples: partly for distinction: indeed therefore Gods dayes, and not theirs: their praises redound to him: shew us where we implore them, where wee consecrate daies to their service: The maine end of Holy-daies is for the service of God, and some, as Socrates sets downe of old, (quo se a laborum contentione relaxent) for relaxation from labour: and if such daies may bee appointed by the Church (as were the Holy-daies of Purim, of the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem, the dedication of the Temple) whose names should they rather beare (though but for meere distinction) than the blessed Apostles of Christ? But this is a colour onely: for you equally condemne those daies of Christs Birth, Ascension, Circumsition, Resurrection, Anunciation, which the Church hath beyond all memorie celebrated: what then is our fault? Wee keepe these holy as the Lords day, in the same manner, though not in the same degree: Indeed wee come to the Church, and worship the God of the Martyrs and Saints: is this yet our offence? No, but wee abstaine from our most lawfull labour in them; True, yet not in conscience of the day, but in obedience to the Church; If the Church shal indict a solemne Fast, doe you not hold it contemptuous to spend that day in lawfull labour; notwithstanding that liberty of the six dayes which God hath given? Why shall that bee lawfull in a case of dejection, which may not in praise and exultation? If you had not loved to cavill, you would rather have accepted the Apology, or excuse of our sister Churches in this behalfe, than aggravated these uncharitable pleas of your owne: yet even in this, your owne Synagogue at Amsterdam (if wee may beleeve your owne) is not altogether guiltlesse: your hands are still, and your shops shut upon festivall dayes; But wee accuse you not: would God this were your worst. The Masters of our Courts would tell you, they would not care so much for this dispossession, as that it should bee done by such conjurers as your selfe.

Our approbation of an unlearned Miniſtery diſproved.

YOur want of quarrels makes you ſtill run over the ſame complaints: which if you redouble a thouſand times, will not become juſt, may become tedious: God knowes how far we are from approving an unlearned Miniſtery: The proteſtations of our gracious King, our Biſhops, our greateſt Patrons of conformity in their publike writings, might make you aſhamed of this bold aſſertion: we doe not allow that it ſhould be, we bewaile that it will be: our number of Pariſhes compared with our number of Divines, will ſoone ſhew, that either many pariſhes muſt have none, or ſome Divines muſt have many Congregations, or too many Congregations muſt have ſcarce Divine-Incumbents. Our deare Soveraigne hath promiſed a medicine for this diſeaſe; But withall tells you that Ieruſalem was not built all on a day. The violence you ſpeake of is commonly in caſe of wilfull contempt, not of honeſt and peaceable deſire of further inſtruction, or in ſuppoſall of ſome tolerable abilitie in the Miniſtery forſaken; we doe heartily pray for labourers into this harveſt: wee doe wiſh that all Iſrael could propheſie: we publiſh the Scriptures, we Preach, Catechiſe, Write, and (Lord thou knoweſt) how many of us would doe more, if we knew what more could be done, for the information of thy people, and remedy of this ignorance which this adverſary reproves us to approve. Diſtinct reading you cannot deny to the moſt Pariſhes: the matter, is eaſie Prayers, and Engliſh Scriptures: if the hearers be regardleſſe, or in ſome things dull of conceit, lay the fault from the ſervice to the men: All yours are free from ignorance, free from wandering conceits: we envy you not, ſome knowledge is no better than ſome ignorance, and careleſneſſe is no worſe than miſ-regard. Penances injoyned in the Church of England.

COmming now to the vaults of Popery, I aske for their Penances, and Purgatory; thoſe Popiſh Penances, which preſumptuous Confeſſors enjoyned as ſatisfactory, and meritorious upon their bold abſolutions: You ſend me to Sheet-penances and Purſe-penances: the one, ceremonious corrections of ſhame, enjoyned and adjoyned to publike Confeſſions of uncleanneſſe, for the abaſing of the offender, and hate of the ſinne: ſuch like as the ancient Church thought good to uſe for this purpoſe. Hence they were appointed (as Tertullian ſpeaketh) in ſack-cloth and aſhes, to crave the prayers of the Church, to beſmeare their body with filthineſſe, to throw themſelves downe before Gods Miniſter and Altar; not to mention other more hard, and perhaps no leſſe ancient Rites; and hence were thoſe five ſtations of the Penitent, whereby he was at laſt received into the body of his wonted Communion: the other a pecuniary mulct impoſed upon ſome (not all, you foulely ſlander us) leſſe hainous offences; as a penalty, not as a penance: I hope you deny not; Sodomy, Murder, Robbery, & (which you would not) Theft it ſelfe is more deeply avenged: But did ever any of ours urge either ſheet or purſe as the remedy of Purgatory, or enjoyne them, to avoid thoſe infernall paines? unleſſe we doe ſo, our Penances are not Popiſh, and our Anſwerer is idle. Touching Purgatory, though you deny the doctrine of it, and teach the contrary, yet how well your practice ſuits with it, let it be conſidered in theſe particulars: Your abſolving of men dying excommunicate after they be dead, and before they may have Chriſtian buriall. Your Chriſtian buriall in holy ground (if the party will bee at the charges;) your ringing of hallowed bells for the ſoule; your ſinging the Corps to the grave from the Church ſtile; your praying over, or for the dead, eſpecially in theſe words, That God would haſten his kingdome, that wee with this our Brother (though his life were never ſo wretched, and death deſperate) and all other departed in the true faith of thy holy Name, may have our perfect conſummation both in body and ſoule. Your generall doctrines and your particular practices agree in this as in the moſt other things, like Harpe and Harrow. In word you profeſſe many truths, which in deed you deny.

B Theſe and many moe Popiſh devices (by others at large diſcovered to the world) both for pomp and profit, are not onely not razed and buried in the duſt, but are advanced amongſt you above all that is called God.

Section XLIV.

YOur next accuſation is more ingenuouſly malicious; our Doctrine you grant contrary to Purgatory: but you will fetch it out of our practice, that we may build that which we deſtroy: Let us therefore purge our ſelves from your Purgatory: We abſolve men dying excommunicate; a rare practice, and which yet I have not lived to ſee: but if Law-makers contemne rare occurrents, ſurely accuſers do not: Once is too much of an evill: Marke then; Doe we abſolve his Soule after the departure? No: what hath the Body to doe with Purgatory? Yet for the body: doe we by C any abſolution ſeeke to quit it from ſinne? Nothing leſſe: reaſon it ſelfe gives us, that it is uncapable either of ſin or pardon; To lie unburied, or to be buried unſeemly, is ſo much a puniſhment, that the Heathens objected it (though upon the havock and fury of Warre) to the Chriſtians, as an argument of Gods neglect. All that authority can doe to the dead Rebell, is to put his carkaſſe to ſhame, and deny him the honour of ſeemely ſepulture: Thus doth the Church to thoſe that will die in wilfull contempt. Thoſe Grecian virgins that feared not death, were yet reſtrained with the feare of ſhame after death: it was a reall, not imaginary curſe of Iezabel; The dogs ſhall eat Iezabel. Now the abſolution (as you call it, by an unproper, but malicious name) is nothing elſe but a liberty given by the Church (upon repentance ſignified of the fault of the late offender) of all thoſe externall rites of decent Funerall: Death it ſelfe is capable of inequality, and unſeemelineſſe: Suppoſe a juſt excommunication: What D reaſon is it, that he which in his life and death would be as a Pagan, ſhould be as a Chriſtian in his buriall? What is any, or all this to Purgatory?

The next intimation of our purgatory, is our Chriſtian buriall, in the place, in the manner: The place, holy ground, the Church, Churchyard, &c. The manner, Ringing, Singing, Praying over the Corps. Thus therfore you argue; We bury the body in the Church, or Churchyard, &c. therefore we hold a Purgatory of the Soule; a proofe not leſſe ſtrange than the opinion: We doe neither ſcorne the carcaſſes of our friends, as the old Troglodites: nor with the old Egyptians reſpect them more, than when they were enformed with a living ſoule: but we keep a meane courſe betwixt both, uſing them as the remainders of dead men, yet as dead Chriſtians: and as thoſe which we hope one day to ſee glorious. We have learned to call no place holy in it ſelfe (ſince the Temple) but ſome more holy in their uſe, than others. The old (κοιμητηρια) of the Chriſtians, E wherein their bodies ſlept in peace, were not leſſe eſteemed of them, than they are ſcorned of you. Gallienus thought he did them a great favour (and ſo they took it) when he gave them the liberty not only of their Churches, but of their former burying places. In the ſame booke Euſebius commends Aſtirius a noble Senator, for his care, and coſt of Marinus his buriall. Of all theſe rites of funerall, & choyce of place, we profeſſe to hold with Auguſtine, that they are onely the comforts of the living, not helpes of the dead; yet as Origen alſo teacheth us, we have learned to honour a reaſonable (much more a Chriſtian) ſoule; and to commit the inſtrument or caſe of it honourably to the grave.

All this might have taught our Anſwerer, that we make account of an heaven, of a reſurrection, not of a Purgatory. But we ring hallowed bells for the ſoule: Do not thoſe bels hang in hallowed Steeples too? and doe we not ring them with hallowed ropes? What fancie is this? If Papiſts were ſo fond of old: their folly and their bells (for the moſt part) are both out of date; wee call them ſoule-bels, for that they ſignifie the departure of the ſoule, not for that they helpe the paſſage of the ſoule. This is meere Boyes-play. But we pray over or for the dead; Doe we not ſing to him alſo? Pardon me, I muſt needs tell you, here is much ſpite, and little wit. To pray for the conſummation of the glory of all Gods elect: What is it, but Thy Kingdome come? How vainly doe you ſeeke a knot in a ruſh, while you cavill at ſo holy a Petition? Goe and learne how much better it is, to call them our brothers, which are not, in harmeleſſe overweening and over-hoping of charity, than to call them no brothers, which are, in a proud and cenſorious uncharitableneſſe: you cannot bee content to tell an untruth, but you muſt face it out. Let any Reader judge, how farre our practice in this diſſented from our doctrine; would to God in nothing more: Yes (ſaith this good friend) in the moſt other things; our words profeſſe, our deeds deny: at once you make us hypocrites, and your ſelves Phariſes. Let all the world know, that the Engliſh Church at Amſterdam profeſſeth nothing which it practiſeth not: we may not be ſo holy, or ſo happy.

Generality is a notable ſhelter of untruth: Many moe, you ſay, Popiſh devices, yet name none; No, you cannot. Advanced above all that is called God? ſurely this is a paradox of ſlanders: you meant at once to ſhame us with falſhood, and to appoſe us with Riddles: we ſay to the Higheſt, whom have we in heaven but thee? and for earth, your ſelfe have granted we give too much to Princes, (which are earthen Gods) and may come under Pauls (πνεῦσιμα.) Either name our Deity, or crave mercy for your wrong: certainly, though you have not remorſe, yet you ſhall have ſhame.

You are farre from doing to the Romiſh Idols, as was done to the Ægyptian Idols, Mithra and Serapis, whoſe Prieſts were expelled their Miniſtery, and Monuments expoſed to utter ſcorne and deſolation, their temples demoliſhed and razed to the very foundation.

SECTION XLV.

THe Majeſty of Romiſh Petti-gods (I truly told you) was long agone, with Mithra and Serapis, expoſed to the laughter of the vulgar: you ſtraine the compariſon too farre; yet we follow you: Their Prieſts were expelled: for (as your Doctor yeeldeth) other actors came upon the ſame ſtage: others in religion, elſe it had beene no change: Their Miniſtery & Monuments expoſed to utter ſcorne: Their Maſſes, their oblations, their adorations, their invocations, their anoylings, their exorcizings, their ſhrift, their abſolutions, their Images, Rood-lofts, and whatſoever elſe of this kind: But the Temples of the old Heathens were demoliſhed and razed: Here is the quarrell: ours ſtand ſtill in their proud Majeſty: Can you ſee no difference betwixt our Churches and their Temples? The very name it ſelfe (if at leaſt you have underſtood it) Kirk or Church (which is nothing but an abbreviation of (κυριακὸν, the Lords houſe) might have taught you, that ours were dedicated to God, and theirs to the Devill, in their falſe gods: Auguſtine anſwers you, as directly, as if he were in my roome: The Gentiles (ſaith he) to their gods erected Temples, we not Temples unto our Martyrs, as unto Gods, but memorialls as unto dead men, whoſe ſpirits with God are ſtil living: Theſe then if they were abuſed by Popiſh Idolatry, is there no way, but Downe with them, down with them to the ground? Well fare the Donatiſts yet your old friends: they but waſhed the walls that were polluted by the Orthodox; by the ſame token, that Optatus askes them, why they did not waſh the bookes which ours toucht, and the heavens which they looked upon: What, are the very ſtones ſinfull? what can be done with them? The very earth where they ſhould lye on heaps would be uncleane: But not their pollution angers you more, than their proud Majeſty: What houſe can be too good for the Maker of all things? As God is not affected with

State

A State, so is he not delighted in baseneſſe. If the pompe of the Temple were ceremoniall, yet it leaves this morality behind it, that Gods houſe ſhould be decent: and what if goodly? If we did put holineſſe in the ſtones, as you doe uncleanneſſe, it might be ſinne to be coſtly: Let me tell you, there may bee as much pride in a clay wall, as in a carved: Proud Majeſty is better than proud baſeneſſe; the ſtone or clay will offend in neither, we may in both; If you love cottages, the ancient Chriſtians with us, loved to have Gods houſe ſtately, as appeares by the example of that worthy Biſhop of Alexandria, and that gracious Conſtantine, in whoſe dayes theſe ſacred piles began to lift up their heads unto this envied height: Take you your owne choyce, give us ours; let us neither repine, nor ſcorne at each other.

But your Temples, eſpecially your Cathedrall and mother Churches, ſtand ſtill in their proud Majeſty poſſeſſed by Arch-biſhops and Lord Biſhops, like the Flamins and Arch-Flamins, amongſt the Gentiles, from whom they were derived and furniſhed with all manner of pompous and ſuperſtitious monuments, as carved and painted Images, Maſſing Copes and Surplices, chanting and Organ-muſicke, and many other glorious ornaments of the Romiſh Harlot, by which her Majeſty is commended to, and admired by the vulgar: ſo far are you in theſe reſpects for being gone, or fled, yea, or crept either, out of Babylon.

Now if you be thus Babyloniſh where you repute your ſelves moſt Sion-like, and thus confounded in your owne evidence, what defence could you make in the things whereof an adverſary would challenge you? If your light be darkneſſe, how great is your darkneſſe.

SECTION XLVI.

ALL this while I feared you had beene in Popiſh Idolatry: now I find you in Heatheniſh: Theſe our Churches are ſtill poſſeſſed by their Flamins, and Arch-Flamins: I had thought none of our Temples had beene ſo ancient: certainly I find but one poore ruinous building, reported to have worne out this long tyranny of time: For the moſt, you might have read their age, and their Founders in open records: But theſe were derived from thoſe: ſurely the Churches as much as the men: It is true, the Flamins, and what ever other Heathen Prieſts, were put downe, Chriſtian Biſhops were ſet up; Are theſe therefore derived from thoſe? Chriſtianity came in the roome of Judaiſme: was it therefore derived from it? Before you told us, that our Prelacy came from that Antichriſt of Rome, now from the Flamius of the Heathen: Both no leſſe, than either: If you cannot bee true, yet learne to be conſtant. But what meane you to charge our Churches with carved and painted Images? It is well you write to thoſe that know them; Why did not you ſay wee bow our knees to them, and offer incenſe? Perhaps you have eſpied ſome old duſty Statue in an obſcure corner, covered over with Cob-webs, with halfe a face, and that miſerably blemiſht, or perhaps halfe a Crucifix inverted in a Church-window, and theſe you ſurely noted for Engliſh Idols: no leſſe dangerous glaſſe you might have ſeene at Geneva, a Church that hates Idolatry, as much as you doe us: What more? Maſſing Copes, and Surplices: ſome Copes (if you will) more Surplices, no Maſſing: Search your bookes againe, you ſhall finde Albes in the Maſſe, no Surplices. As for Organ-muſicke, you ſhould not have fetcht it from Rome, but from Jeruſalem: In the Reformed Church at Middleburgh, you might have found this skirt of the Harlot: which yet you grant at leaſt crept out of Babylon; Judge now (Chriſtian Reader) of the weight of theſe grand exceptions; and ſee whether ten thouſand ſuch were able to make us no Church, and argue us not onely in Babylon, but to bee Babylon it ſelfe: Thus Babyloniſh we are to you, and thus Sion-like to God: every true Church is Gods Sion: every Church that holds the Foundation, is true, according to that golden rule, Epheſ. 2. 21. Every building that is coupled together in this corner-ſtone, groweth unto an holy Temple in the Lord: No adverſary, either Man or Devill, can confound us, either in our evidences, or their

But for that not the ſeparation, but the cauſe makes the Schiſmatike; and leſt you ſhould ſeeme to ſpeake evill of the thing you know not, and to condemne a cauſe unheard, you lay downe in the next place the ſuppoſed cauſe of our ſeparation, againſt which you deale as inſufficiently. And that you pretend to be, none other than your conſorting with the Papiſts in certaine Ceremonies: touching which, and our ſeparation in regard of them thus you write.

M. H. If you have taken but the leaſt knowledge of the ground of our judgement and practice, how dare you thus abuſe both us and the Reader, as if the only or chiefe ground of our ſeparation were your Popiſh Ceremonies? But if you goe only by gheſſe, having never ſo much as read over one Treatiſe publiſhed in our defence, and yet ſticke not to paſſe this your cenſorious doome both upon us and it; I leave it to the Reader to judge whether you have beene more laviſh of your cenſure, or credit. Moſt unjuſt is the cenſure of a cauſe unknowne, though in it ſelfe never ſo blame-worthy, which nevertheleſſe may be praiſe-worthy, for ought he knowes that cenſures it. B

Section XLVII.

On what ground Separation or Ceremonies were objected.

HE that leaves the whole Church in a groſſe and wilfull error, is an Heretike; he that leaves a particular Church for appendances, is a Schiſmatick: ſuch are you, both in the action and cauſe: The act is yeelded, the cauſe hath beene in part ſcanned, ſhall be more: This I vainly pretended to be our conſorting in Ceremonies with the Papiſts: Behold here the ground of your loud challenge of my ignorance: Ignorance of your judgement and practice: Here is my abuſe of you, of my Reader: and, how durſt I? Good words (M. R.) What I have erred, I will confeſſe: I have wronged you indeed: but in my charity: I knew the cauſe of Browniſme, but I knew not you: For (to ſay ingenuouſly) I had heard and hoped, that your cauſe had beene leſſe deſperate; My intelligence was, that in diſlike of theſe Ceremonies obtruded, and an hopeleſneſſe of future liberty, you and your fellowes had made a ſeceſſion rather than a ſeparation from our Church, to a place where you might have ſcope to profeſſe, and opportunity to enjoy your owne conceits: whence it was that I termed you Ring-leaders of the late ſeparation, not followers of the firſt, and made your plea againſt our Church, imperfection, not falſhood: I hoped you, as not ours, ſo not theirs: not ours in place, ſo not quite theirs in peeviſh opinion: I knew it to be no new thing for men inclining to theſe fancies, to begin new Churches at Amſterdam, ſeverall from the reſt: witneſſe the letters of ſome (ſometimes yours) cited by your owne Paſtor: I knew the former ſeparation, and hated it; I hoped better of the latter ſeparation, and pitied it: My knowledge both of *M. Smith whom you followed, and your ſelfe, would not let me thinke of you, as you deſerved: How durſt I charge you with that, which perhaps you might diſavow? It was my charity therefore, that made my accuſations eaſie: it is your uncharitableneſſe that accuſes them of ignorance. I knew why a Browniſt is a true Schiſmatick; I knew not you were ſo true a Browniſt. But why then did I write? Taking your ſeparation at beſt; I knew how juſtly I might take occaſion by it to diſſwade from ſeparation; to others good, though not to yours: Now I know you better, or worſe rather, I thinke you heare more: Forgive me my charity, and make the worſt of my ignorance. I knew that this ſeparation (which now I know yours) ſtands upon foure grounds, as ſome beaſts upon foure feet. Firſt, God worſhipped after a falſe manner; Secondly, Prophane multitude received; Thirdly, Antichriſtian Miniſtery impoſed; Fourthly, Subjection to Antichriſtian Government: The Ceremonies are but as ſome one paw in every foot: yet if we extend the word to the largeſt uſe, dividing all Religion into Ceremony, and Subſtance; I may yet, and doe averre, that your ſeparation is meerely grounded upon Ceremonies. And touching the Ceremonies here ſpoken of, howſoever wee have formerly refuſed them, ſubmitting (as all others did and doe) to the Prelates ſpirituall Iuriſdiction (herein through ignorance ſtraining at Gnats, and ſwallowing Camels) yet are wee verily perſwaded of them, and ſo were before wee ſeparated, that they are but as leaves of that tree, and as badges of that Man of ſinne, whereof the Pope is head, and the Prelates ſhoulders. And ſo wee for our parts ſee no reaſon why any of the Biſhops ſworne ſervants (as all the Miniſters in the Church of England are Canonically) ſhould make nice to weare their Lords Liveries. Which Ceremonies notwithſtanding wee know well enough, howſoever you for advantage extenuate and debaſe them unto us to bee advanced and preferred in your Church, before the preaching of the Goſpell.

B It is much that they being not ſo much as Reed, nor any part of the building (as you pretend) ſhould overturne the beſt builders amongſt you as they doe. The proportion betwixt Zoar and them holds well: Zoar was a neighbour unto Sodome, both in place and ſinne, and obnoxious to the ſame deſtruction with it: and it was Lots errour to deſire to have it ſpared, Gen. 19.15, 18, 19, 20. and ſo hee never found reſt nor peace in it, but forſooke it for feare of the ſame juſt judgement, which had overtaken the reſt of the Cities, verſe 30. The application of this to your Ceremonies, I leave to your ſelfe, and them to that deſtruction, to which they are devoted by the Lord.

Section XLVIII.

AND touching Ceremonies; you refuſed them formerly, but not long: and when you did refuſe them, you knew not wherefore; for immediately before your ſuſpenſion, you acknowledged them to be things indifferent, and for matter Eſtimation of Ceremonies, and ſubjection to the Prelates.

C of ſcandall by them, you had not informed your ſelfe (by your owne confeſſion) of a whole quarter of a yeere after: Why refuſed you then, but as the Poet made his Playes, to pleaſe the people, or as Simon Magus was baptized, for company? But refuſing them, you ſubmitted to the Prelates ſpirituall juriſdiction: there was your crime; this was your Camell, the other your Gnats: Did ever any Prelate challenge ſpirituall rule over your conſcience?

This they all appropriate to the great Biſhop of our ſoules: and if other; grant them as your malice faineth: what ſinne is it to be the ſubject of a Tyrant? now upon more grace, refuſing the Prelacy, you have branded the Ceremonies: So you did before your ſeparation; Tell us, how long was it after your ſuſpenſion, and before your departure, that you could have been content (upon condition) to have worne this linnen badge of your Man of ſinne? Was not this your reſolution, when you went from Norwich to Lincolneſhire, after your ſuſpenſion? Deny it not; my witneſſes are too ſtrong.

D But let us take you as you are: theſe Ceremonies, though too vile for you, yet are good enough for our Miniſters of England: As if you ſaid, Lord, I thanke thee, I am not as this Publican: Why for our Miniſters? Becauſe, thoſe are the Liveries, and theſe the ſworne ſervants of the Antichriſtian Biſhops: We have indeed ſworne obedience to our Ordinary, in honeſt and lawfull Commandements, but ſervice to Chriſt: But doth all obedience imply ſervitude? this obedience is, as to ſpirituall Fathers, not to Maſters; yet ſo are wee the ſervants of Chriſt, that wee are ready to give our ſervice to the leaſt of his Saints; Thus vile will wee bee for God; how much more to thoſe whom God hath made (as Hierome ſayes) Principes Eccleſiæ: whiles they command for God: What doe we herein, but that which Epiphanius urged of old againſt Aerius; What but the ſame which Ignatius (that holy and old Martyr) requires

E (not once) of all Presbyters, and offers the ingagement of his owne ſoule for us in this act?

1 Cor. 4. 1. Ier. in Pſal. 44. Heming. Claſſ. 3. Poteſt. Eccl. c. 10. Vt cuique ſuus clarus & ſua plebs in his quæ Domini ſunt, piè obſequerentur. Ignat. epiſt. ad Tarſenſ.

As for our Ceremonies, aggravate them how you can for your advantage, they are but Ceremonies to us: and ſuch, as wherein we put no holineſſe, but order, decency, convenience: but they are preferred (you ſay) in our Church, before the preaching of the Goſpell: a moſt wrongfull untruth; We hold preaching an eſſentiall part of Gods ſervice, Ceremonies none at all: the Goſpell preached wee hold the life and ſoule of the Church; Ceremonies either the garment, or the lace of the garment: The Goſpell preached preached we hold the Foundation and Walls; Ceremonies hardly ſo much as Reed, or Tile: But how then (ſay you) have they overturned our beſt builders? This is a word of rare favour: I had thought you had held us all ruiners, not builders: Or if builders; of Babel, not of Jeruſalem: in which worke the beſt builders are the worſt. Thoſe whoſe hand hath beene in this act, would tell you, that not ſo much the Ceremonies are ſtood upon, as obedience: If God pleaſe to try Adam but with an Apple, it is enough: What doe we quarrell at the value of the fruit, when we have a prohibition? Shimei is ſlaine: what meerely for going out of the City? the act was little, the bond was great: what is commanded, matters not ſo much, as by whom; inſult not, we may thanke your outrage for this loſſe.

For your retortion of my Zoar and Sodom: I can give you leave to be witty, you uſe it ſo ſeldome: but when you have played with the alluſion what you liſt, I muſt tell you that he which will needs urge a compariſon to goe on foure feet, is not worthy to goe upon two: Zoar was neere to Sodom, not part of it: Zoar was reſerved when Sodom was deſtroyed: Zoars neereneſſe to the place where Sodome ſtood, needed not have given Lot cauſe of removall. Zoar might ſafely have bee the harbour of Lot: his feare was, for want of faith: God promiſed him and the place ſecurity: the far-fetcht application therefore of the wickedneſſe of Zoar, to our Ceremonies, might well have beene forborne, and kept to your ſelfe: much leſſe needed you (like ſome Anti-Lot) to call for fire and brimſtone from heaven upon your Zoar.

Fidem Domino habere debuerat quiſe eam ſervaturum propter eum dixerat. Mercer. in Gen.

How wee would have behaved our ſelves in the Temple, where the Money-changers were, and they that ſold Doves, we ſhall anſwer you, when you prove your Church to bee the Temple of God, compiled and built of ſpiritually hewne and lively ſtones, 1 King. 5.17,18. and 6,7. 1 Pet. 2. 5. and of the Cedars, Firres, and Thyne trees of Lebanon, 2 Chron. 2. 8. framed and ſet together in that comely order, which a greater than Salomon hath preſcribed: unto which God hath promiſed his preſence. But whileſt we take it to be (as it is) a confuſed heape of dead and defiled and polluted ſtones, and of all rubbiſh, of briers and brambles of the wilderneſſe, for the moſt part, fitter for burning than building; we take our ſelves rather bound to ſhew our obedience in departing from it, than our valour in purging it, and to follow the Prophets counſell in flying out of Babylon, as the Hee-goats before the flocke, Jer. 50. 8.

SECTION XLIX.

The ſtate of the Temple, and of our Church in reſemblance.

HOw you would have behaved your ſelfe in the Temple to the Money-changers, you will anſwer when we prove our Church to be Gods Temple, built of that matter, and in that forme which God hath preſcribed: and here you ſend us to 1 King. 5.17. and 2 Chron. 2.8. Ignorantly; as if Salomons Temple had ſtood till Chriſts time: when neither the firſt, nor ſecond (though called Beth Gnolam) outlaſted more than foure hundred yeeres: Or as if the Market had been under the very roofe of that Temple. Whether Herods were built of the ſame matter with Salomons, and in full correſpondence to it, I diſpute not: it was certainly dedicated to Gods ſervice, and that (which you would hardly diſgeſt) in a ſolemne anniverſary Holy day: though not erected upon the word of any Prophet. But to let paſſe Allegories: we muſt prove our ſelves the true Church of God: Thus we doe it: We are true Chriſtians, for we were baptized into the Name of Chriſt; we truly profeſſe our continuance in the ſame faith into which we were baptized: we joyne together in the publike Services of God: wee maintaine every point of the moſt ancient Creeds: wee overthrow not the foundation by any conſequence. Therefore what ever is wanting to us, what ever is ſuperfluous, in ſpight of all the gates of Hell, wee are the true Church of God. Let me aske you: Were not the people of the Iewes in the Prophets, and in Chriſts time, a confuſed heape of dead and defiled, and (for I will uſe your Tautologies) polluted ſtones, and of all rubbiſh, of bryers and brambles of the Wilderneſſe, for the moſt part fitter for burning than building? Can we be worſe than they? If wickedneſſe can defile a Church, they ſhall juſtifie us: did either thoſe Prophets, or our Saviour, rather ſhew their obedience to God in departing from it, than their valour in purging it?

A it? you have well imitated theſe heavenly patternes. But what; can your charity find nothing but rubbiſh? Not one ſquare ſtone, not one living? You will be judging till God judge you: if you take not heed of theſe courſes, you will ſo run with the Hee-goats, that you will ſtand with the Goats on the left hand. That God, whoſe place you have uſurped, give you more wiſdome and love.

SEP.

And what (I pray you) is the valour which the beſt hearted, and moſt zealous Reformers amongſt you have manifeſted, in driving out the money-changers? doth it not appeare in this, that they ſuffer themſelves to be driven out with the two ſtringed whip of Ceremonies and ſubſcription, by the money-changers, the Chancellors and Officials, which ſell ſinnes like Doves: and by the chiefe Prieſts, the Biſhops which ſet them on worke? ſo farre are the moſt zealous amongſt you from driving out the money-changers, as they themſelves are driven out by them, becauſe they will not change with them to the utmoſt farthing.

B

SECTION L.

THe valour of our moſt zealous Reformers hath truly ſhewed it ſelfe in yeeldance: As in Duels; ſo here, he is the moſt valiant that can ſo maſter himſelfe as not to fight: you according to the common opinion of Swaggerers, blame the peaceable of cowardiſe, and accuſe them of ſuffering. Behold a new crime; That they ſuffer themſelves to be driven out: What ſhould they have done? Should they have taken armes, and cry, The ſword of God, and Gedeon? You that will not allow a Prince to compell Subjects, will you allow Subjects to compell Princes? God forbid; This were high Treaſon againſt Gods Annointed: what then? Should they approve the C Ceremonies by ſubſcription, by practice? This you exclaime upon, as high treaſon againſt the Higheſt: What yet more? Should they have preached with their mouthes ſtopt? This is it, which you have learned of your Founder, and through not many hands received, and required with no leſſe violence: Clamour and tumults is that you deſire ſtill: let our ſinne bee peaceable obedience, yours fury and oppoſition. Your head-ſtrong conceit is, that it is a ſinne to be ſilenced: Men muſt preach even when they may not: all times before you, would have wondred at this Paradox: For however the Apoſtles, which had not their calling from men, would not be ſilenced by men, yet we find that all their ſucceſſors held, that thoſe hands which were laid upon their heads, might be laid upon their mouthes: look into all Hiſtories: Thoſe Conſtitutions (which though not Apoſtolike, yet were ancient) in the ſeventh Canon puniſh a Biſhop, or Presbyter, that upon pretence of Religion ſeparates from his wife, with D depoſition: and if any Presbyter ſhall ſhift his charge without licence (τὸν κελευόμενον μὴ θέλειν λειτουργεῖν) and laſtly, inflicts the ſame penalty upon Fornication, Adultery, Perjury.

The great Nicene Councell takes the ſame order with ſome miſliked Biſhops, and Presbyters in divers Canons: Gaudentius in the Councell of Sardy, takes it for granted, that a Biſhop may by Biſhops be depoſed: ſo the ſecond Councell of Carthage, Can. 13. ſo the fourth Councell of Carthage, more than once impoſes degradation: ſo Leo the 1. threats to put ſome offending perſons from the office of their Miniſtery: ſo (that I may not be endleſſe) bleſſed Cyprian adviſes Rogatianus, a good old Biſhop, which was abuſed by a malapert Deacon, by the authority of his Chaire to right himſelfe, and either to depoſe, or ſuſpend the offender. Leontius in Socrates, is deprived of his Prieſthood: yea, what Councell or Father gives not both rules and inſtances of this practice? See how farre the ancient Church was from theſe tumultuous fancies: No, no, (M. R.) E we well find, it is doing that undoes the Church, not ſuffering: If your fellowes could have ſuffered more and done leſſe, the Church had beene happy: As for our Church-Officers, you may raile upon them with a lawleſſe ſafety: there is a great Ditch betwixt you and them: elſe you might pay deare for this ſinne of ſlandering them with their cheap peny-worths: How idly doe you inſult over thoſe, whom your mony-changers have driven out of their Pulpits: When you confeſſe (after all your valour) that they have driven you both out of Church and Country: who can pitty a miſerable inſulter?

For the Wafers in Geneva, and diſorders in Corinth, they were corruptions which may and doe (or the like unto them) creepe into the pureſt Churches in the World: for the Reformation whereof Chriſt hath given his power unto his Church, that ſuch evils as are brought in by humane frailty, may by divine authority be purged out. This power and preſence of Chriſt you want, holding all by homage (or rather by villenage) under the prelates, unto whoſe ſinfull yoke you ſtoope in more than Babyloniſh bondage, bearing and approving by perſonall communion, infinite abominations. And in theſe two laſt reſpects principally, your Babyloniſh confuſion of all ſorts of people in the body of your Church, without ſeparation, and your Babyloniſh bondage under your ſpirituall Lords the prelates, we account you Babylon, and flie from you.

Power of Reforming abuſes given to the Church: and the iſſue of the neglect of it.

YOu that can grant there will be corruptions in all other Churches, will endure none in ours: If England ſhould have either unleavened Wafers, or drunken Love-feaſts (though no other blemiſhes) ſhe could not but be Babylon: We envy not your favours: Theſe, or whatſoever like enormities, Chriſt hath given power unto his Church to reforme: but what if the Church neglect to uſe it? What if thoſe evils, which are brought in, by humane frailty, will not by divine authority be purged out? Now the error (by your doctrine) is growne fundamentall; ſo Chriſt is loſt, and the foundation razed: if we ſhall then aſſume (againſt our friends, to convince our enemies) The Church of Geneva hath beene ſeriouſly dealt with, in this corruption, and diſſwaded by vehement importunity, yet ſtill perſiſteth: How can you free them, and charge us? ſee how we love to be miſerable, with company. This power to purge out all corruptions, Chriſt hath not given us: if he hath given it you; you muſt firſt begin to purge out your ſelves: you have done it; but ſtill there remaine ſome: would God we had as much execution as power: Our Church ſhould be as cleane as yours is Schiſmaticall. If you ſhould meaſure faculties by their exerciſe; Naturall reſt ſhould be the greateſt enemy to vertue: and the ſolitary Chriſtian ſhould be miſerable; This power of ours is not dead, but ſleepeth: When it awaketh unto more frequent uſe, (which we earneſtly pray for) looke you for the firſt hand-ſell of it: None can be more worthy: as it is, we offend not more in defect than you in exceſſe: Of whom that your Lazarello of Amſterdam, G.I. could ſay, that you have Excommunication as ready as a Prelate hath a Priſon: Chriſt is in many that feele him not; but we want not the power onely, but the preſence of Chriſt: How ſo? he was with us while you were here: Did he depart with you? will the Separatiſts ingroſſe our Saviour to themſelves, and (as Cyprian ſaid of Pupianus) go to Heaven alone? yea, confine the God of Heaven to Amſterdam? What inſolence is this? we have him in his Word: we have him in his Sacraments: we have him in our hearts: we have him in our profeſſion; yet this enemy dare ſay, we want him: Wherein? I ſuppoſe in our cenſures: We have Peters keyes (as his true ſucceſſors both in office and doctrine:) our fault is, that wee uſe them not as you would: What Church doth ſo? your firſt Martyr doth as zealouſly inveigh againſt the practice of Geneva, and all other Reformed Congregations in this point, as againſt us: both for the woodden Dagger (as he termes it) of ſuſpenſion, and for their Conſiſtoriall Excommunication. Woe were to all the World, if Chriſt ſhould limit his preſence only to your faſhions: Here you found him, and here you left him: Would to God we did no more grieve him with our ſins, than you pleaſe him in your preſumptuous cenſures: in the reſt, you raile againſt our Prelates and us: Can any man thinke that Chriſt hath left peaceable ſpirits, to goe dwell with Railers? Indeed, yours is free-hold: ſo you would have it free from ſubjection, free from obedience: This is looſeneſſe, more than liberty: You have broken the bonds, and caſt the cords from you: but you miſ-call our tenure: We hate villenage no leſſe than you hate peace, and hold (in capite) of him that is the head of his body, the Church: under whoſe eaſie yoke wee doe willingly ſtoope in a ſweet Chriſtian freedome? abhorring and reproving, and therefore (notwithſtanding our perſonall Communion) avoiding all abominations: In theſe two reſpects

C I Need no better Analyſer than your ſelfe, ſave that you doe not onely reſolve my parts, but adde more: whereas every motion hath a double terme, from whence and whither: both theſe could not but fall into our diſcourſe. Having therefore formerly expoſtulated with you for your (ſince you will ſo terme it) impietie, in forſaking a ceremonious Babylon of your owne making in England; I thought it not unfit to compare your choyce with your refuſall; England with Amſterdam, which it pleaſeth you to intitle a ſubſtantiall Babylon: impiety and madneſſe are titles of your owne choyce; let your guiltineſſe be your owne accuſer: The truth is, my charity and your uncharitableneſſe have cauſed us to miſtake each other. My charity thus: Hearing both at Middleburgh, and here, that certaine companies from the parts of Nottingham and Lincolne (which Harbinger had beene newly in Zeland before mee) meant to retire themſelves to Amſterdam, for their full liberty, D not for the full approbation of your Church: not favouring your maine opinions, but emulating your freedome in too much hate of our Ceremonies, and too much accordance to ſome grounds of your hatred: I hoped you had beene one of their Guides; both becauſe Lincolneſhire was your Country, and Maſter Smith your Oracle, and Generall. Not daring therefore to charge you with perfect Browniſme, what could I thinke might bee a greater motive to this your ſuppoſed change, than the view of our (ſo oft proclaimed) wickedneſſe, and the hope of leſſe cauſe of offence in thoſe forraine parts? This I urged, fearing to goe deeper than I might be ſure to warrant: Now comes my charitable Anſwerer, and imputes this eaſineſſe of my challenge to my ignorance; and therefore will needs perſwade his Chriſtian Reader, that I knew nothing of the firſt ſeparation, becauſe I objected ſo little to the ſecond.

E It were ſtrange if I ſhould thinke, you gather Churches there by Towne-rowes (as wee in England) who know that ſome one Priſon might hold all your refined Flock. you gathered here by Hedge-rowes; but there it is eaſier to tell how you divide, than how you gather: let your Church bee an intire body, enjoying her owne ſpirituall Communion, yet if it be not a corroſive to your heart to converſe in the ſame ſtreets and to be ranged in the ſame Towne-rowes with Jewes, Arrians, Anabaptiſts, &c. you are no whit of kin to him, that vexed his righteous ſoule with the uncleanneſſes of foule Sodome. They are not of the World (ſaith Chriſt) as I am not of the World: Both Chriſt and they were parts of the Jewiſh Church: The Jewiſh Church was not ſo ſanctified, but the moſt were extremely uncleane: therefore we may be parts of a Viſible unſanctified Church, and yet be ſeparate from the World. The neereneſſe of the State & Church, & the great errors found by the Separatiſts in the French & Dutch Churches.

THe Church and State, if they be two, yet they are twins; and that ſo, as either's evill proves mutuall: the ſins of the City not reformed, blemiſh the Church: where the Church hath power and in a ſort comprehends the State, ſhe cannot waſh her hands of tolerated diſorders in the Common-wealth: hence is my compariſon of the Church (if you could have ſeene it, not the Kingdome) of England, with that of Amſterdam: I doubt not, but you could be content to ſing the old ſong of us, Bona terra, mala gens: Our Land you could like well, if you might be Lords alone. Thanks bee to God it likes not you, and juſtly thinks the meaneſt corner too good for ſo mutinous a generation: when it is weary of Peace, it will recall you: you that neither in Priſon, nor on the Seas, nor in the Coaſts of Virginia, nor in your way, nor in Netherland could live in Peace. What ſhal we hope of your eaſe at home? Where ye are, all you thankfull Tenants cannot in a powerfull Chriſtian ſtate move God to diſtinguiſh betwixt the known ſins of the City, and the Church: How oft hath our Gracious Soveraigne, and how importunately, been ſollicited for a Toleration of Religions? It is pity that the Papiſts hired not your Advocation: who in this point are thoſe true Caſſanders, which Reverend Calvin long ſince confuted: Their wiſhes herein are yours: To our ſhame and their excuſe: his Chriſtian heart held that toleration unchriſtian and intolerable, which you either neglect or magnifie: Good Conſtantine winkt at it in his beginning; but as David at the houſe of Zerviah: Succeeding times found theſe Canaanites to be pricks and thornes, and therefore both by Mulcts and baniſhments ſought either their yeeldance or avoydance. If your Magiſtrates having once given their names to the Church, endeavour not to purge this Augean Stable; how can you preferre their Communion to ours?

But howſoever now, leſt we ſhould thinke your Land-lords have too juſt cauſe to packe you away for Wranglers, you turne over all the blame from the Church to the City; yet your Paſtor and Church have ſo found the City in the Church and branded it with ſo blacke markes, as that all your ſmooth extenuations cannot make it a leſſe

A Iesse Babylon than the Church of England: Behold now, by your owne Confessions, either Amsterdam shall bee, or England shall not bee Babylon: These eleven crimes you have found and proclaimed in those Dutch and French Churches.

First, That the Assemblies are so contrived, that the whole Church comes not together in one: So that the Ministers cannot together with the Flocke sanctifie the Lords day; the presence of the members of the Church cannot be knowne, and finally, no publike action, whether Excommunication, or any other, can rightly bee performed. Could you say worse of us? Where neither Sabbath can bee rightly sanctified, nor presence or absence knowne, nor any holy action rightly performed, what can there bee but meere confusion? Fr. Iohns Artic. against the French and Dutch Churches.

Secondly, That they baptize the seed of them who are no members of any Visible Church; of whom moreover they have not care as of members, neither admit
B their Parents to the Lords Supper: Meere Babylonisme, and sinne in constitution, yea the same that makes us no Church: for what separation can there bee in such admittance? what other but a sinfull commixture? How is the Church of Amsterdam now gathered from the World?

Thirdly, That in the publike worship of God they have devised and used another forme of Prayer, besides that which Christ our Lord hath prescribed, Matth. 6. reading out of a Booke certaine Prayers invented and imposed by man. Behold here our fellow-Idolaters: and (as followes) a dayly Sacrifice of a set Service-Booke, which in stead of the sweet Incense of spirituall Praiers is offered to God; very Swines-flesh, a new Portuise, and an equall participation with us of the Curse of addition to the Word. Bar. against Giff.

Fourthly, That rule and commandement of Christ, Matth. 18. 15. they neither
C observe, nor suffer rightly to bee observed among them. How oft have you said that there can bee no sound Church without this course, because no separation? Behold the maine blemish of England in the face of Amsterdam!

Fifthly, That they worship God in the Idol Temples of Antichrist: so the Wine is marr'd with the Vessell; their service, abomination with ours: neither doe these Antichristian stones want all glorious ornaments of the Romish Harlot yet more.

Sixtly, That their Ministers have their set maintenance in another manner than Christ hath ordained, 1 Chron. 14. and that also such, as by which any Ministerie at all, whether Popish or other, might bee maintained: Either Tythes, or as ill: Behold, one of the maine Arguments whereby our Ministery is condemned as false and Antichristian, falling heavy upon our Neighbours.

Seventhly, That their Elders change yeerely, and doe not continue in their Office, according to the Doctrine of the Apostles and practice of the Primitive Church:
D What can our Church have worse than false Governours? Both annuall and perpetuall they cannot be: What is (if not this) a wrong in Constitution?

Eightly, That they celebrate mariage in the Church, as if it were a part of the Ecclesiasticall Administration: a foule shame and sinne: and what better than our third Sacrament?

Ninthly, That they use a new censure of suspension which Christ hath not appointed: no lesse than Englisn presumption.

Tenthly, That they observe daies and times, consecrating certaine daies in the yeere to the Nativitie, Resurrection, Ascension of Christ: Behold their Callender as truly possessed: Two Commandements solemnly broken at once; and wee not Idolaters alone.

Eleventhly, which is last and worst, that they receive unrepentant Excommu-
E nicates to bee members of their Church, which by this meanes becomes one bodie with such as bee delivered unto Sathan; therefore none of Christs bodie: England can bee but a miscelline rabble of prophane men; The Dutch and French Churches are belike no beter: who can bee worse than an unrepentant Excommunicate? Goe now, and say, It is the Apostasie of Antichrist to have communion with the World in the holy things of God, which are the peculiars of the Church, and cannot without Sacrilege bee so prostituted and prophaned; Goe say that the plaguy-spirituall-leprosie H. Ainsworth in his Counter poyson.

of sinne rising up in the foreheads of many in that Church, unshut up, uncovered, (yea, wilfully let loose) infects all both persons and things amongst them: Goe now and flie out of this Babylon also, as the He-Goats before the flocke, or returne to ours: But how-ever these errors be grosse, perhaps they are tractable; Not the sinne undoes the Church, but obstinacie: here is no evasion. For behold, you doe no more accuse those Churches of corruption, than of wilfulnesse: for divers times have you dealt with them about these fearefull enormities: yea you have often desired, that knowledge thereof might bee by themselves given to the whole bodie of their Church, or that (at least) they would take order it might bee done by you: They have refused both; What remaines, but they bee our fellow Heathens and publicans? And not they alone, but all Reformed Churches beside in Christendome, which doe joyntly partake in all these (except one or two personall) abominations: will you never leave, till you have wrangled your selves out of the world? A

But now I feare I have drawne you to say, that the hellish impieties both in the Citie and Church of Amsterdam, are but Frogs, Lice, Flies, Murraine, and other Ægyptian plagues, not prejudicing your Goshen: Say so if you dare; I feare they would soone make the Ocean your Red Sea, and Virginia your Wildernesse. B

The Church is Noahs Arke, which gave safty to her Guests, whereof yee are part; but remember that it had uncleane beasts also, and some savage: If the waves drowne you not, yet (mee thinkes) you should complaine of noisome societie. Sathans throne could not prejudice the Church of Pergamus: but did not the Balaamites (the Nicolaitans?) Yet their heavenly Communion stood, & the Angell is sent away with but threats.

SEP.

It is the will of God and of Christ, that his Church should abide in the world, and converse with it in the affaires thereof, which are common to both: But it is the Apostasie of Antichrist to have Communion with the World in the holy things of God, which are the peculiars of the Church, and cannot without great sacrilege bee so prostituted and prophaned. C

SECTION XLVI.

Conversation with the World.

AS it were madnesse to deny that the Church should converse with the World in the affaires thereof: So to deny her Communion in Gods Holythings, with any of those of the World, which professe Christianity (as yet uncensured) is a point of Anabaptisticall Apostasie: such of the World are still of the Church. As my censure cannot eject them, so their sinne (after my private endevour of redresse) cannot defile me: I speake of private Communicants: If any unbidden Guest come with a ragged garment, and unwashen hands, shall I forbeare Gods heavenly dainties? The Master of the Feast can say, Friend, how camest thou in hither? not, Friends, why came you hither with such a guest? God bids me come: Hee hath imposed this necessity, never allowed this excuse: My teeth shall not bee set on edge with the sowre Grapes of others: If the Church cast not out the knowne unworthy, the sinne is hers: If a man will come unworthy, the sin is his: But if I come not, because hee comes, the sinne is mine: I shall not answer for that others sinne: I shall answer for mine owne neglect: Another mans fault cannot dispense with my duty.

The aire of the Gospell which you draw in, is nothing so free and cleare as you make shew: it is only because you are used to it, that makes you so judge. The thicke smeake of your canons, especially of such as are planted against the Kingdome of Christ the visible Church, and the administration of it, doe both obscure and poison the aire, which you all draw in, and wherein you breath. The daily sacrifice of the service-booke, which in stead of spirituall Prayer, sweet as incense, you offer up Morning and Evening, smels so strong of the Popes Portuise, as it makes many hundreds amongst your selves, stop their noses at it, and yet you boast of the free & cleere aire of the Gospell, wherein you breath.* E

SECTION LV.

AS there is no Element which is not through many mixtures departed from the firſt ſimplicity: So no Church ever breathed in ſo pure an aire, as that it might not juſtly complaine of ſome thicke and unwholſome evaporations of errour and ſin. If you challenge an immunitie, you are herein the true brood of the ancient Puritanes: But if too many ſinnes in practice have thickned the aire of our Church, yet not one Hereſie: that ſmoke of the bottomleſſe pit hath never corrupted it: and therefore juſtly may I averre, that here you might draw in the clear aire of the Goſpell: No where upon earth more freely. And if this be but the opinion of cuſtome, you whom abſence hath helped with a more nice and dainty ſent, ſpeak your worſt: Shew us our Hereſies, and ſhame us: you have done it, and behold four maine infections of our Engliſh aire: The firſt, the ſmoke of our Canons: Wittily: I feare, the great Ordinances of the Church have troubled you more with the blow, than the ſmoke: For you tell us of their Plantation againſt the Kingdome of Chriſt: What Kingdome? The viſible Church: Which is that? Not the reformedſt peece of ours, whoſe beſt are but Goats and Swine: Not the cloſe Nicodemians of your owne Sect amongſt us, which would be loth to be viſible: Not forrainers; to them they extend not: None therefore in all the world, but the Engliſh Parlour-full at Amſterdam: Can there be any truer Donatiſme? Cry you ſtill out of their poyſoning the aire: We hold it the beſt cleanſed by the batteries of your idle fancies, by ridding you from our aire, and by making this your Church inviſible to us; ſmart you thus till we complaine.

The ſecond is the plague or leproſie of ſin unſhut up and uncovered: Wee know that ſin is as ill as the Devill can make it; a moſt loathſome thing in the eies of God, and his Angels, and Saints: and we grant to our griefe, that among ſo many millions of men, there may bee found ſome thouſands of Lepers: good Lawes and cenſures meet with ſome, others eſcape: It is not ſo much our fault as our griefe. But that this Leproſie infects all perſons, and things, is ſhamefully over-reacht: Plague and Leproſie have their limits, beyond which, is no contagion: If a man come not neer them, if he take the wind in an open ayre, they infect not: ſuch is ſin: It can infect none but the guilty: Thoſe which act or aſſent to, or beare with it, or deteſt it not, are in this pollution: But thoſe which can mourne for it, and cannot redreſſe it, are free from infection: How many foule Lepers ſpiritually did our Saviour ſee in the publike ayre of the Jewiſh Church? wherewith yet he joyned, and his, not fearing infection ſo much, as gracing the remnants of their ruinous Church: Were thoſe ſeven thouſand Iſraelites, whoſe knees bowed not to Baal, infected with the Idolatrie of their Neighbours? yet continued they ſtill parts of the ſame Church.

But this yet exceeds: Not onely all perſons, but all things; What? Our Goſpell? Our Heaven, Earth, Sea? Our Bookes, Coyne, Commodities? Behold, you ſee the ſame Heaven with us, you have no Bibles but ours: our ayre in his circular motion comes to bee yours: the water that waſheth our Iland, perhaps waſheth your hands. Our uncleane Silver (I feare) maintains you: Our commodities (in part) inrich your Land-Lords: and yet all things amongſt us infected? you are content to take ſome evill from your Neighbours.

The third is our blaſting Hierarchie, which ſuffers no good thing (that is, no Browniſt, no ſingular fancie, for what good things have we but yours?) to grow, or proſper amongſt us, but withers all, both bud and branch, would to God the roote alſo.

The laſt, is a daily Sacrifice of a Service-book: an Incenſe, how ever unſavory to you, yet ſuch as all Churches in Chriſtendome hold ſweet, and offer up as fit for the noſtrils of the Almighty; we are not alone thus tainted; all Chriſtian Churches that are, or have been, preſent the ſame Cenſures unto God. But ours ſmels ſtrong of the Popes Portuiſe: See whether this be any better than triviall cavilling: If either an ill man, or a Devill ſhall ſpeak that which is good; may not a good man uſe it? If a good Angell, or man ſhall ſpeak that which is evill, is it ever the better for the Deliverer? If Satan

Ac tametſi vos inter vos vicißim de re quapiam minimi momenti diſſentitis (ſiquidem neque omnes de omnibus rebus idem ſentimus) nihilominus tamen fieri poterit, ut eximia concordia ſincerè inter vos, integreque ſervetur, & una inter omnes communio & conſociatio cuſtodiatur.*

THat which followeth is but words, a ſhort anſwer is too much: That all Chriſtendome magnifies the worthineſſe of our Church, in ſo cleare evidences of their owne voices, you cannot deny; and now when you ſee ſuch teſtimonies abroad (leſt you ſhould ſay nothing) you fetch cavills from home: Thoſe men which (you ſay) complaine ſo much of their miſerable condition under the Prelates impoſitions, have notwithſtanding with the ſame pens and tongues not only juſtified our Church, but extold it: you have found no ſharper adverſaries in this very accuſation, for which you maliciouſly cite them: How freely, how fully have they evinced the truth? yea, the happineſſe of the Church of England againſt your falſe challenges: and yet your forehead dare challenge them for Authors. So hath their moderation oppoſed ſome appendances, that they have both acknowledged and defended the ſubſtance with equall vehemencie to your oppoſition: neither do they ſuffer (as you traduce them) for ſeeking an other Church goverment: looke into the Millinaries petition (the common voice of that part) I am deceived, if ought of their complaints ſound that way, much leſſe of their ſufferings: deformity in practice is objected to them, not indeavour of innovation; That quarrell hath been long ſilent, your motion cannot revive it: would God you could as much follow thoſe men in moderate and charitable carriage, as you have out-run them in complaint. D

It pleaſeth you to deviſe us, like pictures upon courſe canvaſſe, which ſhew faireſt at fartheſt; attributing forraine approbation (which you cannot deny) to diſtance, more than to deſert. How is it then, that (beſide ſtrange witneſſes) we which looke upon this face without prejudice, commend it, (God knowes) without flatterie? we can at once acknowledge her infirmities, and bleſſe God for her graces: Our neighbours, (yea, our ſelves) of Scotland, know our Church ſo well, that they do with one E

A consent praise her for one of Gods best daughters; neither doe the most rigorous amongst them, more dislike our Episcopall Government, than imbrace our Church: what fraud is this; to flye from the Church in common, to one circumstance? we can honour that noble Church in Scotland, may wee not dislike their alienations of Church-livings? If one thing offend, doe all displease? Yet even this Government, which you would have them resist to bonds and banishment (who knowes not?) begins to find both favour and place: what choice other Churches would make, as you doubt not, so you care not. If you regard their sentence, how durst you revile her as a false Harlot, whom they honour as a deare Sister? If you were more theirs than we, you might upbraid us: Now you tell us what perhaps they would doe; we tell you what they doe, and will doe: Even with one voyce, blesse God for England, as the most famous and flourishing Church in Christendome: your handfull onely makes
B faces, and envies this true glory. Who yet (you say) despise not our graces, no more than we those of Rome: See how you despise us while you say, you are free from despite: How malicious is this comparison? as if we were to you, as Rome to us: and yet you despise us more: Wee grant Rome a true Baptisme, true Visibility of a Church, though monstrously corrupted: you give us not so much: Thanks be to God, we care lesse for your censure, than you doe for our Church: Wee have by Gods mercy the true and right use of the Word and Sacraments, and all other essentiall gifts and graces of God; if there might be some further helpes in execution, to make these more effectuall, we resist not: But those your other imaginary ordinances, as we have not, so we want not: Neither the Caldeans, nor any Idolatrous enemies could make Sion Babylon, nor the holy vessels prophane; so as they should cease to be fit for Gods use: but they were brought backe at the returne of the captivity, to Ierusalem: Such were
C our Worship, Ministery, Sacraments, and those manifold subjects of your cavils, which whilst you disgrace for their former abuse, you call our good evill, and willingly despise our graces.

SEP.

Where the truth is a gainer, the Lord (which is truth) cannot be a loser. Neither is the thankes of ancient favours lost amongst them, which still presse on towards new mercies: Vnthankfull are they unto the blessed Majesty of God, and unfaithfull also, which knowing the will of their Master doe it not, but goe on presumptuously in disobedience to many the holy ordinances of the Lord and of his Christ, which they know, and in word also acknowledge, he hath given to his Church to be observed, and not for idle speculation, and disputation without obedience.

It is not by our sequestration, but by our confusion, that Rome and Hell gaines. Your odious commixture of all sorts of people in the body of your Church, in whose lap the vilest miscreants are dandled, sucking her brests as her naturall children, and are be-blest by her (as having right thereunto) with all her holy things, as Prayer, Sacraments, and other Ceremonies, is that which advantageth hell, in the finall obduration and perdition of the wicked, whom by these meanes you flatter and deceive.

D The Romish Prelacie and Priesthood amongst you, with the appurtenances for their maintenance and ministrations, are Romes advantage. Which therefore she challengeth as her owne, and by which she also still holds possession amongst you, under the hope of regaining her full inheritance at one time or other. And if the Papists take advantage at our condemnation of you, and separation from you: it concernes you, well to see where the blame is, and there to lay it; lest through light and inconsiderate judgement, you justifie the wicked, and condemne the righteous.

E SECTION LVII.

ALL the sequell of my Answerer is meerely sententious: it is fitter for us to learne than reply: Where the truth gaines (say you) God loseth not: I tell you againe, where God loseth, the truth gaineth not, and where the Church loseth, God (which indowed her) cannot but lose: Alas, what can the truth either get or save by such unkind quarrels? Surely suspition on some hands, on others rejection: for (as Optatus of his Donatists) betwixt our Licet, and your Non licet, many poore soules waver and doubt: nether will settle, because wee agree not: Thanks are not

The issue of Separation.

Inter licet vestrum, & non licet nostrum, nutant ac vremigant animae Christianorum. Optat. contr. Parm.

loſt, where new favours are called for, but where old are denied. While your Poeſie is: Such as the mother, ſuch is the daughter; where are our old, our any mercies? They are unthankfull, which know what God hath done, and confeſſe it not: They are unthankfull to God and his Deputy, which knowing themſelves made to obey, preſume to over-rule, and upon their private authority, obtrude to the Church thoſe ordinances to be obſerved, which never had being but in their owne idle ſpeculation. A

Your Sequeſtration and our confuſion, are both of them beneficiall, where they ſhould not: and as you pretend our confuſion for the cauſe of your Separation; So is your Separation the true cauſe of too much trouble, and confuſion in the Church: Your odious tale of commixture hath cloyed and ſurfeted your Reader already, and received anſwer to ſatiety: this one diſh ſo oft brought forth, argues your poverty: The viſible Church is Gods Drag-net, and Field, and Floore, and Arke; here will be ever at her beſt, Sedge, Tares, Chaffe, uncleane Creatures: yet is this no pretence for her neglect: the notoriouſly evill ſhe caſts from her breſt, and knee, denying them the uſe of her Prayers, and (which your Leaders miſlike) of her Sacrament. If divers through corruption of unfaithfull Officers, eſcape cenſure; yet let not the tranſgreſſions of ſome, redound to the condemnation of the whole Church. In Gods judgement it ſhall not; we care little, if in yours. We tell wicked men they may goe to hell with the water of Baptiſme in their faces, with the Church in their mouthes, we denounce Gods judgements unpartially againſt their ſinnes, and them: Thus we flatter, thus we deceive. If yet they will needs run to perdition: Perditio tua ex te Iſrael. B

Non enim propter malos boni deſerendi, ſed propter bonos mali tolerandi ſunt, &c. Sicut tolleraverunt Prophetæ, &c. Aug. Ep 48. Barr. againſt Gyff.

Our Clergy is ſo Romiſh as our Baptiſme: If therefore Romiſh becauſe they came thence, we have diſproved it; If therefore Romiſh, becauſe they have beene uſed there, wee grant and juſtifie it; That ancient confeſſion of their faith which was famous through the world, we receive with them: If they hold one God, one Baptiſme, one Heaven, one Chriſt, ſhall we renounce it? Why ſhould we not caſt off our Chriſtendome and humanity, becauſe the Romans had both? How much Rome can either challenge, or hope to gaine in our Clergy and Miniſtration, is well witneſſed by the bloud of thoſe Martyrs, eminent in the Prelacy, which in the freſh memories of many was ſhed for God, againſt that Harlot: and by the excellent labours of others, both Biſhops and Doctors: whoſe learned pens have pulled downe more of the wals of Rome, than all the corner-creeping Browniſts in the world ſhall ever be able to doe, while Amſterdam ſtandeth. It is you that furniſh theſe adverſaries with advantages, through your wilfull diviſions: Take Scilurus his arrowes, ſingle out of the sheafe, the leaſt finger breakes them, while the whole bundle feares no treſſe: we know well where the blame is, our deſervings can bee no protection to you: you went from us, not we from you. Plead not our conſtraint, you ſhould not have beene compelled to forſake us, while Chriſt is with us: But who compels you not to call us brethren? to deny us Chriſtians? Your zeale is ſo farre from juſtifying the wicked, that it condemnes the righteous. C D

SEP.

And for the ſuſpition of the rude multitude, you need not much feare it. They will ſuſpect nothing that comes under the Kings broad ſeale: they are ignorant of this fault. Though it were the maſſe that came with authority of the magiſtrate, they (for the moſt part) would be without ſuſpition of it: ſo ignorant and profane are they in the moſt places, 1 Sam. 10. 10. It is the wiſe-hearted amongſt you, that ſuſpect your dealings, who will alſo ſuſpect you yet more, as your unſound dealing ſhall be further diſcovered. E

SECTION LVIII.

The Browniſts ſcornfull opinion of our people.

HOw ſcornfully doe you turne over our poore rude multitude, as if they were beaſts, not men; or if men, not rude but ſavage! This contempt needed not: Theſe ſonnes of the earth may goe before you to Heaven: Indeed it was of old ſaid, that all Ægyptians were Phyſitians: So may it now of you; All Browniſts are Divines, no Separatiſt cannot propheſie: No ſooner can they look at the skirts of this hill, but they are rapt from the ordinary pitch of men: Either this change is perhaps

A haps by some strange illumination, or else your learned paucity got their skill amongst our profane and rude multitude: we have still many in our rude multitude, whom we dare compare with your Teachers: neither is there any so lewd and profane, that cannot pretend a scandall from your separation: Even these soules must bee regarded (tho not by you.) Such were some of you, but ye are washed, &c.

The wise-hearted amongst us doe more than suspect, find out our weaknesses, and bewaile them; yet doe they not more discover our imperfections than acknowledge our truth: If they be truly wise, we cannot suspect them, they cannot forsake us: Their charity will cover more than their wisdome can discover.

SEP.

Lastly, the terrible threat you utter against us, that even whoredomes and murders shall B abide an easier answer than separation, would certainly fall heavy upon us, if this answer were to be made in your Consistory Courts, or before any of your Ecclesiasticall Iudges; but because we know, that not Antichrist, but Christ shall be our Iudge, wee are bold upon the warrant of his Word and Testament, (which being sealed with his bloud may not be altered) to proclaime to all the world Separation from whatsoever riseth up rebellionsly against the Scepter of his Kingdome, as we are undoubtedly perswaded, the Communion, Government, Ministery, and worship of the Church of England doe.

SECTION LIX.

MY last threat, of the easier answers of whordomes, and adulteries, than separation, you thinke to scoffe out of countenance. I feare your conscience will not alwayes allow this mirth; Our Consistories have spared you enough: let C those which have tried, say, whether your corrupt Eldership be more safe Iudges: If ours imprison justly, yours excommunicate unjustly; to be in custody is lesse grievous, than out of the Church: at least if your censures were worth any thing, but contempt: As Ierome said of the like; it is well that malice hath not so great power as will: you shall one day (I feare) find the Consistory of Heaven more rigorous, if you wash not this wrong with your teares; That tribunall shall find your confidence, presumption; your zeale, fury. You are bold (surely more than wise) to proclaime: wee have no need of such cries: doubtlesse your head hath made Proclamations long, now your hand begins. What proclaime you? Separation from the Communion, Government, Ministery, and worship of the Church of England: what need it? Your act might have saved your voyce: what should our eyes and eares be troubled with one bad object?

But why separate you from these? Becausse they rise up rebellionsly against the D Scepter of Christ: The Scepter of Christ is his Word: he holds it out, we touch and kisse it: What one sentence of it doe we wilfully oppose? Away with these foolish impieties; you thrust a Reed into your Saviours hand; and say, Haile, King of the Iewes, and will needs perswade us, none but this is his rod of iron. Lastly, upon what warrant? Of his will and Testament. You may wrong us; But how dare you fasten your lies upon your Redeemer and Judge? What clause of his hath bid you separate? We have the true Copies: As we hope or desire to be saved, we can find no sentence that soundeth toward the favour of this your act: Must God be accused of your wilfulnesse? Before that God and his blessed Angels and Saints, wee feare not to protest that wee are undoubtedly perswaded that whosoever wilfully forsakes the Communion, Government, Ministery, or worship of the Church of England, are enemies to the Scepter of Christ, and Rebels against his Church and Annointed; neither doubt we to say, that E the Mastership of the Hospitall at Norwich, or a lease from that City (sued for with repulse) might have procured that this separation from the Communion, Government, and worship of the Church of England should not have beene made

A SERIOVS DISSWASIVE FROM POPERIE.

To W. D. Revolted, &c.

YOV challenged mee for my bold assertion of your manifold divisions: I doe here make it good with usurie. Those mouths that say they teach you the truth, say also (and you have beleeved them) that they all teach the same. As you finde them true in this, so trust them in the other: For mee, I cannot without indignation see, that in this light of the Gospell, God and his truth should thus bee losers by you; and that a miserable soule should suffer it selfe thus grossely cozened of it selfe, and glory: Many can write to you with more profoundnesse, none with more sincere fervencie, and desire to save you.

I call heaven and earth to record against you this day, that if you relent or answer not, your perishing is wilfull. Wee may pittie your weaknesse, but God shall plague your Apostasie: if you had been bred in blindnesse, your ignorance had been but lamentable, now your choice and love of darknesse is fearfull and desperate. Alas! you cannot bee condemned without our sorrow and shame. What should we doe? Wee can but intreat, perswade, protest, mourne, and gage our soules for yours; if these availe not, who can remedie that which will perish? Heare this yet (you weake Revolter) if there be any care left in you of that soule which you have thus prostituted to error; if you have any regard to that God whose simple truth you have contemned and forsaken: what is this that hath driven you from us, allured you to them? For Gods sake, let me but expostulate a little ere my silence: Either bee convicted or inexcusable. Our bad lives have set you off; Woe is me that they are no holier; I bewaile our wickednesse, I defend it not; Onely aske how they live in Italie; if they bee not (for the most part) filths to the worst of ours, goe with them and prosper. Let all indifferent tongues say, whether that very See whereon your faith depends, even within the smoke of his Holinesse, be not (for viciousnesse) the sinke of the world; we may condemne our selves, their lives shall justifie us; But you list not to looke so farre; you see their lives at home, you see ours: The comparison is not equall; They take this for the time of their persecution; we of our prosperitie. The stubborneſt Israelite, and the most godlesse Mariner, could call upon God in his trouble: wee are all worse with liberty: Looke backe and see how they lived in former times while they prospered; No Turkes (saith Erasmus) more abominably: though now at the worst, how many holy professors might you finde, which would scorne that the most strict Hermit, or austere Cappucine, should goe before them in a gratious life, and in true mortification? even amongst twelue, there will be one Devill: I wish they were so good, that wee might emulate them: but for my part, I never yet could could know that Papiſt, which made conſcience of all Gods ten morall lawes: Shortly, whatſoever is upbraided to us; the truth is pure, though men be unholy; and God is where he was, whatſoever becomes of men: For you, if you had not fallen to coole affections, and a looſe life, you had been ſtill ours: It is juſt with God to puniſh your ſecure negligence with error and deluſion; and to ſuffer you thus to loſe the truth, who had loſt your care of obedience and firſt love. And now you doe well to ſhift off this blame to others ſins, which have moſt cauſe to accuſe your owne.
